On the other hand, persons whom the women have long deplored, and the men long pitied as having no "manner," who blush when you speak to them, and blunder when they speak to you, suddenly jump up in the House with a self-confidence, which is only equalled by their consummate ability. And so it was with Arundel Dacre. He rose the first night that he took his seat, a great disadvantage, of which no one was more sensible than himself, and for two hours and a-half he harangued the fullest House that had ever been assembled, with the self-possession of an habitual debater. His clenching argument, and his luminous detail, might have been expected from one who had the reputation of having been a student. What was more wonderful was, the withering sarcasm that blasted like the sinooon, the brilliant sallies of wit that flashed like a sabre, the gushing eddies of humour that drowned all opposition and overwhelmed those ponderous and unwieldy arguments which the producers announced as rocks, but which he proved to be porpoises. Never was there such a triumphant début; and a peroration of genuine eloquence, because of genuine feeling, concluded amid the long and renewed cheers of all parties.

The truth is, Eloquence is the child of Knowledge. When a mind is full, like a wholesome river, it is also clear. Confusion and obscurity are much oftener the results of ignorance than of inefficiency. Few are the men who cannot express their meaning when the occasion demands the energy; as the lowest will defend their lives with acuteness, and sometimes even with eloquence. They are masters of their subject. Knowledge must be gained by ourselves. Mankind may supply us with facts; but the results, even if they agree with previous ones, must be the work of our own mind. To make others feel, we must feel ourselves; and to feel ourselves, we must be natural. This we can never be when we are vomiting forth the dogmas of the schools. Knowledge is not a mere collection of words; and it is a delusion to suppose that thought can be obtained by the aid of any other intellect than our own. What is repetition, by a curious mystery, ceases to be truth, even if it were truth when it was first heard; as the shadow in a mirror, though it move and mimic all the actions of vitality, is not life. When a man is not speaking, or writing, from his own mind, he is as insipid company as a looking-glass.

Before a man can address a popular assembly with command he must know something of mankind, and he can know nothing of mankind without he knows something of himself. Self-knowledge is the property of that man whose passions have their play, but who ponders over their results. Such a man sympathizes by inspiration with his kind. He has a key to every heart. He can divine, in the flash of a single thought, all that they require, all that they wish. Such a man speaks to their very core. All feel that a masterly hand tears off the veil of cant, with which, from necessity, they have enveloped their souls; for cant is nothing more than the sophistry which results from attempting to account for what is unintelligible, or to defend what is improper.

Perhaps, although we use the term, we never have had oratory in England. There is an essential difference between oratory and debating. Oratory seems an accomplishment confined to the ancients, unless the French preachers may put in their claim, and some of the Irish lawyers. Mr. Shiel's speech in Kent was a fine oration; and the boobies who taunted him for having got it by rote were not aware that in doing so he only wisely followed the examples of Pericles, Demosthenes, Lysias, Isocrates, Hortensius, Cicero, Cæsar, and every great orator of antiquity. Oratory is essentially the accomplishment of antiquity: it was their most efficient mode of communicating thought; it was their substitute for printing.

I like a good debate; and, when a stripling, used often to be stiled in the gallery, or enjoy the easier privileges of a member's son. I like, I say, a good debate, and have no objection to a due mixture of bores, which are a relief. I remember none of the giants of former days: but I have heard Canning. He was a consummate rhetorician; but there seemed to me a dash of commonplace in all that he said, and frequent indications of the absence of an original mind. To the last he never got clear of "good God, sir!" and all the other hackneyed ejaculations of his youthful debating clubs. The most commanding speaker that I ever listened to is, I think, Sir Francis Burdett. I never heard him in the House,—but at an election. He was full of music, grace, and dignity, even amid all the vulgar tumult; and, unlike all mob orators, raised the taste of the populace to him, instead of lowering his own to theirs. His colleague, Mr. Hobbhouse, seemed to me ill qualified for a demagogue, though he spoke with power. He is rather too elaborate, and a little heavy, but fluent, and never weak. His thoughtful and highly cultivated mind maintains him under all circumstances; and his breeding never deserts him. Sound sense comes recommended from his lips by the language of a scholar and the urbanity of a gentleman.

Mr. Brougham, at present, reigns paramount in the House of Commons. I think the lawyer has spoiled the statesman. He is said to have very great powers of sarcasm. From what I have observed there, I should think very little ones would be quite sufficient. Many a sneer withers in those walls which would scarcely, I think, blight a currant-bush out of them; and I have seen the House convulsed with raillery which, in other society, would infallibly settle the railler to be a bore beyond all tolerance. Even an idiot can raise a smile. They are so good-natured, or find it so dull. Mr. Canning's badinage was the most successful, though I confess I have listened to few things more calculated to make a man gloomy. But the House always ran riot, taking every thing for granted, and cracked their universal sides before he opened his mouth. The fault of Mr. Brougham is, that he holds no intellect at present in great dread, and, consequently, allows himself on all occasions to run wild. Few men hazard more unphilosophical observations; but he is safe because there is no one to notice them. On all great occasions Mr. Brougham has come up to the mark,—an infallible test of a man of genius.

I hear that Mr. Babington Macauley is to be returned. If he speaks half as well as he writes, the House will be in fashion again. I fear that he is one of those who, like the individual whom he has most studied, "will give up to party what was meant for mankind."

At any rate, he must get rid of his rabidity. He writes now on all subjects, as if he certainly intended to be a renegade, and was determined to make the contrast complete.

Mr. Peel is a model of a minister, and improves as a speaker; though, like most of the rest, he is fluent without the least style. He should not get so often in a passion, either, or, if he do, should not get out of one so easily. His sweet apologies are cloying. His candour—he will do well to get rid of that. He can make a present of it to Mr. Huskisson.

Mr. Hnskisson is a memorable instance of the value of knowledge, which maintains a man under all circumstances and all disadvantages, and will. I am not sure now, if I were king,—which, thank God! I am not, because I should then be prevented from being the most dutiful of subjects, which, thank God! I am,—I am not sure, I say, if I were his most gracious majesty, and the present cabinet could not go on, I am not sure that I should not send for Mr. Huskisson.

"Huskisson!" I should say, "the duke can whip it on no longer. If you like to try, you may. But, hark ye! no more coalitions, and no more explanations. I have no idea of the first estate of the realm having again to do the duty of the two others. If you have a party strong enough, you shall have a fair trial. You need not speak at present. Luncheon is in the next room. When you have taken a bottle of hock, we shall get a little truth out of you."

In the Lords I admire The Duke. The readiness with which he has adopted the air of a debater shows the man of genius. There is a gruff, husky sort of a downright Montaignish naïveté about him, which is quaint, unusual, and tells. You plainly perceive that he is determined to be a civilian; and he is as offended if you drop a hint that he occasionally wears a uniform, as a servant on a holiday if you mention the word livery.

Lord Grey speaks with feeling, and is better to hear than to read, though ever strong and impressive. Lord Holland's speeches are like a refuocimento of all the suppressed passages in Clarendon, and the notes in the new edition of Bishop Burnet's Memoirs: but taste throws a delicate hue over the curious medley, and the candour of a philosophic mind shows, that in the library of Holland House he can sometimes cease to be a partisan.

Lord Goderich speaks too often, and not sufficiently to the purpose; but he is a man of talents. These Canningites sadly want a leader, and are scattered about in a very loose style, indeed. I think I must come over. It would take a month though, I should think, to knock up the present administration, provided it were February, and not leap-year. But then I must be consistent, and not compromise my principles, which will never do in England—more than once a-year. Let me see: what are they? Am I a whig or a tory? I forget. As for the tories, I admire antiquity, particularly a ruin; even the relics of the temple of intolerance have a charm. I think I am a tory. But then the whigs give such good dinners, and are the most amusing. I think I am a whig; but then the tories are so moral, and morality is my forte: I must be a tory. But the whigs dress so much better; and an ill-dressed party, like an ill-dressed man, must be wrong. Yes! I am a decided whig. And yet—I feel like Garrick between tragedy and comedy. I think I will be a whig and tory alternate nights, and then both will be pleased: or I have no objection, according to the fashion of the day, to take a place under a tory minister, provided I may vote against them.

One thing is quite clear,—that a man may speak very well in the House of Commons, and fail very completely in the House of Lords. There are two distinct styles requisite; I intend, in the course of my career, if I have time, to give a specimen of both. In the lower House, Don Juan may perhaps be our model; in the upper House, Paradise Lost.

CHAPTER VII.

Nothing was talked of in Yorkshire but Mr. Arundel Dacre's speech. All the world flocked to Castle Dacre, to compliment and to congratulate; and a universal hope was expressed that he might come in for the county, if indeed the success of his eloquence did not enable his uncle to preoccupy that honour. Even the calm Mr. Dacre shared the general elation, and told the Duke of St. James regularly every day that it was all owing to him. May Dacre was enthusiastic; but her gratitude to him was synonymous with her love for Arundel, and valued accordingly. The duke, however, felt that he had acted at once magnanimously, generously, and wisely. The consciousness of a noble action is itself ennobling. His spirit expanded with the exciting effects which his conduct had produced; and he felt consolation under all his misery, from the conviction that he had now claims to be remembered, and perhaps regarded, when he was no more among them.

The bill went swimmingly through the Commons, the majority of two gradually swelling into eleven; and the important night in the Lords was at hand.

"Lord Faulconcourt writes," said Mr. Dacre, "that they expect only thirty-eight against us."

"Ah! that terrible House of Lords!" said May Dacre. "Let us see: when does it come on—the day after to-morrow? Scarcely forty-eight hours and all will be over, and we shall be just where we were.—You and your friends manage very badly in your House," she added, addressing herself to the duke.

"I do all I can," said his grace, smiling: "Barlington has my proxy."

"That is exactly what I complain of. On such an occasion there should be no proxies. Personal attendance would indicate a keener interest in the result. Ah! if I were the Duke of St. James for one night!"

"Ah! that you would be the Dutchess of St. James!" thought the duke; but a despairing lover has no heart for jokes, and so he did not give utterance to the wish. He felt a little agitated, and caught May Dacre's eye. She smiled and slightly blushed, as if she felt the awkwardness of her remark, though too late.

The duke retired early, but not to sleep. His mind was busied on a great deed. It was past midnight before he could compose his agitated feelings to repose, and by five o'clock he was again up. He dressed himself, and then put on a rough travelling coat, which, with a shawl, effectually disguised his person; and putting in one pocket a shirt, and in the other a few articles from his dressing-case, the Duke of St. James stole out of Castle Dacre, leaving a note for his host accounting for his sudden departure by urgent business at Hauteville, and promising a return in a day or two.

The fresh morn had fully broke. He took his hurried way through the long dewy grass, and, crossing the park, gained the road, which however was not the high one. He had yet another hour's rapid walk before he could reach his point of destination; and when that was accomplished, he found himself at a small public-house, bearing for a sign his own arms, and situated in the high road opposite his own park. He was confident that his person was unknown to the host, or to any of the early idlers who were lingering about the mail, then breakfasting.

"Any room, guard, to London?"

"Room inside, sir,—just going off."

The door was opened, and the Duke of St. James took his seat in the Edinburgh and York Mail. He had two companions: the first, because apparently the most important, was a hard-featured, gray-headed gentleman, with a somewhat supercilious look, and a mingled air of acuteness and conceit; the other was an humble-looking widow in her weeds, middle-aged, and sad. These persons had recently roused themselves from their nocturnal slumbers, and now, after their welcome meal and hurried toilet, looked as fresh as birds.

"Well! now we are off," said the gentleman. "Very neat, cleanly little house this, ma'am," continued he to his companion. "What is the sign?"—"The Hauteville arms."—"O! Hauteville—that is—that is—let me see!—the St. James family. Ah! a pretty fool that young man has made himself, by all accounts—eh! sir?"

"I have reason to believe so," said the duke.

"I suppose this is his park—eh? Hem! going to London, sir?"

"I am."

"Ah! hem! Hauteville Park, I suppose, this. Fine ground wasted. What the use of parks is, I can't say."

"The place seems well kept up," said the widow.

"So much the worse—I wish it were in ruins."

"Well, for my part," continued the widow, in a low voice, "I think a park the most beautiful thing we have. Foreigners, you know, sir—"

"Ah! I know what you are going to say," observed the gentleman, in a curt, gruff voice. "It is all nonsense. Foreigners are fools. Don't talk to me of beauty—a mere word. What is the use of all this! It produces about as much benefit to society as its owner does."

"And do you think his existence, then, perfectly useless?" asked the duke.

"To be sure, I do. So the world will, some day or other. We are opening our eyes fast. Men begin to ask themselves what the use of an aristocracy is? That is the test, sir."

"I think it not very difficult to demonstrate the use of an aristocracy," mildly observed the duke.

"Pooh! nonsense, sir! I know what you are going to say; but we have got beyond all that. Have you read this, sir? This article on the aristocracy in 'The Screw and Lever Review?'"

"I have not, sir."

"Then I advise you to make yourself master of it, and you will talk no more of the aristocracy. A few more articles like this, and a few more noblemen like the man who has got this park, and people will open their eyes at last."

"I should think," said his grace, "that the follies of the man who has got this park have been productive of evil only to himself. In fact, sir, according to your own system, a prodigal noble seems to be a very desirable member of the commonwealth, and a complete leveller."

"We shall get rid of them all soon, sir," said his companion, with a malignant smile.

"I have heard that he is very young, sir," remarked the widow.

"What is that to you or me?"

"Ah! youth is a very trying time. Let us hope the best! He may turn out well yet, poor soul!"

"I hope not. Don't talk to me of poor souls. There is a poor soul," said the utilitarian, pointing to an old man breaking stones on the highway. "That is what I call a poor soul, not a young prodigal, whose life has been one long career of infamous debauchery."

"You appear to have heard much of this young nobleman," said the duke; "but it does not follow, sir, that you have heard truth."

"Very true, sir," said the widow. "The world is very foul-mouthed. Let us hope he is not so very bad."

"I tell you what, my friends; you know nothing about what you are talking. I don't speak without foundation. You have not the least idea, sir, how this fellow has lived. Now what I am going to tell you is a fact: I know it to be a fact. A very intimate friend of mine, who is an intimate friend of a friend who knows a person who is a very intimate friend of an intimate friend of a person who knows the Duke of St. James, told me himself, that one night they had for supper—what do you think, ma'am?—Venison cutlets, each served up in a hundred pound note, and sovereign sauce."

"Mercy!" exclaimed the widow.

"And do you believe it?" asked the duke.

"Believe it! I know it!"

"He is very young," said the widow. "Youth is a very trying time."

"Nothing to do with his youth. It's the system—the infernal system. If that man had to work for his bread, like everybody else, do you think he would dine off bank-notes? No! to be sure he wouldn't! It's the system."

"Young people are very wild!" said the widow.

"Pooh! ma'am, nonsense! Don't talk cant. If a man be properly educated, he is as capable at one-and-twenty of managing any thing as at any time in his life: more capable. Look at the men who write 'The Screw and Lever'—the first men in the country. Look at them. Not one of age. Look at the man who wrote this article on the aristocracy—young Duncan Macmorrough. Look at him, I say—the first man in the country by far."

"I never heard his name before," calmly observed the duke.

"Not heard his name?—not heard of young Duncan Macmorrough—first man of the day, by far,—not heard of him! Go and ask the Marquis of Sheephead what he thinks of him. Go and ask Lord Two and Two what he thinks of him. Duncan dines with Lord Two and Two every week."

The duke smiled, and his companion proceeded.

"Well, again, look at his friends. There is young First Principles. What a head that fellow has got! Here, this article on India is by him. He'll knock up their charter. He is a clerk in the India House. Up to the detail, you see. Let me read you this passage on monopolies. Then there is young Tribunal Quirk. By G—, what a mind that fellow has got! By G—, nothing but first principles will go down with these fellows! They laugh at any thing else. By G—, sir, they look upon the administration of the present day as a parcel of sucking babes! When I was last in town Quirk told me that he would not give that for all the public men that ever existed! He is keeping his terms at Gray's Inn. This article on a new code is by him. Shows as plain as light that by sticking close to first principles the laws of the country might be carried in every man's waistcoat pocket."

The coach stopped, and a colloquy ensued.

"Any room to Selby?"

"Outside or in?"

"Out, to be sure."

"Room inside only."

"Well! in then."

The door opened, and a singularly quaint-looking personage presented himself. He was very stiff and prim in his appearance; dressed in a blue coat, and scarlet waistcoat, with a rich bandanna handkerchief tied very neatly round his neck, and a very new hat, to which his head seemed little habituated.

"Sorry to disturb you, ladies and gentlemen; not exactly the proper place for me. Don't be alarmed. I'm always respectful wherever I am. My rule through life is to be respectful."

"Well, now, in with you," said the guard.

"Be respectful, my friend, and don't talk so to an old soldier who has served his king and his country."

Off they went.

"Majesty's service?" asked the stranger of the duke.

"I have not that honour."

"Hum! Lawyer, perhaps?"

"Not a lawyer."

"Hum! A gentleman, I suppose?"

The duke was silent; and so the stranger addressed himself to the anti-aristocrat, who seemed vastly annoyed by the intrusion of so low a personage.

"Going to London, sir?"

"I tell you what, my friend, at once. I never answer impertinent questions."

"No offence, I hope, sir! Sorry to offend. I'm always respectful. Madam! I hope I don't inconvenience you; I should be sorry to do that. We sailors, you know, are always ready to accommodate the ladies."

"Sailor!" exclaimed the acute utilitarian, his curiosity stifling his hauteur. "Why! just now I thought you were a soldier."

"Well! so I am."

"Well, my friend, you are a conjurer, then."

"No, I a'n't; I'm a marine."

"A very useless person, then."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean to say, that if the sailors were properly educated, such an amphibious corps would never have been formed, and some of the most atrocious sinecures ever tolerated would consequently not have existed."

"Sinecures! I never heard of him. I served under Lord Combermere. Maybe you've heard of him, ma'am! A nice man,—a beautiful man. I have seen him stand in a field like that, with the shot falling about him like hail, and caring no more for them than peas."

"If that were for bravado," said the utilitarian, "I think it a very silly thing."

"Bravado! I never heard of him. It was for his king and country."

"Was it in India?" asked the widow.

"In a manner, ma'am," said the marine, very courteously. "At Bhurtpore, up by Pershy, and thereabouts—the lake of Cashmere, where all the shawls come from. Maybe you have heard of Cashmere, ma'am?"

"Who has not heard of the lake of Cashmere?" hummed the duke to himself.

"Ah! I thought so," said the marine; "all people know much the same; for some have seen, and some have read. I can't read, but I have served my king and country for five-and-twenty years, and have used my eyes."

"Better than reading," said the duke, humouring the character.

"I'll tell you what," said the marine, with a knowing look. "I suspect there is a d—d lot of lies in your books. I landed in England last 7th of June, and went to see St. Paul's. 'This is the greatest building in the world,' says the man. 'Thanks I, 'You lie.' I did not tell him so, because I am always respectful. I tell you what, sir; maybe you think St. Paul's the greatest building in the world, but I tell you what, it's a lie. I have seen one greater. Maybe, ma'am, you think I am telling you a lie too; but I am not. Go and ask Captain Jones, of the 58th: I went with him: I give you his name: go and ask Captain Jones of the 58th, if I be telling you a lie. The building I mean is the palace of the Sultan Acber; for I have served my king and country five-and-twenty years last 7th of June, and have seen strange things—all built of precious stones, ma'am. What do you think of that? All built of precious stones: cornelian, of which you make your seals: as sure as I'm a sinner saved. If I a'n't speaking the truth, I am not going to Selby. Maybe you'd like to know why I am going to Selby. I'll tell you what. Five-and-twenty years have I served my king and country last 7th of June. Now I will begin with the beginning. I ran away from home, when I was eighteen, you see; and after the siege of Bhurtpore, I was sitting on a bale of silk alone, and I said to myself, I'll go and see my mother. Sure as I am going to Selby, that's the whole. I landed in England last 7th of June, absent five-and-twenty years, serving my king and country. I sent them a letter last night. I put it in the post myself. Maybe I shall be there before my letter now."

"To be sure you will," said the utilitarian: "what made you do such a silly thing? Why, your letter is in this coach."

"Well! I shouldn't wonder. I shall be there before my letter now. All nonsense, letters: my wife wrote it at Falmouth."

"You are married, then?" said the widow.

"A'n't I, though!—the sweetest creature, madam, though I say it before you, that ever lived."

"Why did not you bring your wife with you?" asked the widow.

"And wouldn't I be very glad to? but she wouldn't come among strangers at once; and so I have got a letter, which she wrote for me, to put in the post, in case they are glad to see me, and then she will come on."

"And you, I suppose, are not sorry to have a holyday?" said the duke.

"A'n't I, though? A'n't I as low about leaving her, as ever as I was in my life? and so is the poor creature. She won't eat a bit of victuals till I come back, I'll be sworn,—not a bit, I'll be bound to say that—and I myself, although I am an old soldier, and served my king and country for five-and-twenty years, and so got knocked about, and used to any thing, as it were—I don't know how it is, but I always feel queer whenever I am away from her. I shan't make a hearty meal till I see her. Something or other, when I am away from her, every thing feels dry in the throat."

"You are very fond of her, I see?" said the duke.

"And ought I not to be? Didn't I ask her three times before she said yes? Those are the wives for wear, sir. None of the fruit that fall at a shaking for me! Hasn't she stuck by me in every climate, and in every land I was in? Not a fellow in the company had such a wife. Wouldn't I throw myself off this coach this moment, to give her a moment's peace? That I would, though,—d—n me if I wouldn't."

"Hush! hush!" said the widow; "never swear.—I am afraid you talk too much of your love," she added, with a faint smile.

"Ah! you don't know my wife, ma'am.—Are you married, sir?"

"I have not that happiness," said the duke.

"Well! there is nothing like it! but don't take the fruit that falls at a shake. But this, I suppose, is Selby."

The marine took his departure, having stayed long enough to raise in the young duke's mind curious feelings.

As he was plunged in reverie, and as the widow was silent, conversation was not resumed until the coach stopped for dinner.

"We stop here half an hour, gentlemen," said the guard. "Mrs. Burnet," he continued, to the widow, "let me hand you out."

They entered the parlour of the inn. The duke, who was ignorant of the etiquette of the road, did not proceed to the discharge of his duties, as the youngest guest, with all the promptness desired by his fellow-travellers.

"Now, sir," said an outside, "I will thank you for a slice of that mutton, and will join you, if you have no objection, in a bottle of sherry."

"What you please, sir. May I have the pleasure of helping you, ma'am?"

After dinner, the duke took advantage of a vacant outside place.

Tom Rawlins was the model of a guard. Young, robust, and gay, he had a letter, a word, or a wink for all he met. All seasons were the same to him; night or day, he was ever awake, and ever alive to all the interest of the road: now joining in conversation with a passenger, shrewd, sensible, and respectful; now exchanging a little elegant badinage with the coachman; now bowing to a pretty girl; now quizzing a passer-by;—he was off and on his seat in an instant; and, in the whirl of his cigar, would lock a wheel, or unlock a passenger.

From him the young duke learned that his fellow-inside was Mr. Duncan Macmorrogh, senior, a writer at Edinburgh, and, of course, the father of the first man of the day. Tom Rawlins could not tell his grace as much about the principal writer in "The Screw and Lever Review" as we can; for Tom was no patron of our periodical literature, further than a police report in the Publican's Journal. Young Duncan Macmorrogh was a limb of the law, who had just brought himself into notice by a series of articles in "The Screw and Lever," in which he had subjected The Universe piecemeal to his critical analysis. Duncan Macmorrogh cut up the creation, and got a name. His attack upon mountains was most violent, and proved by its personality, that he had come from the Lowlands. He demonstrated the inutility of all elevation, and declared that the Andes were the aristocracy of the globe. Rivers he rather patronised; but flowers he quite pulled to pieces, and proved them to be the most useless of existences. Duncan Macmorrogh informed us, that we were quite wrong in supposing ourselves to be the miracle of the creation. On the contrary, he avowed that already there were various pieces of machinery of far more importance than man; and he had no doubt, in time, that a superior race would arise, got by a steam-engine on a spinning-jenny.

The other "inside" was the widow of a former curate of a Northumbrian village. Some friend had obtained for her only child a clerkship in a public office, and, for some time, this idol of her heart had gone on prospering; but, unfortunately, of late, Charles Burnet had got into a bad set, was now involved in a terrible scrape, and, as Tom Rawlins feared, must lose his situation and go to ruin.

"She was half distracted when she heard it first, poor creature! I have known her all my life, sir. Many the kind word and glass of ale I have had at her house, and that's what makes me feel for her, you see. I do what I can to make the journey easy to her; for it is a pull at her years. God bless her! there is not a better body in this world; that I will say for her. When I was a boy, I used to be the playfellow in a manner with Charley Burnet, a gay lad, sir, as ever you would wish to see in a summer's day,—and the devil among the girls always, and that's been the ruin of him; and as open a hearted fellow as ever lived. Damn me! I'd walk to the land's end to save him, if it were only for his mother's sake,—to say nothing of himself."

"And can nothing be done?" asked the duke.

"Why, you see, he is back in £ s. d.; and, to make it up, the poor body must sell her all, and he won't let her do it, and wrote a letter like a prince—(No room, sir)—as fine a letter as ever you read—(Hilloa, there! What! are you asleep!)—as ever you read on a summer's day. I didn't see it, but my mother told me it was as good as e'er a one of the old gentleman's sermons. 'Mother,' said he, 'my sins be upon my own head. I can bear disgrace,'—(How do, Mr. Wilkins?)—'but I cannot bear to see you a beggar!'

"Poor fellow!"

"Ah! sir, as good a hearted fellow as ever you'd wish to meet!"

"Is he involved to a great extent, think you?"

"O! a long figure, sir—(I say, Betty, I've got a letter for you from your sweetheart)—a very long figure, sir—(Here, take it!)—I should be sorry—(Don't blush—no message!)—I should be sorry to take two hundred pounds to pay it. No, I wouldn't take two hundred pounds, that I wouldn't!—(I say, Jacob, stop at old Bag Smith's.)"

Night came on, and the duke resumed his inside place. Mr. Macmorrough went to sleep over his son's article: and the duke feigned slumber, though he was only indulging in reverie. He opened his eyes, and a light, which they passed, revealed the countenance of the widow. Tears were stealing down her face.

"I have no mother—I have no one to weep for me," thought the duke; "and yet, if I had been in this youth's station, my career probably would have been as fatal. Let me assist her. Alas! how I have misused my power, when, even to do this slight deed, I am obliged to hesitate, and consider whether it be practicable."

The coach again stopped for a quarter of an hour. The duke had, in consideration of the indefinite period of his visit, supplied himself amply with money on repairing to Dacre. Besides his purse, which was well stored for the road, he had somewhat more than three hundred pounds in his note-book. He took advantage of their tarrying to enclose it and its contents in a sheet of paper, with these lines—

"An unknown friend requests Mrs. Burnet to accept this token of his sympathy with suffering virtue."

Determined to find some means to put this in her possession before their parting, he resumed his place. The Scotchman now prepared for his night's repose. He produced a pillow for his back, a bag for his feet, and a cap for his head. These, and a glass of brandy and water, in time produced a due effect, and he was soon fast asleep. Even to the widow night brought some solace. The duke alone found no repose. Unused to travelling in public conveyances at night, and unprovided with any of the ingenious expedients of a mail-coach adventurer, he felt all the inconveniences of an inexperienced traveller. The seat was unendurably hard, his back ached, his head whirled, the confounded sherry, slight as was his portion, had made him feverish, and he felt at once excited and exhausted. He was sad, too, very depressed. Alone, and no longer surrounded with that splendour which had hitherto made solitude precious, life seemed stripped of all its ennobling spirit. His energy vanished. He repented his rashness; and the impulse of the previous night, which had gathered fresh power from the dewy moon, vanished. He felt alone, and without a friend, and night passed without a moment's slumber, watching the driving clouds.

The last fifteen miles seemed longer than the whole journey. At St. Alban's he got out, took a cup of coffee with Tom Rawlins, and although the morning was raw, again seated himself by his side.

In the first gloomy little suburb Mrs. Burnet got out. The duke sent Rawlins after her with the parcel, with peremptory instructions to leave it. He watched the widow protesting it was not hers, his faithful emissary appealing to the direction, and, with delight, he observed it left in her hands. They rattled into London, stopped in Lombard-street, reached Holborn, entered an archway; the coachman threw the whip and reins from his now careless hands. The duke bade farewell to Tom Rawlins, and was shown to a bed.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE return of morning had in some degree dissipated the gloom that had settled on the young duke during the night. Sound and light made him feel less forlorn, and for a moment his soul again responded to his high purpose. But now he was to seek necessary repose. In vain. His heated frame and anxious mind were alike restless. He turned, he tossed in his bed, but he could not banish from his ear the whirling sound of his late conveyance, the snore of Mr. Macmorrough, and the voice of Tom Rawlins. He kept dwelling on every petty incident of his journey, and repeating in his mind every petty saying. His determination to slumber made him even less sleepy. Conscious that repose was absolutely necessary to the performance of his task, and dreading that the boon was now unattainable, he became each moment more feverish and more nervous; a crowd of half-formed ideas and images flitted over his heated brain. Failure, misery, May Dacre, Tom Rawlins, boiled beef; Mrs. Burnet, the aristocracy, mountains and the marine, and the tower of St. Alban's cathedral, hurried along in infinite confusion. But there is nothing like experience. In a state of distraction, he remembered the hopeless but refreshing sleep he had gained after his fatal adventure at Brighton. He jumped out of bed, and threw himself on the floor, and in a few minutes, from the same cause, his excited senses subsided into slumber.

He awoke: the sun was shining through his rough shutter. It was noon. He jumped up, rang the bell, and asked for a bath. The chambermaid did not seem exactly to comprehend his meaning, but said she would speak to the waiter. He was the first gentleman who ever had asked for a bath at the Dragon with Two Tails. The waiter informed him that he might get a bath, he believed, at the Hummums. The duke dressed, and to the Hummums he then took his way. As he was leaving the yard, he was followed by an ostler, who, in a voice musically hoarse, thus addressed him.

"Have you seen missis, sir?"

"Do you mean me? No, I have not seen your missis," and the duke proceeded.

"Sir, sir," said the ostler, running after him, "I think you said you had not seen missis?"

"You think right," said the duke, astonished, and again he walked on.

"Sir, sir," said the pursuing ostler; "I don't think you have got any luggage!"

"O! I beg your pardon," said the duke; "I see it. I am in your debt; but I meant to return."

"No doubt on't, sir; but when gemmen don't have no luggage, they sees missis before they go, sir."

"Well, what am I in your debt? I can pay you here."

"Five shillings, sir."

"Here!" said the duke; "and tell me when a coach leaves this place to-morrow for Yorkshire."

"Half-past six o'clock in the morning precisely," said the ostler.

"Well, my good fellow, I depend upon your securing me a place; and that is for yourself," added his grace, throwing him a sovereign. "Now, mind; I depend upon you."

The man stared, as if he had been suddenly taken into partnership with missis; at length, he found his tongue.

"Your honour may depend upon me. Where would you like to sit? In or out? Back to your horses, or the front? Get you the box, if you like. Where's your great-coat, sir? I'll brush it for you."

The bath and the breakfast brought our hero round a good deal, and at half-past two he stole to a solitary part of St. James' Park, to stretch his legs and collect his senses. We must now let our readers into a secret, which perhaps they have already unravelled. The duke had rushed up to London, with the determination not only of attending the debate, but of participating in it. His grace was no politician; but the question at issue was one simple in its nature, and so domestic in its spirit, that few men could have arrived at his period of life without having heard its merits, both too often and too amply discussed. He was master of all the points of interest, and he had sufficient confidence in himself to believe that he could do them justice. He walked up and down, conning over in his mind, not only the remarks which he intended to make, but the very language in which he meant to offer them. As he formed sentences, almost for the first time, his courage and his fancy alike warmed; his sanguine spirit sympathized with the nobility of the imaginary scene, and inspirited the intonations of his modulated voice.

About four o'clock he repaired to the House. Walking up one of the passages, his progress was stopped by the back of an individual bowing with great servility to a patronising peer, and my-lording him with painful repetition. The nobleman was Lord Fitz-pompey; the bowing gentleman Mr. Duncan Macmorrogh, the anti-aristocrat, and father of the first man of the day.

"George! is it possible!" exclaimed Lord-Fitz-pompey. "I will speak to you in the House," said the duke, passing on, and bowing to Mr. Donald Macmorrogh.

He recalled his proxy from the Duke of Burlington, and accounted for his presence to many astonished friends by being on his way to the Continent; and, passing through London, thought he might as well be present, particularly as he was about to reside for some time in Catholic countries. It was the least compliment that he could pay his future hosts. "Give me a pinch of snuff."

The debate began. Don't be alarmed. I shall not describe it. Five or six peers had spoken, and one of the ministers had just sat down when the Duke of St. James rose. He was extremely nervous, but he repeated to himself the name of May Dacre for the hundredth time, and proceeded. He was nearly commencing "May Dacre," instead of "My Lords," but he escaped this blunder. For the first five or ten minutes, he spoke in almost as cold and lifeless a style as when he echoed the king's speech; but he was young, and seldom troubled them, and was listened to therefore with indulgence. The duke warmed, and a courteous "hear, hear," frequently sounded; the duke became totally free from embarrassment, and spoke with equal eloquence and energy. A cheer, a stranger in the House of Lords, rewarded and encouraged him. As an Irish landlord, his sincerity could not be disbelieved, when he expressed his conviction of the safety of emancipation; but it was as an English proprietor and British noble, that it was evident that his grace felt most keenly upon this important measure. He described with power the peculiar injustice of the situation of the English Catholics. He professed to feel keenly upon this subject, because his native county had made him well acquainted with the temper of this class; he painted in glowing terms, the loyalty, the wealth, the influence, the noble virtues, of his Catholic neighbours; and he closed a speech of an hour's duration, in which he had shown that a worn subject was susceptible of novel treatment and novel interest, amid loud and general cheers. The lords gathered round him while he spoke, and many personally congratulated him upon his distinguished success. The debate took its course. At three o'clock the pro-catholics found themselves in a minority, but in a minority in which the prescient might have well discovered the herald of future justice. The address of the Duke of St. James was the crack speech of the night.

The duke walked into White's. It was crowded. The first man who welcomed him was Annesley. He congratulated the duke with a warmth for which the world did not give him credit.

"I assure you, my dear St. James, that I am one of the few people whom this display has not surprised. I have long observed that you were formed for something better than mere frivolity. And, between ourselves, I am sick of it. Don't be surprised if you hear that I go to Algiers. Depend upon it, that I am on the point of doing something dreadful."

"Sup with me, St. James," said Lord Squire; "I will ask O'Connell to meet you."

Lord Fitz-pompey and Lord Darrell were profuse in congratulations; but he broke away from them to welcome the man who now advanced. He was one of whom he never thought without a shudder, but whom, for all that, he greatly liked.

"My dear Duke of St. James," said Arundel Dacre, "how ashamed I am that this is the first time I have personally thanked you for all your goodness!"

"My dear Dacre, I have to thank you for proving for the first time to the world, that I was not without discrimination."

"No, no," said Dacre, gayly and easily; "all the congratulations and all the compliments to-night shall be for you. Believe me, my dear friend, I share your triumph."

They shook hands with earnestness.

"May will read your speech with exultation," said Arundel. "I think we must thank her for making you an orator."

The duke faintly smiled, and shook his head.

"And how are all your Yorkshire friends?" continued Arundel. "I am disappointed again in getting down to them; but I hope, in the course of the month, to pay them a visit."

"I shall see them in a day or two," said the duke. "I pay Mr. Dacre one more visit before my departure from England."

"Are you then indeed going?" asked Arundel, in a kind voice.

"Forever."

"Nay, nay, ever is a strong word."

"It becomes then my feelings. However, we will not talk of this. Can I bear any letter for you?"

"I have just written," replied Arundel, in a gloomy voice, and with a changing countenance, "and therefore will not trouble you. And yet—"

"What!"

"And yet the letter is an important letter—to me. The post, to be sure, never does miss:—but if it were not troubling your grace too much, I almost would ask you to be its bearer."

"It will be there as soon," said the duke, "for I shall be off in an hour."

"I will take it out of the box, then," said Arundel, and he fetched it. "Here is the letter," said he on his return: "pardon me if I impress upon you its importance. Excuse this emotion,—but, indeed, this letter decides my fate. My happiness for life is dependent on its reception!"

He spoke with an air and voice of agitation.

The duke received the letter in a manner scarcely less disturbed; and with a hope that they might meet before his departure, faintly murmured by one party, and scarcely responded to by the other, they parted.

"Well, now," said the duke, "the farce is complete:—and I have come to London to be the bearer of his offered heart! I like this, now. Is there a more contemptible—a more ludicrous—absolutely ludicrous ass than myself? Fear not for its delivery: most religiously shall it be consigned to the hand of its owner. The fellow has paid a compliment to my honour or my simplicity: I fear the last,—and really I feel rather proud. But away with these feelings! Have not I seen her in his arms? Pah, pah, pah! Thank God! I spoke. At least, I die in a blaze. Even Annesley does not think me quite a fool. O, May Dacre, May Dacre!—if you were but mine, I should be the happiest fellow that ever breathed!"

He breakfasted, and then took his way to the Dragon with Two Tails. The morning was bright, and fresh, and beautiful, even in London. Joy came upon his heart, in spite of all his loneliness, and he was glad and sanguine. He arrived just in time. The coach was about to start. The faithful ostler was there with his great-coat, and the duke found that he had three fellow-passengers. They were lawyers, and talked for the first two hours of nothing but the case respecting which they were going into the country. At Woburn a despatch arrived with the newspapers. All purchased one, and the duke among the rest. He was well reported, and could now sympathize with, instead of smile at, the anxiety of Lord Darrell.

"The young Duke of St. James seems to have distinguished himself very much," said the first lawyer.

"So I observe," said the second one. "The leading article calls our attention to his speech as the most brilliant delivered."

"I am surprised," said the third, "I thought he was quite a different sort of person."

"By no means," said the first: "I have always had a very high opinion of him. I am not one of those who think the worse of a young man because he is a little wild."

"Nor I," said the second. "Young blood, you know, is young blood."

"A very intimate friend of mine who knows the Duke of St. James well, once told me," rejoined the first, "that I was quite mistaken about him; that he was a person of no common talents, well read, quite a man of the world, and a good deal of wit too; and let me tell you that in these days wit is no common thing."

"Certainly not," said the third. "We have no wit now."

"And a very kind-hearted, generous fellow," continued the first, "and very unaffected."

"I can't bear an affected man," said the second, without locking off his paper. "He seems to have made a very fine speech, indeed."

"I should not wonder his turning out something great," said the third.

"I have no doubt of it," said the second.

"Many of these wild fellows do."

"He is not so wild as we think," said the first.

"But he is done up," said the second.

"Is he indeed?" said the third. "Perhaps, by making a speech, he wants a place?"

"People don't make speeches for nothing," said the third.

"I shouldn't wonder if he is after a place in the Household," said the second.

"Depend upon it, he looks to something more active," said the first.

"Perhaps he would like to be head of the Admiralty?" said the second.

"Or the Treasury?" said the third.

"That is impossible?" said the first. "He is too young."

"He is as old as Pitt," said the third.

"I hope he will resemble him in nothing but his age then," said the first.

"I look upon Pitt as the first man that ever lived," said the third.

"What!" said the first. "The man who worked up the national debt to nearly eight hundred millions!"

"What of that?" said the third. "I look upon the national debt as the source of all our prosperity."

"The source of all our taxes, you mean."

"What is the harm of taxes?"

"The harm is, that you will soon have no trade; and when you have no trade, you will have no duties: and when you have no duties, you will have no dividends; and when you have no dividends, you will have no law; and then where is your source of prosperity?" said the first.

But here the coach stopped, and the duke got out for an hour.

By midnight they had reached a town not more than thirty miles from Dacre. The duke was quite exhausted, and determined to stop. In half an hour he enjoyed that deep, dreamless slumber with which no luxury can compete. One must have passed restless nights for years to be able to appreciate the value of sound sleep.

CHAPTER IX.

He rose early and managed to reach Dacre at the breakfast hour of the family. He discharged his chaise at the park gate, and entered the house unseen. He took his way along a corridor lined with plants, which led to the small and favourite room in which the morning meetings of May and himself always took place when they were alone. As he lightly stepped along, he heard a voice that he could not mistake, as it were in animated converse. Agitated by sounds which ever created in him emotion, for a moment he paused. He starts,—his eye sparkles with strange delight,—a flush comes over his panting features, half of modesty, half of triumph. He listens to his own speech from the lips of the woman he loves. She is reading to her father with melodious energy the passage in which he describes the high qualities of his Catholic neighbours. The intonations of the voice indicate the deep sympathy of the reader. She ceases. He hears the admiring exclamation of his host. He rallies his strength,—he advances,—he stands before them. She utters almost a shriek of delightful surprise, and welcomes him with both her hands.

How much there was to say!—how much to ask!—how much to answer! Even Mr. Dacre poured forth questions like a boy. But May—she could not speak, but leaned forward in her chair with an eager ear, and look of congratulation, that rewarded him for all his exertion. Every thing was to be told. How he went;—whether he slept in the mail,—where he went;—what he did;—whom he saw;—what they said;—what they thought:—all must be answered. Then fresh exclamations of wonder, delight, and triumph. The duke forgot every thing but his love, and for three hours felt the happiest of men.

At length Mr. Dacre rose and looked at his watch with a shaking head. "I have a most important appointment," said he, "and I must gallop to keep it. God bless you, my dear St. James! I could stay talking with you forever; but you must be utterly wearied. Now, my dear boy, go to bed."

"To bed!" exclaimed the duke. "Why, Tom Rawlins would laugh at you!"

"And who is Tom Rawlins?"

"Ah! I cannot tell you every thing: but assuredly I am not going to bed."

"Well, May, I leave him to your care; but do not let him talk any more."

"O! sir," said the duke, "I really had forgotten. I am the bearer to you, sir, of a letter from Mr. Arundel Dacre." He gave it him.

As Mr. Dacre read the communication, his countenance changed, and the smile which before was on his face vanished. But whether he were displeased, or only serious, it was impossible to ascertain, although the duke watched him narrowly. At length he said, "May! here is a letter from Arundel, in which you are much interested."

"Give it me then, papa."

"No, my love; we must speak of this together. But I am pressed for time. When I come home. Remember!" He quitted the room.

They were alone: the duke began again talking, and Miss Dacre put her finger to her mouth, with a smile.

"I assure you," said he, "I am not half so wearied as the day after hunting. I slept at —y, and the only thing I now want is a good walk. Let me be your companion this morning!"

"I was thinking of paying nurse a visit. What say you?"

"O! I am ready; anywhere."

She ran for her bonnet, and he kissed her handkerchief, which she left behind, and, I believe, every thing else in the room which bore the slightest relation to her. And then the recollection of Arundel's letter came over him, and his joy fled. When she returned, he was standing before the fire, gloomy and dull.

"I fear you are tired," she said.

"Not in the least."

"I shall never forgive myself if all this exertion make you ill."

"Why not?"

"Because, although I will not tell papa, I am sure my nonsense is the cause of your having gone to London."

"It is probable; for you are the cause of all that does not disgrace me." He advanced, and was about to seize her hand; but the accursed miniature occurred to him, and he repressed his feelings, almost with a groan. She, too, had turned away her head, and was busily engaged in tending a flower.

"Because she has explicitly declared her feelings to me, and, sincere in that declaration, honours me by a friendship of which alone I am unworthy, am I to persecute her with my dishonoured overtures—the twice rejected? No, no!" He took up his hat, and offered her his arm.

They took their way through the park, and he soon succeeded in reassuming the tone that befitted their situation. Traits of the debate, and the debaters, which newspapers cannot convey, and which he had not yet recounted,—anecdotes of Annesley and their friends, and other gossip, were offered for her amusement. But if she were amused, she was not lively, but singularly, unusually silent. There was only one point on which she seemed interested, and that was his speech. When he was cheered, and who particularly cheered; who gathered round him, and what they said after the debate: on all these points she was most inquisitive.

They rambled on: nurse was quite forgotten and at length they found themselves in the beautiful valley, rendered more lovely by the ruins of the abbey. It was a place that the duke could never forget, and which he ever avoided. He had never renewed his visit since he first gave vent, among its reverend ruins, to his overcharged and most tumultuous heart.

They stood in silence before the holy pile with its vaulting arches and crumbling walls, mellowed by the mild lustre of the declining sun. Not two years had fled since here he first staggered after the breaking glimpses of self-knowledge, and struggled to call order from out of the chaos of his mind. Not two years, and yet what a change had come over his existence! How diametrically opposite now were all his thoughts, and views, and feelings, to those which then controlled his fatal soul! How capable, as he firmly believed, was he now of discharging his duty to his Creator and his fellow-men! and yet the boon that ought to have been the reward for all this self-repentance—the sweet seal that ought to have ratified this new contract of existence was wanting.

"Ah!" he exclaimed aloud, and in a voice of anguish,—“ah! if I ne'er had left the walls of Dacre, how different might have been my lot!”

A gentle but involuntary pressure reminded him of the companion whom for once in his life, he had for a moment forgotten.

"I feel it is madness,—I feel it is worse than madness; but must I yield without a struggle, and see my dark fate cover me without an effort? O! yes, here, even here, where I have wept over your contempt,—even here, although I subject myself to renewed rejection, let, let me tell you, before we part, how I adore you!"

She was silent; a strange courage came over his spirit; and, with a reckless boldness, and rapid voice, a misty sight, and total unconsciousness of all other existence, he resumed the words which had broken out as if by inspiration.

"I am not worthy of you. Who is? I was worthless. I did not know it. Have not I struggled to be pure? have not I sighed on my nightly pillow for your blessing? O! could you read my heart,—and sometimes I think, you can read it, for indeed, with all its faults, it is without guile, I dare to hope, that you would pity me. Since we first met, your image has not quitted my conscience for a second. When you thought me least worthy,—when you thought me vile, or mad,—O! by all that is sacred, I was the most miserable wretch that ever breathed, and flew to dissipation only for distraction!

"Not, not for a moment have I ceased to think you the best, the most beautiful, the most enchanting and endearing creature that ever graced our earth. Even when I first dared to whisper my insolent affection, believe me, even then, your presence controlled my spirit as no other woman had. I bent to you then in pride and power. The station that I could then offer you was not utterly unworthy of your perfection. I am now a beggar, or, worse, an insolvent noble, and dare I, dare I to ask you to share the fortunes that are broken and the existence that is obscure!"

She turned; her arm fell over his shoulder; she buried her head in his breast.

CHAPTER X.

MR. DACRE returned home with an excellent appetite, and almost as keen a desire to renew his conversation with his guest; but dinner and the duke were neither to be commanded. Miss Dacre also could not be found. No information could be obtained of them from any quarter. It was nearly seven o'clock—the hour of dinner. That meal, somewhat to Mr. Dacre's regret, was postponed for half an hour, servants were sent out, and the bell was rung—but no tidings. Mr. Dacre was a little annoyed and more alarmed; he was also hungry, and at half-past seven he sat down to a solitary meal.

About a quarter past eight, a figure rapped at the dining-room window:—it was the young duke. The fat butler seemed astonished, not to say shocked, at this violation of etiquette; nevertheless, he slowly opened the window.

"Any thing the matter, George! Where is May?"

"Nothing. We lost our way. That is all. May—Miss Dacre desired me to say, that she would not join us at dinner."

"I am sure something has happened."

"I assure you, my dear sir, nothing, nothing at all the least unpleasant—but we took the wrong turning. All my fault."

"Shall I send for the soup?"

"No. I am not hungry—I will take some wine." So saying, his grace poured out a tumbler of claret.

"Shall I take your grace's hat?" asked the fat butler.

"Dear me! have I my hat on?"

This was not the only evidence afforded by our hero's conduct that his presence of mind had slightly deserted him. He was soon buried in a deep reverie, and sat with a full plate but idle knife and fork before him,—a perfect puzzle to the fat butler, who had hitherto considered his grace the very pink of propriety.

"George, you have eaten no dinner," said Mr. Dacre.

"Thank you, a very good one indeed—a remarkably good dinner. Give me some red wine, if you please."

At length they were left alone.

"I have some good news for you, George."

"Indeed!"

"I think I have let Rosemount."

"So!"

"And exactly to the kind of person that you wanted,—a man who will take a pride, although merely a tenant, in not permitting his poor neighbours to feel the want of a landlord. You will never guess—Lord Mildmay."

"What did you say of Lord Mildmay, sir?"

"My dear fellow, your wits are wool-gathering—I say, I think I have let Rosemount."

"O! I have changed my mind about letting Rosemount."

"My dear duke, there is no trouble which I will grudge to further your interests; but really I must beg, in future, that you will, at least, apprise me when you change your mind. There is nothing, as we have both agreed, more desirable than to find an eligible tenant for Rosemount. You never can expect to have a more beneficial one than Lord Mildmay; and really, unless you have positively promised the place to another person, which, excuse me for saying, you were not authorized to do, I must insist, after what has passed, upon his having the preference."

"My dear sir, I only changed my mind this afternoon: I couldn't tell you before. I have promised it to no one; but I think of living there myself."

"Yourself! O! if that be the case, I shall be quite reconciled to the disappointment of Lord Mildmay. But what, in the name of goodness, my dear fellow, has produced this wonderful revolution in all your plans in the course of a few hours? I thought you were going to mope away life in the lake of Geneva, or dawdle it away in Florence or Rome."

"It is very odd, sir. I can hardly believe it myself:—and yet it must be true. I hear her voice even at this moment. O! my dear Mr Dacre, I am the happiest fellow that ever breathed!"

"What is all this?"

"Is it possible, my dear sir, that you have not long before detected the feelings I ventured to entertain for your daughter? In a word, she requires only your sanction to my being the most fortunate of men."

"My dear friend,—my dear, dear boy!" cried Mr. Dacre, rising from his chair and embracing him, "it is out of the power of man to impart to me any event which could afford me such exquisite pleasure! Indeed, indeed, it is to me most surprising! for I had been induced to suspect, George, that some explanation had passed between you and May, which, while it accounted for your mutual esteem, gave little hope of a stronger sentiment."

"I believe, sir," said the young duke with a smile, "I was obstinate."

"Well, this changes all our plans. I have intended, for this fortnight past, to speak to you finally on your affairs. No better time than the present: and, in the first place—"

But, really, this interview is confidential.

CHAPTER XI.

THEY come not: it is late. He is already telling all! She relapses into her sweet reverie. Her thought fixes on no subject: her mind is intent on no idea: her soul is melted into dreamy delight: her only consciousness is perfect bliss! Sweet sounds still echo in her ear, and still her pure pulse beats, from the first embrace of passion.

The door opens, and her father enters, leaning upon the arm of her beloved. Yes—he has told all! Mr. Dacre approached, and, bending down, pressed the lips of his child. It was the seal to their pledged faith, and told, without speech, that the blessings of a parent mingled with the vows of a lover! No other intimation was at present necessary: but she, the daughter, thought now only of her father, that friend of her long life, whose love had ne'er been wanting,—was she about to leave him? She arose: she threw her arms round his neck and wept.

The young duke walked away, that his presence might not control the full expression of her hallowed soul. "This jewel is mine," was his thought: "what, what have I done to be so blessed?"

In a few minutes he again joined them, and was seated by her side; and Mr. Dacre considerably remembered that he wished to see his steward, and they were left alone. Their eyes met, and their soft looks tell that they were thinking of each other. His arm steals round the back of her chair, and with his other hand he gently captures hers.

First love, first love! how many a glowing bard has sung thy beauties! How many a poor devil of a prosing novelist, like myself, has echoed all our superiors, the poets, teach us! No doubt, thou rosy god of young desire, thou art a most bewitching little demon; and yet, for my part, give me last love.

Ask a man, which turned out best—the first horse he bought, or the one he now canters on? Ask—but, in short, there is nothing in which knowledge is more important, and experience more valuable, than in love. When we first love, we are enamoured of our own imaginations. Our thoughts are high, our feelings rise from out the deepest caves of the tumultuous tide of our full life. We look around for one to share our exquisite existence, and sanctify the beauties of our being.

But these beauties are only in our thoughts. We feel like heroes, when we are but Loys. Yet our mistress must bear a relation, not to ourselves, but to our imagination. She must be a real heroine, while our perfection is but ideal. And the quick and dangerous fancy of our race will, at first, rise to the pitch. She is all—we can conceive. Mild and pure as youthful priests, we bow down before our altar. But the idol to which we breathe our warm and gushing vows, and bend our eager knees—all its power, does it not exist only in our idea? all its beauty, is it not the creation of our own excited fancy? And then the sweetest of superstitions ends. The long delusion bursts, and we are left like men upon a heath when fairies vanish—cold and dreary, gloomy, bitter, harsh, existence seems a blunder.

But just when we are most miserable, and curse the poets' cunning and our own conceits, there lights upon our path, just like a ray fresh from the sun, some sparkling child of light, that makes us think we are premature, at least, in our resolves. Yet we are determined not to be taken in, and try her well in all the points in which the others failed. One by one her charms steal on our warming soul, as, one by one, those of the other beauty sadly stole away, and then we bless our stars, and feel quite sure that we have found perfection in a petticoat.

What shall I do, then? Why, sir, if you have cash enough, marry; but if not, go to Paris for a month—not Bath or Brighton—you may find her there—and forget her.

For, believe me, who, being a bachelor, may be allowed to put in a word in favour of a system in which I am not interested, love without marriage is both expensive, immoral, and productive of the most disagreeable consequences. It tries the constitution, heart, and purse. Profligacy is almost an impossibility; and even dissipation, as this work well proves, soon gets a bore. What we call morality is nothing else but common sense, and the experience of our fellow-men codified for our common good.

And if, if marriage did not require such an income (they say three thousand now will scarcely do, even for us youngers. What times we live in!)—I have half a mind (I think we must come down) really to look about me; (one gets tired of wandering;) and, no doubt, there is great pleasure in a well-regulated existence, particularly if no children come in after dinner.

But our duke—where are we? He had read woman thoroughly, and consequently knew how to value the virgin pages on which his thoughts now fixed. He and May Dacre wandered in the woods, and nature seemed to them more beautiful from their beautiful loves. They gazed upon the sky; a brighter light fell o'er the luminous earth. Sweeter to them the fragrance of the sweetest flowers, and a more balmy breath brought on the universal promise of the opening year.

They wandered in the woods, and there they breathed their mutual adoration. She to him was all in all, and he to her was like a new divinity. She poured forth all that she long had felt, and scarcely could suppress. From the moment he tore her from the insulter's arms, his image fixed in her heart, and the struggle which she experienced to repel his renewed vows was great indeed. When she heard of his misfortunes, she had wept; but it was the strange delight she experienced when his letter arrived to her father, that first convinced her how irrevocably her mind was his.

And now she does not cease to blame herself for all her past obduracy—now she will not for a moment yield that he could have been ever any thing but all that was pure, and beautiful, and good.

CHAPTER XII.

BUT although we are in love, business must not be utterly neglected, and Mr. Dacre insisted that the young duke should for one morning cease to wander in his park, and listen to the result of his exertions during the last three months. His grace listened. Rents had not risen, but it was hoped that they had seen their worst; the rail-road had been successfully opposed; and coals had improved. The London mansion and the Alhambra had both been disposed of, and well: the first to the new French ambassador; and the second to a gray-headed stock-jobber, very rich, who, having no society, determined to make solitude amusing. The proceeds of these sales, together with sundry sums obtained by converting into cash the stud, the furniture, and the bijouterie, produced a most respectable fund, which nearly paid off the annoying miscellaneous debts. For the rest, Mr. Dacre, while he agreed that it was on the whole advisable that the buildings should be completed, determined that none of the estates should be sold, or even mortgaged. His plan was, to procrastinate the termination of these undertakings, and to allow each year itself to afford the necessary supplies. By annually setting aside one hundred thousand pounds, in seven or eight years he hoped to find every thing completed and all debts cleared. He did not think that the extravagance of the duke could justify any diminution in the sum which had hitherto been apportioned for the maintenance of the Irish establishments; but he was of opinion, that the decreased portion which they, as well as the western estates, now afforded to the total incomes, was a sufficient reason. Fourteen thousand a-year were consequently allotted to Ireland, and seven to Pen Brounck. There remained to the duke about thirty thousand per annum; but then Hauteville was to be kept up with this. Mr. Dacre proposed that the young people should reside at Rosemount, and that, consequently, they might form their establishment from the castle, without reducing their Yorkshire appointments, and avail themselves, without any obligation, or even the opportunity of great expenses, of all the advantages afforded by the necessary expenditure. Finally, Mr. Dacre presented his son with his town-mansion and furniture; and as the young duke insisted that the settlements upon her grace should be prepared in full reference to his inherited and future income, this generous father at once made over to him the great bulk of his personal property, amounting to upwards of a hundred thousand pounds, and a little ready money, of which he now knew the value.

The Duke of St. James had duly informed his uncle, the Earl of Fitz-pompey, of the intended change in his condition, and in answer received the following letter.

"Fitz-pompey Hall, May, 18—

"MY DEAR GEORGE:—Your letter did not give us so much surprise as you expected; but, I assure you, it gave us as much pleasure. You have shown your wisdom and your taste in your choice; and I am free to confess, that I am acquainted with no one more worthy of the station which the Dutchess of St. James must always fill in society, and more calculated to maintain the dignity of your family than the lady whom you are about to introduce to us as our niece. Believe me, my dear George, that the notification of this agreeable event has occasioned even additional gratification both to your aunt and to myself, from the reflection that you are about to ally yourself with a family in whose welfare we must ever take an especial interest, and whom we may in a manner look upon as our own relatives. For, my dear George, in answer to your flattering and most pleasing communication, it is my truly agreeable duty to inform you (and, believe me, you are the first person out of our immediate family to whom this intelligence is made known) that our Caroline, in whose happiness we are well assured you take a lively interest, is about to be united to one who may now be described as your near relative, namely, Mr. Arundel Dacre.

"It has been a long attachment, though, for a considerable time, I confess, unknown to us; and, indeed, at first sight, with Caroline's rank and other advantages, it may not appear, in a mere worldly point of view, so desirable a connexion as some perhaps might expect. And, to be quite confidential, both your aunt and myself were at first a little disinclined (great as our esteem and regard have ever been for him)—a little disinclined, I say, to the union. But Dacre is certainly the most rising man of the day. In point of family he is second to none; and his uncle has indeed behaved in the most truly liberal manner. I assure you, he considers him as a son; and even if there were no other inducement, the mere fact of your connexion with the family would alone not only reconcile, but, so to say, make us perfectly satisfied with the arrangement. It is unnecessary to speak to you of the antiquity of the Dacres. Arundel will ultimately be one of the richest commoners, and I think it is not too bold to anticipate, taking into consideration the family into which he marries, and, above all, his connexion with you, that we may finally succeed in having him called up to us. You are, of course, aware that there was once a barony in the family.

"Everybody talks of your speech. I assure you, although I ever gave you credit for uncommon talents, I was astonished. So you are to have the vacant riband! Why did you not tell me? I learned it to-day from Lord Bobbleshim. But we must not quarrel with men in love for not communiating.

"You ask me for news of all your old friends. You, of course, saw the death of old Annesley. The new lord took his seat yesterday—he was introduced by Lord Bloomerly. I was not surprised to hear in the evening, that he was about to be married to Lady Charlotte, though the world affect to be astonished. I should not forget to say that Lord A. asked most particularly after you.

"I think I have now written you a very long letter. I once more congratulate you on your admirable selection; and with the united remembrance of our family circle—particularly Caroline, who will write perhaps by this post to Miss D.—believe me, dear George, your truly affectionate uncle,
J. P.

"P. S.—Lord Marylebone is very unpopular—quite a brute. We all miss you."

It is not to be supposed that this letter conveyed the first intimation to the Duke of St. James of the most interesting event of which it spoke. On the contrary he had long been aware of the whole affair; but I have been too much engaged with his own conduct to find time to let the reader into the secret, which, like all secrets, is to be hoped, was no secret. Next to gaining the affections of May Dacre, it was impossible for any event to occur more delightful to our hero than the present. His heart had often misgiven him when he had thought of Caroline. Now she was happy, and not only happy, but connected with him for life, just as he wished. Arundel Dacre, too, of all men he most wished to like, and indeed most liked. One feeling alone had prevented them from being bosom friends, and that feeling had long triumphantly vanished.

May Dacre had been almost from the beginning the confidant of his cousin. In vain however, had she beseeched him to intrust all to her father. Although he now repented his past feelings, he would not work upon himself to change; and not till he had entered parliament and succeeded, and gained a name which would reflect honour on the family with which he wished to identify himself, could he impart to his uncle the secret of his heart, and gain that support, without which his great object could never have been achieved. The Duke of St. James, by returning him to parliament, had been the unconscious cause of all his happiness, and ardently did he pray that his generous friend might succeed in what he was well aware was his secret aspiration, and that his beloved cousin might yield her hand to the only man whom Arundel Dacre considered worthy of her.

CHAPTER XIII.

ANOTHER week brought another letter from the Earl of Fitz-pompey.

THE EARL OF FITZ-POMPEY TO THE DUKE OF ST. JAMES.

[Read this alone.]

"MY DEAR GEORGE,—I beg you will not be alarmed by the above memorandum, which I thought it but prudent to prefix. A very disagreeable affair has just taken place, and to a degree exceedingly alarming; but it might have turned out much more distressing, and on the whole, we may all congratulate ourselves at the result. Not to keep you in fearful suspense, I beg to recall your recollection to the rumour, which is in circulation, of the intention of Lady Aphrodite Grafton to oppose the divorce. A few days back, her brother, Lord Wariston, with whom I was previously unacquainted, called upon me by appointment, having previously requested a private interview. The object of his seeing me was no less than to submit to my inspection the letters, by aid of which it was anticipated that the divorce might be successfully opposed. You will be astounded to hear that these consist of a long series of correspondence of Mrs. Dallington Vere's, developing, I am shocked to say, machinations of a very alarming nature, the effect of which, my dear George, was no less than very materially to control your fortunes in life, and those of that charming and truly admirable lady whom you have delighted us all so much, by declaring to be our future relative.

"From the very delicate nature of the disclosures, Lord Wariston felt the great importance of obtaining all necessary results without making them public; and, actuated by these feelings, he applied to me, both as your nearest relative, and an acquaintance of Sir Lucius, and, as he expressed it, and I may be permitted to repeat, as one whose experience in the management of difficult and delicate negotiations was not altogether unknown, in order that I might be put in possession of the facts of the case, advise and perhaps interfere for the common good.

"Under these circumstances, and taking into consideration the extreme difficulty attendant upon a satisfactory arrangement of the affair, I thought fit, in confidence, to apply to Arundel, whose talents I consider of the first order, and only equalled by his prudence and calm temper. As a relation, too, of more than one of the parties concerned, it was perhaps only proper that the correspondence should be submitted to him.

"I am sorry to say, my dear George, that Arundel behaved in a very odd manner, and not at all with that discretion which might have been expected, both from one of his remarkably sober and staid disposition, and one not a little experienced in diplomatic life. He exhibited the most unequivocal signs of his displeasure at the conduct of the parties principally concerned, and expressed himself in so vindictive a manner against one of them, that I very much regretted my application, and requested him to be cool.

"He seemed to yield to my solicitations; but, I regret to say, his composure was only feigned, and the next morning he and Sir Lucius Grafton met. Sir Lucius fired first without effect, but Arundel's aim was more fatal, and his ball was lodged in the thigh of his adversary. Sir Lucius has only been saved by amputation; and I need not remark to you, that to such a man, life on such conditions is scarcely desirable. All idea of a divorce is quite given over. The letter in question was stolen from his cabinet by his valet, and given to a soubrette of his wife, whom Sir Lucius considered in his interest, but who, as you see, betrayed him.

"For me remained the not very agreeable office of seeing Mrs. Dallington Vere. I made known to her, in a manner as little offensive as possible, the object of my visit. The scene, my dear George, was very trying; and I think it very hard, that the follies of a parcel of young people should really place me in such a distressing position. She fainted, &c., wished the letters to be given up; but Lord W—— would not consent to this, though he promised to keep their contents secret, provided she quitted the country. She goes directly; and I am well assured, which is not the least surprising part of this strange history, that her affairs are in a state of great distraction. The relatives of her late husband are about again to try the will, and with every prospect of success. She has been negotiating with them for some time through the agency of Sir Lucius Grafton, and the late exposé will not favour her interests.

"If any thing further happen, my dear George, depend upon my writing; but Arundel desires me to say, that on Saturday he will run down to Dacre for a few days, as he very much wishes to see you and all. With our united remembrance to Mr. and Miss Dacre,

"Ever, my dear George,

"Your very affectionate uncle,
"FITZ-POMPEY."

The young duke turned with trembling and disgust from these dark terminations of unprincipled careers, and their fatal evidences of the indulgence of unbridled passions. How nearly too had he been shipwrecked in this moral whirlpool! With what gratitude did he not invoke the beneficent Providence that had not permitted the innate seeds of human virtue to be blighted in his wild and neglected soul! With what admiration did he not gaze upon the pure and beautiful being whose virtue and whose loveliness were the causes of his regeneration, the sources of his present, and the guarantees of his future joy.

Four years have now elapsed since the young Duke of St. James was united to May Dacre; and it would not be too bold to declare, that during that period he has never for an instant ceased to consider himself the happiest, and the most fortunate of men. His life is passed in the agreeable discharge of all the important duties of his exalted station, and his present career is by far a better answer to the lucubrations of young Duncan Macmorrough, than all the abstract arguments that ever yet were offered in favour of the existence of an aristocracy.

Hauteville House and Hauteville Castle proceeded in regular course—their magnificent dwellings will never erase simple and delightful Rosemount from the grateful memory of the Dutchess of St. James. Parliament, and in a degree society, invite the duke and dutchess each year to the metropolis, and Mr. Dacre is generally their guest. Their most intimate and beloved friends are Arundel and Lady Caroline;—and as her ladyship now heads the establishment of Castle Dacre, they are seldom separated. But among their most agreeable company is a young gentleman styled by courtesy Dacre, Marquis of Hauteville; and his young sister, who has not yet escaped from her beautiful mother's arms, and who beareth the blooming title of the Lady May.

Reader! our tale is told, and the sweet shades who for three long weeks have stolen from decay its consciousness, and lent life even to languor, vanish into air. The syllables are sailing on the wind, that are the sting of life. Farewell! O! word of wo! O! sound of sorrow! and yet the necessary termination of all joy.

NOTES.

Page 240.—(1) Lady Morgan, in her very agreeable work, "The Book of the Boudoir," has a most amusing chapter on Raconteurs. Lady Morgan is certainly a woman of considerable talents, and has been what is called "hardly used." But I suspect that this lively writer is one who would prefer excessive abuse to moderate commendation. Why does Lady Morgan give her critics such unnecessary advantages? Why, for instance, in the volumes of which I am speaking, and in which there is so much to admire, is the "Menagiana," and that too more than once, quoted and panegyricized as the work of Menage? Why does Vandyke, too, figure as the court painter of Henry the Eighth? Why—but I cease this ungracious office. I know that there is a delightful giddiness in Irish brains, which will perfectly account for these errors, without seeking for a harsher cause; but then, what use is the "English husband" who is introduced to us with such triumph? Surely Sir Charles might be permitted to read the proofs, and to extinguish by the frigorific influence of his Saxon blood, these macula in the flaming luminary of Kildare street.

Page 255.—(2) This important principle is much more ably expressed in the witty memoirs of the brilliant Henry Pelham. Had I his gay volumes at command, I should have pleasure in referring to them more particularly. The author of "Pelham" is one of the few rising writers to whom we may look up for the maintenance of the honour of English literature.

CONTARINI FLEMING

A PSYCHOLOGICAL AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

CONTARINI FLEMING.

I.

WANDERING in those deserts of Africa that border the Erythræan sea, I came to the river Nile, to that ancient, and mighty, and famous stream, whose waters yielded us our earliest civilization, and which, after having witnessed the formation of so many states, and the invention of so many creeds, still flow on with the same serene beneficence, like all that we can conceive of Deity; in form sublime, in action systematic, in nature bountiful, in source unknown.

My solitary step sounded in the halls of the Pharaohs. I moved through those imperial chambers, supported by a thousand columns, and guarded by colossal forms seated on mysterious thrones; I passed under glittering gates meet to receive the triumphal chariot of a Titan; I gazed on sublime obelisks pointing to the skies, whose secrets their mystic characters affected to conceal. Wherever I threw my sight, I beheld vast avenues of solemn sphinxes reposing in supernatural beauty, and melancholy groups of lion-visaged kings; huge walls vividly pictured with the sacred rites and the domestic offices of remote antiquity, or sculptured with the breathing forms of heroic warfare.

And all this might, all this magnificence, all this mystery, all this beauty, all this labour, all this high invention—where were their originators? I fell into deep musing. And the kingdoms of the earth passed before me, from the thrones of the Pharaohs to those enormous dominations that sprang out of the feudal chaos, the unlawful children of Ignorance and Expediency. And I surveyed the generations of man from Rameses the Great, and Memnon the Beautiful, to the solitary pilgrim, whose presence now violated the sanctity of their gorgeous sepulchres. And I found that the history of my race was but one tale of rapid destruction or gradual decay.

And in the anguish of my heart, I lifted up my hands to the blue ether, and I said, "Is there no hope? What is knowledge, and what is truth? How shall I gain wisdom?"

The wind arose, the bosom of the desert heaved, pillars of sand sprang from the earth and whirled across the plain, sounds more awful than thunder came rushing from the south; the fane and the palace, the portal and the obelisk, the altar and the throne, the picture and the frieze, disappeared from my sight, and darkness brooded over the land. I knelt down and hid my face in the movable and burning soil, and as the wind of the desert passed over me, methought it whispered, "Child of nature, learn to unlearn!"

We are the slaves of false knowledge. Our memories are filled with ideas that have no origin in truth. We learn nothing from ourselves. The sum of our experience is but a dim dream of the conduct of past generations, generations that lived in a total ignorance of their nature. Our instructors are the unknowing and the dead. We study human nature in a charnel-house, and, like the nations of the East, we pay divine honours to the maniac and the fool. A series of systems have mystified existence. We believe what our fathers credited, because they were convinced without a cause. The faculty of thought has been destroyed. Yet our emasculated minds, without the power of fruition, still pau for the charms of wisdom. It is this that makes us fly with rapture to false knowledge—to tradition, to prejudice, to custom. Delusive tradition, destructive prejudice, degenerating custom! It is this that makes us prostrate ourselves with reverence before the wisdom of by-gone ages, in no one of which has man been the master of his own reason.

I am desirous of writing a book which shall be all truth, a work of which the passion, the thought, the action, and even the style, should spring from my own experience of feeling, from the meditations of my own intellect, from my own observation of incident, from my own study of the genius of expression.

When I turn over the pages of the metaphysician, I perceive a science that deals in words instead of facts. Arbitrary axioms lead to results that violate reason; imaginary principles establish systems that contradict the common sense of mankind. All is dogma, no part demonstration. Wearied, perplexed, doubtful, I throw down the volume in disgust.

When I search into my own breast, and trace the developement of my own intellect, and the formation of my own character, all is light and order. The luminous succeeds to the obscure, the certain to the doubtful, the intelligent to the illogical, the practical to the impossible, and I experience all that refined and ennobling satisfaction that we derive from the discovery of truth and the contemplation of nature.

I have resolved, therefore, to write the history of my own life, because it is the subject of which I have the truest knowledge.

At an age when some have scarcely entered upon their career, I can look back upon past years spent in versatile adventure and long meditation. My thought has been the consequence of my organization; my action the result of a necessity not less imperious. My fortune and my intelligence have blended together, and formed my character.

I am desirous of executing this purpose while my brain is still fed by the ardent though tempered flame of youth; while I can recall the past with accuracy, and record it with vividness; while my memory is still faithful, and while the dewy freshness of youthful fancy still lingers on the flowers of my mind.

I would bring to this work the illumination of an intellect emancipated from the fatal prejudices of an irrational education. This may be denied me. Yet some exemption from the sectarian prejudices that imbitter life may surely be expected from one who, by a curious combination of circumstances, finds himself without country, without kindred, and without friends; nor will he be suspected of indulging in the delusion of worldly vanity, who, having acted in the world, has retired to meditate in an inviolate solitude, and seeks relief from the overwhelming vitality of thought in the flowing spirit of creation.

II.

WHEN I can first recall existence, I remember myself a melancholy child. My father, Baron Fleming, was a Saxon nobleman of ancient family, who, being opposed to the French interest, quitted, at the commencement of this century, his country, and after leading for some years a wandering life, entered into the service of a northern court. At Venice, yet a youth, he married a daughter of the noble house of Contarini, and of that marriage I was the only offspring. My entrance into this world was marked with evil, for my mother yielded up her life while investing me with mine. I was christened with the name of her illustrious race. Thus much, during the first years of my childhood, I casually learned, but I know not how; I feel I was early conscious that my birth was a subject on which it was proper that I should not speak, and one, the mention of which, it was early instilled into me, would only occasion my remaining parent bitter sorrow. Therefore upon this topic I was ever silent, and with me, from my earliest recollection, Venice was a name to be shunned.

My father again married. His new bride was a daughter of the country which had adopted him. She was of high blood, and very wealthy, and beautiful in the fashion of her land. This union produced two children, both males. As a child, I viewed them with passive antipathy. They were called my brothers, but nature gave the lie to the reiterated assertion. There was no similitude between us. Their blue eyes, their flaxen hair, and their white visages claimed no kindred with my Venetian countenance. Wherever I moved, I looked around me, and beheld a race different from myself. There was no sympathy between my frame and the rigid clime whither I had been brought to live. I knew not why, but I was unhappy. Had I found in one of my father's new children a sister, all might have been changed. In that sweet and singular tie, I might have discovered solace, and the variance of constitution would perhaps, between different sexes, have fostered, rather than discouraged affection. But this blessing, which I have ever considered the choicest boon of nature, was denied me. I was alone.

I loved my father dearly and deeply, but I seldom saw him. He was buried in the depth of affairs. A hurried kiss and a passing smile were the fleeting gifts of his affection. Scrupulous care however was taken that I should never be, and should never feel, neglected. I was overladen with attentions, even as an infant. My stepmother, swayed by my father, and perhaps by a well-regulated mind, was vigilant in not violating the etiquette of maternal duty. No favour was shown to my white brethren which was not extended also to me. To me also, as the eldest, the preference, if necessary, was ever yielded. But for the rest, she was cold, and I was repulsive, and she stole from the saloon, which I rendered interesting by no infantile graces, to the nursery, where she could lavish her love upon her troublesome, but sympathizing offspring, and listen to the wondrous chronicle which their attendants daily supplied of their marvellous deeds and almost oracular prattle.

Because I was unhappy, I was sedentary and silent, for the lively sounds and the wild gambols of children are but the unconscious pourings of joy. They make their gay noises, and burst into their gay freaks, as young birds in spring chant in the free air, and flutter in the fresh boughs. But I could not revel in the rushing flow of my new blood, nor yield up my frame to its dashing and voluptuous course. I could not yet analyze my feelings; I could not indeed yet think; but I had an instinct that I was different from my fellow-creatures, and the feeling was not triumph, but horror.

My quiet inaction gained me the reputation of stupidity. In vain they endeavoured to conceal from me their impression. I read it in their looks; in their glances of pity full of learned discernment, in their telegraphic exchanges of mutual conviction. At last, in a moment of irritation, the secret broke from one of my white brothers. I felt that the urchin spoke truth, but I cut him to the ground. He ran howling and yelping to his dam. I was surrounded by the indignant mother and the domestic police. I listened to their agitated accusations, and palpitating threats of punishment, with sullen indifference. I offered no defence. I courted their vengeance. It came in the shape of imprisonment. I was conducted to my room, and my door was locked on the outside. I answered the malignant sound by bolting it in the interior. I remained there two days deaf to all their entreaties, without sustenance, feeding only upon my vengeance. Each fresh visit was an additional triumph. I never answered; I never moved. Demands of apology were exchanged for promises of pardon: promises of pardon were in turn succeeded by offers of reward. I gave no sign. I heard them stealing on tiptoe to the portal, full of horrible alarm, and even doubtful of my life. I scarcely would breathe. At length the door was burst open, and in rushed the half-fainting baroness, and a posse of servants, with the children clinging to their nurses' gowns. Planted in the most distant corner, I received them with a grim smile. I was invited away. I refused to move. A man-servant advanced and touched me. I stamped, I gnashed my teeth, I gave a savage growl, that made him recoil with dread. The baroness lost her remaining presence of mind, withdrew her train, and was obliged to call in my father, to whom all was for the first time communicated.

I heard his well-known step upon the stair, I beheld the face that never looked upon me without a smile, if in carelessness, still, still a smile. Now it was grave, but sad, not harsh.

"Contarini," he said, in a serious, but not angered voice, "what is all this?"

I burst into a wild cry, I rushed to his arms. He pressed me to his bosom. He tried to kiss away the flooding tears, that each embrace called forth more plentifully. For the first time in my life I felt happy, because for the first time in my life I felt loved.

III.

It was a beautiful garden, full of terraces and shaded walks of bowery trees. A tall fountain sprang up from a marble basin, and its glittering column broke in its fall into a thousand coloured drops, and woke the gleamy fish that would have slept in the dim water. And I wandered about, and the enchanted region seemed illimitable, and at each turn more magical and more bright. Now a white vase shining in the light, now a dim statue shadowy in a cool grot. I would have lingered a moment at the mossy hermitage, but the distant bridge seemed to invite me to new adventures.

It was only three miles from the city, and belonged to the aunt of the baroness. I was brought here to play. When the women met there was much kissing, and I also was kissed, but it gave me no pleasure, for I felt even then that it was a form, and I early imbibed a hatred of all this mechanical domestic love. And they sat together, and took out their work, and talked without ceasing, chiefly about the children. The baroness retold all the wonderful stories of the nurses, many of which I knew to be false. I did not say this, but the conviction gave me, thus early, a contempt for the chatter of women. As soon as I was unobserved, I stole away to the garden.

Even then it was ravishing to be alone. And although I could not think, and knew not the cause of the change, I felt serene, and the darkness of my humour seemed to leave me. All was so new and so beautiful. The bright sweet flowers, and the rich shrubs, and the tall trees, and the flitting birds, and the golden bees, and the gay butterflies, and that constant and soothing hum, broken only ever and anon by a strange shrill call, and that wonderful blending of brilliancy and freshness, and perfume and warmth, that strong sense of the loveliness and vitality of nature which we feel amid the growing life of a fair garden, entered into my soul, and diffused themselves over my frame, softened my heart, and charmed my senses.

But all this was not alone the cause of my happiness. For to me the garden was not a piece of earth belonging to my aunt, but a fine world. I wandered about in quest of some strange adventure, which I would fain believe, in so fair a region must quickly occur. The terrace was a vast desert over which I travelled for many days, and the mazy walks, so mysterious and unworldly, were an unexplored forest fit for a true knight. And in the hermitage, I sought the simple hospitality of a mild and aged host, who pointed to the far bridge as surely leading to a great fulfilment, and my companion was a faithful esquire, whose fidelity was never wanting, and we conversed much, but most respecting a mighty ogre, who was to fall beneath my puissant arm. Thus glided many a day in unconscious and creative reverie, but sometimes, when I had explored over again each nook and corner, and the illimitable feeling had worn off, the power of imagination grew weak. I found myself alone amid the sweets and sunshine, and felt sad.

But I would not quit this delicious world without an effort, and invented a new mode of mingling in its life. I reclined beneath a shady tree, and I covered my eyes with my little hand, and I tried to shut out the garish light, that seemed to destroy the visions which were ever flitting before me.

They came in their beauty, obedient to my call. And I wandered in strange countries, and achieved many noble acts, and said many noble words, and the beings with whom I acted were palpable as myself, with beautiful faces and graceful forms. And there was a brave young knight, who was my friend, and his life I ever saved, and a lovely princess, who spoke not, but smiled ever, and ever upon me. And we were lost in vast forests, and shared hard food, and as the evening drew on, we came to the gates of a castle.

"Contarini! Contarini!" a voice sounded from the house, and all the sweet visions rushed away like singing birds scared out of a tree. I was no longer a brave knight: I was a child. I rose miserable and exhausted, and in spite of a repeated cry, I returned with a slow step and a sullen face.

I saw there was an unusual bustle in the house. Servants were running to and fro doing nothing, doors were slammed, and there was much calling. I stole into the room unperceived. It was a new comer. They were all standing around a beautiful girl, expanding into prime womanhood, and all talking at the same time. There was also much kissing.

It appeared to me that there could not be a more lovely being than the visiter. She was dressed in a blue riding-coat, with a black hat, which had fallen off her forehead. Her full chestnut curls had broken loose. Her rich cheek glowed with the excitement of the meeting, and her laughing eyes sparkled with social love.

I gazed upon her unperceived. She must have been at least eight years my senior. This idea crossed me not then, I gazed upon her unperceived, and it was fortunate, for I was entranced. I could not move or speak. My whole system changed. My breath left me. I panted with great difficulty. The colour fled from my cheek, and I was sick from the blood rushing to my heart.

I was seen, I was seized, I was pulled forward. I bent down my head. They lifted it up, drawing back my curls; they lifted it up covered with blushes. She leant down, she kissed me—O! how unlike the dull kisses of the morning. But I could not return her embrace; I nearly swooned upon her bosom. She praised, in her good-nature, the pretty boy, and the tone in which she spoke made me doubly feel my wretched insignificance.

The bustle subsided; eating succeeded to talking. Our good aunt was a great priestess in the mysteries of plum-cake and sweet wine. I had no appetite. This was the fruitful theme of much discussion. I could not eat: I thought only of the fair stranger. They wearied me with their wonderment and their inquiries. I was irritated and I was irritable. The baroness schooled me in that dull tedious way which always induces obstinacy. At another time, I should have been sullen, but my heart was full and softened, and I wept. My step-mother was alarmed lest, in an unguarded moment, she should have passed the cold, strict line of maternal impartiality which she had laid down for her constant regulation. She would have soothed me with commonplace consolation. I was miserable and disgusted. I fled again to the garden.

I regained with hurrying feet my favourite haunt, again I sat under my favourite tree. But not now to build castles of joy and hope, not now to commune with my beautiful creation, and revel in the warm flow of my excited fancy. All, all had fled; all had changed. I shivered under the cold horror of reality.

I thought I heard beautiful music, but it was only the voice of a woman.

"Contarini," said the voice, "why do you weep?"

I looked up; it was the stranger, it was Christiana. "Because," I answered, sobbing, "I am miserable."

"Sweet boy," she said, as she knelt down beside me, "dry, dry your tears, for we all love you. Mamma meant not to be cross."

"Mamma! She is not my mamma."

"But she loves you like a mother."

"No one loves me."

"All love you, dearest—I love you," and she kissed me with a thousand kisses.

"O! Christiana," I exclaimed, in a low, tremulous voice, "love me, love me always. If you do not love me I shall die!"

I threw my arms around her neck, and a gleam of rapture seemed to burst through the dark storm of my grief. She pressed me to her heart a thousand times, and each time I clung with a more ardent grasp—and by degrees, the fierceness of my passion died away, and heavy sobs succeeded to my torrents of tears, and light sighs at last came flying after, like clouds in a clearing heaven. Our grief dies away like a thunder-storm.

IV.

THE visit of Christiana was the first great incident of my life. No day passed without my seeing her, either at the garden-house, or at our town, and each day I grew happier. Her presence, the sound of her voice, one bright smile, and I was a different being; but her caresses, her single society, the possession of her soft hand—all this was maddening. When I was with her in the company of others, I was happy, but I indicated my happiness by no exterior sign. I sat by her side, with my hand locked in hers, and I fed in silence upon my tranquil joy. But when we were alone, then it was that her influence over me broke forth. All the feelings of my heart were hers. I concealed nothing. I told her each moment that I loved her, and that until I knew her I was unhappy. Then I would communicate to her in confidence all my secret sources of enjoyment, and explain how I had turned common places into enchanted regions, where I could always fly for refuge. She listened with fondness and delight, and was the heroine of all my sports. Now I had indeed a princess. Strolling with her, the berceau was still more like a forest, and the solace of the hermit's cell still more refreshing.

Her influence over me was all-powerful, for she seemed to change my habits and my temper. In kindness she entered into my solitary joys; in kindness she joined in my fantastic amusements; for her own temper was social, and her own delight in pastimes that were common to all. She tried to rouse me from my inaction, she counselled me to mingle with my companions. How graceful was this girl! Grace was indeed her characteristic, her charm. Sometimes she would run away swifter than an arrow, and then, as she was skimming along, suddenly stop, and turn her head with an expression so fascinating, that she appeared to me always like a young sunny fawn.

"Contarini!" she would cry, in a clear flute-like voice. How I rushed to her!

I became more amiable to my brothers. I courted more the members of my little society. I even joined in their sports. It was whispered that Contarini was much improved, and the baroness glanced at me with a kind of patronising air, that seemed to hint to the initiated not to press me too heavily with their regulations, or exercise towards one so unpractised, perhaps so incapable, all the severity of their childish legislation.

The visit of Christiana drew to a close. There was a children's ball at our house, and she condescended to be its mistress. Among my new companions, there was a boy who was two years my senior. He had more knowledge of the world than most of us, for he had been some time at school. He was gay, vivacious, talkative. He was the leader in all our diversions. We all envied him his superiority, and all called him conceited. He was ever with Christiana. I disliked him.

I hated dancing, but to-night I had determined to dance, for the honour of our fair president. When the ball opened, I walked up to claim her hand as a matter of course. She was engaged—she was engaged to this youthful hero. Engaged! Was it true! Engaged! Horrible jargon! Were the hollow forms of mature society to interfere with our play of love? She expressed her regret, and promised to dance with me afterward. She promised what I did not require. Pale and agitated, I stole to a corner, and fed upon my mortified heart.

I watched her in the dance. Never had she looked more beautiful; what was worse, never more happy. Every smile pierced me through. Each pressure of my rival's hand touched my brain. I grew sick and dizzy. It was a terrible effort not to give way to my passion. But I succeeded, and escaped from the chamber, with all its glaring lights and jarring sounds.

I stopped one moment on the staircase for breath. A servant came up and asked if I wanted any thing. I could not answer. He asked if I were unwell. I struggled with my choking voice, and said I was very well. I stole up to my bed-room. I had no light, but a dim moon just revealed my bed. I threw myself upon it and wished to die.

My forehead was burning hot, my feet were icy cold. My heart seemed in my throat. I felt quite sick. I could not speak; I could not weep; I could not think. Every thing seemed blended in one terrible sensation of desolate and desolating wretchedness.

Much time perhaps had not elapsed, although it seemed to me an age, but there was a sound in the room, light and gentle. I looked around, I thought that a shadowy form passed between me and the window. A feeling of terror crossed me. I nearly cried out; but as my lips moved, a warm mouth sealed them with sweetness.

"Contarini," said a voice I could not mistake, "are you unwell?"

I would not answer.

"Contarini, my love, speak to Christiana!"

But the demon prevailed, and I would not speak.

"Contarini, you are not asleep?"

Still I was silent.

"Contarini, you do not love me."

I would have been silent, but I sighed.

"Contarini, what has happened? Tell me, tell me, dearest. Tell your Christiana. You know you always tell her every thing."

I seized her hand—I bathed it with my fast-flowing tears.

She knelt down as she did on our first meeting in the garden, and clasped me in her arms; and each moment the madness of my mind grew greater. I was convulsed with passion.

And when I grew more calm, she again spoke, and asked me what made me so unhappy; and I said, between my wild sobs, "O! Christiana, you too have turned against me!"

"Dear, sensitive child," she said, as she pressed me to her bosom, "if you feel so keenly, you will never be happy. Turn against you! O! Contarini, who is your friend if not Christiana! Do I not love you better than all the world! Do I not do all I can to make you happy and good? And why should I turn against Contarini when he is the best and dearest of boys, and loves his Christiana with all his heart and soul?"

She raised me from the bed, and placed me in her lap. My head reposed upon her fond and faithful heart. She was silent, for I was exhausted, and I felt her sweet breath descending upon my cheek.

"Go," I said, after some little time, and in a feeble voice, "go, Christiana. They want you."

"Not without you, dearest. I came to fetch you."

"I cannot go. It is impossible; I am so tired."

"O! come dearest! I shall be so unhappy if you do not come. You would not have me unhappy the whole evening, this evening that we were to be so gay. See! I will run and fetch a light, and be with you in a moment." And she kissed me and ran away, and in a moment returned.

"Dearest Christiana! I cannot go. What will they think of me?"

"Nobody knows even that you are away; all are busy."

"What will they think of me? Really I cannot go, and my eyes are so red."

"Nonsense! They are the blackest and most beautiful eyes I ever saw."

"O! they are horridly red," I answered, looking in the glass. "I cannot go, Christiana."

"They are not the least red. I will wash them with some eau de Cologne and water."

"O! Christiana, do you really love me? Have you really made it up?"

"I love you more than ever, dear! There, let me brush your curls. Is this your brush? What a funny little brush! Dear Contarini, how pretty you look!"

V.

WHEN I was eight years of age, a tutor was introduced into the house, and I was finally and formally emancipated from the police of the nursery, and the government of women. My tutor was well qualified for his office, according to the existing ideas respecting education, which substitute for the noblest of sciences the vile art of teaching words. He was learned in his acquirements, and literary in his taste, with a calm mind, a bland manner, and a mild voice. The baroness, who fancied herself a great judge of character, favoured him, before the commencement of his labours, with an epitome of mine. After a year's experience of his pupil, he ventured to express his opinion, that I was by no means so slow as was supposed, that although I had no great power of application, I was not averse to acquiring knowledge, and that if I were not endowed with any very remarkable or shining qualities, my friends might be consoled for the absence of these high powers by my being equally destitute of those violent passions and that ungovernable volition which were usually attendant upon genius, and too often rendered the most gifted miserable.

I was always a bad learner, and although I loved knowledge from my cradle, I liked to acquire it in my own way. I think that I was born with a detestation of grammars. Nature seemed to whisper to me the folly of learning words instead of ideas, and my mind would have grown sterile for want of manure, if I had not taken its culture into my own hands, and compensated by my own tillage for my tutor's bad husbandry. I therefore, in a quiet way, read every book that I could get hold of, and studied as little as possible in my instructor's museum of verbiage, whether his specimens appeared in the anatomy of a substantive, or the still more disgusting form of a dissected verb.

This period of my life was too memorable for a more interesting incident than the introduction of my tutor. For the first time I visited the theatre. Never shall I forget the impression. At length I perceived human beings conducting themselves as I wished. I was mad for the playhouse, and I had the means of gratifying my mania. I so seldom fixed my heart upon any thing, I showed, in general, such little relish for what is called amusement, that my father accorded me his permission with pleasure and facility, and as an attendant to this magical haunt, I now began to find my tutor of great use.

I had now a pursuit, for when I was not a spectator at the theatre, at home I was an actor. I required no audience—I was happier alone. My chivalric reveries had been long gradually leaving me; now they entirely vanished. As I learned more of life and nature, I required for my private world something which, while it was beautiful and uncommon, was nevertheless natural and could live. Books more real than fairy tales and feudal romances had already made me muse over a more real creation. The theatre at once fully introduced to me this new existence, and there arose accordingly in my mind new characters. Heroes succeeded to knights, tyrants to ogres, and boundless empire to enchanted castles. My character also changed with my companions. Before all was beautiful and bright, but still and mystical. The forms that surrounded me were splendid, the scenes through which I passed glittering, but the changes took place without my agency, or if I acted, I fulfilled only the system of another—for the foundation was the supernatural. Now, if every thing were less beautiful, every thing was more earnest. I mingled with the warlike and the wise, the crafty, the suffering, the pious—all depended upon our own exertions, and each result could only be brought about by their own simple and human energies—for the foundation was the natural.

Yet at times even this fertile source of enjoyment failed, and the dark spirit which haunted in my first years would still occasionally descend upon my mind. I knew not how it was, but the fit came upon me in an instant, and often when least counted on. A star, a sunset, a tree, a note of music, the sound of the wind, a fair face flitting by me in unknown beauty, and I was lost. All seemed rapid, dull, spiritless, and flat. Life had no object and no beauty; and I slunk to some solitary corner, where I was content to lie down and die. These were moments of bitter agony, these were moments in which if I were spoken to I had no respect for persons. Once I remember my father found me before the demon had yet flown, and, for the first time, he spoke without being honoured.

At last I had such a lengthened fit that it attracted universal attention. I would scarcely move, or speak, or eat for days. There was a general alarm. The baroness fell into a flutter, lest my father should think I had been starved to death, or ill-used, or poisoned, and overwhelmed me with inquiries, each of which severally procrastinated my convalescence. For doubtless, now that I can analyze my past feelings, these dark humours arose only from the want of being loved. Physicians were called in. There were immense consultations. They were all puzzled, and all had recourse to arrogant dogmas. I would not, nay, I could not assist them. Lying upon the sofa with my eyes shut, as if asleep, I listened to their conferences. It was settled that I was suffering from a want of nervous energy. Strange jargon, of which their fellow-creatures are the victims! Although young, I looked upon these men with suspicion, if not contempt, and my after life has both increased my experience of their character, and confirmed my juvenile impression.

Change of air and scene were naturally prescribed for an effect by men who were ignorant of the cause. It was settled that I should leave town, accompanied by my tutor, and that we should reside for a season at my father's castle.

VI.

"AND I, too, will fly to Egeria!"

We were discoursing of Pompilius when the thought flashed across me. I no longer listened to his remarks, and ceased also to answer. My eyes were indeed fixed upon the page, but I perceived nothing; as it was not yet my hour of liberty, I remained in a soft state of dreamy abstraction.

When I was again free I wandered forth into the park, and I hastened, with a rushing, agitated step, to the spot on which I had fixed.

It was a small dell, and round it grew tall trees with thin and light-coloured leaves; and the earth was everywhere covered with thick fern and many wild flowers. And the dell was surrounded at a very slight distance by a deep wood, out of which white glancing hares each instant darted to play upon the green sunny turf. It was not indeed a sparry grot, cool in the sparkling splendour of a southern scene; it was not indeed a spot formed in the indefinite, but lovely, mould of the regions of my dreams, but it was green, and sweet, and wondrous still.

And I threw myself upon the soft yielding fern, and covered my eyes. And a shadowy purple tint was all that I perceived, and as my abstraction grew more intense, the purple lightened into a dusky white, and this new curtain again into a glittering veil, and the veil mystically disappeared, and I beheld a beautiful and female face.

It was not unlike Christiana, but more dazzling, and very pensive. And the eyes met mine, and they were full of serious lustre, and my heart beat, and I seemed to whisper with a very low, but almost ecstatic voice, "Egeria!" Yet indeed my lips did not move. And the vision beamed with a melancholy smile. And suddenly I found myself in a spacious cave, and I looked up into the face of a beautiful woman, and her countenance was the countenance of the vision. And we were in deep shade, but far out I could perceive a shining and azure land. And the sky was of a radiant purple, and the earth was streaming with a golden light. And there were blue mountains, and bright fields, and glittering vineyards.

And I said nothing, but I looked upon her face, and dwelt upon her beauty. And hours flew, and the sun set, and the dew descended. And as the sky became less warm, the vision gradually died away, and I arose in the long twilight, and I returned home pensive and grave, but full of a soft and palpitating joy.

And when I returned, I could not eat. My tutor made many observations, many inquiries, but he was a simple man, and I could always quiet him. I sat at the table full of happiness, and almost without motion. And in the evening I stole into a corner, and thought of the coming day with all its rich strange joys.

My life was now one long stream of full felicity. It was indeed but one idea, but that idea was as beautiful as it was engrossing. Each day I hastened to the enchanted dell, each day I returned with renewed rapture. I had no thought for any thing but my mystic mistress. My studies, always an effort, would now have been insupportable, had I not invented a system by which I rendered even their restraint a new source of enjoyment. I had now so complete a command of my system of abstraction, that while my eye apparently was employed and interested with my allotted page, I in fact perceived nothing but my visionary nymph. My tutor, who observed me always engrossed, could not perceive that I was otherwise than a student, and when I could remember, I would turn over a leaf, or affect with much anxiety to look out a word in the lexicon, so that his deception was perfect. Then at the end of the day I would snatch some hasty five minutes to gain an imperfect acquaintance with my task, imperfect enough to make him at length convinced that the baroness's opinion of my intellect was not so erroneous as he had once imagined.

A short spring and a long summer had passed away thus delightfully, and I was now to leave the castle and return to the capital. The idea of being torn away from Egeria was harrowing. I became again melancholy, but my grief was tender, not savage. I did not recur to my ancient gloom, for I was prevented by the consoling conviction that I was loved. Yet to her the sad secret must be confided. I could not quit her without preparation. How often in solitary possession of the dreadful fact, have I gazed upon her incomparable face, how often have I fancied that she was conscious of the terrible truth, and glanced reproachfully even amid her looks of love.

It was told: in broken acts of passionate we with streaming eyes, and amid embraces of mad dening rapture, it was told. I clung to her, I would have clung to her forever, but a dark and irresistible destiny doomed us to part, and I was left to my uninspired loneliness.

Returning home from my last visit to the dell, I met my tutor. He came upon me suddenly, otherwise I would have avoided him, as at this moment I would have avoided any thing else human. My swollen cheeks, my eyes dim with weeping, my wild and broken walk, attracted even his attention.

He inquired what ailed me. His appearance, so different from the radiant being from whom I had lately parted, his voice so strange after the music which yet lingered in my ear, his salutation so varying in style to the one that ever welcomed me, and ever and alone was welcome, the horrible contrast that my situation formed with the condition I had the instant quitted—all this overcame me. I expressed my horror by my extended arms and my averted head. I screamed, I foamed at the mouth, I fell into violent convulsions.

VII.

ALTHOUGH I have delineated with some detail the feelings of my first boyhood, I have been indebted for this record to the power of a faithful and analytic memory, and not to any early indulgence in the habits of introspection. For indeed, in these young years I never thought about myself, or if some extraordinary circumstances impelled me to idiosyncratic contemplation, the result was not cheering. For I well remember that when, on the completion of my eleventh year, being about to repair to a college where I was to pass some years preparatory to the university, I meditated on this great and coming change,—I was impressed with a keen conviction of inferiority. It had sometimes indeed crossed my mind that I was of a different order to those around me, but never that the difference was in my favour, and brooding over the mortifying contrast which my exploits exhibited in my private and my public world, and the general opinion which they entertained of me at home, I was at times strongly tempted to consider myself even half a fool.

Though change was ever agreeable, I thought of the vicissitude that was about to occur with the same apprehension that men look forward to the indefinite horror of a terrible operation. And the strong pride that supported me under the fear, and forbade me to demonstrate it, was indeed the cause of my sad forebodings. For I could not tolerate the thought that I should become a general jest, and a common agent. And when I perceived the state preparing for me, and thought of Egeria, I blushed. And that beautiful vision that had brought me such delicious solace was now only a source of depressing mortification. And for the first time in my life, in my infinite tribulation, and in the agony of my fancy, I mused why there should be such a devilish and tormenting variance between my thought and my action.

The hour came, and I was placed in the heart of a little and a busy world. For the first time in my life I was surrounded by struggling and excited beings. Joy, hope, sorrow, ambition, craft, courage, wit, dulness, cowardice, beneficence, awkwardness, grace, avarice, generosity, wealth, poverty, beauty, hideousness, tyranny, suffering, hypocrisy, truth, love, hatred, energy, inertness—they were all there, and all sounded, and moved, and acted about me. Light laughs, and bitter cries, and deep imprecations, and the deeds of the friendly, the prodigal, and the tyrant, and the exploits of the brave, the graceful, and the gay, and the flying words of native wit, and the pompous sentences of acquired knowledge—how new, how exciting, how wonderful!

Did I tremble? Did I sink into my innermost self? Did I fly? Never. As I gazed upon them, a new principle rose up in my breast, and I perceived only beings whom I was determined to control. They came up to me with a curious glance of half-suppressed glee, breathless and mocking. They asked me questions of gay nonsense with a serious voice and a solemn look. I answered in their kind. On a sudden I seemed endowed with new powers, and blessed with the gift of tongues. I spoke to them with a levity which was quite new to me, a most unnatural ease. I even, in my turn, presented to them questions to which they found it difficult to respond. Some ran away to communicate their impressions to their comrades, some stayed behind, but these became more serious and more natural. When they found that I was endowed with a pregnant and decided character, their eyes silently pronounced me a good fellow, they vied with each other in kindness, and the most important led me away to initiate me in their mysteries.

Weeks flew away, and I was intoxicated with my new life and my new reputation. I was in a state of ceaseless excitement. It seemed that my tongue never paused: yet each word brought forth a new laugh, each sentence of gay nonsense fresh plaudits. All was rattle, frolic, and wild mirth. My companions caught my unusual manner, they adopted my new phrases, they repeated my extraordinary apophthegms. Every thing was viewed and done according to the new tone which I had introduced. It was decided that I was the wittiest, the most original, the most diverting of their society. A coterie of the most congenial insensibly formed around me, and my example gradually ruled the choice spirits of our world. I even mingled in their games, although I disliked the exertion, and in those in which the emulation was very strong, I even excelled. My ambition conquered my nature. It seemed that I was the soul of the school. Wherever I went, my name sounded, whatever was done, my opinion was quoted. I was caressed, adored, idolized. In a word, I was popular.

Yet sometimes I caught a flying moment to turn aside, and contrast my present situation with my past one. What was all this? Was I the same being? But my head was in a whirl, and I had not time, or calmness, to solve the perplexing inquiry.

There was a boy, and his name was Musæus. He was somewhat my elder. Of a kind, calm, docile, mellow nature, moderate in every thing, universally liked, but without the least influence,—he was the serene favourite of the school. It seemed to me that I never beheld so lovely and so pensive a countenance. His face was quite oval, his eyes deep blue: his rich brown curls clustered in hyacinthine grace upon the delicate rose of his downy cheeks, and shaded the light blue veins of his clear white forehead.

I beheld him: I loved him. My friendship was a passion. Of all our society, he alone crowded not around me. He was of a cold temperament, shy and timid. He looked upon me as a being whom he could not comprehend, and rather feared. I was unacquainted with his motives, and piqued with his conduct. I gave up my mind to the acquisition of his acquaintance, and of course I succeeded. In vain he endeavoured to escape. Wherever he moved, I seemed unintentionally to hover around him: whatever he wanted, I seemed providentially to supply. In the few words that this slight intercourse called forth, I addressed him in a tone strange to our rough life; I treated him with a courtesy which seemed to elevate our somewhat coarse condition. He answered nothing, was confused, thankful, agitated. He yielded to the unaccustomed tenderness of my manner, to the unexperienced elegance of my address. He could not but feel the strange conviction, that my conduct to him was different to my behaviour to others, for in truth his presence ever subdued my spirit, and repressed my artificial and excited manner.

Musæus was lowly born, and I was noble; he poor, and I wealthy; I had a dazzling reputation, he but good report. To find himself an object of interest, of quiet and tender regard, to one to whose notice all aspired, and who seemed to exist only in a blaze of cold-hearted raillery and reckless repartee, developed even his dormant vanity. He looked upon me with interest, and this feeling soon matured into fondness.

O! days of rare and pure felicity, when Musæus and myself, with our arms around each other's neck, wandered together amid the meads and shady woods that formed our limits. I lavished upon him all the fanciful love that I had long stored up, and the mighty passions that yet lay dormant in my obscure soul, now first began to stir in that glimmering abyss. And indeed conversing with this dear companion was it, that I first began to catch some glimpses of my yet hidden nature. For the days of futurity were our usual topic, and in parcelling out their fortunes, I unconsciously discovered my own desires. I was to be something great, and glorious, and dazzling, but what we could not determine. The camp and the senate, the sword and the scroll, that had raised, and had destroyed, so many states—these were infinitely discussed. And then a life of adventure was examined, full of daring delight. One might be a corsair or a bandit. Foreign travel was what we could surely command, and must lead to much. I spoke to him, in the fulness of our sweet confidence, of the strangeness of my birth, and we marvelled together over mysterious Venice. And this led us to conspiracies, for which I fancied that I had a predisposition. But in all these scenes, Musæus was to be never absent. He was to be my heart's friend from the beginning to the death. And I mourned that nature had given me no sister, wherewith I could bind him to me by a still stronger and sweeter tie. And then, with a shy, hesitating voice, for he delighted not in talking of his home, he revealed to me that he was more blessed: and Caroline Musæus rose up at once to me like a star, and without having seen her, I was indeed her betrothed.

Thus, during these bright days, did I pour forth all the feelings I had long treasured up, and in endeavouring to communicate my desires to another, I learned to think. I ascended from indefinite reverie to palpable cogitation.

I was now seldom alone. To be the companion of Musæus, I participated in many pastimes which otherwise I should have avoided, and in return he, although addicted to sports, was content, for my sake, to forego much former occupation. With what eagerness I rushed, when the hour of study ceased—with what wild eagerness I rushed to resume our delicious converse! Nor indeed was his image ever absent from me, and when, in the hour of school, we passed each other, or our countenances chanced to meet, there was ever a sweet, faint smile, that, unmarked by others, interchanged our love

A love that I thought must last forever, and forever flow like a clear, bright stream, yet at times my irritable passions would disturb even these sweet waters. The temperament of Musæus was cold and slow. I was at first proud of having interested his affection, but, as our friendship grew apace, I was not contented with this calm sympathy and quiet regard. I required that he should respond to my affection with feelings not less ardent, and energetic than mine own. I was sensitive, I was jealous. I found a savage joy in harrowing his heart—I triumphed when I could draw a tear from his beautiful eye; when I could urge him to unaccustomed emotion; when I forced him to assure me, in a voice of agitation, that he loved me alone, and prayed me to be pacified.

From sublime torture to ridiculous teasing, too often Musæus was my victim. One day I detected an incipient dislike to myself, or a growing affection for another: then, I passed him in gloomy silence, because his indispensable engagements had obliged him to refuse my invitation to our walk. But the letters with which I overwhelmed him under some of these contingencies—these were the most violent infliction. What pages of mad eloquence!—solemn appeals, bitter sarcasms, infinite ebullitions of frantic sensibility. For the first time in my life, I composed. I grew intoxicated with my own eloquence. A new desire arose in my mind, novel aspirations which threw light upon old and often-experienced feelings. I began to ponder over the music of language; I studied the collocation of sweet words, and constructed elaborate sentences in lonely walks. Poor Musæus quite sunk under the receipt of my effusions. He could not write a line, and had he indeed been able, it would have been often difficult for him to have discovered the cause of our separations. The brevity, the simplicity of his answers were irresistible and heart-rending. Yet these distractions brought with them one charm, a charm to me so captivating, that I fear it was sometimes a cause—reconciliation was indeed a love-feast.

The sessions of our college closed. The time came that Musæus and myself must for a moment part, but for a moment, for, I intended that he should visit me in our vacation, and we were also to write to each other every week. Yet even under these palliating circumstances parting was anguish.

The eve of the fatal day, we took our last stroll in our favourite meads. The whole way I wept, and leaned upon his shoulder. With what jealous care I watched to see if he too shed a tear. One clear drop at length came quivering down his cheek, like dew upon a rose. I pardoned him for its beauty. The bell sounded. I embraced him, as if it sounded for my execution, and we parted.

VIII.

I was once more at home, once more silent, once more alone. I found myself changed. My obscure aspirations after some indefinite happiness, my vague dreams of beauty, or palpable personifications of some violent fantastic idea, no longer inspired, no longer soothed, no longer haunted me. I thought only of one subject, which was full of earnest novelty, and abounded in interest, curious, serious, and engrossing. I speculated upon my own nature. My new life had developed many qualities, and had filled me with self-confidence

The clouds seemed to clear off from the dark landscape of my mind, and vast ambition might be distinguished on the far horizon, rearing its head like a mighty column. My energies stirred within me, and seemed to pant for the struggle and the strife. A deed was to be done, but what? I entertained at this time a deep conviction that life must be intolerable, unless I were the greatest of men. It seemed that I felt within me the power that could influence my kind. I longed to wave my inspiring sword at the head of armies, or dash into the very heat and blaze of eloquent faction.

When I contrasted my feelings and my situation I grew mad. The constant jar between my conduct and my conceptions was intolerable. In imagination a hero, I was in reality a boy. I returned from a victorious field to be criticised by a woman: in the very heart of a deep conspiracy, which was to change the fate of nations, to destroy Rome or to free Venice, I was myself the victim of each petty domestic regulation. I cannot describe the insane irritability which all this produced. Infinite were the complaints of my rudeness, my violence, my insufferable impertinence: incessant the threats of pains and penalties. It was universally agreed that college had ruined me. A dull, slow boy I had always been, but, at least, I was tolerably kind and docile. Now, as my tutor's report correctly certified, I was not improved in intellect, and all witnessed the horrible deterioration of my manners and my morals.

The baroness was in despair. After several smart skirmishes, we at length had a regular pitched battle.

She began her delightful colloquy in the true style of domestic reprimand; dull, drony nonsense, adapted, as I should hope, to no state in which human intellect can ever be found, even if it have received the full benefit of the infernal tuition of nurses, which would be only ridiculous, if its effects were not so fatally and permanently injurious. She told me that whenever I spoke I should speak in a low voice, and that I should never think for myself. That if any thing were refused, I should be contented, and never ask the reason why, because it was not proper ever to ask questions, particularly when we were sure that every thing was done for our good. That I should do every thing that was bidden, and always be ready to conform to everybody's desires, because at my age no one should have a will of his own. That I should never, on any account, presume to give my opinion, because it was quite impossible that one so young could have one. That on no account, also, should I ever be irritable, which never could be permitted; but she never considered that every effect has a cause, and never attempted to discover what might occasion this irritability. In this silly, superficial way she went on for some time, repeating dull axioms by rote, and offering to me the same useless advice that had been equally thrown away upon the tender minds of her generation.

She said all this, all this to me, all this to one who, a moment before, was a Cæsar, an Alcibiades. Now I had long brooded over the connexion that subsisted between myself and this lady. I had long formed in my mind and caught up from books, a conception of the relations which must exist between a stepmother and her unwelcome son. I was therefore prepared. She grew pale as I described in mad heroics our exact situation. She had no idea that any people, under any circumstances, could be influenced by such violent, such wicked, such insane sentiments. She stared, in stupid astonishment, at my terrible and unexpected fluency. She entirely lost her presence of mind, and burst into tears—tears not of affection, but of absolute fright, the hysteric offspring of a cold, alarmed, puzzled mind.

She vowed she would tell my father. I inquired, with a malignant sneer, of what? She protested she certainly would tell. I dilated on the probability of a stepdame's tale. Most certainly she would tell. I burst into a dark, foaming rage. I declared that I would leave the house, that I would leave the country, that I would submit no longer to my intolerable life, that suicide (and here I kicked down a chair) should bring me immediate relief. The baroness was terrified out of her life. The fall of the chair was the perfection of fear. She was one of those women who have the highest respect for furniture. She could not conceive a human being, much less a boy, voluntarily kicking down a chair, if his feelings were not very keen indeed. It was becoming too serious. She tried to soothe me. She would not speak to my father. All should be right, all should be forgotten, if I only would not commit suicide, and not kick down the chairs.

After some weeks, Musæus paid his long meditated visit. I had never, until I invited him, answered his solitary letter. I received him with a coldness which astonished me, and must have been apparent to any one but himself. I was distressed by the want of unction in my manner, and tried to compensate by a laboured hospitality which, like ice, was dazzling, but frigid. Many causes, perhaps, conduced to occasion this change, then inscrutable to me. Since we had parted, I had indulged in lofty ideas of self, and sometimes remembered, with a feeling approaching to disgusting mortification, the influence which had been exercised over me by a fellow-child. The reminiscence savoured too much of boyish weakness, and painfully belied my proud theory of universal superiority. At home, too, when the permission for the invitation was accorded, there was much discussion as to the quality of the invited. They wished to know who he was, and when informed looked rather grave. Some caution was muttered about the choice of my companions. Even my father, who seldom spoke to me, seemed alarmed at the prospect of a bad connexion. His intense worldliness was shocked. He talked to me for an unusual time upon the subject of school friendships, and his conversation, which was rare, made an impression. All this influenced me, for at that age I was, of course, the victim of every prejudice. Must I add to all this, what is perhaps the sad and dreary truth, that in loving all this time Musæus with such devotion, I was in truth rather enamoured of the creature of my imagination than the companion of my presence. Upon the foundation which he had supplied, I had built a beautiful and enchanted palace. Unceasing intercourse was a necessary ingredient of the spell. We parted, and the fairy fabric dissolved into the clouds.

Certain it is, that his visit was a failure. Musæus was too little sensitive to feel the change of my manner, and my duty, as his host, impelled me to conceal it. But the change was great. He appeared to me to have fallen off very much in his beauty. The baroness thought him a little coarse, and praised the complexion of her own children, which was like chalk. Then he wanted constant attention, for it was evident that he had no resources of his own, and certainly he was not very refined. But he was pleased, for he was in a new world. For the first time in his life he moved in theatres and saloons, and mingled in the splendour of high civilization. I took him everywhere; in fact, I could bear every thing but to be alone with him. So he passed a very pleasant fortnight, and then quitted us. How different from our last parting! Cheerful indeed it was, and, in a degree, cordial. I extended him my hand with a patronising air, and mimicking the hollow courtesy of maturer beings, I expressed, in a flimsy voice of affected regard, a wish that he might visit us again. And six weeks before I had loved this boy better than myself, would have perilled for him my life, and shared with him my fortune!

IX.

I RETURNED to college gloomy and depressed. Not that I cared for quitting home: I hated home. I returned in the fullness of one of my dark humours, and which promised to be one of the most terrible visitations that had ever fallen upon me. Indeed, existence was intolerable, and I should have killed myself had I not been supported by my ambition, which now each day became more quickening, so that the desire of distinction and of astounding action raged in my soul, and when I recollected that at the soonest many years must elapse before I could realize my ideas, I gnashed my teeth in silent rage and cursed my existence.

I cannot picture the astonishment that pervaded our little society, when they found the former hero of their gayety avoiding all contact and conversation, and moving about always in gloomy silence. It was at first supposed, that some great misfortune had happened to me, and inquiries were soon afloat, but nothing could be discovered. At length one of my former prime companions, I should say, perhaps, patrons, expostulated with me upon the subject: I assured him with grim courtesy that nothing had happened, and wished him good morning. As for Musæus, I just contrived the first day to greet him with a faint agonizing smile, and ever after I shunned him. Nothing could annoy Musæus long, and he would soon have forgotten his pain, as he had already perhaps freed his memory of any vivid recollection of the former pleasure which our friendship had undoubtedly brought him. He welcomed enjoyment with a smile, and was almost as cheerful when he should have been much less pleased.

But although Musæus was content to be thus quiet, the world in which he lived determined that he should be less pliegmatic. As they had nothing better to do, they took his quarrel upon themselves. "He certainly has behaved infamously to Musæus. You know they were always together. I wonder what it can be! As for the rest of the school, that is in comparison nothing; but Musæus—you know they were decided cronies. I never knew fellows more together. I wonder what it can be! If I were Musæus, I certainly would come to an explanation. We must put him up to it. If Musæus asks him, he cannot refuse, and then we shall know what it is all about."

They at length succeeded in beating it into poor Musæus's head, that he had been very ill-treated, and must be very unhappy, and they urged him to insist upon an explanation. But Musæus was no hand at demanding explanations, and he deputed the task to a friend.

I was alone, sitting on a gate in a part of the grounds which was generally least frequented, when I heard a shout which, although I could not guess its cause, sounded in my ear with something of a menacing and malignant expression. The whole school, headed by the deputy, were finding me out, in order that the important question might be urged, that the honour of Musæus might be supported, and their own curiosity gratified.

Now at that age, whatever I may be now, I could not be driven. A soft word, and I was an Abel; an appearance of force, and I scowled a Cain. Had Musæus, instead of being a most commonplace character, which assuredly he was, had it been in his nature to have struck out a single spark of ardent feeling, to have indulged in a single sigh of sentiment, he might perhaps yet have been my friend. His appeal might have freed me from the domination of the black spirit, and in weeping over our reconciliation upon his sensitive bosom, I might have been emancipated from its horrid thrall. But the moment that Musæus sought to influence my private feelings by the agency of public opinion, he became to me, instead of an object of indifference, an object of disgust, and only not of hatred, because of contempt.

I did not like the shout, and when, at a considerable distance, I saw them advancing towards the gate with an eager run, I was almost tempted to retire; but I had never yet flinched in the course of my life, and the shame and sickness which I now felt at the contemplation of such an act impelled me to stay.

They arrived, they gathered round me, they did not know how to commence their great business: breathless and agitated, they looked first at their embarrassed leader, and then at me.

When I had waited a sufficient time for my dignity, I rose to quit the place.

"We want you, Fleming," said the chief.

"Well!" and I turned round and faced the speaker.

"I tell you what, Fleming," said he, in a rapid nervous style, "you may think yourself a very great man; but we do not exactly understand the way you are going on. There is Musæus; you and he were the greatest friends last half, and now you do not speak to him, nor to any one else. And we all think that you should give an explanation of your conduct. And, in short, we come here to know what you have got to say for yourself."

"Do you!" I answered, with a sneer.

"Well, what have you got to say?" he continued in a firmer voice and more peremptory tone.

"Say! say that either you or I must leave this gate. I was here first, but as you are the largest number, I suppose I must yield."

I turned my heel upon him and moved. Some one hissed. I returned, and inquired in a very calm, mild voice, "Who hissed?"

Now the person who hissed was a boy, who was indeed my match in years, and perhaps in force, but a great coward. I knew it was he, because he was just the fellow who would hiss, and looked quite pale when I asked the question. Besides, no one answered it, and he was almost the only boy who, under such circumstances, would have been silent.

"Are you afraid to own it?" I asked, in a contemptuous tone, but still very subdued.

This great mob of nearly two hundred boys were very much ashamed at the predicament in which their officious and cowardly member had placed them. So their leader, proud in a fine frame, a great and renowned courage, unrivalled achievements in combat, and two years of superiority of age over myself, advanced a little and said, "Suppose I hissed, what then?"

"What then!" I exclaimed, in a voice of thunder, and with an eye of lightning—"what then! Why, then I will thrash you."

There was an instantaneous flutter and agitation, and pausing monosyllabic whisper in the crowd; they were like birds when the hawk is first detected in airy distance. Unconsciously, they withdrew like waves, and the arena being cleared, my opponent and I were left in opposition. Apparently there never was a more unequal match: but indeed he was not fighting with Contarini Fleming, but with a demon that had usurped his shape.

"Come on, then," he replied, with brisk confidence.

And I came—as the hail upon the tall corn. I flew at him like a wild beast; I felt not his best blow, I beat down his fine guard, and I sent him to the ground, stunned and giddy.

He was up again in a moment, and indeed I would not have waited for their silly rules of mock combat, but have destroyed him in his prostration. But he was up again in a moment. Again I flew upon him. He fought with subtle energy, but he was like a serpent with a tiger. I fixed upon him: my blows told with the rapid precision of machinery. His bloody visage was not to be distinguished. I believe that he was terrified with my frantic air.

I would never wait between the rounds. I cried out in a voice of madness for him to come on. There was breathless silence. They were thunder-struck. They were too generous to cheer their leader. They could not refrain from sympathizing with inferior force and unsupported courage. Each time that he came forward, I made the same dreadful spring, beat down his guard, and never ceased working upon his head, until at length my fist seemed to enter his very brain, and after ten rounds he fell down quite blind. I never felt his blows—I never lost my breath.

He could not come to time—I rushed forward—I placed my knee upon his chest. "I fight no more," he faintly cried.

"Apologize," I exclaimed; "apologize."

He did not speak.

"By heavens, apologize," I said, "or I know not what I shall do."

"Never!" he replied.

I lifted up my arm. Some advanced to interfere. "Oil, dogs," I shouted; "Oil, off." I seized the fallen chief, rushed through the gate, and dragged him like Achilles through the mead. At the bottom there was a dung hill: upon it I flung the half-inanimate body.

X.

I STROLLED away to one of my favourite haunts; I was calm and exhausted; my face and hands were smeared with gore. I knelt down by the side of the stream, and drank the most delicious draught that I had ever quaffed. I thought that I should never have ceased. I felt invigorated, and a plunge in the river soon completed my renovation.

I reclined under a branching oak, and moralized on the part. For the first time in my life, I had acted. Hitherto I had been a creature of dreams, but within the last month unconsciously I found myself a stirrer in existence. I perceived that I had suddenly become a responsible agent. There were many passions, many characters, many incidents. Love, hatred, faction, vengeance, Musæus, myself, my antagonist, his followers, who were indeed a world; our soft walks, the hollow visit, the open breach, the organized party, the great and triumphant struggle.

And as I mused, all these things flitted across my vision, and all that had passed was again present, and again performed, except indeed that my part in the drama was of a more studied and perfect cast. For I was conscious of much that might have been finely expressed and dexterously achieved; and to introduce all this, I indulged in imaginary scenes. There was a long interview between myself and Musæus, most harrowing; a logomachy between myself and the chief of the faction, most pungent. I became so excited, that I could no longer restrain the outward expression of my strong feeling. My voice broke into impassioned tones; I audibly uttered the scornful jest. My countenance was in harmony with my speech; my action lent a more powerful meaning to my words.

And suddenly there was a great change whose order I cannot trace. For Musæus, though he looked upon me, was not Musæus, but a youth in a distant land, and I was there in a sumptuous dress, with a brilliant star; and we were friends. And a beautiful woman rose up, a blending of Christiana and Egeria. Both of us loved her, and she yielded herself to me, and Musæus fled for aid. And there came a king with a great power, and as I looked upon his dazzling crown, lo! it encircled the brow of my late antagonist.

And I beheld and felt all this growing and expanding life with a bliss so keen, so ravishing, that I can compare it to nothing but to joys, which I was then too young even to participate. My brain seemed to melt into a liquid, rushing stream; my blood quickened into action, too quick even to recognise pulsation, fiery and fleet, yet delicate and soft. With difficulty I breathed, yet the oppression was delicious. But in vain I endeavour to paint the refined excitement of this first struggle of my young creation.

The drama went on, nor was it now in my power to restrain it. At length, oppressed with the vitality of the beings I had formed, dazzled with the shifting brilliancy of the scenes in which they moved, exhausted with the marvellous action of my shadowy self, who figured before me in endless exploit, now struggling, now triumphing, now pouring forth his soul in sentences of burning love, now breathing a withering blast of proud defiance, I sought for means to lay the wild ghosts that I had unconsciously raised.

I lifted my hand to my face, that had been gazing all this time, in fixed abstraction, upon a crimson cloud. There was a violent struggle, which I did not comprehend. Every thing was chaos, but soon, as it were, a mystic music came rising out of the incongruous mass, a mighty secret was revealed to me, all was harmony, and order, and repose, and beauty. The whirling scene no longer changed; and there was universal stillness; and the wild beings ceased their fierce action, and bending down before me in humility, proffered their homage to their creator.

"Am I then," I exclaimed, looking around with an astonished and vacant air, "am I then, after all, a poet?"

I sprang up—I paced up and down before the tree, but not in thought. The perspiration ran down my forehead—I trembled—I panted—I was lost. I was not conscious of my existence. My memory deserted me—the rudder of my mind broke away.

My thought came back—I threw myself upon the ground. "Yes," I exclaimed, "beautiful beings, I will release you from the prison-house of my brain. I will give you to freedom and to light. You shall exist not only for me—you shall go forth to the world to delight and to conquer."

And this was the first time in my life that the idea of literary creation occurred to me. For I disliked poetry, of which indeed I had read little except plays, and although I took infinite delight in prose fiction, it was only because the romance, or the novel, offered to me a life more congenial to my feelings, than the world in which I lived. But the conviction of this day threw light upon my past existence. My imaginary deeds of conquest, my heroic aspirations, my long, dazzling dreams of fanciful adventure, were perhaps but sources of ideal action; that stream of eloquent and choice expression that seemed ever flowing in my ear was probably intended to be directed in a different channel than human assemblies, and might melt, or kindle the passions of mankind in silence. And the visions of beauty and the vows of love—were they too to glitter and glow only in imagination.

XI.

I REPAIRED the next day to my favourite tree, armed with a pencil and a paper book. My mind was, as I thought, teeming with ideas. I had composed the first sentence of my work in schooltime—it seemed full of music. I had repeated it a thousand times—I was enchanted with its euphony. It was now written, fairly written. With rapture I perceived it placed in its destined position. But what followed?—Nothing. In vain I rubbed my forehead; in vain I summoned my fancies. The traitors would not listen. My mind seemed full to the very brink, but not a drop of the rich stream overflowed. I became anxious, nervous, fretful. I walked about; I resealed myself. Again I threw down the pencil. I was like a man disenchanting. I could scarcely recall the visions of yesterday, and if, with an effort, I succeeded, they appeared cold, tame, dull, lifeless. Nothing can describe my blank despair.

They know not, they cannot tell—the cold, dull world—they cannot even remotely conceive the agony of doubt and despair which is the doom of youthful genius. To sigh for Fame in obscurity is like sighing in a dungeon for light. Yet the votary and the captive share an equal hope. But to feel the strong necessity of fame, and to be conscious without intellectual excellence life must be insupportable, to feel all this with no simultaneous faith in your own power—these are moments of despendency for which no immortality can compensate.

As for myself, repeated experiments only brought repeated failures. I would not die without a struggle, but I struggled only to be vanquished. One day was too hot; another I fancied too cold. Then again I was not well, or perhaps I was too anxious. I would try only a sentence each day. The trial was most mortifying, for I found when it came to this practical test, that in fact I had nothing to write about. Yet my mind had been so full, and even now a spark, and it would again light up; but the flame never kindled, or if ever I fanned an appearance of heat, I was sure only to extinguish it. Why could I not express what I seemed to feel? All was a mystery.

I was most wretched. I wandered about in very great distress, for my pride was deeply wounded, and I could no longer repose on my mind with confident solace. My spirit was quite broken. Had I fought my great battle now, I should certainly have been beaten. I was distracted with disquietude—I had no point of refuge—hope utterly vanished. It was impossible that I could be any thing. I must always fail. I hated to think of myself. The veriest dunce in the school seemed my superior. I grew meek and dull. I learned my dry lessons—I looked upon a grammar with a feeling of reverence; my lexicon was constantly before me. But I made little advance. I no longer ascribed my ill progress to the uninteresting task, but to my own incapacity. I thought myself, once more, half a fool.

XII.

HAD I now been blessed with a philosophic friend, I might have found consolation and assistance. But my instructors, to whom I had a right to look up for this aid, were, of course, wanting. The system which they pursued taught them to consider their pupils as machines, which were to fulfil a certain operation, and this operation was word-learning. They attempted not to discover, or to develop, or to form character. Predisposition was to them a dark oracle: organization, a mystery in which they were not initiated. The human mind was with them always the same soil, and one to which they brought ever the same tillage. And mine was considered a sterile one, for they found that their thistles did not flourish where they should have planted roses.

I was ever considered a lazy, idle boy, because I required ideas instead of words. I never would make any further exertion than would save me from their punishments: their rewards I did not covet. Yet I was ever reading, and in general knowledge was immeasurably superior to all the students—for aught I know, to all the tutors. For indeed in any chance observations in which they might indulge, I could even then perceive that they were individuals of the most limited intelligence. They spoke sometimes of great men, I suppose for our emulation, but their great men were always commentators. They sometimes burst into a eulogium of a great work; you might be sure it was ever a huge bunch of annotations. An unrivalled exploit turned out to be a happy conjecture—a marvellous deed was the lion's skin that covered the ears of a new reading. I was confounded to hear the same epithets applied to their obscure demi-gods that I associated with the names of Cæsar and Socrates, and Pericles, and Cicero. It was perplexing to find that Pharsalia or a Philippic—the groves of Academus or the fanes of the Acropolis, could receive no higher admiration than was lavished upon the unknown exploits of a hunter after syllables.

After my battle, I was never annoyed by my former friends. As time advanced I slightly relaxed in my behaviour, and when it was necessary, we interchanged words, but I never associated with any one. I was however no longer molested. An idea got afloat that I was not exactly in my perfect senses, and on the whole, I was rather feared than disliked.

Reading was my only resource. I seldom indulged in revery. The moment that I perceived my mind wandering, I checked it with a mixed feeling of disgust and terror. I made, however, during this period, more than one attempt to write, and always with signal discomfiture. Neither of the projected subjects in any way grew out of my own character, however they might have led to its delineation, had I proceeded. The first was a theme of heroic life, in which I wished to indulge in the gorgeousness of remote antiquity. I began with a fine description, which again elevated my hopes, but when the scene was fairly painted, my actors would not come on. I flung the sheet into the river, and cursed my repeated idiotism.

After an exposure of this kind, I always instantaneously became practical, and grave, and stupid; as a man, when he recovers from intoxication, vows that he will never again taste wine. Nevertheless, during the vacation, a pretty little German lady one night took it into her head to narrate some of the traditions of her country. Among these I heard, for the first time, the story of the Wild Huntsman of Rodenstein. It was most unlucky. The baroness, who was a fine instrumental musician, but who would never play when I requested her, chanced this night to be indulging us. The mystery and the music combined their damnable spells, and I was again enchanted. Infinite characters and ideas seemed rushing in my mind. I recollected that I had never yet given my vein a trial at home. Here I could command silence, solitude, hours unbroken and undisturbed. I walked up and down the room, once more myself. The music was playful, gay, and joyous. A village dance was before my vision—I marked with delight the smiling peasantry bounding under the clustering vines, the girls crowned with roses—the youth adorned with flowing ribands. Just as a venerable elder advanced, the sounds became melancholy, wild, and ominous. I was in a deep forest, full of doubt and terror—the wind moaned—the big branches heaved—in the distance I heard the baying of a hound. It did not appear, for suddenly the trumpet announced a coming triumph: I felt that a magnificent procession was approaching, that each moment it would appear: each moment the music became louder, and already an advanced and splendid guard appeared in the distance. I caught a flashing glimpse of a sea of waving plumes and glistening arms. The music ceased—the procession vanished—I fell from the clouds, I found myself in a dull drawing-room, a silly boy, very exhausted.

I felt so excessively stupid that I instantly gave up all thoughts of the Hunter of Rodenstein—and went to bed gloomy and without hope; but in the morning when I rose, the sun was shining so softly, the misty trees and the dewy grass were so tender and so bright, the air was so fresh and fragrant, that my first feeling was the desire of composition, and I walked forth into the park cheerful, and moved by a rising faith.

The excited feelings of the evening seemed to return, and when I had sufficiently warmed my mind with revery, I sat down to my table surrounded by every literary luxury that I could remember. Ink enclosed in an ornolu Cupid, clear and brilliant, quires of the softest cream-coloured paper, richly gilt, and a perfect magazine of the finest pens. I was exceedingly nervous, but on the whole not unsuccessful. I described a young traveller arriving at night at a small inn on the borders of a Bohemian forest. I did not allow a single portion of his dress to escape, and even his steed and saddle-bags duly figured. The hostess was founded on our own housekeeper, therefore I was master of my subject. From her ear-rings to her shoe-buckles, all was perfect. I managed to supply my hero with supper, and at length I got him, not to bed, but to his bed-room—for heroes do not get into bed, even when wearied, with the expedition of more commonplace characters. On the contrary, he first opened the window, it was a lattice window, and looked at the moon. I had a very fine moonlight scene. I well remember that the trees were tipped with silver, but O! triumph of art, for the first time in my life, I achieved a simile, and the evening breeze came sounding in his ear soft as a lover's sigh!

This last master-touch was too much for me. I was breathless, and indeed exhausted. I read over the chapter. I could scarcely believe its existence possible. I rushed into the park—I hurried to some solitude where, undisturbed by the sight of a human being, I could enjoy my intense existence.

I was so agitated, I was in such a tumult of felicity, that for the rest of the day I could not even think. I could not find even time to determine on my hero's name, or to ascertain the reason for which I had brought him to such a wild scene, and placed him in such exceedingly uncomfortable lodgings. The next morning I had recovered my self-possession. Calm and critical, I reviewed the warm product of brain which had the preceding day so fascinated me. It appeared to me that it had never been my unfortunate fate to read more crude, ragged, silly stuff in the whole course of my experience. The description of costume, which I had considered so perfect, sounded like a catalogue of old clothes. As for the supper, it was very evident that so lifeless a personage could never have an appetite. What he opened the window for I certainly knew not, but certainly if only to look at the moon he must have been disappointed, for in spite of all my asseverations it was very dim indeed, and as for the lover's sigh, at the same time so tame, and so forced, it was absolutely sickening.

I threw away the wretched effusion, the beautiful inkstand, the cream-coloured paper, the fine pens—away they were all crammed in a drawer, which I was ever after ashamed to open. I looked out of the window, and saw the huntsman going out. I called to him, I joined him. I hated field-sports. I hated every bodily exertion except riding, which indeed is scarcely one, but now any thing that was bodily, that was practical, pleased, and I was soon slaughtering birds in the very bowers in which I had loved Egeria.

On the whole, this was a most miserable and wretched year. I was almost always depressed, often felt heartbroken. I entirely lost any confidence in my own energies, and while I was deprived of the sources of pleasure which I had been used to derive from reverie, I could acquire no new ones in the pursuits of those around me.

It was in this state of mind that after a long solitary walk I found myself at a village which I had never before visited. On the skirts was a small Gothic building, beautiful and ancient. It was evening. The building was illuminated, the door open. I entered—I found myself in a Catholic church. A Lutheran in a Lutheran country, for a moment I trembled, but the indifference of my father on the subject of religion had prevented me at least from being educated a bigot, and in my Venetian meditations I sometimes would recollect, that my mother must have professed the old faith.

The church was not very full—groups were kneeling in several parts. All was dusk except at the high altar. There, a priest in a flaming vest officiated, and, ever and anon, a kneeling boy, in a scarlet dress, rang a small, and musical, and silver bell. Many tall white candles, in golden sticks, illuminated the sacred table, redolent of perfumes, and adorned with flowers. Six large burnished lamps were suspended above, and threw a magical light upon a magical picture. It was a Magdalen kneeling and weeping in a garden. Her long golden hair was drawn off her ivory forehead, and reached to the ground. Her large blue eyes, full of ecstatic melancholy, pierced to heaven. The heavy tears studded like pearls her wan, but delicate cheek. Her clasped hands embraced a crucifix.

I gazed upon this picture with a strange fascination, I came forward, I placed myself near the altar. At that moment, the organ burst forth, as if heaven were opening; clouds of incense rose and wreathed round the rich and vaulted roof, the priest advanced and revealed a God, which I fell down and worshipped. From that moment I became a Catholic.

XIII.

THERE was a mystery in the secret creed full of delight. Another link too seemed broken in the chain that bound me to the country, which, each day, I more detested. Adoration also was ever a resource teeming with rapture, for a creed is imagination. The Magdalen succeeded to Christiana and to Egeria. Each year my mistress seemed to grow more spiritual. First reality, then fancy, now pure spirit: a beautiful woman, a mystical nymph, a canonized soul. How was this to end? Perhaps I was ultimately designed for angelic intercourse, perhaps I might mount the skies, with the presiding essence of a star.

My great occupations were devout meditation and solitary prayer. I inflicted upon myself many penances. I scrupulously observed every fast. My creative power was exercised in the production of celestial visitants; my thirst for expression gratified in infinite invocation. Wherever I moved, I perceived the flashing of a white wing, the streaming of radiant hair; however I might apparently be employed, I was, in fact, pondering over the music of my next supplication.

One mundane desire alone mingled with these celestial aspirations, and in a degree sprang out of their indulgence. Each day I languished more for Italy. It was a strong longing. Nothing but the liveliness of my faith could have solaced and supported me under the want of its gratification. I pined for the land where the true religion flourished in becoming glory, the land where I should behold temples worthy of the beautiful mysteries which were celebrated within their sumptuous walls, the land which the Vicar of God and the Ruler of Kings honoured and sanctified by his everlasting presence. A pilgrimage to Rome occupied my thoughts.

My favourite retreat now, when at the college, were the ruins of a Gothic abbey, whither an hour's stroll easily carried me. It pleased me much to sit among these beautiful relics, and call back the days when their sanctity was undefiled, and their loveliness unimpaired. As I looked upon the rich framework of the oriel window, my fancy lent perfection to its shattered splendour. I beheld it once more beaming with its saints and martyrs, and radiant with chivalric blazonry. My eye wandered down the mouldering cloisters. I pictured a procession of priests solemnly advancing to the high altar, and blending in sacred melody, with their dark garments and their shining heads, elevating a golden and gigantic crozier, and waving on high a standard of Madonna.

One day, as I was indulging in these soothing visions I heard a shout, and looking around, I observed a man seated at no great distance, who, by his action, had evidently called to me. I arose, and coming out of the ruins, advanced to him. He was seated on a mass of ancient brick-work, and appeared to be sketching. He was a tall man, fair and blue-eyed, but very sunburnt. He was hawk-nosed, with a quick glancing vision, and there was an air of acuteness in his countenance which was very striking. His dress was not the dress of our country, but I was particularly pleased with his cap, which was of crimson cloth, with a broad border of fur, and fell on one side of his head like a cap in a picture.

"My little man," said he, in a brisk, clear voice, "I am sorry to disturb you, but as probably you know this place better than I, you can perhaps tell me whether there be a spring at hand."

"Indeed, sir, a very famous one, for I have often drunk its water, which is most sweet, and clear, and cold, and if you will permit me, I will lead you to it."

"With all my heart, and many thanks, my little friend." So saying, he arose, and placing his portfolio under one arm, with the other lifted up a knapsack, which I offered to carry.

"By no means, kind sir," said he, in a most cheerful voice, "I am ever my own servant."

So leading him on round the other side of the abbey, and thence through a small but very fragrant mead, I brought him to the spring of which I had spoken. Over it was built a small, but fair arch, the keystone being formed of a mitre and escutcheon, and many parts very much covered with thick ivy.

The eye of the stranger kindled with pleasure when he looked upon the arch, and then, sitting down upon the bank, and opening his knapsack, he took out a large loaf and broke it, and, as I was retiring, he said, "Prithee do not go, my little friend, but stay and share my meal. It is rough, but there is plenty. Nay, refuse not, little gentleman, for I wish to prolong our acquaintance. In not more than as many minutes, you have conferred upon me two favours. In this world such characters are rare. You have given me that which I love better than wine, and you have furnished me with a divine sketch, for indeed this arch is of a finer style than any part of the great building, and must have been erected by an abbot of grand taste, I warrant you. Come, little gentleman, eat, prithee, eat."

"Indeed, sir, I am not hungry; but if you would let me look at your drawing of the abbey, I should be most delighted."

"What, dost love art? What! have I stumbled upon a little artist!"

"No, sir, I cannot draw, nor indeed do I understand art, but I love every thing which is beautiful."

"Ah! a comprehensive taste," and he gave me the portfolio.

"O!" I exclaimed, "how beautiful!" for the drawing turned out, not, as I had anticipated, a lean skeleton pencil sketch, but one rapidly and richly coloured. The abbey rose as in reality, only more beautiful, being suffused with a warm light, for he had dashed in a sunset full of sentiment.

"O! sir, how beautiful! I could look at it forever. It seems to me that some one must come forth from the pass of those blue mountains. Cannot you fancy some bright cavalier, sir, with a flowing plume, or even a string of mules, even that would be delicious!"

"Bravo! bravo! my little man," exclaimed the stranger, shooting a sharp, scrutinizing side glance. "You deserve to see sketches. There! undo that strap and open the folio, for there are many others, and some which may please you more."

I opened it as if I were about to enter a sanctuary. I perceived it very full. I culled a drawing which appeared the most richly coloured, as one picks the most glowing fruit. There seemed a river and many marble palaces on each side, and long, thin, gliding boats shooting in every part, and over the stream there sprang a bridge, a bridge with a single arch, an ancient and solemn bridge, covered with buildings. I gazed upon the scene for a moment with breathless interest, a tear of agitating pleasure stole down my cheek, and then I shouted, "Venice! Venice!"

"Little man," said the stranger, "what is the matter?"

"O! sir, I beg your pardon, you must think me very foolish indeed. I am sure I did not mean to call out, but I have been longing all my life to go to Venice, and when I see any thing connected with it, I feel, sir, quite agitated. Your drawing, sir, is so beautiful, that I know not how—I thought for a moment that I was really looking upon these beautiful palaces, and crossing the famous Rialto."

"Never apologize for showing feeling, my friend. Remember that when you do so, you apologize for truth. I too am fond of Venice; nor is there any city where I have made more drawings."

"What, sir, have you been at Venice?"

"Is that so strange a deed! I have been in much stranger places."

"O! sir, how happy you must be! To see Venice, and to travel in the distant countries, I could die at the condition of such enjoyment."

"You know as yet too little of life to think of death," said the stranger.

"Alas! sir," I mournfully sighed, "I have often wished to die."

"But can one so young be unhappy?" asked the stranger.

"O! sir, most, most unhappy." I am alone supported in this world by a fervent persuasion, that the holy Magdalen has condescended to take me under her especial protection."

"The holy Magdalen!" exclaimed the stranger, with an air of great astonishment—"indeed! and what made you unhappy before the holy Magdalen condescended to take you under her especial protection? Do you think, or has anybody told you, that you have committed any sin?"

"No! sir, my life has been, I hope, very innocent; nor do I see indeed how I could commit any sin, for I have never been subject to any temptation. But I have ever been unhappy, because I am perplexed about myself. I feel that I am not like other persons, and that which makes them happy is to me a source of no enjoyment."

"But you have, perhaps, some sources of enjoyment which are peculiar to yourself, and not open to them. Come, tell me how you have passed your life. Indeed, you have excited my curiosity, for I observed to-day, while I was drawing, that you were a good four hours reclined in the same position."

"Four hours, sir! I thought that I had been there but a few minutes."

"Four hours by the sun, as well as by this watch. What were you doing? Were you thinking of the blessed Magdalen?"

"No, sir!" I gravely replied, "not to-day."

"How then?"

"Indeed, sir!" I answered, reddening, "if I tell you, I am afraid, you will think me very foolish."

"Speak out, little man. We are all very foolish; and I have a shrewd suspicion, that if we understood each other better, you might perhaps turn out the least foolish of the two. Open, then, your mind, and fear nothing. For believe me, it is dishonourable to blush when you speak the truth, even if it be to your shame."

There was something in the appearance and manner of the stranger that greatly attracted me. I sought him with the same eagerness with which I always avoided my fellow-creatures. From the first, conversation with him was no shock. His presence seemed to sanctify, instead of outraging my solitude. His voice subdued my sullen spirit, and called out my hidden nature. He inspired me not only with confidence, but even with a degree of fascinating curiosity.

"Indeed, sir," I began, still with a hesitating voice, but a more assured manner—"indeed, sir, I have never spoken of these things to any one, for I feel they could not believe or comprehend what I would wish to express, nor indeed is it delightful to be laughed at. But know that I ever like to be alone, and it is this—that when I am alone, I can indulge in thought, which gives me great pleasure. For I would wish you to comprehend, sir, that I have ever lived in, as it were, two worlds, a public world and a private world. But I should not be unhappy in the private world but for one reason, which is nothing, but I was ever most happy; but n the public world, I am indeed miserable. For you must know, sir, that when I am alone, my mind is full with what seem to me beautiful thoughts, nor indeed are they thoughts alone that make me so happy, but in truth I perform many strange and noble acts, and these too in distant countries, and in unknown places, and other persons appear, and they also act. And we all speak in language more beautiful than common words. And, sir, many other things occur, which it would take long to recount, but which, indeed, I am sure, that is, I think, would make any one very happy."

"But all this is a source of happiness, not of unhappiness," said the stranger. "Am I to comprehend, then, the source has dried up?"

"O! no, sir, for only this morning I had many visions, but I checked them."

"But why check them?"

"Ah! sir," I answered, heaving a deep sigh, "it is this which makes me unhappy; for when I enter into this private world, there arises in the end a desire to express what has taken place in it, which indeed I cannot gratify."

The stranger for a moment mused. Then he suddenly said, "And when you looked upon my sketch of the abbey, there seemed to you a cavalier advancing, I think you said?"

"From the pass of the blue mountains, sir. When ever I look upon pictures, it is thus."

"And when you beheld the Rialto, tell me what occurred then?"

"There was a great rush, sir, in my mind, and when my eye caught that tall young signior who is stepping off the stairs of a palace into a gondola, I wished to write a tale of which he should be the hero."

"It appears to me, my young friend," said the stranger, in a serious tone, and looking at me very keenly—"it appears to me, my young friend, that you are a poet."

"Alas! sir," I exclaimed, extremely agitated and nearly seizing his hand—"alas! alas! sir, I am not. For I once thought so myself, and have often tried to write; and either I have not produced a line, or something so wretchedly flat and dull that even I have felt it intolerable. It is this that makes me so miserable, so miserable that were it not for feeling, in the most marked manner, that I am under the especial protection of the blessed Magdalen, I think I should kill myself."

A gentle smile played upon the lip of the stranger, but it was in an instant suppressed. Then turning to me he said, "Supposing a man were born with a predisposition for painting, as I might have been myself, and that he were enabled to fancy pictures in his eye, do you think that if he took up a brush for the first time, he could transfer these pictures to the canvass?"

"By no means, sir, for the artist must learn his art."

"And is not a poet an artist, and is not writing an art, equally with painting? Words are but chalk and colour. The painter and the poet must follow the same course. Both must study before they execute. Both must alike consult nature and invent the beautiful. Those who delineate imitate nature, and those who describe her must equally study her, if they wish to excel in their own creations; and for man, if the painter study the outward form of the animal, the inward must be equally investigated by the poet. Thus far for the natural; and for the ideal, which is an improvement upon nature, and which you will some day more clearly comprehend, remember this, that the painter and the poet, however assisted by their own organization, must alike perfect their style by the same process—I mean by studying the works themselves of great painters and great poets. See, then, my young friend, how unreasonable you are, that because you cannot be a great artist without studying your art, you are unhappy."

"O! sir, indeed, indeed, I am not. There is no application—there is no exertion, I feel, I feel it strongly, of which I am not capable to gain knowledge. Indeed, sir, you speak to me of great things, and my mind opens to your wisdom, but how am I to study?"

"Be not too rapid. Before we part, which will be in a moment, I will write you some talismanic rules, which have been of great service to myself. I copied them from off an old obelisk amid the ruins of Thebes. They will teach you all that is now necessary."

"O! sir, how good, how kind you are. How different would have been my life, had I been taught by somebody like you."

"Where, then, were you educated?"

"I am a student of the college about two miles off. Perhaps you may have passed it!"

"What, the large house upon the hill, where they learn words?" said the stranger, with a smile.

"Indeed, sir, it is too true. For though it never occurred to me before, I see now why, with an ardent love of knowledge, I have indeed there gained nothing but an ill name."

"And now," said the stranger, rising, "I must away, for the sun will in a few-minutes sink, and I have to reach a village which is some miles off for my night's encampment."

I beheld him prepare to depart with a feeling of deep regret. I dropped for a moment into profound abstraction; then rushing to him, I seized his hand, and exclaimed, "O, sir, I am noble, and I am rich, yet let me follow you!"

"By no means," said the stranger, very good-naturedly, "for our professions are different."

"Yet a poet should see all things."

"Assuredly. And you too will wander, but your hour has not yet come."

"And shall I ever see Venice?"

"I doubt not, for when a mind like yours thinks often of a thing it will happen."

"You speak to me of mysteries."

"There is little mystery; there is much ignorance. Some day you will study metaphysics, and you will then understand the nature of volition."

He opened his knapsack and took out two small volumes, in one of which he wrote some lines. "This is the only book," he said, "I have with me, and, as, like myself, you are such a strong Venetian, I will give it you, because you love art and artists, and are a good boy. When we meet again, I hope I may call you a great man."

"Here," he said, giving them to me, "they are full of Venice. Here, you see, is a view of the Rialto. This will delight you. And in the blank leaf I have written all the advice you at present require. Promise me, however, not to read it till you return to your college. And so farewell, my little man—farewell!"

He extended me his hand. I took it, and although it is an awkward thing at all times, and chiefly for a boy, I began telling him my name and condition, but he checked me. "I never wish to know anybody's name. Were I to become acquainted with every being who flits across me in life, the callousness of my heart would be endangered. If your acquaintance be worth preserving, fate or fortune will some day bring us again together."

He departed. I watched his figure until it melted in the rising haze of evening. It was strange the ascendancy that this man exercised over me. When he spoke I seemed listening to an oracle, and now that he had departed, I felt as if some supernatural visitant had disappeared.

I quickened my walk home from the intense anxiety to open the volume in which I was to find the talismanic counsel. When I had arrived, I read written in pencil these words.

"Be patient. Cherish hope. Read more. Ponder less. Nature is more powerful than education. Time will develop every thing. Trust not overmuch in the blessed Magdalen: learn to protect yourself."

XIV.

INDEED I could think of nothing but the stranger. All night his image was before my eyes, and his voice sounded in my ear. I recalled each look, I repeated each expression. When I woke in the morning, the first thing I did was to pronounce from memory his oracular advice. I determined to be patient, I resolved never to despair. Revery was no longer to be endured, and a book was to be ever in my hand.

He had himself enabled me to comply with this last rule. I seized the first opportunity to examine his present. It was the History of Venice in French, by Amelot de la Houssaye—a real history of Venice, not one written years after the extinction of the republic by some solemn sage, full of first principles and dull dissertations upon the vicious constitution—a prophet of the past, trying to shuffle off his commonplace deductions for authentic inspiration—but a history of Venice written by one who had witnessed the doge sitting on his golden throne, and receiving awe-struck ambassadors in his painted halls.

I read it with an avidity with which I had never devoured any book: some parts of it indeed with absolute rapture. When I came to the chapter upon the nobility, a dimness came over my sight: for a moment I could not proceed. I saw them all; I marked all the divisions; the great magnificoes, who ranked with crowned heads, the nobles of the war of Candia, and the third, and still inferior class. I was so excited, that for a moment I did not observe that the name of Contarini did not appear. I looked for it with anxiety. But when I read that there were yet four families of such pre-eminent ancestry, that they were placed even above the magnificoes, being credited descendants of Roman consular families, and that of these the unrivalled house of Contarini was the chief, I dashed down the book in a paroxysm of nervous exultation, and rushed into the woods.

I ran about like a madman for some time, cutting down the underwood that opposed my way with a sharp stick, leaping trenches, hallooing, spouting, shouting, dashing, through pools of water. At length I arrived at a more open part of the wood. At a slight distance was a hill. I rushed on up the hill, and never stopped till I had gained the summit. That steep ascent a little tamed me. I found myself upon a great ridge, and a vast savage view opened upon all sides. I felt now more at ease, for the extent of the prospect harmonized with the largeness and swell of my soul.

"Ha! ha!" I cried, like a wild horse. I snorted in the air, my eyes sparkled, my crest rose, waved my proud arm. "Ha! ha! have I found it out at last! I knew there was something. Nature whispered it to me, and time has revealed it. He said truly; time has developed every thing. But shall these feelings subside into poetry? Away! give me a sword, give me a sword! My consular blood demands a sword. Give me a sword, ye winds, ye trees, ye mighty hills, ye deep cold waters, give me a sword. I will fight! I will fight! I will fight! I will conquer. Why am I not a doge? A curse upon the tyranny of man, why is she not free! why am I not a doge? By the God of heaven, I will be a doge! O! thou fair and melancholy saint," I continued, falling on my knees, "who in thy infinite goodness condescended, as it were, to come down from heaven to call me back to the true and holy faith of Venice, and to take me under thy especial protection, blessed and beautiful Mary Magdalene, look down from thy glorious seat above, and smile upon thy elected and favourite child!"

I rose up refreshed by this short prayer, calmer and cooler, and began to meditate upon what was now fitting to be done. That Contarini Fleming must with all possible despatch cease to be a school-boy was indeed evident, necessary, and indispensable. The very idea of the great house upon the hill, where they teach words, was ludicrous. Nor indeed would it become me ever again, under any pretence whatever, to acknowledge a master, or, as it would appear, to be subject to any laws, save the old laws of Venice, for I claimed for myself the rights and attributes of a Venetian noble of the highest class, and they were those pertaining to blood royal. But when I called to my recollection the cold, worldly, practical character of my father, the vast quantity of dull, lowering, entangling ties that formed the great domestic mesh, and bound me to a country which I detested, covered me with a climate which killed me, surrounded me with manners with which I could not sympathize, and duties which nature impelled me not to fulfil, I felt that, to ensure my emancipation, it was necessary at once to dissolve all ties of blood and affection, and to break away from those links which chained me as a citizen to a country which I abhorred. I resolved therefore immediately to set out for Venice. I was, for the moment, I conceived, sufficiently well supplied with money, for I possessed one hundred six-dollars, more than any five of my fellow-students together. This, with careful husbandry, I counted would carry me to the nearest sea-port, perhaps even secure me a passage. And for the rest, I had a lively conviction that something must always turn up to assist me in any difficulties, for I was convinced that I was a hero, and heroes are never long forlorn.

On the next morning, therefore, long ere the sun had risen, I commenced my adventures. I did not steal away. First I kissed a cross three times, which I carried next to my breast, and then recommending myself to the blessed Magdalen, I walked off proudly and slowly, in a manner becoming Corio-

Ianus or Cæsar, who, after some removes, were both of them, for aught I knew, my great-grandfathers. I carried in a sort of knapsack, which we used for our rambles, a few shirts, my money, a pair of pocket pistols, and some ammunition. Nor did I forget a large loaf of bread—not very heroic food, but classical in my sight, from being the victual of the mysterious stranger. Like him also I determined in future only to drink water.

XV.

I JOURNEYED for some hours without stopping along a road, about which all I knew was, that it was opposite to the one that had first carried me to the college, and consequently, I supposed, did not lead home. I never was so delighted in my life. I had never been up so early in my life. It was like living in a new world. Every thing was still, fresh, fragrant. I wondered how long it would last, how long it would be before the vulgar days, to which I had been used, would begin. At last a soft luminous appearance commenced in the horizon, and gradually gathered in strength and brightness. Then it shivered into brilliant streaks, the clouds were dabbled with rich flaming tints, and the sun rose. I felt grateful when his mild but vivifying warmth fell upon my face, and it seemed to me that I heard the sound of trumpets, when he came forth, like a royal hero, out of his pavilion.

All the birds began singing, and the cocks crowed with renewed pride. I felt as if I myself could sing, my heart was so full of joy and exultation. And now I heard many pleasant rural sounds. A horse neighed, and a whip smacked, there was a whistle, and the sound of a cart-wheel. I came to a large farm-house. I felt as if I were indeed travelling, and seeing the world and its wonders. When I had rambled about before, I had never observed any thing, for I was full of nonsensical ideas. But now I was a practical man, and felt capable, as the stranger said, of protecting myself. Never was I so cheerful.

There was a great barking, and several dogs rushed out at me, all very fierce, but I hit the largest over the nose with my stick, and it retreated yelping into the yard, where it again barked most furiously behind the gate; the lesser dogs were so frightened that they slunk away immediately through different hedges, nor did they bark again till I passed the gate; but I heard them then, though very feeble, and rather snappish than fierce.

The farmer was coming out of the gate, and saluted me. I returned him the salute with a firm voice and a manly air. He spoke then of the weather, and I differed with him to show that I was a thinking being, and capable of protecting myself. I made some inquiries respecting the distance of certain places, and I acquired from him much information. The nearest town was fifteen miles off. This I wished to reach by night, as there was no great village, and this I doubted not to do.

When the heat increased, and I felt a little fatigued, I stopped at a beautiful spring, and taking my loaf out of my knapsack like the stranger, I ate with a keen relish, and slaked my slight thirst in the running water. It was the coldest and purest water that I had ever tasted. I felt quite happy, and was full of confidence and self-gratulation at my prosperous progress. I reposed here till noon, and as the day, though near midsummer, became cloudy, I then recommenced my journey without dread of the heat.

On I went, full of hope. The remembrance of the cut that I had given the great dog over the nose had wonderfully inflamed my courage. I longed to knock down a man. Every step was charming. Every flower, every tree gave me delight, which they had not before yielded. Sometimes, yet seldom, for it was an unfrequented road, I met a traveller, and always prepared myself for an adventure. It did not come, but there was yet time. Every person I saw, and every place I observed, seemed strange and new: I felt in a far land. And for adventures, my own consciousness was surely a sufficient one, for was I not a nobleman incognito, going on a pilgrimage to Venice! To say nothing of the adventures that might then occur, here were materials for the novelist! Pah! my accursed fancy was again wandering. I forgot that I was no longer a poet, but something which, though difficult to ascertain, I doubted not in the end all would agree to be infinitely greater.

As the afternoon advanced, the thin gray clouds melted away, the sun mildly shone in the warm, light-blue sky. This was again fortunate, and instead of losing my gay heart with the decline of day, I felt inspired with fresh vigour, and shot on joyous and full of cheerfulness. The road now ran through the skirts of a forest. It was still less like a commonplace journey. On each side was a large plot of turf, green and sweet. Seated on this at some little distance I perceived a group of men and women. My heart beat at the prospect of an incident. I soon observed them with more advantage. Two young women were seated together repairing a bright garment, which greatly excited my wonder. It seemed of very fine stuff, and richly embroidered with gold and silver. Greatly it contrasted with their own attire and that of their companions, which was plain, and indeed shabby. As they worked, one burst into repeated fits of laughter, but the other was more sedulous, and looking grave, seemed to reprove her. A man was feeding with sticks a fire, over which boiled a great pot; a middle-aged woman was stirring its contents. A young man was lying asleep upon the grass; an older one was furbishing up a sword. A lightly built but large wagon was on the other side of the road, the unharnessed horses feeding on the grass.

A little dog shrilly barked when I came up, but I was not afraid of dogs. I flourished my stick, and the laughing girl called out "Harlequin," and the cur ran to her. I stopped and inquired of the fire-lighter the distance to the town where I hoped to sleep. Not only did he not answer me, but he did not even raise up his head. It was the first time in my life that I had not obtained an answer. I was astonished at his insolence. "Sir," I said, in a tone of offended dignity, "how long is it since you have learned not to answer the inquiry of a gentleman?"

The laughing girl burst into a renewed fit. All stopped their pursuits. The fire-lighter looked up with a puzzled sour face, the old woman stared with her mouth open, and the furbisher ran up to him with his naked weapon. He had the oddest and most comical face that I had ever seen. It was like that of a seal, but full of ludicrous mobility. He came rushing up, saying, with an air and voice of mock heroism, "To arms, to arms!"

I was astonished, and caught the eye of the laughing girl. She was very fair, with a small nose, and round cheeks breaking into most charming dimples. When I caught her eye, she made a wild grimace at me, and I also laughed. Although I was trudging along with a knapsack, my dress did not befit my assumed character, and in a moment of surprise, I had given way to a manner which still less became my situation. Women are quicker than men in judging of strangers. The two girls were evidently my friends from the first, and the fair laugher beckoned me to come and sit down by her. This gay wench had wonderfully touched my fancy. I complied with her courteous offer without hesitation. I threw away my knapsack and my stick, and stretched my legs with the air of a fine gentleman. I was already ashamed of my appearance, and forgot every thing in the desire to figure to the best advantage to my new friend. "This is the first time," I drawled out, with a languid air, and looking in her face, "this is the first time in life that I ever walked, and I am heartily sick of it."

"And why have you walked, and where have you come from, and where are you going to?" eagerly she demanded.

"I was tired to death of riding every day of my life," I rejoined, with the tone of a man who had exhausted pleasure. "I am not going anywhere, and I forget where I came from."

"O! you odd thing!" said the wench, and she gave me a pinch.

The other girl, who was handsome, but dark, and of a more serious beauty, at this moment rose, and went and spoke to the crusty fire-lighter. When she returned, she seated herself on my other side, so I was now between both, but as she seated herself, though doubtless unconsciously, she pressed my hand in a very sentimental manner.

"And what is your name?" asked the laughing girl.

"Theodora! how can you be so rude?" remarked the serious beauty.

"Do you know," said the laughing girl, whispering in my ear, "I think you must be a little count."

I only smiled in answer, but it was a smile which complimented her penetration.

"And now, may I ask who you may be, and whether you may be going?"

"We are going to the next town," replied the serious beauty, "where, if we find the public taste not disinclined, we hope to entertain them with some representations."

"You are actors, then. O! what a charming profession. How I love the theatre. When I am at home I go in my father's box every night. I have often wished to be an actor."

"Be one," said the serious beauty, pressing my hand.

"Join us," said the laughing girl, pinching my elbow.

"Why not?" I replied, and almost thought. "Youth must be passed in adventure."

The fairy nymph produced a box of sugarplums, and taking out a white almond, kissed it, and pushed it into my mouth. While I laughed at her wild kitten-like action, the dark girl drew a deep-coloured rose from her bosom, and pressed it to my nose. I was nearly stifled with their joint sweets and kindness. Neither of them would take away their hands. The dark girl pressed her rose with increased force; the sugarplum melted away, but I found in my mouth the tip of a little finger scarcely larger, and as white and sweet. There was giggling without end; I sank down upon my back. The dark girl snatched a hasty embrace, her companion fell down by my side, and bit my cheek.

"You funny little count!" said the fair beauty.

"I shall keep these in remembrance of a happy moment," said her friend, with a sentimental air, and she glanced at me with her flashing eye. So saying, she picked up the scattered leaves of the rose.

"And I! am I to have nothing?" exclaimed the blue-eyed girl with an air of mock sadness, and she crossed her arms upon her lap with a drooping head.

I took a light iron chain from my neck, and threw it over hers. "There," I said, "Miss Sugarplum, that is for you."

She jumped up from the ground, and bounded about as if she were the happiest of creatures, laughing without end, and kissing the slight gift. The dark girl rose and began to dance full of grace and expression: Sugarplum joined her, and they fell into one of their stage figures. The serious beauty strove to excel, and indeed was the greater artist of the two, but there was a wild grace about her companion which pleased me most.

"Can you dance, little count?" she cried.

"I am too tired," I answered.

"Nay, then, another day, for it is pleasant to look forward to frolic."

The man with the odd face now advanced towards me. He fell into the most ridiculous attitudes. I thought that he would never have finished his multiplied reverences. Every time he bowed he saluted me with a new form of visage. It was the most ludicrous medley of pomposity, and awkwardness, and humour. I thought that I had never seen such a droll person, and was myself a little impregnated with his oddity. I also made him a bow with assumed dignity, and then he became more subdued.

"Sir," said he, placing his huge hand upon his breast, and bowing nearly to the ground, "I assure you, sir, indeed, sir, the greatest honour, sir, your company, sir, a very great honour indeed."

"I am equally sensible of the honour," I replied, "and think myself most fortunate to have found so many and such agreeable friends."

"The greatest honour, sir, the greatest honour, indeed, sir, very sensible, sir, always sensible, sir."

He stopped, and I again returned his reverence, but this time without speaking.

"The greatest liberty, sir, the greatest liberty indeed, sir, never take liberties, sir, but fear you will consider it a very great liberty, a very great liberty indeed, sir."

"Indeed, I shall esteem myself very fortunate to comply with any wish that you can express."

"O! sir, you are too kind, sir, too kind, indeed, sir, always are kind, have no doubt, no doubt at all, sir, but our meal, sir, our humble meal, very humble indeed, we venture to request the honour, very great honour indeed, sir, your company, sir," and he pronounced the last and often-repeated monosyllable with a musical shake, and renewed reverence.

"Indeed I fear that I have already too much, and too long intruded."

"O come, pray come!" and each girl seized an arm and led me to their banquet.

I sat down between my two friends. The fire-lighter, who was the manager, and indeed proprietor of the whole concern, now received me with great courtesy. When they were all seated, they called several times, "Frederick, Frederick," and then the young man who was on the ground jumped up, and seated himself. He was not ill-looking, but I did not like the expression of his face. His countenance and his manner seemed to me vulgar. I took rather a prejudice against him. Nor indeed did my appearance seem much to please him, for he stared at me not very courteously, and when the manager mentioned that I was a young gentleman travelling, who had done them the honour to join their repast, he said nothing.

The repast was not very humble. There was plenty to eat. While the manager helped the soup, they sat very quiet and demure; perhaps my presence slightly restrained them. Even the laughing girl was, for a moment, calm. I had a keen appetite, and though I at first, from shame, restrained it, I played my part well. The droll carved a great joint of boiled meat. I thought I should have died; he seldom spoke, but his look made us all full of merriment. Even the young man sometimes smiled.

"We prefer living in this way to sojourning in dirty inns," said the manager, with an air of dignity.

"You are quite right," I replied. "I desire nothing better than to live always so."

"Inns are indeed wretched things," said the old mother. "How extravagantly they charge for what costs them in a manner nothing!"

Wine was now produced. The manager filled a cup, and handed it to me. I was just going to observe, that I drank only water, when Sugarplum, first touching it with her lips, placed it in my hand, and pledging them all, I drank it off.

"You are eating rough fare," said the old mother, "but you are welcome."

"I never enjoyed any thing so much in my life," I truly replied. "How I envy you all the happy life you lead!"

"Before you style it happy you should have experienced it," remarked Frederick.

"What you say is in part true. But if a person have imagination, experience appears to me of little use, since both are means by which we can equally arrive at knowledge."

"I know nothing about imagination," said the young man, "but what I know, I owe to experience. It may not have taught me as much as imagination has taught you."

"Experience is every thing," said the old mother, shaking her head.

"It sometimes costs dear," said the manager.

"Terrible, terrible," observed the droll with a most sad and solemn shake of the head, and lifting up his hands. I burst into a fit of laughter, and poured down another draught of wine.

Conversation now became more brisk, and I took more than my share of it, but I being new, they all wished me to talk. I got very much excited by my elocution as much as by the wine. I discussed upon acting, which I pronounced to be one of the first and finest of arts. I treated this subject indeed very deeply, and in a spirit of æsthetic criticism, with which they seemed unacquainted, and a little surprised.

"Should we place it," I asked, "before painting?"

"Before scene-painting, certainly," said the droll, in a hoarse thick voice, "for it naturally takes its place there."

"I never knew but one painter," said the old mother, "and therefore cannot give an opinion." The manager was quite silent.

"All employments are equally disgusting," said the young man.

"On further reflection," I continued, "it appears to me that if we examine"—but here the white girl pinched me so severely under the table, that I could not contain myself, and was obliged to call out. All stared, and she looked quite demure, as if nothing had happened.

After this all was merriment, fun, and frolic. The girls pelted the droll with plums, and he unfurled an umbrella to protect himself. I assisted them in the attack. The young man lighted his pipe and walked off. The old mother in vain proclaimed silence. I had taken too much wine, and for the first time in my life. All of a sudden I felt the trees dancing and whirling round. I took another bumper to set myself right. In a few minutes I fell down quite flat, and remember nothing more.

XVI.

"I must get out. I am so hot."

"You shall not," said Thalia.

"I must, I must. I am so very hot."

"Will you desert me?" exclaimed Melpomene.

"O! how hot I am. Pray let me out."

"No one can get out at night," said the dark girl, earnestly, and in a significant voice, which intimated to her companion to take up the parable.

"No, indeed," said her friend.

"Why not?" I asked.

"Because it is a rule. The manager will not permit it."

"Confound the manager! What is he to me? I will get out."

"O! what a regular little count," said Thalia.

"Let me out, let me out. I never was so hot in my life."

"Hush! hush! hush! or you will wake them."

"If you do not let me out, I will scream."

The manager and the droll were in the fore part of the wagon affecting to drive, but they were both asleep. The old mother was snoring behind them. They had put me in the back part of the wagon with my two friends.

"Let him out, Theodora," for the other was afraid of a contention.

"Never," said Theodora, and she embraced me with increased energy. My legs were in the other girl's lap. I began to kick and struggle.

"O! you naughty little count," said one.

"Is this the return for all our love!" exclaimed the other.

"I will get out, and there is an end of it. I must have some air. I must stretch my legs. Let me out at once, or I will wake them all."

"Let him out, Theodora."

"He is certainly the wickedest little count,—but promise you will come back in five minutes."

"Any thing, I will promise any thing; only let me out."

They unbolted the back of the wagon, the fresh air came in. They shivered, but I felt it delightful.

"Farewell, dearest," exclaimed Melpomene, "one parting embrace. How heavily will the moments roll until we again meet!"

"Adieu, count," said Thalia, "and remember you are to come back in five minutes."

I jumped into the road. It was a clear, sharp night, the stars shining very brightly. The young man was walking behind, wrapped up in a great-coat, and smoking his pipe. He came up and assisted me in shutting the door with more courtesy than he had hitherto shown, and asked me if I would try a cigar.

I declined this offer, and for some little way we walked on in silence. I felt unwell, my head ached, my mouth was parched. I was conscious that I had exposed myself. I had commenced the morning by vowing that I would only drink water, and, for the first time in my life, I had got tipsy with wine. I had committed many other follies, and altogether felt much less like a hero. I recalled all my petty vanity and childish weaknesses with remorse. Imagination was certainly not such a sure guide as experience. Was it possible that one who had already got into such scrapes, could really achieve his great purpose? My conduct and my situation were assuredly neither of them Roman.

As I walked on, the fresh air did its kind office. My head was revived by my improved circulation, my companion furnished me with an excellent draught of water. Hope did not quite desert my invigorated frame. I began to turn in my mind how I might yet prosper.

"I feel better," I said to my companion, with a feeling of gratitude.

"Ay! ay! that wagon is enough to make any one ill, at least any one accustomed to a more decent conveyance. I never enter it. To say nothing of their wine, which is indeed intolerable to those who may have tasted a fair glass in the course of this sad life."

"You find life, then, sad?" I inquired, with a mixed feeling of curiosity and sympathy.

"He who knows life will hardly style it joyous."

"Ah! ah!" I thought to myself, "here is some chance of philosophical conversation. Perhaps I have found another stranger, who can assist me in self-knowledge." I began to think that I was exceedingly wrong in entertaining a prejudice against this young man, and in a few minutes I had settled that his sullen conduct was the mark of a very superior mind, and that he himself must be a very interesting personage.

"I have found life very gloomy myself," I rejoined; "but I think it arises from our faulty education. We are taught words and not ideas."

"There is something in that," said the young man, thoughtfully.

"After all, perhaps, the best is to be patient, and cherish hope."

"Doubtless," said the young man.

"And I think it equally true, that we should read more and ponder less."

"O! curse reading," said my friend, "I never could read."

"You have, like myself, then, indulged in your own thoughts?"

"Always," he affirmed.

"Ah! indeed, my dear friend, there is, after all, nothing like it. Let them say what they will, but give me the glorious pleasure of my private world, and all the jarring horror of a public one I leave without regret to those more fitted to struggle with them."

"I believe that most public men are scoundrels," said the young man.

"It is their education," I rejoined, although I did not clearly detect the connexion of his remark. "What can we expect?"

"No, sir, it is corruption," he replied, in a firm tone.

"Pray," said I, leading back the conversation to a point which I more fully comprehended, "is it your opinion that nature is stronger than education?"

"Why," said my friend, taking a good many whiffs of his pipe, "there is a great deal to be said on both sides."

"One of the wisest and most extraordinary men I ever knew, however, was of a decided opinion that nature would ultimately prevail."

"Who might he be?" asked my companion.

"Why, really, his name—but it is a most extraordinary adventure, and to this hour I cannot help half believing that he was a supernatural being—but the truth is, I do not know his name, for I met him casually, and under very peculiar circumstances, and though we conversed much and of very high matters, he did not, unfortunately, favour me with his name."

"That certainly looks odd," said Mr. Frederick, "for when a man sheers off giving his name, I, for one, never think him better than he should be."

"Had he not spoken of the blessed Magdalen in a way which can scarcely reconcile with his other sentiments, I should certainly have considered him a messenger from that holy personage, for I have the best reason for believing that I am under her especial protection."

"If he abused her, that could scarcely be," remarked Frederick.

"No. Certainly I think he must have been only a man. For he presented me with a gift before his departure—"

"That was handsome."

"And I can hardly believe that he was really deputed—though I really do not know. Every thing seems mysterious, although I believe, after all, there is little mystery, but, on the contrary, much ignorance."

"No doubt: though they are opening schools now in every parish. And how much did he give you?" continued Frederick.

"How much! I do not understand you."

"I mean what did he give you?"

"A most delightful book, to me particularly interesting."

"A book?"

"A book which I shall no doubt find of great use in my travels."

"I have myself some thoughts of travelling," said Frederick, "for I am sick of this life, which is ill-suited to my former habits, but one gets into scrapes without thinking of it."

"One does in a most surprising manner." I never made an observation in a tone of greater sincerity.

"You have led a very different sort of life, then?" I asked—"To tell you the truth, I thought so. You could not disguise from me that you were superior to your appearance. I suppose, like myself, you are incog.?"

"That is the exact truth."

"Good heavens! how lucky it is that we have met. Do not you think that we could contrive to travel together? What are your plans?"

"Why, to say truth, I care little where I go. It is necessary that I should travel about for some time, and see the world, until my father, the count, is reconciled."

"You have quarrelled with your father?"

"Do not speak of it. It is a sad affair. But I hope that it will end well. Time will show."

"Time indeed develops every thing."

"I hope every thing from my mother the countess's influence—but I cannot bear speaking about it. I am supported now by my sister Lady Caroline, out of her own allowance too, poor creature. There is nothing like those sisters."—And he raised his hand to his face, and would have brushed away the tear that nearly started from his manly eye.

I was quite affected. I respected his griefs, and would not press him for details. I exhorted him to take courage.

"Ay! ay! it is very easy talking, but when a man accustomed to the society and enjoyments I have been, finds himself wandering about the world in this manner—it is very easy to talk—but, curse it—do not let us speak of it. And now where do you intend to go?"

"I am thinking of Venice."

"Venice! just the place I should long to see. But that requires funds. You are very welcome to share mine as far as they will last—but have you any thing yourself?"

"I have one hundred rix-dollars." I replied, "not too much, certainly, but I quitted home without notice; you understand?"

"O, yes! I have done these things myself. I was just such a fellow as you are at your age. A hundred rix-dollars?—not too much, to be sure, but with what I have got, it will do. I scorn to leave a companion in distress like you. Let me be shivered, if I would not share the last farthing with the fellow I liked."

"You shall never repent, sir, your kindness to me; of that feel assured. The time may come, when I may be enabled to yield you assistance, nor shall it be wanting."

We now began seriously to consult over our plans. He recommended an immediate departure even that night, or else, as he justly remarked, I should get perhaps entangled with these girls. I objected to quitting so unceremoniously, and without thanking my kind friends for their hospitality, and making some little present to the worthy manager, but he said that that worthy manager already owed him a year's salary, and therefore I need not be anxious on his account. Hamburg, according to him, was the port to which we must work our way, and indeed our departure must not be postponed an hour, for, luckily for us, the next turning was the route to Hamburg. I was delighted to find for a friend such a complete man of the world, and doubted not, under his auspices, most prosperously to achieve my great object.

XVII.

"HERE is your knapsack. I woke the girls getting it. They thought it was you, and would have given me more kind words and kisses than I care for. Theodora laughed heartily when she found out her mistake, but Emilia was in a great rage."

"Good-natured lasses! I think I must give them a parting embrace."

"Pooh! pooh! that will spoil all. Think of Venice. I cannot get at my portmanteau. Never mind, it matters little. I always carry my money about me. We must make some sacrifices, and we shall get on the better for it, for I can now carry provisions; and yet my riband of the order of the Fox is there—pah! I will not think of it. See! here runs the Hamburg road. Cheerily, boy, and good-bye to the old wagon."

He hurried me along. I had no time to speak.

We pushed on with great spirit. The road again entered the forest, on the skirts of which I had been the whole day journeying.

"I know this country well," said Frederick, "for in old days I have often hunted here with my father's hounds. I can make many a short cut that will save us much. Come along down this glade. We are making fine way."

We continued in this forest several hours, walking with great speed. I was full of hope, and confidence, and self-congratulation, that I had found such a friend. He took the whole management upon himself, always decided upon our course, never lost his readiness. I had no care. The brisk exercise prevented me from feeling wearied. We never stopped.

The morning broke and gave me fresh courage. The sun rose. It was agreeable to think that I was still nearer Venice. We came to a pleasant piece of turf, fresh from the course of a sparkling rivulet.

"We have gone as good as thirty miles," said Frederick. "Had we kept the common road, we should have got through barely half."

"Have we, indeed!" I said. "This is indeed progress; but there is nothing like willing hearts. May we get on as well each day."

"Here I propose to rest a while," said my companion, "a few hours repose will bring us quite round. You must not forget that you rather debauched yesterday."

Now that I had stopped, I indeed felt wearied and exceedingly sleepy. My companion kindly plucked some fern, and made me an excellent bed under a branching tree.

"This is indeed a life of adventure," I said. "How very kind you are. Such a bed in such a scene would alone repay me for all our fatigue."

He produced some bread and a bottle, and gathered some cresses; but I felt no desire to eat or drink, and before he had finished his meal, I had sunk into a deep slumber.

I must have slept many hours, for when I woke it was much past noon. I woke wonderfully refreshed. I looked round for Frederick, but, to my surprise, he was not there. I jumped up. I called his name. No answer. I became alarmed. I ran about the vicinity of our encampment shouting "Frederick!" There was still no answer. Suddenly I observed that my knapsack also was gone. A terrible feeling of doubt, or rather dismay, came over me. I sank down and buried my face in my hands, and it was some minutes before I could even think.

"Can it be! It is impossible! Infamous knave, or rather miserable ass! Have I been deceived, entrapped, plundered! O, Contarini, Contarini, you are at length punished for all your foolery! Frederick, Frederick! he cannot surely have left me! He is joking, he is trying to frighten me. I will not believe that I have been deceived. I will not appear frightened. I will not shout the least. Ah! I think I see him behind that tree." I jumped up again and ran to the tree, but there was no Frederick. I ran about in turn shouting his name, execrating my idiotism, confiding in his good faith, proclaiming him a knave. An hour, a heavy but agitating hour, rolled away before I was convinced of the triumph of experience over imagination.

I was hungry, I was destitute, I was in a wild and unknown solitude, I might be starved, I might be murdered, I might die. I could think of nothing but horrible events. I felt for the first time in my life like a victim. I could not bear to recall my old feelings. They were at once maddening and mortifying. I felt myself, at the same time, the most miserable and the most contemptible of beings. I entirely lost all my energy. I believed that all men were villains. I sank upon the ground and gave myself up to despair. In a word, I was fairly frightened.

I heard a rustling in a neighbouring copse. I darted up. I thought it was Frederick. It was not Frederick, but it was a human being. An ancient woodman came forth from a grove of oaks, a comely and venerable man. His white hair, his fresh hale face, his still keen eye, and the placid, benignant expression of his countenance, gave me hope. I saluted him, I told him my story. My appearance, my streaming eyes, my visible emotion, were not lost upon him. Sharply he scrutinized me, many were the questions he asked, but he finally credited my tale. I learned from him, that during the night I had advanced far into the interior of the forest, that he himself lived in a cottage on its skirts some miles off, that he was about to return from his daily labour, and that I should accompany him. As for the road to Hamburg, that was a complete invention. I also collected, that home as well as the college were very distant.

We proceeded together along a turf road, with his donkey laden with the day's spoils. I entirely regained my cheerfulness, and was very much interested by my new companion. Never had I seen any one so kind, and calm, and so truly venerable. We talked a great deal about trees. He appeared to be entirely master of his calling. I began to long to be a woodman, to pass a quiet, and contemplative, and virtuous life, amid the deep silence and beautiful scenery of forests—exercising all the primitive virtues which became so unostentatious a career.

His dog darted on before us with joyful speed. We had arrived at his cottage. It was ancient, and neat, and well ordered as himself. His wife, attentive to the welcome bark, was ready at the gate. She saluted me, and her husband, shortly telling my tale, spoke of me in kind terms. Never had I been treated with greater kindness, never was I more grateful for it. The twilight was dying away, the door was locked and the lamp lighted, a blazing log thrown upon the fire, and the round table covered with a plenteous and pleasant meal. I felt quite happy, and indeed to be happy yourself, you must live among the happy.

The good woman did not join us in our meal.

She sat by the fireside, under the lamp, watching us with a fond smile. Her appearance delighted me, and seemed like a picture.

"Now does not the young gentleman remind you of Peter?" said the dame. "For that is just where he used to sit, God bless him. I wonder when we shall hear of him again!"

"She speaks of our son, young master," said my host, turning to me in explanation.

"A boy as has been seldom seen among people of our condition, sir, I can well say," continued the old woman, speaking with great animation. "O! why should he have ever left home! Young people are ever full of fancies, but will they ever find friends in the world they think so much of, like the father who gives them bread, and the mother who gives them milk?"

"My father brought me up at home, and I have ever lived at home," observed Peter. "I have ever lived in this old forest. Many is the tree that is my forest brother, and that is sixty-eight years come Martinmas. I saw my father happy and wished no more. Nor had I ever a heavy hour till Peter began to take these fancies in his head, and that indeed was from a boy this high, for he was ever full of them, and never would do any thing with the axe. I am sure I do not know how they got there. The day will come he will wish he had never left home, and perhaps we may yet see him."

"Too late, too late," said the old woman; "he might have been the prop of our old age. Many is the girl that would have given her eyes for Peter. Our grandchildren might have been running this moment about the room. God bless them, whom we shall never bless. And the old man now must work for the old woman as if it were his wedding year."

"Pooh! pooh! as for that, say nothing," rejoined Peter; "for I praise God my arms and legs are hearty yet. And indeed were they not, we cannot say that our poor boy has ever forgotten us."

"Indeed it is true. He is our own son. But where does the money come from? that is the question. I am sure I think what I dare not say, and pray God to forgive me. How can a poor woodman's son, who never works, gain wherewith to support himself, much more to give away? I fear that if all had their rights, we should have better means to succour Peter, than Peter us."

"Nay, nay, say not that, Mary," said her husband, reprovingly, "for it is in a manner tempting the devil."

"The devil perhaps sent the thought, but it often comes," answered the old woman, firmly.

"And where is your son, sir?" I asked.

"God, who knows all, can tell, not I," said the old man; "but wherever he be, I pray God to bless him."

"Has he left you long, sir?"

"Fifteen years last September; but he ran away once before, when he was barely your height, but that was not for long."

"Indeed," I said, reddening.

"I believe he is a good lad," said the father, "and will never believe harm against him till I hear it. He was a kind boy, though strong-tempered, and even now every year he sends us something, and sometimes writes a line, but never tells us where he is, only that he is very happy, if we are. But for my part, I rather thiak he is in foreign parts."

"That is certain," interrupted Dame Mary. "I dare say he has got among the French."

"He was ever a wrong headed, qucer chap," continued the father, in an under-tone, to me: "sometimes he wanted to be a soldier, then a painter, then he was all for travelling about, and I used to say, 'Peter, my boy, do you know what you are?' And when I sent him into the woods to work, when he came home at night, I found he had been painting the trees!"

The conversation had taken a turn which induced meditation. I was silent, and thoughtful; the dame busied herself with work, the old man resumed his unfinished meal. Suddenly there was a loud shouting at the garden gate. All stared and started. The dog jumped up, and barked. The shouting was repeated, and was evidently addressed to the inmates of the cottage. The old woodman seized his rifle, and opened the casement.

"Who calls," he demanded, "and what want you?"

"Dwellesh Peter Winter here?" was inquired.

"He speaks to you," was the reply.

"Open the door, then," said the shouter.

"Tell me first who you are."

"My name has been already mentioned," answered the shouter, with a laugh.

"What mean you?"

"Why, that my name is Peter Winter."

The old woman screamed, a strange feeling also was my lot, the woodman dropped the loaded rifle. I prevented it from going off—neither of them could move. At last I opened the door, and the stranger of the abbey entered.

XVIII.

THERE was some embracing, much blessing, the old woman never ceased crying, and the eyes of the father were full of tears. The son was calm, and unperturbable, and smiling.

"Are you indeed Peter?" exclaimed the old woman, sobbing with joy.

"I never heard so from any one but you," answered the son.

"And am I blessed with a sight of you before my death?" continued the mother.

"Death! why you look ten years younger than when I last saw you!"

"O! dear, no, Peter. And why did not you tell us where you were?" she continued.

"Because I never knew."

"O! my dear, dear son, how tall you have grown! and pray how have you managed to live? honestly, I am sure: your face says so."

"As for that, it does not become me to praise myself, but you see I have saved my neck."

"And what would you like to eat?"

"Any thing."

The father could not speak for silent joy. I had retired to the remotest corner of the room.

"The old cottage, pretty as ever. I have got a drawing of it in my portfolio—always kept it, and your portrait too, mother, and my father cutting down Schinkel's oak, do you remember?"

"Do I remember! Why what a memory the child has got, and only think of its keeping its poor old mother's head in its pocketbook, and the picture of the cottage, and father cutting down Schinkel's oak. Do I remember!—Why, I remember—"

"Come, my dear old lady, give me something to eat, and, father, your hand again. You flourish like one of your foster brothers. A shower of blessings on you both."

"Ah! what do we want more than to see our dear Peter!" said the old woman, bustling about the supper. "And as for working, I warrant you, you shall be plagued no more about working; shall be as idle as it pleases, that's for it. For old Peter was only saying this evening, that he could do more work now, and more easily, than when he first married—Ay! he will make old bones, I warrant him."

"I said, Mary—"

"Pooh! pooh! never mind what you said, but get the brandy bottle, and give our dear Peter a sup. He shall be plagued no more about working, and that's for it. But Lord bless us, where is the young master all the time, for I want him to help me get the things."

I advanced forward and caught the eye of the son.—"What," he exclaimed, "my little embryo poet—and how came you here, in the name of the holy Magdalen?"

"It is a long story," I said.

"O! then, pray, do not tell it," he replied.

Supper soon appeared. He ate heartily, talking between each mouthful, and full of jests. The father could not speak, but the mother was never silent. He asked many questions about old acquaintances, and I fancied he asked them with little real interest, and only to gratify his mother, who, at each query, burst into fresh admiration of his memory, and his kind-heartedness. At length, after much talk, he said, "Come, old people, to bed, to bed; these hours are not for gray hairs. We shall have you all knocked up to-morrow, instead of fresh and joyful."

"I am sure I cannot sleep," said the dame. "I am in such a taking."

"Pooh! you must sleep, mother—good-night to you, good-night," and kissing her, he pushed her into the next room—"Good-night, dear father," he added, in a soft and serious tone, as he pressed the honest woodman's hand.

"And now, little man, you may tell me your story, and we will try to talk each other to sleep." So saying, he flung a fresh log on the fire, and stretched his legs in his father's ancient seat.

XIX.

It was settled that I should remain at the cottage for a few days, and then that, accompanying Winter, I should repair to the capital. Hither he was bound—and for myself, both from his advice, and his own impulse, I had resolved to return home.

On the next morning the woodman went not to his usual labour, but remained with his son. They strolled out together, but in a short time returned. The mother bustled about preparing a good dinner. For her, this was full employment, but time hung heavy on the old man. At last he took his axe, and fairly set at work at an old tree near his dwelling, which he had long condemned, and never found time to execute. His son and he had few ideas to exchange, and he enjoyed his happiness more while he was employed. Winter proposed to me a ramble, and I joined him.

He was very gay, but would not talk about himself, which I wished. I longed to know what he exactly was, but deemed a direct inquiry indelicate. He delighted to find out places he had known when he was young, and laughed at me very much about my adventures.

"You see what it is to impart knowledge to youth like you. In eight-and-forty hours all these valuable secrets are given to Master Frederick, who will perhaps now turn out a great poet."

I bore his rallying as good-humouredly as he could wish, and tried to lead our conversation to subjects which interested me. "Ask me no more questions," he said, "about yourself—I have told you every thing. All that I can recommend you now is to practise self-forgetfulness."

We rested ourselves on a bank, and talked about foreign countries, of which, though he himself never figured in his tales, he spoke without reserve. My keen attention proved with what curiosity and delight I caught each word. Whenever he paused, I led him by a question to fresh narrative. I could not withstand expressing how I was charmed by such conversation. "All that I tell you," he said, "and much more, may be found in books. Those that cannot themselves observe, can at least acquire the observation of others. These are indeed shadows, but by watching these shadows we learn that there are substances. Little man, you should read more. At your time of life, you can do nothing better than read good books of travellers."

"But is it not better myself to travel?"

"Have I not told you that your wandering days have not yet come? Do you wish to meet another Mr. Frederick? You are much too young. Travel is the great source of true wisdom, but to travel with profit, you must have such a thing as previous knowledge. Do you comprehend?"

"Ah! sir! I fear me much that I am doomed to be unhappy."

"Pooh! pooh! Clear your head of all such nonsense. There is no such thing as unhappiness."

"No such thing as unhappiness, sir? How may this be, for all men believe—"

"All men believe many things which are not true; but remember what I say, and when you have lived as long as I have, you will perhaps discover that it is not a paradox. In the mean time it is nonsense talking about it, and I have got an enormous appetite. A fine dinner to-day for us, I warrant you."

So we returned home at a brisk pace. The old woman looked out at the door when she heard our steps, and nodding to her son with a smile of fondness, "You must walk in the garden a while, Peter," she said, "for I am busy getting the room ready. Now, I dare say, you are thinking of the dinner, but you cannot tell me what there is for Peter, that you cannot. But I'll tell you, for if you fret yourself with guessing, mayhap it will hurt your relish. Do you remember crying once for a pig, Peter, and father saying a woodman's boy must not expect to live like the forest farmer's son? Well, he may say what he likes, Peter, there is a pig."

The father joined us cleanly shaved, and in his Sunday raiment. I never saw any one look so truly respectable as did this worthy old peasant in his long blue coat with large silver buttons, deep waistcoat covered with huge pink flowers and small green leaves, blue stockings, and massy buckles.

The three days at the woodman's cottage flew away most pleasantly. I was grieved when they were gone, and in spite of my natural courage, which was confirmed by meditation, and heightened by my constantly trying it in ideal conjectures, I thought of my appearance at home with a little anxiety.

We were to perform our journey on foot. The morning of the third day was to light us into the city. All was prepared. I parted with my kind friends with many good wishes, hearty shakes of the hand, and frequent promises of another visit. Peter was coming to them again very shortly. They hoped I might again be his companion. The father walked on with us some little way. The mother stood in the cottage door till we were out of sight, smiling through her tears, and waving her hand with many blessings.

"I must take care of my knapsack," said the younger Winter; "evil habits are catching."

"Nevertheless, I hope you will sometimes let me carry it. At any rate, give me your portfolio."

"No, no, you are not to be trusted, and so come on."

XX.

"But, my dear friend, you have lodged, you have fed, you have befriended, you have supported me. If my father were to know that we parted thus, he would never forgive me. Pray, pray, tell me."

"Prithee, no more. You have told me your name, which is against my rules; you know mine, no one of my fellow-travellers ever did before; and yet you are not contented. You grow unreasonable. Did I not say that if our acquaintance were worth maintaining, we should meet again. Well! I say the same thing now—and so good-bye."

"Dear sir, pray, pray—"

"This is my direction—your course lies over that bridge—look sharp about you, and do not enter into your private world, for the odds are, you may find your friend Count Frederick picking a pocket. Good morning, little man."

We parted. I crossed the bridge. The stir of man seemed strange after the silence of the woods. I did not feel quite at my ease; my heart a little misgave me. I soon reached the street in which my father resided. I thought of the woodman's cottage, and the careless days I had spent under that simple roof. I wished myself once more by Schinkel's oak, talking of Arabia the Blessed with that strange man with whom my acquaintance, although so recent, seemed now only a dream. Did he really exist—were they all real beings with whom I seemed lately to have consorted? Or had I indeed been all this time plunged in one of my incurable reveries! I thought of the laughing girl, and her dark sentimental friend. I felt for the chain which I always wore round my neck. It was gone. No doubt, then, it must all be true.

I had reached the gate. I uttered an involuntary sigh. I took up the knocker. It was for a moment suspended. I thought of the Contarinis, and my feeble knock hurried into a sharp rap. . . entered. "Tis a nervous business," thought I, "there is no concealing it. 'Tis flat rebellion—'tis desertion—'tis an outrage of all parental orders—'tis a violation of the law of nature and of nations." I sighed again. "Yet these are all bug-bears, for what can they do to me? Is there any punishment that they can inflict that I care for? Certainly not, and 'tis likely it will all blow over. Yet the explanations, and the vile excuses, and the petty examinations, there is something pitiful, and contemptible, and undignified in the whole process. What is it that so annoys me? 'Tis not fear. I think it is the disgust of being accountable to any human being."

I went up stairs. My father, I felt sure, was away. I found the baroness alone. She started when I entered, and looked sullen. Her countenance, she flattered herself, was a happy mixture of the anxiety which became both a spouse and a mother, pity for my father, pity for me, and decided indignation at my very improper conduct.

"How do you do, madam?" I inquired, in as quiet a tone as I could command. "My father is, I suppose, at his office."

"I am sure I cannot tell," she replied, speaking in a very subdued, serious tone, as if there were death in the house. "I believe he has gone out to-day. He has been very agitated indeed, and I think is extremely unwell. We have all been extremely agitated and alarmed. I have kept myself as quiet as I can, but can bear no noise whatever. The baron has received a fine letter from your tutor," she continued, in a brisker and rather malignant tone, "but your father will speak to you. I know nothing about these things, I wished to have said something to soothe him, but I know I never interfere for any good."

"Well," I observed, with a dogged, desperate tone, speaking through my teeth, "well! all I can say is, that if my father has been prejudiced against me by a parcel of infamous falsehoods, as it appears by your account. I know how to protect myself. I see how the ground lies; I see that I have already been judged, and am now to be punished without a trial. But I will not submit any longer to such persecution. Kindness in this house I never expect, but justice is a right enjoyed by a common woodman, and denied only to me."

"Dear me, Contarini, how violent you are! I never said your father was even angry. I only said I thought he was a little unwell—a little bilious, I think. My dear Contarini, you are always so very violent. I am sure I said I was confident you would never have left college without a very good cause indeed. I have no doubt you will explain every thing in the most satisfactory manner possible. I do not know what you mean always by talking of not expecting kindness in this house. I am sure I never interfered with you. I make it a rule always, when your interest is in the least concerned, never to give an opinion. I am sure I wish you were quite happy and less violent. As for judging and punishing without a trial, you know your father never punishes any one, nor has he decided any thing, for all he knows is from the letter of your tutor, and that is merely a line, merely saying you had quitted the college without leave, and, as they supposed, had gone home. They said, too, that they were the more surprised, as your general behaviour was quite unexceptionable. Not at all against you the letter was, not at all, I assure you. I pointed out to your father more than once, that the letter was, if any thing, rather in your favour, because I had no doubt that you would explain the step in the most satisfactory manner; and they said, you see, that your conduct, otherwise, was perfectly unexceptionable."

"Well, my dear madam, I am very sorry it I have offended you. How are my brothers?"

"I am very willing to forget it. You may say and think what you please, Contarini, as long as you are not violent. The children are pretty well. Ernest quite ready to go to college, and now there is no one to take care of him. I always thought of your being there with quite a feeling of satisfaction, for I was sure that you would not refuse to do what you could for him among the boys. As it is, I have no doubt he will be killed the first half year, or, at least, have a limb broken, for, poor dear boy, he is so delicate, he cannot fight."

"Well, my dear madam, if I be not there, I can recommend him to some one who will take care of him. Make yourself quite easy. A little rough life will do him no harm, and I will answer he is not killed, and even have not a limb broken. Now, what do you recommend me to do about my father? Shall I walk down to him?"

"I certainly think not. You know that he will certainly be at home this afternoon, though, to be sure, he will be engaged, but to-morrow, or the day after, I have no doubt he will find half an hour to speak to you. You know he is so very busy."

I immediately resolved to walk down to him. I had no idea of having a scene impending over me in this manner for days. My father at this time filled the office of Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. He had been appointed to this post recently, and I had never yet visited him at his new office. I repaired to it immediately. It was at some distance from his house. His horses were waiting at the door, therefore I was sure that he was to be found. When I entered, I found myself in a hall. A porter was loitering in a large chair. I asked him for Baron Fleming. He did not deign to answer me, but pointed to a mahogany door. I entered, and found myself in a large well-furnished room, fitted up with desks. At the end, two young men were fencing. Another, seated at a round table covered with papers, was copying music, and occasionally trying a note on his guitar. A fourth was throwing himself into attitudes before a pier-glass; and the fifth, who was the only one whose employment was in any degree of a political nature, was seated at his desk, reading the newspaper.

No one noticed my entrance. I looked in vain for my father, and with some astonishment at those I found in his place. Then I inquired for Baron Fleming, and, for the second time in one day, I did not receive any answer. I repeated my query in a more audible tone, and the young gentleman who was reading the newspaper, without taking his eyes off the columns, demanded, in a curt voice, what I wanted with him.

"What is that to you?" I ingenuously asked.

This unusual reply excited attention. They all looked at me, and when they had looked at me, they looked at each other, and smiled. My appearance indeed, of which, till I had seen myself in the pier-glass, I was not sensible, was indeed well calculated to excite a smile, and to attract a stare. My clothes were not unattracted, and were very much soiled, being covered with shreds of moss and blades of grass, and stuck over with thistle-tops; my boots had not been cleaned for a week, my shirt frill, which fell over my shoulders, was torn and dirtied, my dishevelled and unbrushed locks reached my neck, and could scarcely be said to be covered by the small forester's cap, which I always wore at school, and in which I had decamped. Animate the countenance of this strange figure with that glow of health which can only be obtained by the pedestrian, and which seemed to shock the nerves of this company of dapper youths.

"If you want Baron Fleming, then you must go up stairs," said the student of the newspaper in a peevish voice.

As I shut the door, I heard the burst of laughter, I mounted up the great staircase and came into an antechamber.

"What do you want, sir, what do you want, sir? You must not come here," said a couple of pompous messengers, nearly pushing me out.

"I shall not go away," I replied; "I want Baron Fleming."

"Engaged, young gentleman, engaged—can't see any one—impossible."

"I shall wait, then."

"No use waiting, young gentleman; better go."

"It is not such an easy matter, I perceive, to see one's father," I thought to myself.

I did not know which was his room, otherwise I would have gone in: but turning round, I detected written on a door, "Under Secretary's Office," and I ran to it.

"Stop, sir, stop," said the messengers.

But I had hold of the lock. They pulled me, I kicked the door, and out came the private secretary of the under secretary.

"What is all this, what is all this?" asked the private secretary. He was a fit companion for the young gentlemen I had left down stairs.

"I want Baron Fleming," I replied, "and these men will not tell me where he is, and therefore I come to the under secretary to ask." So saying, I most indignantly freed my arm from the capture of one of the messengers, and kicked the shin of the other.

"May I ask who you are?" demanded the private secretary.

"I am Baron Contarini Fleming," I replied.

"Pray sit down," said the private secretary, "I will be with you in a moment."

The two messengers darted back, and continued bowing without turning their backs, until they unexpectedly reached the end of the room.

The private secretary returned with the under secretary. The under secretary told me that my father was engaged with the chancellor, and that his door was locked, but that the moment the door was unlocked, and the chancellor departed, he would take care that he was informed of my arrival. In the mean time, as he himself had a deputation to receive in his room, who were to come to-day to complain in form of what they had for months been complaining informally, he begged that I would have the kindness to accompany his private secretary to the room down stairs.

The room down stairs I again entered. The private secretary introduced me. All looked very confused, and the young gentleman who was still reading the newspaper immediately handed it to me. I had never read a newspaper in my life, but I accepted his offer to show my importance. As I did not understand politics, I turned the back of the sheet, where there is generally an article on the fine arts, or a review of a new book. My wandering eye fixed upon a memoir of the Chevalier de Winter. I was equally agitated and astonished. My eye quivered over the page. I saw in an instant enough to convince me it was my friend, and that my friend was styled "a great ornament to the country," and the Northmen were congratulated on at length producing an artist whom the Italians themselves acknowledged unrivalled among the living. I learned how he was the son of a peasant; how his genius for painting early developed itself; how he had led four years an eccentric and wandering life; how he had returned to Rome, and at once produced a master-piece: how he had gained prizes in academies; how he was esteemed and honoured by foreign princes; how his own illustrious monarch, ever alive to the patronage of the fine arts, had honoured him with two commissions; how he had returned to his native country with these magnificent pictures, which were daily exhibiting at the Royal Academy of Arts; how the king had conferred on him the collar of a high order and offered him a great pension; how he had refused the pension, and requested only that a competency might be settled on his parents.

I was bewildered, I fell into a deep revery, the paper dropped from my hand, the door opened, and the private secretary summoned me to the presence of my father.

XXI.

It is time you should know something of my father. You must remember that he was little more than a score of years my senior. Imagine then a man about four-and-thirty years of age, tall and thin, slightly bald, handsome and elegant, pensive and pale. His clear broad brow, his aquiline, but delicately-chiselled nose, his gray, deep-set, and penetrating eye, and his compressed lips, altogether formed a countenance which enchanted women, and awed men.

His character is more difficult to delineate. It was perhaps inscrutable. I will attempt to sketch it, as it might then have appeared to those who considered themselves qualified to speculate upon human nature.

His talents were of a high order, and their exercise alone had occasioned his rise in a country in which he had no interest and no connexions. He had succeeded in every thing he had undertaken. As an orator, as a negotiator, and in all the details of domestic administration he was alike eminent, and his luminous interpretation of national law had elevated the character of his monarch in the opinion of Europe, and had converted a second-rate power into the mediator between the highest.

The minister of a free people, he was the personal as well as the political pupil of Metternich. Yet, he respected the institutions of his country, because they existed, and because experience proved that, under their influence, the natives had become more powerful machines.

His practice of politics was compressed in two words—subtlety and force. The minister of an emperor, he would have maintained his system by armies; in the cabinet of a small kingdom, he compensated for his deficiency by intrigue.

His perfection of human nature was a practical man. He looked upon a theorist either with alarm or with contempt. Proud in his own energies, and conscious that he owed every thing to his own dexterity, he believed all to depend upon the ind ence of individual character. He required men not to think but to act, not to examine but to obey, and animating their brute force with his own intelligence, he found the success which he believed could never be achieved by the rational conduct of an enlightened people.

Out of the cabinet, the change of his manner might perplex the superficial. The moment that he entered society, his thoughtful face would break into a fascinating smile, and he listened with interest to the tales of levity, and joined with readiness in each frivolous pursuit. He was sumptuous in his habits, and was said to be even voluptuous. Perhaps he affected gallantry because he was deeply impressed with the influence of women, both upon public and upon private opinion. With them he was a universal favourite; and as you beheld him assenting with conviction to their gay or serious nonsense, and waving, with studied grace, his perfumed handkerchief in his delicately-white and jewelled hand, you might have supposed him for a moment a consummate lord-chamberlain—but only for a moment,—for had you caught his eye, you would have withdrawn your gaze with precipitation, and perhaps with awe. For the rest, he spoke all languages, never lost his self-possession, and never in my recollection, had displayed a spark of strong feeling.

I loved my father deeply, but my love was mixed with more than reverence; it was blended with fear. He was the only person before whom I ever quailed. To me he had been universally kind. I could not recall, in the whole period of my existence, a single harsh word directed to myself that had ever escaped him. Whenever he saw me, he smiled and nodded; and sometimes, in early days, when I requested an embrace, he had pressed my lips. As I grew in years, every thing was arranged that could conduce to my happiness. Whatever I desired was granted, whatever wish I expressed was gratified. Yet with all this, by some means or other which I could not comprehend, the intercourse between my father and myself seemed never to advance. I was still to him as much an infant as if I were yet a subject of the nursery, and the impending and important interview might be considered the first time that it was ever my fortune to engage with him in serious converse.

The door was opened, my heart palpitated, the private secretary withdrew, I entered the lofty room. My father was writing. He did not look up as I came in. I stood at his table a second. He raised his eyes, stared at my odd appearance, and then pointing to a chair, he said, "How do you do, Contarini? I have been expecting you some days." Then he resumed his writing.

I was rather surprised, but my entrance had so agitated me that I was not sorry to gain time. A clock was opposite to me, and I employed myself in watching the hands. They advanced over one, two, three minutes very slowly and solemnly; still my father wrote; even five minutes disappeared, and my father continued writing. I thought five minutes had never gone so slowly; I began to think of what I should say, and to warm up my courage by an imaginary conversation. Suddenly I observed that ten minutes had flown, and these last five had scudded in a most surprising manner. Still my father was employed. At length he rang his bell. One of my friends the messengers entered. My father sent for Mr. Strelamb, and before Mr. Strelamb, who was his private secretary, appeared, he had finished his letter and given it to the other messenger. Then Mr. Strelamb came in and seated himself opposite to my father, and took many notes with an attention and quickness which appeared to me quite marvellous, and then my father, looking at the clock, said he had an appointment with the Prussian ambassador at his palace; but, while Mr. Strelamb was getting some papers in order for him, he sent for the under secretary and gave him so many directions, that I thought the under secretary must have the most wonderful memory in the world. At length my father left the room, saying, as he quitted it, "Rest you here, Contarini."

I was consoled for his neglect by the consciousness that my father was a very great man indeed. I had no idea of such a great man. I was filled with awe. I looked out of the window to see him mount his horse, but just as he had one foot in his stirrup, a carriage dashed up to the door, my father withdrew his foot, and saluting the person in the carriage, entered it. It was the Austrian ambassador. In ten minutes he came out, but just as the steps were rattled up, and the chasseur had closed the door with his best air, my father returned to the carriage, but he remained only a minute, and then, mounting his horse, galloped off.

"This is indeed a great man," I thought, "and I am his son." I began to muse upon this idea of political greatness. The simple woodman, and his decorous cottage, and his free forest life recurred to my mind, unaccompanied by that feeling of satisfaction which I had hitherto associated with them, and were pictured in faded and rather insipid colours. Poetry, and philosophy, and the delights of solitude, and the beauty of truth, and the rapture of creation—I know not how it was, they certainly did not figure in such paramount beauty and colossal importance as I had previously viewed them. I thought of my harassing hours of doubt and diffidence with disgust, I sickened at the time wasted over imperfect efforts, at what, when perfect, seemed somehow of questionable importance. I was dissatisfied with my past life. Ambassadors, and chancellors, under secretaries, and private secretaries, and public messengers, flitted across my vision. I was sensibly struck at the contrast between all this greatness achieved, and moving before me in its quick and proud reality, and my weak meditations of unexecuted purposes and dreamy visions of imaginary grandeur. I threw myself in my father's chair, took up a pen, and, insensibly to myself, while I indulged in these reflections, scribbled Contarini Fleming over every paper that afforded itself for my signature.

My father was a long while away. I fell into a profound reverie. He entered the room. I did not observe him, I was entirely lost. I was engaged in a conversation with both the Prussian and Austrian ambassadors together. My father called me; I did not hear him. My eyes were fixed on vacancy, but I was listening with the greatest attention to their excellencies. My father approached, lifted me gently from his seat, and placed me in my original chair. I stared, looked up, and shook myself like a man awakened. He slightly smiled, and then seating himself, shrugging up his shoulders at my labours, and arranging his papers, he said, at the same time,

"Now, Contarini, I wish you to tell me why you have left your college!"

This was a home query, and entirely brought me to myself. With the greatest astonishment, I found that I had no answer. I did not speak, and my father commenced writing. In two or three instances he said, "Well can you answer my question?"

"Yes, sir," I replied, to gain time.

"Well! tell me."

"Because, sir, because it was no use staying there."

"Why?"

"Because I learned nothing!"

"Were you the first boy in the school, or the last? had you learned every thing that they could teach you, or nothing?"

"I was neither first nor last. Not that I should be ashamed of being last where I considered it no honour to be first."

"Why not?"

"Because I do not think that it is an enviable situation to be the first among the learners of words."

My father gave me a sharp glance, and then said, "Did you leave college because you considered that they taught you only words?"

"Yes, sir, and because I wished to learn ideas."

"Some silly book has filled your head, Contarini, with these ridiculous notions about the respective importance of words and ideas. Few ideas are correct ones, and what are correct no one can ascertain. But with words we govern men."

This observation completely knocked up all my philosophy, and I was without an answer.

"I tell you what, Contarini: I suspect that there must be some other reason for this step of yours. I wish you to tell it to me. If you were not making there that progress which every intelligent youth desires, such a circumstance might be a very good reason for your representing your state to your parent, and submitting it to his consideration, but you—you have never complained to me upon the subject. You said nothing of the kind when you were last with me, you never communicated it by letter. I never heard of a boy running away from school because they did not teach him sufficient, or sufficiently well. Your instructors do not complain of your conduct, except with regard to this step. There must be some other reason which induced you to adopt a measure which, I flatter myself, you have already learned to consider as both extremely unauthorized and very injudicious."

I had a good mind to pour it all out. I had a good mind to dash Venice in his teeth, and let him chew it as he could. I was on the point of asking a thousand questions, which I had been burning all my life to know, but the force of early impressions was too strong. I shunned the fatal word, and remained silent with a clouded brow, and my eyes fixed upon the ground.

"Answer me, Contarini," he continued; "you know that all I ask is only for your good. Answer me, Contarini; I request that you answer me. Were you uncomfortable? Were you unhappy?"

"I am always unhappy," I replied, in a gloomy tone.

My father moved round his chair. "You astonish me, Contarini. Unhappy! always unhappy! Why are you unhappy? I should have thought you the happiest boy of my acquaintance. I am sure I cannot conceive what makes you unhappy.

Pray tell me. Is there any thing you want? Have you done, has anybody done any thing to annoy you? Have you any thing upon your mind?"

I did not answer, my eyes were still fixed upon the ground, the tears stealing down my cheek, tears not of tenderness, but rage.

"My dear Contarini," continued my father, "I must indeed earnestly request you to answer me. Throughout life you have never disobeyed me. Do not let to-day be an epoch of rebellion. Speak to me frankly. Tell me why you are unhappy."

"Because I have no one I love, because there is no one who loves me, because I hate this country, because I hate every thing and everybody, because I hate myself." I rose from my seat and stamped about the room.

My father was perfectly astounded. He had thought that I might possibly have got into debt, or had a silly quarrel, but he did not lose his self-command.

"Sit down, Contarini," he said very calmly, "never give way to your feelings. Explain to me quietly what all this means. What book have you been reading to fill your head with all this nonsense! What could have so suddenly altered your character?"

"I have read no book, my character is what I always was, and I have only expressed to-day, for the first time, what I have ever felt. Life is intolerable to me, and I wish to die."

"What can you mean by persons not loving you?" resumed my father, "I am sure the baroness—"

"The baroness!" I interrupted him in a sharp tone; "what is the baroness to me! Always this wretched nursery view of life—always considered an insignificant, unmeaning child—What is the baroness, and her petty persecutions to me?—Pah!"

I grew bold. The truth is, my vanity was flattered by finding the man, who was insensible to all, and before whom all trembled, yield his sympathy and his time to me. I began to get interested in the interview. I was excited by this first conversation with a parent. My suppressed character began unconsciously to develop itself, and I unintentionally gave way to my mind, as if I were in one of my own scenes.

"I should be sorry if there were even petty persecutions," said my father, "and equally so, if you were insensible to them; but I hope that you speak only under excited feelings. For your father, Contarini, I can at least answer, that his conscience cannot accuse him of a deficiency in love for one who has such strong claims upon a father's affection. I can indeed say that I have taken no important step in life which had not for its ulterior purpose your benefit; and what, think you, can sweeten this all-engrossing and perhaps fatal labour, to which I am devoted, but the thought that I am toiling for the future happiness of my child? You are young, Contarini. Some day you will become acquainted with the feelings of a father, and you will then blush with shame and remorse that you have ever accused me of insensibility."

While he spoke I was greatly softened. The tears stole down my cheek. I leaned my arm upon the table, and tried to shade my face with my hand. My father rose from his seat, turned the key of the door, and resumed his place

"Occupied with affairs," he resumed, "which do not always allow me sleep, I have never found time for those slight parental offices which I do not think less delightful because it has been my misfortune not to fulfil, or to enjoy them. But you, Contarini, have never been absent from my thoughts, and I had considered that I had made such arrangements as must secure you the gratification of every innocent desire. But to-day I find, for the first time, that I have been mistaken for years. I regret it: I wish, if possible, to compensate for my unhappy neglect, or rather unfortunate ignorance. Tell me, Contarini, what do you wish me to do?"

"Nothing, nothing," I sobbed and sighed.

"But if necessity have hitherto brought us less together than I could wish, you are now, Contarini, fast advancing to that period of life, to which I looked forward as a consolatory recompense for this deplorable estrangement, I hoped to find in you a constant companion. I hoped that I might have the high gratification of forming you into a great and good man—that I might find in my son, not merely a being to be cherished, but a friend, a counsellor, a colleague—yes! Contarini, perhaps a successor."

I clasped my hands in agony, but restrained a cry.

"And now," he continued, "I am suddenly told, and by himself, that I have never loved him; but still more painful, still more heart-rending, is the accompanying declaration, which indeed is what I could not be prepared for. Misconception on his part, however improbable, might have accounted for his crediting my coldness, but alas! I have no room for hope or doubt; his plain avowal can never be misconstrued. I must then yield to the terrible conviction that I am an object of abhorrence to my child."

I flung myself at his feet, I seized his hand, I kissed it, and bathed it with my tears.

"Spare me, O! spare me," I faintly muttered. "Henceforth I will be all you wish!" I clung upon his hand, I would not rise till he pardoned me. "Pardon me," I said, "pardon me, I beseech you, father, for I spoke in madness! Pardon me, pardon me, dear father! It was in madness, for indeed there is something which comes over me sometimes like madness, but now it will never come, because you love me. Only tell me that you love me, and I will always do every thing. I am most grieved for what I said about the baroness. She is too good! I will never give you again an uneasy moment, not a single uneasy moment. Now that I know that you love me, you may depend upon me, you may indeed. You may depend upon me forever."

He smiled, and raised me from the ground, and kissed my forehead. "Compose yourself, dearest boy! Strelamb must soon come in. Try more to repress your feelings. There, sit down and calm yourself."

He resumed his writing directly, and I sat sobbing myself into composure. In about a quarter of an hour, he said, "I must send for Strelamb now, love. If you go into the next room, you can wash your face."

When I returned, my father said, "Come! come! you look quite blooming. By-the-by, are you aware what a very strange figure you are, Contarini? After being closeted all the morning with me, they will think, from your costume, that you are a foreign ambassador. Now, go home, and dress, for I have a large dinner-party to-day, and I wish you to dine with me. There are several persons whom you should know. And, if you like, you may take my horses, for I had rather walk home."

XXII.

I WAS so very happy that, for some time, I did not think of the appalling effort that awaited me. It was not till I had fairly commenced dressing, that I remembered, that in the course of an hour, for the first time in my life, I was to enter a room full of strangers, conducting themselves with ease in all that etiquette of society in which I was entirely unpractised. My heart misgave me. I wished myself again in the forest. I procrastinated my toilet to the last possible moment. Ignorant of the art of dress, I found myself making a thousand experiments, all of which failed. The more I consulted my glass, the less favourable was the impression. I brushed my hair out of curl. I confined my neck for the first time in a cravat. Each instant my appearance became more awkward, more formal, and ineffectual. At last I was obliged to go down, and less at my ease, and conscious of appearing worse than I ever did in my life, at the only moment of that life in which appearance had been of the slightest consequence, and had ever occupied my thoughts, I entered the room at the side door. It was very full, as I had expected. I stole in, without being observed, which a little reanimated my courage. I looked round in vain for a person I knew; I crept to a corner. All seemed at their ease. All were smiling, all exchanging words, if not ideas. The women all appeared beautiful, the men all elegant. I painfully felt my wretched inferiority. I watched the baroness, magnificently attired, and sparkling with diamonds, wreathed with smiles, and scattering, without effort, phrases which seemed to diffuse universal pleasure. This woman, whom I had presumed to despise, and dared to insult, became to me an object of admiration and of envy. She even seemed to me beautiful. I was bewildered.

Suddenly a gentleman approached me. It was the under secretary. I was delighted by his notice. I answered his many uninteresting questions about every school pastime, which I detested, as if I felt the greatest interest in their recollection. All that I desired was, that he would not leave me, that I might at least appear to be doing what the others were, and might be supposed to be charmed, although I was in torture. At length he walked off to another group, and I found myself once more alone, apparently without a single chance of keeping up the ball. I felt as if every one were watching with wonder, the strange, awkward, ugly, silent boy. I coined my cheek into a base smile, but I found that it would not pass. I caught the eye of the baroness; she beckoned me to come to her. I joined her without delay. She introduced me to a lady who was sitting at her side. This lady had a son at the college, and asked me many questions. I answered in the most nervous, rapid manner, as if her son were my most intimate friend, gave the anxious mother a complete detail of all his occupations, and praised the institution up to the seventh heaven. I was astonished at the tone of affection with which the baroness addressed me, at the interest which she took in every thing which concerned me. It was ever "Contarini, dear"—"Contarini, my love"—"You have been riding to-day. Where have you been? I have hardly had time to speak to you. He only came home to-day. He is looking vastly well—very well indeed—very much grown—O! amazingly—quite a beau for you, baroness—O! yes, quite delightful."

What amiable people, I thought, and what would I give to be once more in old Winter's cottage!

The door opened, the Chevalier de Winter was announced. My fellow-traveller entered the room, though I could scarcely recognise him in his rich, and even fanciful dress, and adorned with his brilliant order. I was struck with his fine person, his noble carriage, and his highly-polished manner. Except my father, I had never seen so true a nobleman. The baron went forward to receive him with his most courteous air, and most fascinating smile. I withdrew as he led him to my mother. I watched the baroness as she rose to greet him. I was surprised at the warmth of her welcome, and the tone of consideration with which she received him. Some of the guests, who were the highest nobles in the country, requested my father to present them to him: with others Winter was already acquainted, and they seemed honoured by his recognition.

"This also is a great man," I exclaimed, "but of a different order." Old feelings began to boil up from the abyss in which I had plunged them. I sympathized with this great and triumphant artist. In a few days it seemed that the history of genius had been acted before me for my instruction, and for my encouragement. A combination of circumstances had allowed me to trace this man from his first hopeless obscurity. I had seen all—the strong predisposition, the stubborn opposition of fortune, the first efforts, the first doubts, the paramount conviction, the long struggle, the violated ties, the repeated flights, the deep studies, the sharp discipline, the great creation, and the glorious triumph.

My father, crossing the room, saw me. "Contarini," he said, "where have you been all this time? I have been often looking for you. Come with me, and I will introduce you to the Chevalier de Winter, one of the first painters in the world, and who has just come from Rome. You must go and see his pictures; every one is talking of them. Always know eminent men, and always be master of the subject of the day. Chevalier," for we had now come up to him, "my son desires your acquaintance."

"Ah! fellow-traveller, welcome, welcome—I told you we should soon meet again," and he pressed my hand with warmth.

"Sir, I had a prescience that I had been the companion of a great man."

This was pretty well said for a bashful youth, but it was really not a compliment. The moment I addressed Winter, I resumed unconsciously my natural tone, and, reminded by his presence that higher accomplishments and qualities existed than a mere acquaintance with etiquette, and the vivacity which could enliven the passages of ordinary conversation, I began to feel a little more at my ease.

Dinner was announced. The table was round. I sat between the under secretary and the lady to whom I had been introduced. The scene was a very novel one, and I was astonished at observing a magnificent repast, which all seemed to pique themselves upon tasting as little as possible. They evidently assembled here, then, I thought, for the sake of conversation, yet how many are silent, and what is said might be omitted. But I was then ignorant of the purposes for which human beings are brought together. My female companion, who was a little wearied by a great general, who, although a hero and a strategist, was soon beaten and bewildered in a campaign of repartee, turned round to amuse herself with her other supporter. Her terrific child was again introduced. I had drank a glass or two of wine, and altogether had, in a great degree, recovered my self-possession. I could support her tattle no longer. I assured the astonished mother that I had never even heard of her son; that, if really at college, he must be in a different part of the establishment; and that I had never met him, that I did not even know the name, that the college was a very bad college indeed, that nobody learned any thing there, that I abhorred it, and that I hoped I should never return, and then I asked her to do me the honour of taking wine.

XXIII.

THE day after the party, I went with the baroness to see the great pictures of Winter in the Royal Academy of Arts. They both of them seemed to me magnificent, but one, which was a national subject, and depicted the emancipating exploits of one of the heroic monarchs, was the most popular. I did not feel so much interested with this. I did not sympathize with the gloomy, savage scene, the black pine forests, the rough mountains, the feudal forms and dresses; but the other, which was of a very different character, afforded me exquisite delight. It represented a procession going up to sacrifice at a temple in a Grecian isle. The brilliant colouring, the beautiful and beautifully-clad forms, the Ionian fane, seated on a soft acclivity covered with sunny trees, the classical and lovely background, the deep-blue sea, broken by a tall white scudding sail, and backed by undulating and azure mountains—I stood before it in a trance, a crowd of ideas swiftly gathered in my mind. It was a poem.

After this, I called upon Winter, and found him in his studio. Many persons were there, and of high degree. It was the first time I had ever been in the studio of an artist. I was charmed with all I saw; the infinite sketches, the rough studies, the unfinished pictures, the lay figure, the beautiful cast, and here and there some choice relic of antiquity, a torso, a bust, or a gem. I remained here the whole morning examining his Venetian sketches: and a day seldom passed over that I did not drop in to pay my devotions at this delightful temple.

I was indeed so much at home, that if he were engaged, I resumed my portfolio without notice, so that in time I knew perhaps more about Venice than many persons who had passed their whole lives there.

When I had been at home a fortnight, my father one day invited me to take a ride with him, and began conversing with me on my plans. He said that he did not wish me to return to college, but that he thought me at least a year too young to repair to the university, whither, on every account, he desired me to go. "We should consider, then," he continued, "how this interval can be turned to the greatest advantage. I wish you to mix as much as is convenient with society. I apprehend that you have, perhaps, hitherto indulged a little too much in lonely habits. Young men are apt to get a little abstracted, and occasionally to think that there is something singular in their nature, when the fact is, if they were better acquainted with their fellow-creatures, they would find they were mistaken. This is a common error, indeed the commonest. I am not at all surprised that you have fallen into it. All have. The most practical business-like men that exist have many of them, when children, conceived themselves totally disqualified to struggle in the world. You may rest assured of this. I could mention many remarkable instances. All persons, when young, are fond of solitude, and when they are beginning to think, are sometimes surprised at their own thoughts. There is nothing to be deplored, scarcely to be feared, in this. It almost always wears off; but sometimes it happens, that they have not judicious friends by them to explain, that the habits which they think peculiar are universal, and, if unreasonably indulged, can ultimately only turn them into indolent, insignificant members of society, and occasion them lasting unhappiness."

I made no reply, but gave up all idea of writing a tale, which was to embrace both Venice and Greece, and which I had been for some days meditating.

"But to enter society with pleasure, Contarini, you must be qualified for it. I think it quite time for you to make yourself master of some accomplishments. Decidedly, you should make yourself a good dancer. Without dancing, you can never attain a perfectly graceful carriage, which is of the highest importance in life, and should be every man's ambition. You are yet too young fully to comprehend how much in life depends upon manner. Whenever you see a man who is successful in society, try to discover what makes him pleasing, and, if possible, adopt his system. You should learn to fence. For languages, at present, French will be sufficient. You speak it fairly—try to speak it elegantly. Read French authors. Read Rochefoucault. The French writers are the finest in the world, for they clear our heads of all ridiculous ideas. Study precision.

"Do not talk too much at present—do not try to talk. But, whenever you speak, speak with self-possession. Speak in a subdued tone, and always look at the person whom you are addressing. Before one can engage in general conversation with any effect, there is a certain acquaintance with trifling, but amusing subjects, which must be first attained. You will soon pick up sufficient by listening and observing. Never argue. In society nothing must be discussed—give only results. If any person differ with you—bow, and turn the conversation. In society, never think—always be on the watch, or you will miss many opportunities, and say many disagreeable things.

"Talk to women—talk to women as much as you can. This is the best school. This is the way to gain fluency—because you need not care what you say, and had better not be sensible. They, too, will rally you on many points, and, as they are women, you will not be offended. Nothing is of so much importance, and of so much use, to a young man entering life, as to be well criticised by women. It is impossible to get rid of those bad habits which we pick up in boyhood without this supervision. Unfortunately, you have no sisters. But never be offended if a woman rally you. Encourage her. Otherwise, you will never be free from your awkwardness, or any little oddities, and certainly never learn to dress.

"You ride pretty well, but you had better go through the manège. Every gentleman should be a perfect cavalier. You shall have your own groom and horses, and I wish you to ride regularly every day.

"As you are to be at home for so short a time, and for other reasons, I think it better that you should not have a tutor in the house. Parcel out your morning, then, for your separate masters. Rise early and regularly, and read for three hours. Read the memoirs of the Cardinal de Retz—the life of Richelieu—every thing about Napoleon—read works of that kind. Strelamb will prepare you a list. Read no history—nothing but biography, for that is life without theory. Then fence. Talk an hour with your French master, but do not throw the burden of the conversation upon him. Give him an account of something. Describe to him the events of yesterday, or give him a detailed account of the constitution. You will have then sufficiently rested yourself for your dancing. And, after that, ride and amuse yourself as much as you can. Amusement to an observing mind is study."

I pursued the system which my father had pointed out with exactness, and soon with pleasure. I sacredly observed my hours of reading, and devoted myself to the study of the lives of what my father considered really great men—that is to say, men of great energies and violent volition, who look upon their fellow-creatures as mere tools, with which they can build up a pedestal for their solitary statue, and who sacrifice every feeling, which should sway humanity, and every high work which genius should really achieve, to the short-sighted gratification of an irrational and outrageous selfishness. As for my manners, I flattered myself that they had advanced in measure with my mind, although I already emulated Napoleon. I soon overcame the fear which attended my first experiments in society, and by scrupulously observing the paternal maxims, I soon became very self-satisfied. I listened to men with a delightful mixture of deference and self-confidence: were they old, and did I differ with them, I contented myself by positively stating my opinion in a most subdued voice, and then either turning the subject or turning upon my heel. But as for women, it is astonishing how well I got on. The nervous rapidity of my first rattle soon subsided into a continuous flow of easy nonsense. Impertinent and slipshod, I was universally hailed an original and a wit. But the most remarkable incident was, that the baroness and myself became the greatest friends. I was her constant attendant, and rehearsed to her flattered ear all my evening performance. She was the person with whom I practised, and as she had a taste in dress, I encouraged her opinions. Unconscious that she was at once my lay figure and my mirror, she loaded me with presents, and announced to all her coterie, that I was the most delightful young man of her acquaintance.

From all this, it may easily be suspected that, at the age of fifteen, I had unexpectedly become one of the most affected, conceited, and intolerable atoms that ever peopled the sunbeam of society.

A few days before I quitted home for the university, I paid a farewell visit to Winter, who was himself on the point of returning to Rome.

"Well, my dear chevalier," I said, seizing his hand, and speaking in a voice of affected interest, "I could not think of leaving town without seeing you. I am off to-morrow, and you—you, too, are going. But what a difference—a Gothic university and immortal Rome! Pity me, my dear chevalier," and I shrugged my shoulders.

"O! yes, certainly—I think you are to be pitted."

"And how does the great work go on? Your name is everywhere. I assure you, Prince Besborodsko was speaking to me last night of nothing else. By-the-by, shall you be at the opera to-night?"

"I do not know."

"O! you must go. I am sorry I have not a box to offer you. But the baroness's, I am sure, is always at your service."

"You are vastly kind."

"'Tis the most charming opera. I think his master-piece. That divine air—I hum it all day. I do indeed. What a genius! I can bear no one else. Decidedly the greatest composer that ever existed."

"He is certainly very great, and you are, no doubt, an excellent judge of his style; but the air you meant to hum is an introduction, and by Pacini."

"Is it, indeed? Ah! Italy is the land of music. We men of the north must not speak of it."

"Why is Italy the land of music? Why not Germany?"

"Perhaps music is more cultivated in Germany at present, but do not you think that it is, as it were, more indigenous in Italy?"

"No."

As I never argued, I twirled my cane, and asked his opinion of a new Casino.

"Ah! by-the-by, is it true, chevalier, that you have at last agreed to paint the princess-royal? I tell you what I recommend you seriously to do—most seriously, I assure you—most decidedly it is my opinion—most important thing, indeed—should not be neglected a day. Certainly, I should not think of going to Italy without doing it."

"Well, well!"

"Countess Arnfeldt, chevalier. By heavens, she is divine! What a neck, and what a hand! A perfect study."

"Poh!"

"Don't you think so, really? Well, I see I am terribly breaking into your morning. Adieu! Let us hope we may soon meet again. Perhaps at Rome—who knows? Au revoir, au revoir."

I kissed my hand, and tripped out of the room in all the charming fulness of a perfectly graceful manner.

we contrast our worn and harassed existence with that sweet prime, free from anxiety, and fragrant with innocence. I cannot share these feelings. I was a most miserable child, and school I detested more than I ever abhorred the world in the darkest moments of my experienced manhood. But the university—this new life yielded me different feelings, and still commands a grateful reminiscence.

My father, who studied to foster in me every worldly feeling, sought all means which might tend to make me enamoured of that world to which he was devoted. An extravagant allowance, a lavish establishment, many servants, numerous horses were forced upon, rather than solicited by me. According to his system, he acted dexterously. My youthful brain could not be insensible to the brilliant position in which I was placed. I was now, indeed, my own master, and every thing around me announced that I could command a career flattering to the rising passions of my youth. I well remember the extreme self-complacency with which I surveyed my new apartments, how instantaneously I was wrapped up in all the mysteries of furniture, and how I seemed to have no other purpose in life than to play the honoured and honourable part of an elegant and accomplished host.

My birth, my fortune, my convivial habits, rallied around me the noble and the gay, the flower of our society. Joyously flew our careless hours, while we mimicked the magnificence of men. I had no thought but for the present moment. I discoursed only of dogs and horses, of fanciful habiliments and curious repasts. I astonished them by a new fashion, and decided upon the exaggerated charms of some ordinary female. How long the novelty of my life would have been productive of interest, I know not. An incident occurred which changed my habits.

A new professor arrived in the university. He was by birth a German. I attended, by an accident, his preliminary lecture on Grecian history. I had been hunting, and had suddenly returned home. Throwing my gown over my forest frock, I strolled, for the sake of change, into the theatre. I nodded, with a smile, to some of my acquaintance, I glanced with listlessness at their instructor. His abstracted look, the massiness of his scull, his large luminous eye, his long gray hair, his earnest and impassioned manner, struck me. He discoursed on that early portion of Grecian history which is entirely unknown. I was astonished at the fulness of his knowledge. That which to a common student appears but an inexplicable or barren tradition, became, in his magical mould, a record teeming with deep knowledge and picturesque interest. Hordes, who hitherto were only dimly distinguished wandering over the deserts of antiquity, now figured as great nations, multiplying in beautiful cities, and moving in the grand and progressive march of civilization; and I listened to animated narratives of their creeds, their customs, their manners, their philosophy, and their arts. I was deeply impressed with this mystical creation of a critical spirit. I was charmed with the blended profundity and imagination. I revelled in the sagacious audacity of his revolutionary theories. I yielded to the full spell of his archaic eloquence. The curtain was removed from the sacred shrine of antique ages, and an inspired prophet, ministering in the sanctuary, expounded the mysteries which had perplexed

PART THE SECOND.

I.

OUR schoolboy days are looked back to by all with fondness. Oppressed with the cares of life, the imperfect intelligence of their remote posterity.

The lecture ceased; I was the first who broke into plaudits; I advanced, I offered to our master my congratulations and my homage. Now that his office had finished, I found him the meekest, the most modest, and nervous being that ever trembled in society. With difficulty he would receive the respectful compliments even of his pupils. He bowed, and blushed, and disappeared. His reserve only the more interested me. I returned to my rooms, musing on the high matters of his discourse. Upon my table was a letter from one of my companions, full of ribald jests. I glanced at its uncomplimentary lines, and tossed it away unread. I fell into a reverie of Arcadian loveliness. A beautiful temple rose up in my mind like the temple in the picture of Winter. The door opened, a band of loose revellers burst into their accustomed gathering room. I was silent, reserved, cold, moody. Their inane observations amazed me. I shrank from their hollow tattle, and the gibberish of their foul slang. Their unmeaning, idiotic shouts of laughter tortured me. I knew not how to rid myself of their infernal presence. At length one offered me a bet. I rushed out of the chamber.

I did not stop until I reached the room of the professor. I found him buried in his books. He stared at my entrance. I apologized, I told him all I felt, all I wanted; the wretched life I was leading, my deep sympathy with his character, my infinite disgust at my own career, my unbounded love of knowledge, and admiration of himself.

The simplicity of the professor's character was not shocked by my frank enthusiasm. Had he been a man of the world, he would have been alarmed, lest my strong feeling and unusual conduct should have placed us both in a ridiculous position. On the contrary, without a moment's hesitation, he threw aside his papers, and opened his heart to all my wants. My imperfect knowledge of the Greek language was too apparent. Nothing could be done until I mastered it. He explained to me a novel and philosophical mode of acquiring a full acquaintance with it. As we proceeded in our conversation, he occasionally indicated the outlines of his grand system of metaphysics. I was fascinated by the gorgeous prospect of comprehending the unintelligible. The professor was gratified by the effect that his first effusion had produced. He was interested by the ardour of my mind. He was flattered in finding an enthusiastic votary in one whose mode of life had hitherto promised any thing but study, and whose position in society was perhaps an apology, if not a reason, for an irrational career.

I announced to my companions that I was going to read. They stared, they pitied me. Some deemed the avowal affectation, and trusted that increased frolic would repay them for the abstinence of a week of application. Fleming and his books was only a fresh instance of his studied eccentricity. But they were disappointed. I worked at Greek for nearly fourteen hours a-day, and at the end of a month I had gained a very ample acquaintance with the construction of the language, and a still fuller one of its signification. So much can be done by an ardent and willing spirit. I had been for six or seven years nominally a Greek student, and had learned nothing, and how many persons waste even six or seven more, and only find themselves in the same position!

I was amply rewarded for my toilsome effort. I felt the ennobling pride of learning. It is a fine thing to know that which is unknown to others, it is still more dignified to remember that we have gained it by our own energies. The struggle after knowledge too is full of delight. The intellectual chase, not less than the material one, brings fresh vigour to our pulses, and infinite palpitations of strange and sweet suspense. The idea that is gained with effort affords far greater satisfaction than that which is acquired with dangerous facility. We dwell with more fondness on the perfume of the flower that we have ourselves tended, than on the odour which we cull with carelessness, and cast away without remorse. The strength and sweetness of our knowledge depend upon the impression which it makes upon our own minds. It is the liveliness of the ideas that it affords, which renders research so fascinating, so that a trifling fact or deduction, when discovered or worked out by our own brain, affords us infinitely greater pleasure than a more important truth obtained by the exertions of another.

I thought only of my books; I was happy, I was quite emancipated from my painful selfism. My days passed in unremitting study. My love of composition unconsciously developed itself. My note-books speedily filled, and my annotations soon swelled into treatises. Insensibly I had become an author. I wrote with facility, for I was master of my subject. I was fascinated with the expanding of my own mind. I resolved to become a great historical writer. Without intention, I fixed upon subjects in which imagination might assist erudition. I formed gigantic schemes which many lives could not have accomplished: yet I was sanguine I should achieve all. I mused over an original style which was to blend profound philosophy, and deep learning, and brilliant eloquence. The nature of man, and the origin of nations, were to be expounded in glowing sentences of oracular majesty.

Suddenly the university announced a gold medal for the writer of the ablest treatise upon the Dorian people. The subject delighted me. Similar ones had already engaged my notice. I determined to be a candidate.

I shut myself up from all human beings; I collected all the variety of information that I could glean from the most ancient authors, and the rarest modern treatises. I moulded the crude matter into luminous order. A theory sprang out of the confused mass like light out of chaos. The moment of composition commenced. I wrote the first sentence while in chapel, and under the influence of music. It sounded like the organ that inspired it. The whole was composed in my head before I committed it to paper,—composed in my daily rides, and while pacing my chamber at midnight. The action of my body seemed to lend vitality to my mind.

Never shall I forget the moment when I finished the last sentence of my fair copy, and, sealing it, consigned it with a motto to the principal. It was finished, and at the very instant, my mind seemed exhausted, my power vanished. The excitement had ceased. I dashed into the forest, and throwing myself under a tree, passed the first of many days that flew away in perfect indolence, and vague and unmeaning reverie.

In spite of my great plans, which demanded the devotion of a life, and were to command the admiration of a grateful and enlightened world, I was so anxious about the fate of my prize essay, that all my occupations suddenly ceased. I could do nothing. I could only think of sentences which might have been more musical, and deductions which might have been more logically true. Now that it was finished, I felt its imperfectness. Week after week I grew more desponding, and the very morning of the decision I had entirely discarded all hope.

It was announced: the medal was awarded,—and to me. Amid the plaudits of a crowded theatre, I recited my triumphant essay. Full of victory, my confident voice lent additional euphony to the flowing sentence, and my bright, firm eye added to the acuteness of my reasoning, and enforced the justice of my theory. I was entirely satisfied. No passage seemed weak. Noble, wealthy, the son of the minister, congratulations came thick upon me. The seniors complimented each other on such an example to the students. I was the idol of the university. The essay was printed, lavishly praised in all the journals, and its author, full of youth and promise, anticipated as the future ornament of his country. I returned to my father in a blaze of glory.

II.

I ADDRESSED him with the confidence that I was now a man, and a distinguished one. My awe of his character had greatly worn off. I was most cordial to the baroness, but a slight strain of condescension was infused into my courtesy. I had long ceased to view her with dislike: on the contrary, I had even become her protégé. That was now over. We were not less warm, but I was now the protector, and if there was a slight indication of pique, or a chance ebullition of temper, instead of their calling forth any simultaneous sentiments on my side, I only bowed with deference to her charms, or mildly smiled on the engaging weaknesses of the inferior sex. I was not less self-conceited or less affected than before, but my self-conceit and my affectation were of a nobler nature. I did not consider myself a less finished member of society, but I was also equally proud of being the historiographer of the Dorians. I was never gloomy. I was never in repose. Self-satisfaction sparkled on my countenance, and my carriage was agitated with the earnestness and the excitement with which I busied myself with the trivial and the trite. My father smiled, half with delight and half with humour, upon my growing consciousness of importance, and introduced me to his friends with increased satisfaction. He even listened to me while, one day after dinner, I disserted upon the Pelasgi, but when he found that I believed in innate ideas, he thought my self-delusion began to grow serious.

As he was one of those men who believe that directly to oppose a person in his opinions is a certain mode of confirming him in his error, he attacked me by a masked battery. Affecting no want of interest in my pursuits, he said to me one day, in a very careless tone, "Contarini, I am no great friend to reading, but as you have a taste that way, if I were you, during the vacation, I would turn over Voltaire."

Now I had never read any thing of Voltaire's. The truth is, I had no very great opinion of the philosopher of Ferney, for my friend the professor assured me that Voltaire knew nothing of the Dorians, that his Hebrew also was invariably incorrect, and that he was altogether a very superficial person,—but I chanced to follow my father's counsel.

I stood before the hundred volumes; I glanced with indifference upon the wondrous and witching shelf. History, poetry, philosophy, the lucid narrative, and the wild invention, and the unimpassioned truth—they were all before me, and with my ancient weakness for romance I drew out Zadig. Never shall I forget the effect this work produced on me. What I had been long seeking offered itself. This strange mixture of brilliant fantasy and poignant truth, this unrivalled blending of ideal creation and worldly wisdom—it all seemed to speak to my two natures. I wandered a poet in the streets of Babylon, or on the banks of the Tigris. A philosopher and a statesman, I moralized over the condition of man and the nature of government. The style enchanted me. I delivered myself up to the full abandonment of its wild and brilliant grace.

I devoured them all, volume after volume. Morning, and night, and noon, a volume was ever my companion. I ran to it after my meals, it reposed under my pillow. As I read, I roared, I laughed, I shouted with wonder and admiration, I trembled with indignation at the fortunes of my race, my bitter smile sympathized with searching ridicule and withering mockery.

Pedants, and priests, and tyrants, the folios of dunces, the fires of inquisitors, and the dungeons of kings, and the long, dull system of imposture and misrule, that had sat like a gloating incubus on the fair neck of nature, and all our ignorance, and all our weakness, and all our folly, and all our infinite imperfection—I looked round—I thought of the dissertation of the Dorians, and I considered myself the most contemptible of my wretched species.

I returned to the university: I rallied round me my old companions, whom I had discarded in a fit of disgusting pedantry. But not now merely to hold high revels. The goblet indeed still encircled, but a bust of the author of "Candide" over the head of the president, warned us, with a smile of prophetic derision, not to debase ourselves, and if we drank deep, our potations were perhaps necessary to refresh the inexperienced efforts of such novices in philosophy. Yet we made way: even the least literary read the romances, or parts of the Philosophical Dictionary: the emancipation of our minds was rapidly effecting, we entirely disembarrassed ourselves of prejudice, we tried every thing by the test of first principles, and finally we resolved ourselves into a Secret Union for the Amelioration of Society.

Of this institution I had the honour of being elected president by acclamation. My rooms were the point of meeting. The members were in number twelve, chiefly my equals in rank and fortune. One or two of them were youths of talents, and not wholly untinctured by letters; the rest were ardent, delighted with the novelty of what they did and heard, and, adopting our thoughts, arrived at conclusions the truth of which they did not doubt.

My great reputation at the university long prevented these meetings from being viewed with sus vision, and when the revolutionary nature of our opinions occasionally developed itself in a disregard for the authorities by some of our society, who perhaps considered such license as the most delightful portion of the new philosophy, my interest often succeeded in stifling a public explosion. In course of time, however, the altered tenor of my own conduct could no longer be concealed. My absence from lectures had long been overlooked, from the conviction that the time thus gained was devoted to the profundity of private study; but the systematic assembly at my rooms of those who were most eminent for their disregard of discipline, and their neglect of study, could no longer be treated with inattention, and after several intimations from inferior officers, I was summoned to the presence of the High Principal.

This great personage was a clear-headed, cold-minded, unmanageable individual. I could not cloud his intellect, or control his purpose. My ever-successful sophistry, and my ever-fluent speech failed. At the end of every appeal, he recurred to his determination to maintain the discipline of the university, and repeated with firmness that this was the last time our violation of it should be privately noticed. I returned to my rooms in a dark rage. My natural impatience of control and hatred of responsibility, which had been kept off of late years by the fondness of society, which developed itself with my growing passions, came back upon me. I cursed authority, I paced my room like Cataline.

At this moment my accustomed companions assembled. They were ignorant of what had passed, but they seemed to me to look like conspirators. Moody and ferocious, I headed the table, and filling a bumper, I drank confusion to all government. They were surprised at such a novel commencement, for, in general, we only arrived at this great result by the growing and triumphant truths of a long evening, but they received my proposition, as indeed they ever did, with a shout.

The wine warmed me. I told them all. I even exaggerated in my rage the annoying intelligence. I described our pleasant meetings about to cease for ever. I denounced the iniquitous system which would tear us from the pursuit of real knowledge and ennobling truths—knowledge that illuminated, and truths that should support the destinies of existing man—to the deplorable and disgusting study of a small collection of imperfect volumes, written by Greeks, and preserved by Goths. It was bitter to think that we must part. Surely society, cruel society, would too soon sever the sweet and agreeable ties that bound our youth. Why should we be parted ever? Why, in pursuance of an unnatural system, abhorred by all of us—why were we to be dispersed and sent forth to delude the world in monstrous disguises of priests, and soldiers, and statesmen? Out upon such hypocrisy! A curse light upon the craven knave who would not struggle for his salvation from such a monotonous and degrading doon. The world was before us. Let us seize it in our prime. Let us hasten away—let us form a society in some inviolate solitude founded upon the eternal principles of truth and justice. Let us fly from the feudal system. Nobles and wealthy, let us cast our titles to the winds, and our dross to the earth which produced it. Let us pride ourselves only on the gifts of nature, and exist only on her beneficence.

I ceased, and three loud rounds of cheering announced to the High Principal and all his slaves that we had not yet yielded.

We drank deep. A proposition came forth with the wine of every glass. We all talked of America. Already we viewed ourselves in a primeval forest, existing by the chase, to which many of us were devoted. The very necessary toil of life seemed, in such an existence, to consist of what, in this worn-out world, was considered the choicest pastime and the highest pleasure. And the rich climate, and the simple manners, and the intelligible laws, and the fair aborigines, who must be attracted by such interesting strangers—all hearts responded to the glowing vision. I alone was grave and thoughtful. The remembrance of Master Frederick and the Venetian expedition, although now looked back to as a childish serape, rendered me nevertheless the most practical of the party. I saw immediately the invincible difficulty of our reaching with success such a distant land. I lamented the glorious times when the forests of our own northern land could afford an asylum to the brave and free.

The young Count de Pahlen was a great hunter. Wild in his life, and daring in his temper, he possessed, at the same time, a lively and not uncultivated intellect. He had a great taste for poetry, and, among other accomplishments, was an excellent actor. He rose up as I spoke, like a volcano out of the sea. "I have it, Fleming, I have it!" he shouted, with a dancing eye and exulting voice. "You know the great forest of Jonsterna. Of en have I hunted in it. The forest near us is but, as it were, a huge root of that vast woodland. Nearly in its centre is an ancient and crumbling castle, which, like all old ruins, is of course haunted. No peasant dare approach it. At its very mention the face of the forest-farmer will grow grave and serious. Let us fly to it. Let us become the scaring-ghosts whom all avoid. We shall be from man—we shall live only for ourselves—we—" but his proposition was drowned in our excited cheers, and rising together, we all pledged a sacred vow to stand or fall by each other in this great struggle for freedom and for nature.

The night passed in canvassing plans to render this mighty scheme practicable. The first point was to baffle all inquiries after our place of refuge, and to throw all pursuers off the scent. We agreed that on a certain day, in small and separate parties, we should take our way by different routes to the old castle, which we calculated was about sixty miles distant. Each man was to bear with him a rifle, a sword, and pistols, a travelling cloak, his knapsack, and as much ammunition as he could himself carry. Our usual hunting dress afforded an excellent uniform, and those who were without it were immediately to supply themselves. We were to quit the university without notice, and each of us on the same day was to write to his friends, to notify his sudden departure on a pedestrian tour in Norway. Thus we calculated to gain time, and effectually to baffle pursuit.

In spite of our lavish allowances, as it ever happens among young men, money was wanted. All that we possessed was instantly voted a common stock, but several men required rifles, and the funds were deficient. I called for a crucible: I opened a cabinet: I drew out my famous gold medal. I gazed at it for a moment, and the classic cheer.

amid which it had been awarded seemed to rise upon my ear. I dashed away the recollection, and in a few minutes the splendid reward of my profound researches was melting over the fire, and affording the means of our full equipment.

III.

It was the fourth morning of our journey. My companion was Ulric de Brahe. He was my only junior among the band, delicate of frame and affectionate in disposition, though hasty if excited, but my enthusiastic admirer. He was my great friend, and I was almost as intent to support him under the great fatigue, as about the success of our enterprise. I had bought a donkey in our progress of a farmer, and loaded it with a couple of kegs of the brandy of the country. We had travelled the last two days entirely in the forest, passing many farmhouses, and several villages, and as we believed, were now near our point of rendezvous. I kicked on the donkey before me, and smiled on Ulric. I would have carried his rifle, as well as my own, but his ardent temper and devoted love maintained him, and when I expressed any anxiety about his toil, he only laughed, and redoubled his pace.

We were pushing along an old turf road cut through the thick woods, when suddenly, at the end of a side vista, I beheld the tower of a castle. "Jonsterna!" I shouted, and I ran forward without the donkey. It was more distant than it appeared, but at length we came to a large piece of clear land, and at the other side of it we beheld the long-dreamt-of building. It was a vast structure, rather dilapidated than ruined. With delight I observed a human being moving upon the keep, whom I recognised by his uniform to be one of us, and as we approached nearer we distinguished two or three of our comrades stretched upon the turf. They all jumped up and ran forward to welcome us. How heartily we shook hands, and congratulated each other on our reunion! More than half were already assembled. All had contrived, besides their own equipments, to bring something for the common stock. There was plenty of bread, and brandy, and game. Some were already out collecting wood. Before noon the rest arrived, except Pahlen and his comrade. And they came at last, and we received them with a cheer, for the provident vice-president, like an ancient warrior, was seated in a cart. "Do not suppose that I am done up, my boys," said the gay dog, "I have brought gunpowder."

When we had all assembled we rushed into the castle, and, in the true spirit of boyhood, examined every thing. There was a large knights'-hall, covered with tapestry, and tattered banners. This was settled to be our chief apartment. We even found a huge oak table, and some other rude and ancient furniture. We appointed committees of examination. Some surveyed the cellars and dungeons, some the out-buildings. We were not afraid of ghosts, but marvellously fearful that we might have been anticipated by some human beings, as wild and less philosophical than ourselves. It was a perfect solitude. We cleared and cleaned out the hall, lighted an immense fire, arranged our stores, appointed their keeper, made beds with our cloaks, piled our arms, and cooked our dinner. An hour after sunset our first meal was prepared, and the Secret Union for the Amelioration of Society resumed their sittings almost in a savage state.

I shall never forget the scene, and the proud exultation with which I beheld it. The vast and antique hall, the mystic tapestry, moving and moaning with every gust of the windy night—the deep shades of the distant corners, the flickering light flung by the blazing hearth, and the huge pine torches, the shining arms, the rude but plenteous banquet, the picturesque revellers, and I their president, with my sword pressing on a frame ready to dare all things. "This, this is existence," I exclaimed. "O! let us live by our own right arms, and let no law be stronger than our swords!"

I was even surprised by the savage yell of exultation with which my almost unconscious exclamation was received. But we were like young tigers, who, for a moment tamed, had for the first time tasted blood, and rushed back to their own natures. A band of philosophers, we had insensibly placed ourselves in the most antiphilosophical position. Flying from the feudal system, we had, unawares, taken refuge in its favourite haunt. All our artificial theories of universal benevolence vanished. We determined to be what fortune had suddenly made us. We discarded the abstract truths which had in no age of the world ever been practised, and were, of course, therefore impracticable. We smiled at our ignorance of human nature and ourselves. The Secret Union for the Amelioration of Society suddenly turned into a corps of bandits, and their philosophical president was voted their captain.

IV.

It was midnight. They threw themselves upon their rough couches, that they might wake fresh with the morning. Fatigue and brandy in a few minutes made them deep slumberers, but I could not sleep. I flung a log upon the fire, and paced the hall in deep communion with my own thoughts. The rubicon was passed. Farewell my father, farewell my step-country, farewell literary invention, maudlin substitute for a poetic life, farewell effeminate arts of morbid civilization! From this moment I ceased to be a boy. I was surrounded by human beings, bold and trusty, who looked only to my command, and I was to direct them to danger, and guide them through peril. No child's game was this, no ideal play. We were at war, and at war with mankind.

I formed my plans, I organized the whole system. Action must be founded on knowledge. I would have no crude abortive efforts. Our colossal thoughts should not degenerate into a frolic. Before we commenced our career of violence, I was determined that I would have a thorough acquaintance with the country. Every castle and every farmhouse should be catalogued. I longed for a map, that I might muse over it like a general. I looked upon our good arms with complacency. I rejoiced that most of us were cunning of fence. I determined that they should daily exercise with the broadsword, and that each should become a dead shot with his rifle. In the perfection of our warlike accomplishments, I sought a substitute for the weakness of our numbers.

The morning at length broke. I was not the least fatigued. I longed to commence my arrangements. It grew very cold. I slept for an hour. I was the first awake. I determined in future to have a constant guard. I roused Pahlen. He looked fierce in his sleep. I rejoiced in his determined visage. I appointed him my lieutenant. I impressed upon him how much I depended upon his energy. We lighted an immense fire, arranged the chamber, and prepared their meal before any woke. I was determined that their resolution should be supported by the comfort which they found around them. I felt that cold and hunger are great sources of cowardice.

They arose in high spirits. Every thing seemed delightful. The morn appeared only a continuation of the enjoyment of the evening. When they were emboldened by a good meal, I developed to them my plans. I ordered Ulric de Brahe to be first on guard, a duty from which no one was to be exempt but Pahlen and myself. The post was the tower, which had given me the first earnest of their fealty in assembling. No one could now approach the castle without being perceived, and we took measures that the guard should be perfectly concealed. Parties were then ordered out in different directions, who were all to bring their report by the evening banquet. Pahlen alone was to repair to a more distant town, and to be absent four days. He took his cart, and we contrived to dress him as like a peasant as our wardrobe would permit. His purpose was to obtain different costumes, which were necessary for our enterprise. I remained with two of my men, and worked at the interior arrangements of our dwelling.

Thus passed a week, and each day the courage of my band became more inflamed. They panted for action. We were in want of meal. I determined to attack a farmer's grange on the ensuing eve, and I resolved to head the enterprise myself. I took with me Ulric and three others. We arrived an hour before sunset at the devoted settlement. It had been already well reconnoitred. Robberies in this country were unknown. We had to encounter no precautions. We passed the door of the granary, rifled it, stored our cart, and escaped without a dog barking. We returned two hours before midnight, and the excitement of this evening I never shall forget. All were bursting with mad enthusiasm. I alone looked grave, as if every thing depended upon my mind. It was astonishing the influence, that this assumption of seriousness, in the midst of their wild mirth, already produced upon my companions. I was indeed their chief. They placed in me unbounded confidence, and almost viewed me as a being of another order.

I sent off Pahlen the next day in the disguise of a pedlar to a neighbouring village. The robbery was the topic of universal conversation. Everybody was astounded, and no one was suspected. I determined, however, not to hazard in a hurry another enterprise in the neighbourhood. We wanted nothing except wine. Our guns each day procured us meat, and the farmer's meal was a plentiful source of bread. Necessity develops much talent. Already one of our party was pronounced an excellent cook; and the last fellow in the world we should ever have suspected, put an old oven into perfect order, and turned out a most ingenious mechanic.

It was necessary to make a diversion in a distant part of the forest. I sent out my lieutenant with a strong party. They succeeded in driving home from a very rich farm four fine cows in milk. This was a great addition to our luxuries, and Pahlen, remaining behind, paid in disguise an observatory visit to another village in the vicinity, and brought us home the gratifying intelligence, that it was scouted that the robbers were a party from a town far away on the other side of the forest.

These causes of petty plundering prepared my band for the deeper deeds which I always contemplated. Parties were now out for days together. We began to be familiar with every square mile of country. Through this vast forest-land, but much removed from the castle, ran a high road on which there was great traffic. One evening, as Ulric and myself were prowling in this neighbourhood, we perceived a band of horsemen approaching. They were cloth-merchants, returning from a great fair, eight in number, but only one or two armed, and merely with pistols. A cloth-merchant's pistol, that had been probably loaded for years, and was borne, in all likelihood, by a man who would tremble at its own fire, did not appear a very formidable weapon. The idea occurred to both of us simultaneously. We put on our masks, and one of us ran out of each side of the road, and seized the bridle of the foremost horseman. I never saw a man so astonished in my life. He was, perhaps, even more astonished than afraid. But we gave them no time. I can scarcely describe the scene. There was dismounting, and the opening of the saddle-bags, and the clinking of coin. I remember wishing them good-night in the civilest tone possible, and then we were alone.

I stared at Ulric, Ulric stared at me, and then we burst into a loud laugh, and danced about the road. I quite lost my presence of mind, and rejoiced that no one but my favourite friend was present to witness my unheroic conduct. We had a couple of forest ponies, that we had driven home one day from a friendly farmer, tied up in an adjoining wood. We ran to them, jumped on, and scampered away without stopping for five or six hours, at least I think so, for it was an hour after sunset before the robbery was committed, and it was the last hour of the moon before we reached our haunt.

"The captain is come, the captain is come," was a sound that always summoned my band; fresh faggots were thrown on the fire, beakers of wine and brandy placed on the tables. I called for Pahlen and my pipe, flung myself on my seat, and dashing the purses upon the board, "Here," I said, "my boys, here is our first gold."

V.

THIS affair of the cloth-merchants made us quite mad. Four parties were stopped in as many days. For any of our companions to return without booty, or what was much more prized, without an adventure, was considered flat treason. Our whole band was now seldom assembled. The travellers to the fair were a never-failing source of profit.

Each day we meditated bolder exploits, and understanding that a wedding was about to take place at a neighbouring castle, I resolved to surprise the revellers in their glory, and capture the bride.

One evening, as seated in an obscure corner of the hall, I was maturing my plans for this great achievement, and most of my companions were assembled at their meal, Pahlen unexpectedly returned. He was evidently much fatigued. He panted for breath, he was covered with sweat and dirt, his dress was torn and soiled, he reached the table with staggering steps, and seizing a mighty flask of Rhenish, emptied it at a draught.

"Where is the captain?" he anxiously inquired.

I advanced. He seized me by the arm, and led me out of the chamber.

"A strong party of police and military have entered the forest. They have taken up their quarters at a town not ten miles off. Their orders to discover our band are peremptory. Every spot is to be searched, and the castle will be the first. Not daring to return by our usual route, I have fought my way through the uncut woods. You must decide to-night. What will you do?"

"Their strength?"

"A company of infantry, a party of rangers, and a sufficiently stout body of police. Resistance is impossible."

"It seems so."

"And escape, unless we fly at once. To-morrow we shall be surrounded."

"The devil!"

"I wish to heaven we were once more in your rooms, Fleming!"

"Why, it would be as well! But, for Heaven's sake, be calm. If we quaver, what will the rest do? Let us summon our energies. Is concealment impossible? The dungeons?"

"Every hole will most assuredly be searched."

"An ambush might destroy them. We must fight if they run us to bay."

"Poh!"

"Blow up the castle, then!"

"And ourselves?"

"Well?"

"Heavens! what a madman you are! It was all you, Fleming, that got us in this infernal scrape. Why the devil should we become robbers, whom society has evidently intended to be robbed?"

"You are poignant, Pahlen. Come, let us to our friends." I took him by the arm, and we entered the hall together.

"Gentlemen," I said, "my lieutenant brings important intelligence. A strong party of military and police have entered the forest to discover and secure us. They are twenty to one, and therefore too strong for open combat; the castle cannot stand an hour's siege, and ambush, although it might prove successful, and gain us time, will eventually only render our escape more difficult, and our stay here impossible. I propose, therefore, that we should disperse for a few days, and before our departure, take heed that no traces of recent residence are left in this building. If we succeed in baffling their researches, we can again assemble here, or, which I conceive will be more prudent and more practicable, meet once more only to arrange our plans for our departure to another and a more distant country. We have ample funds, we can purchase a ship. Mingling with the crew as amateurs, we shall soon gain sufficient science. A new career is before us. The Baltic leads to the Mediterranean. Think of its blue waters, and beaming skies, its archipelagoes, and picturesque inhabitants. We have been bandits in a northern forest, let us now become pirates on a southern sea!"

No sympathetic cheer followed this eloquent appeal. There was a deep, dull, dead, dismal silence. I watched them narrowly. All looked with fixed eyes upon the table. I stood with folded arms. The foot of Pahlen nervously patting against the ground was the only sound. At length, one by one, each dared to gaze upon another, and tried to read his fellow's thoughts. They could, without difficulty, detect the lurking, but terrible alarm.

"Well, gentlemen," I said, "time presses, I still trust I am your captain!"

"O! Fleming, Fleming," exclaimed the cook, with a broken voice and most piteous aspect, and dropping my title, which hitherto had been scrupulously observed, "How can you go on so! It is quite dreadful!"

There was an assenting murmur.

"I am sure," continued the artiste, whom I always knew was the greatest coward of the set, "I am sure I never thought it would come to this. I thought it was only a frolic. I have got led on, I am sure I do not know how. But you have such a way! What will our fathers think? Robbers! How horrible! And then suppose we are shot! O, Lord! what will our mothers say! And after all we are only a parcel of boys, and did it out of fun. O! what shall I do?"

The grave looks with which this comic ebullition was received, proved that the sentiments, however undignified in their delivery, were congenial to the band. The orator was emboldened by not being laughed at for the first time in his life, and proceeded—

"I am sure I think we had better give ourselves up, and then our families might get us through. We can tell the truth. We can say we only did it for fun, and can give up the money, and as much more as they like. I do not think they would hang us. Do you? Oh!"

"The-devil take the hindmost," said the young Count Bornholm, rising, "I am off. It will go hard if they arrest me, because I am out sporting with my gun, and if they do, I will give them my name, and then I should like to see them stop me."

"That will be best," all eagerly exclaimed, and rose. "Let us all disperse, each alone with his gun."

"Let us put out the fire," said the cook; "they may see the light."

"What, without windows?" said Bornholm.

"O! these police see every thing. What shall I do with the kettles? We shall all get detected. To think it should come to this! Shot! perhaps hung! Oh!"

"Throw every thing down the well," said Pahlen, "money and all."

Now I knew it was over. I had waited to hear Pahlen's voice, and I now saw it was all up. I was not sorry. I felt the inextricable difficulties in which we were involved, and what annoyed me most was, that I had hitherto seen no mode of closing my part with dignity.

"Gentlemen," I said, "as long as you are still within these walls, I am still your captain. You desert me, but I will not disgrace you. Fly then, fly to your schools and homes, to your affectionate parents and your dutiful tutors. I should have known with whom I leagued myself. I at least am not a boy, and although now a leader without followers, I will still, for the honour of my race, and of the world in which we breathe, I will still believe that I may find trustier bosoms, and pursue a more eminent career."

Ulric de Brahe rushed forward and placed himself by my side,—“Fleming,” he said, “I will never desert you!”

I pressed his hand with the warmth it deserved, but the feeling of solitude had come over me. I wished to be alone. “No, Ulric,” I replied, “we must part. I will tie no one to my broken fortunes. And my friends all, let us not part in bitterness. Excuse me if, in a moment of irritation, I said aught that was unkind to those I love, depreciating to those whose conduct I have ever had cause to admire. Some splendid hours we have passed together, some brief moments of gay revel, and glorious daring, and sublime peril. We must part. I will believe that our destiny, and not our will, separates us. My good sword,” I exclaimed, and I drew it from my scabbard, “in future you shall belong to the bravest of the brave,” and kissing it I presented it to Pahlen. “And now one brimming cup to the past. Pledge me all, and, in spite of every danger, with a merry face.”

Each man quaffed the goblet till it was dry, and performed the supernaculum, and then I walked to a distant part of the hall, whispering, as I passed Pahlen, “See that every thing necessary is done.”

The castle well was the general receptacle for all our goods and plunder. In a few minutes the old hall presented almost the same appearance as on our arrival. The fire was extinguished. Every thing disappeared. By the light of a solitary torch, each man took his rifle, and his knapsack, and his cloak, and then we were about to disperse. I shook hands with each. Ulric de Brahe lingered behind, and once more whispered his earnest desire to accompany me. But I forbade him, and he quitted me rather irritated.

I was alone. In a few minutes, when I believed that all had gone forth, I came out. Ere I departed, I stopped before the old castle, and gazed upon it in the gray moonlight. The mighty pines rose tall and black into the dark blue air. All was silent. The beauty and the stillness blended with my tumultuous emotions, and in a moment I dashed into poetry. Forgetting the imminent danger in which my presence in this spot, even my voice, might involve me, I poured forth my passionate farewell to the wild scene of my wilder life. I found a fierce solace in this expression of my heart. I discovered a substitute for the excitement of action in the excitement of thought. Deprived of my castle and my followers, I fled to my ideal world for refuge. There I found them—a forest far wilder and more extensive, a castle far more picturesque and awful, a band infinitely more courageous and more true. My imagination supported me under my overwhelming mortification. Crowds of characters, and incidents, and passionate scenes, clustered to my brain. Again I acted, again I gave the prompt decision, again I supplied the never-failing expedient, again we revelled, fought, and plundered.

It was midnight, when wrapping himself in his cloak, and making a bed of fern, the late Lord of Jonsterna betook himself to his solitary slumber beneath the wide canopy of heaven.

VI.

I rose with the sun, and the first thought that occurred to me was to write a tragedy. The castle in the forest, the Protean Pahlen, the tender-hearted Ulric, the craven cook, who was to be the traitor to betray the all-interesting and marvellous hero, myself—here was material. What soliloquies, what action, what variety of character! I threw away my cloak, it wearied me, and walked on, waving my arm, and spouting a scene, I longed for the moment that I could deliver to an imperishable scroll these vivid creations of my fancy. I determined to make my way to the nearest town, and record these strong conceptions, ere the fire of my feelings died away. I was suddenly challenged by the advanced guard of a party of soldiers. They had orders to stop all travellers, and bring them to their commanding officer. I accordingly repaired to their chief.

I had no fear as to the result. I should affect to be a travelling student, and in case of any difficulty, I had determined to confide to the officer my name. But this was unnecessary. I went through my examination with such a confident air that nothing was suspected, and I was permitted to proceed. This was the groundwork for a new incident, and in the third act I instantly introduced a visit in disguise to the camp of the enemy.

I refreshed myself at a farmhouse, where I found some soldiers billeted. I was amused with being the subject of their conversation, and felt my importance. As I thought, however, it was but prudent to extricate myself from the forest without any unnecessary loss of time, I took my way towards its skirts, and continued advancing in that direction for several days, until I found myself in a country with which I was unacquainted. I had now gained the open country. Emerging from the straggling woodland one afternoon, about an hour before sunset, I found myself in a highly cultivated and beautiful land. A small, but finely formed lake spread before me, covered with wild fowl. On its opposite side rose a gentle acclivity, richly wooded, and crowned by a magnificent castle. The declining sun shed a beautiful warm light over the proud building, and its park, and gardens, and the surrounding land, which was covered with orchards, and small fields of tall golden grain.

The contrast of all this civilization and beauty with the recent scene of my savage existence, was very striking. I leaned in thought upon my rifle, and it occurred to me that also, in my dark work, although indeed its characteristic was the terrible, there too should be something sunny, and fresh, and fair. For if in nature, and in life, man finds these changes so delightful, so also should it be in the ideal and the poetic. And the thought of a heroine came into my mind. And while my heart was softened by the remembrance of woman, and the long repressed waters of my passionate affections came gushing through the stern rocks that had so long beat them away, a fanciful and sparkling equipage appeared advancing at a rapid pace to the castle. A light and brilliant carriage, drawn by four beautiful gray horses, and the chasseur in a hussar dress, and the caracoling outriders, announced a personage of distinction. They advanced, the road ran by my feet. As they approached, I perceived that there was only a lady in the carriage. I could not distinguish much, but my heart was prophetic of her charms. The carriage was within five yards of me. Never had I beheld so beautiful and sumptuous a creature. A strange feeling came over me, the carriage and the riders suddenly stopped, and its mistress, starting from her seat, exclaimed almost shouted, “Contarini! surely Contarini!”

VII.

I rushed forward, I seized her, extended hand, the voice called back the sweetness of the past, my memory struggled through the mist of many years—"Christiana!"

I had seen her once or twice since the golden age of our early loves, but not of late. I had heard too, that she had married, and heard it with a pang. Her husband, Count Norberg, I now learned, was the lord of the castle before us. I gave a hurried explanation of my presence—a walking tour, a sporting excursion, any thing did, while I held her sweet hand, and gazed upon her sparkling face.

I gave my gun and knapsack to an attendant, and jumped into the carriage. So many questions uttered in so kind a voice, I never felt happier. Our drive lasted only a few minutes, yet it was long enough for Christiana to tell me, a thousand times, how rejoiced she was to meet me, and how determined that I should be her guest.

We dashed through the castle gates. We alighted. I led her through the hall, up the lofty staircase, and into a suit of saloons. No one was there. She ran with me up stairs, would herself point out to me my room, and was wild with glee. "I have not time to talk now, Contarini. We dine in an hour. I will dress as fast as I can, and then we shall meet in the drawing-room."

I was alone, I threw myself into a chair, and uttered a deep sigh. It even surprised me, for I felt at this moment very happy. The servant entered with my limited wardrobe. I tried to make myself look as much like a man of the world, and as little like a bandit as possible; but I was certainly more picturesque than splendid. When I had dressed, I forgot to descend, and leaned over the mantel-piece, gazing on the empty stove. The remembrance of my boyhood overpowered me. I thought of the garden in which we had first met, of her visit to me in the dark, to solace my despair; I asked myself why, in her presence, every thing seemed beautiful, and I felt happy?

Some one tapped at the door. "Are you ready?" said the voice of voices. I opened the door, and taking her hand, we exchanged looks of joyful love, and descended together.

We entered the saloon; she led me up to a middle-aged but graceful personage; she introduced me to her husband, as the oldest and dearest of her friends. There were several other gentlemen in the room, who had come to enjoy the chase with their host, but no ladies. We dined at a round table, and I was seated by Christiana. The conversation ran almost entirely on the robbers, of whom I heard the most romantic and ridiculous accounts. I asked the countess how she should like to be the wife of a bandit chief?

"I hardly know what I should do," she answered playfully, "were I to meet with some of those interesting ruffians of whom we occasionally read; but I fear in this age of reality, these sentimental heroes would be difficult to discover."

"Yes, I have no doubt," said a young nobleman opposite, "that if we could detect this very captain, of whom we have daily heard such interesting details, we should find him to be nothing better than a decayed innkeeper, or a broken subaltern at the best."

"You think so?" I replied. "In this age we are as prone to disbelieve in the extraordinary, as we were once eager to credit it. I differ with you about the subject of our present discussion, nor do I believe him to be by any means a common character."

My remark attracted general observation. I spoke in a confident, but slow and serious tone. I wished to impress on Christiana that I was no longer a child.

"But may I ask on what grounds you have formed your opinion?" said the count.

"Principally upon my own observation," I replied.

"Your own observation!" exclaimed my host. "What! have you seen him?"

"Yes."

They would have thought me joking had I not looked so grave, but my serious air ill accorded with their smiles.

"I was with him in the forest," I continued, "and had considerable conversation with him. I even accompanied him to his launt, and witnessed his assembled band."

"Are you serious!" all exclaimed. The countess was visibly interested.

"But were you not very much frightened?" she inquired.

"Why should I be frightened?" I answered; "a solitary student offered but poor prey. He would have passed me unnoticed, had I not sought his acquaintance, and he was a sufficiently good judge of human nature speedily to discover that I was not likely to betray him."

"And what sort of a man is he?" asked the young noble. "Is he young?"

"Very."

"Well! I think this is the most extraordinary incident that ever happened!" observed the count.

"It is most interesting," added the countess.

"Whatever may be his rank or appearance, it is all up with him by this time," remarked an old gentleman.

"I doubt it," I replied, mild, but firm.

"Doubt it! I tell you what, if you were a little older, and knew this forest as well as I do, you would see that his escape is impossible. Never were such arrangements. There is not a square foot of ground that will not be scoured, and stations left on every cross-road. I was with the commanding officer only yesterday. He cannot escape."

"He cannot escape," echoed a hitherto silent guest, who was a great sportsman. "I will bet any sum he is taken before the week is over."

"If it would not shock our fair hostess, Count Prater," I rejoined, "rest assured you should forfeit your stake."

My host and his guests exchanged looks, as if to ask each other who was this very young man who talked with such coolness on such very extraordinary subjects. But they were not cognizant of the secret cause of this exhibition. I wished to introduce myself as a man to the countess. I wished her to associate my name with something of a more exalted nature than our nursery romance. I did not, indeed, desire that she should conceive that I was less sensible to her influence, but I was determined that she should feel her influence was exercised over no ordinary being. I felt that my bold move had already in part succeeded. I more than once caught her eye, and read the blended feelings of astonishment and interest with which she listened to me.

"Well! perhaps he may be taken in a week," said the betting Count Prater; "it would be annoying to lose my wager by an hour."

"Say a fortnight, then," said the young nobleman.

"A fortnight, a year, an age, what you please," observed.

"You will bet, then, that he will not be taken?" asked Count Prater, eagerly.

"I will bet that the expedition retires in despair," I replied.

"Well! what shall it be?" asked the count, feeling he had an excellent bet, and yet fearful from my youthful appearance, our host might deem it but delicate to insure its being a light one.

"O! what you please," I replied; "I seldom bet, but when I do, I care not how high the stake may be."

"Five, or fifty, or, if you please, five hundred dollars?" suggested the count.

"Five thousand, if you like."

"We are very moderate men here, baron," said our host with a smile, "you university heroes frighten us."

"Well, then," I exclaimed, pointing to the countess's left arm, "you see this ruby bracelet? the loser shall supply its fellow."

"Bravo!" said the young nobleman, and Prater was forced to consent.

A great many questions were now asked about the robbers, as to the nature and situation of their haunt, their numbers, their conduct. To all these queries I replied with as much detail as was safe, but with the air of one who was resolved not in any way to compromise the wild outlaws who had recognised his claim to be considered a man of honour.

In the evening, the count and his friends sat down to cards, and I walked up and down the saloon in conversation with Christiana. I found her manner to me greatly changed since the morning. She was evidently more constrained. Evidently she felt that, in her previous burst of cordiality, she had forgotten that time might have changed me more than it had her. I spoke to her little of home. I did not indulge in the details of domestic tattle. I surprised her by the wild and gloomy tone in which I mentioned myself and my fortunes. I mingled with my reckless prospect of the future, the bitterest sarcasms on my present lot, and when I almost alarmed her by my malignant misanthropy, I darted into a train of gay nonsense, or tender reminiscences, and piqued her by the easy and rapid mode in which my temper seemed to shift from morbid sensibility to callous mockery.

VIII.

I RETIRED to my room, I wrote a letter to my servant at the university, directing him to repair to Norberg Castle with my horses and wardrobe. The fire blazed brightly, the pen was fresh and brisk, the idea rushed into my head in a moment, and I commenced my tragedy. I had already composed the first scene in my head. The plot was simple, and had been finally arranged while walking up and down the room with the countess. A bandit chief falls in love with the wife of a rich noble, the governor of the province, which is the scene of his ravages. I sat up nearly all night in fervid composition. I wrote with greater facility than before, because my experience of life was so much increased that I had no difficulty in making my characters think and act. There was indeed little art in my creation, but there was much vitality.

I rose very late, and found the chase had long ago called forth my fellow-guests. I could always find amusement in musing over my next scene, and I sauntered forth, almost unconscious of what I did. I found Christiana in a very fanciful flower-garden. She was bending down, tending a favourite plant. My heart beat, my spirit seemed lighter, she heard my step, she raised her smiling face, and gave me a flower.

"Ah! does not this remind you," I said, "of a spot of early days? I should grieve if you had forgotten the scene of our first acquaintance."

"The dear garden-house," exclaimed Christiana, with an arch smile. "Never shall I forget it. O! Contarini, what a little boy you were then!"

We wandered about together till the noon had long passed, talking of old times, and then we entered the castle for rest. She was as gay as a young creature in spring, but I was grave though not gloomy. I listened to her musical voice. I watched the thousand ebullitions of her beaming grace. I could not talk. I could only assent to her cheerful observations, and repose in peaceful silence, full of tranquil joy. The morning died away, the hunters returned, we reassembled again to talk over the day's exploits, and speculate on the result of my bet with Count Prater.

No tidings were heard of the robbers; nearly every observation of yesterday was repeated. It was a fine specimen of rural conversation. They ate keenly, they drank freely, and I rejoiced when they were fairly seated again at their card-table, and I was once more with Christiana.

I was delighted when she quitted the harp, and seated herself at the piano. I care little for a melodious voice, as it gives me no ideas, but instrumental music is a true source of inspiration, and as Christiana executed the magnificent overture of a great German master, I moulded my feelings of the morning into a scene, and when I again found myself in my room, I recorded it with facility, or only with a degree of difficulty with which it was exhilarating to contend.

At the end of three days my servant arrived, and gave me the first information that myself and my recent companions were expelled, for which I cared as little as for their gold medal.

Three weeks flew away, distinguished by no particular incident, except the loss of his gage by Count Prater, and my manifold care that he should redeem it. The robbers could not in any manner be traced, although Jonsterna afforded some indications. The wonder increased, and was universal, and my exploits afforded a subject for a pamphlet, the cheapness of whose price the publisher earnestly impressed upon us could only be justified by its extensive circulation.

Three weeks had flown away, three sweet weeks, and flown away in the almost constant presence of Christiana, or in scarcely less delightful composition. My tragedy was finished. I resolved to return home, I longed to bring my reputation to the test, yet I lingered about Christiana.

I lingered about her as the young bird about the first sunny fruit his inexperienced love dare not touch. I was ever with her, and each day grew more silent. I joined her exhausted by composition. In her presence I sought refreshing solace, renewed inspiration. I spoke little, for one feeling alone occupied my being, and even of that I was not cognizant, for its nature to me was indefinite and indistinct, although its power was constant and irresistible. But I avenged myself for this strange silence when I was once more alone, and my fervid page teemed with the imaginary passion, of whose reality my unpractised nature was not yet convinced.

One evening, as we were walking together in the saloon, and she was expressing her wish that I would remain, and her wonder as to the necessity of my returning, which I described as so imperative, suddenly and in the most unpremeditated manner, I made her the confidant of my literary secret. I was charmed with the temper in which she received it, the deep and serious interest which she expressed in my success. "Do you know," she added, "Contarini, you will think it very odd, but I have always believed you were intended for a poet."

My sparkling eye, sparkling with hope and affection, thanked her for her sympathy, and it was agreed that on the morrow I should read to her my production.

I was very nervous when I commenced. This was the first time that my composition had been submitted to a human being, and now this submission was to take place in the presence of the author, through the medium of his voice. As I proceeded, I grew rather more assured. The interest which Christiana really found, or affected to find, encouraged me. If I hesitated, she said, "beautiful!" whenever I paused, she exclaimed, "interesting!" My voice grew firmer, the interest which I myself took banished my false shame. I grew excited, my modulated voice impressed my sentiments, and my action sometimes explained them. The robber scene was considered wonderful, and full of life and nature. Christiana marvelled how I could have invented such extraordinary things and characters. At length I came to my heroine. Her beauty was described in an elaborate, and far too poetic passage. It was a perfect fac-simile of the countess. It was ridiculous. She herself felt it, and looking up, smiled with a faint blush.

I had now advanced into the very heart of the play, and the scenes of sentiment had commenced. I had long since lost my irresolution. The encouragement of Christiana, and the delight which I really felt in my writing, made me more than bold. I really acted before her. She was susceptible. All know how very easy it is for a very indifferent drama, if well performed, to soften even the callous. Her eyes were suffused with tears, my emotion was also visible. I felt like a man brought out of a dungeon, and groping his way in the light. How could I have been so blind when all was so evident? It was not until I had recited to Christiana my fictitious passion, that I had become conscious of my real feelings. I had been ignorant all this time that I had been long fatally in love with her. I threw away my manuscript, and seizing her hand, "O Christiana!" I exclaimed, "what mockery is it thus to veil truth! Before you is the leader of the band of whom you have heard so much. He adores you."

She started, I cannot describe the beautiful consternation of her countenance.

"Contarini," she exclaimed, "are you mad! what can you mean?"

"Mean!" I poured forth, "is it doubtful? Yes! I repeat, I am the leader of that band whose exploits have so recently alarmed you. Cannot you now comprehend the story of my visiting their haunt? Was it probable, was it possible, that I should have been permitted to gain their secret and to retire? The robbers were youth like myself, weary of the dull monotony of our false and wretched life. We have yielded to overwhelming force, but we have baffled all pursuit. For myself, I quit forever the country I abhor. Ere a year has passed, I shall roam a pirate on the far waves of the Ægean. One tie only binds me to this rigid clime. In my life I have loved only one being. I look upon her. Yes! yes! it is you, Christiana. On the very brink of my exile, destiny has brought us once more together. O! let us never part! Be mine,—be mine! Share with me my glory, my liberty, and my love!"

I poured forth this rhapsody with impassionate haste. The countess stared with blank astonishment. She appeared even alarmed. Suddenly she sprang up and ran out of the room.

IX.

I WAS enraged, and I was confused. I do not know whether I felt more shame or more irritation. My vanity impelled me to remain some time with the hope she would return. She did not, and seizing my tragedy, I rushed into the park. I met my servant exercising a horse. I sent him back to the castle alone, jumped on my steed, and in a few minutes was galloping along the high road to the metropolis.

It was about one hundred miles distant. When I arrived home I found that my father and the baroness were in the country. I was not sorry to be alone, as I really had returned without any object, and had not, in any degree, prepared myself to meet my father. After some consideration I enclosed my tragedy to a most eminent publisher, and I sent it him from a quarter whither he could gain no clew as to its source. I pressed him for a reply without unnecessary loss of time, and he, unlike these gentry, who really think themselves far more important personages than those by whose wits they live, was punctual. In the course of a week he returned me my manuscript, with his compliments, and an extract from the letter of his principal critic, in which my effusion was described as a laboured exaggeration of the most unnatural features of the German school. The day I received this my father arrived.

He was alone, and had merely come up to town to transact business. He was surprised to see me, but said nothing of my expulsion, although I felt confident he must be aware of it. We dined together alone. He talked to me at dinner of indifferent subjects, of alterations at his castle, and the state of Europe. As I wished to conciliate him, I affected to take great interest in this latter topic, and I thought he seemed pleased with the earnest readiness with which I interfered in the discussion. After dinner he remarked, very quietly filling his glass, "Had you communicated with me, Contarini, I could perhaps have saved you the disgrace of expulsion."

I was quite taken by surprise, and looked very confused. At last I said, "I fear, sir, I have occasioned you too often great mortification, but I sometimes cannot refrain from believing that I may yet make a return to you for all your goodness."

"Every thing depends upon yourself, Contarini. You have elected to be your own master. You must take the consequences of your courage, or your rashness. What are your plans? I do not know whether you mean to honour me with your confidence as a friend. I do not even aspire to the authority of a father."

"O! pray, sir, do not say so. I place myself entirely at your disposal. I desire nothing more ardently than to act under your command. I assure you that you will find me a very different personage than you imagine. I am impressed with a most earnest and determined resolution to become a practical man. You must not judge of me by my boyish career. The very feelings that made me revolt at the discipline of schools, will ensure my subordination in the world. I took no interest in their petty pursuits, and their minute legislation interfered with my more extended views."

"What views?" asked my father, with a smile.

I was somewhat puzzled, but I answered, "I wish, sir, to influence men."

"But before you influence others, you must learn to influence yourself. Now those who would judge, perhaps imperfectly, of your temperament, Contarini, would suppose that its characteristic was a nature so headstrong and imprudent that it could not fail of involving its possessor in many dangerous, and sometimes even in very ridiculous positions."

I was silent, with my eyes fixed on the ground.

"I think you have sufficient talents for all that I could reasonably desire, Contarini," continued my father; "I think you have talents indeed for any thing; I mean, that a rational being can desire to attain; but you sadly lack judgment. I think that you are the most imprudent person with whom I ever was acquainted. You have a great enemy, Contarini, a great enemy in yourself. You have a great enemy in your imagination. I think if you could control your imagination, you might be a great man.

"It is a fatal gift, Contarini; for when possessed in its highest quality and strength, what has it ever done for its votaries! What were all those great poets of whom we now talk so much, what were they in their lifetime? The most miserable of their species. Depressed, doubtful, obscure, or involved in petty quarrels and petty precautions, often unappreciated, utterly un influential, beggars, flatterers of men unworthy even of their recognition—what a train of disgusting incidents, what a record of degrading circumstances is the life of a great poet? A man of great energies aspires that they should be felt in his lifetime, that his existence should be rendered more intensely vital by the constant consciousness of his multiplied and multiplying power. Is posthumous fame a substitute for all this? Viewed in every light and under every feeling, it is alike a mockery. Nay, even try the greatest by this test, and what is the result? Would you sooner have been Homer or Julius Cæsar, Shakspeare or Napoleon? No one doubts. Moralists may cloud truth with every possible adumbration of cant, but the nature of our being gives the lie to all their assertions. We are active beings, and our sympathy, above all other sympathies is with great action.

"Remember, Contarini, that all this time I am taking for granted that you may be a Homer. Let us now recollect that it is perhaps the most improvable incident that can occur. The high poetic talent,—as if to prove that a poet is only, at the best, a wild, although a beautiful error of nature,—the high poetic talent is the rarest in creation. What you have felt is what I have felt myself, is what all men have felt; it is the consequence of our native and inviolate susceptibility. As you advance in life, and become more callous, more acquainted with man, and with yourself, you will find it, even daily, decrease. Mix in society, and I will answer that you lose your poetic feeling; for in you, as in the great majority, it is not a creative faculty originating in a peculiar organization, but simply the consequence of a nervous susceptibility that is common to all."

I suspected very much, that my father had stumbled on the unhappy romance of the "Wild Hunter of Rodenstein," which I had left lying about my drawers, but I said nothing. He proceeded.

"The time has now arrived which may be considered a crisis in your life. You have, although very young, resolved that society should consider you a man. No preparatory situation can now veil your indiscretions. A youth at the university may commit outrages with impunity, which will affix a lasting prejudice on a person of the same age, who has quitted the university. I must ask you again, what are your plans?"

"I have none, sir, except your wishes. I feel acutely the truth of all you have observed. I assure you I am as completely and radically cured of any predisposition that I confess I once conceived I possessed for literary invention, as even you could desire. I will own to you that my ambition is very great. I do not think that I should find life tolerable unless I were in an eminent position, and conscious that I deserved it. Fame, although not posthumous fame, is, I feel, necessary to my felicity. In a word, I wish to devote myself to affairs—I attend only your commands."

"If it meet your wishes, I will appoint you my private secretary. The post, particularly when confirmed by the confidence which must subsist between individuals connected as we are, is the best school for public affairs. It will prepare you for any office."

"I can conceive nothing more delightful. You could not have fixed upon an appointment more congenial to my feelings. To be your constant companion, in the slightest degree to alleviate the burden of your labours, to be considered worthy of your confidence—this is all that I could desire. I only fear that my ignorance of routine may at first inconvenience you, but trust me, dear father, that if devotion, and the constant exertion of any talents I may possess can aid you, they will not be wanting. Indeed, indeed, sir, you never shall repent your goodness."

This same evening I consigned my tragedy to the flames.

X.

I devoted myself to my new pursuits with as much fervour as I had done to the study of Greek.

The former secretary initiated me in the mysteries of routine business. My father, although he made no remark, was evidently pleased at the facility and quickness with which I attained this formal, but necessary information. Vattel and Martens were my private studies. I was greatly interested with my novel labours. Foreign policy opened a dazzling vista of splendid incident. It was enchanting to be acquainted with the secrets of European cabinets, and to control or influence their fortunes. A year passed with more satisfaction than any period of my former life. I had become of essential service to my father. My talent for composition found full exercise, and afforded him great aid in drawing up state papers and manifestoes, despatches and decrees. We were always together. I shared his entire confidence. He instructed me in the characters of the public men who surrounded us, and of those who were more distant. I was astonished at the scene of intrigue that opened on me. I found that in some, even of his colleagues, I was only to perceive secret enemies, and in others but necessary tools and tolerated encumbrances. I delighted in the danger, the management, the negotiation, the suspense, the difficult gratification of his high ambition.

Intent as he was to make me a great statesman, he was scarcely less anxious that I should become a finished man of the world. He constantly impressed upon me that society was a politician's great tool, and the paramount necessity of cultivating its good graces. He afforded me an ample allowance. He encouraged me in a lavish expenditure. Above all, he was ever ready to dilate upon the character of women, and while he astonished me by the tone of depreciation in which he habitually spoke of them, he would even magnify their influence, and the necessity of securing it.

I modelled my character upon that of my father. I imbibed his deep worldliness. With my usual impetuosity, I even exaggerated it. I recognised self-interest as the spring of all action. I received it as a truth, that no man was to be trusted, and no woman to be loved. I gloried in secretly believing myself the most callous of men, and that nothing could tempt me to compromise my absorbing selfishness. I laid it down as a principle, that all considerations must yield to the gratification of my ambition. The arduous and assiduous with which I fulfilled my duties and prosecuted my studies, had rendered me, at the end of two years, a very skilful politician. My great fault, as a man of affairs, was, that I was too fond of patronising charlatans, and too ready to give every adventurer credit for great talents. The moment a man started a new idea, my active fancy conjured up all the great results, and conceived that his was equally prophetic. But here my father's severe judgment and sharp experience always interfered for my benefit, and my cure was assisted by hearing a few of my black swans cackle, instead of chant. As a member of society, I was entirely exempt from the unskilful affectation of my boyhood. I was assured, arrogant, and bitter, but easy, and not ungraceful. The men trembled at my sarcasms, and the women repeated with wonderment my fantastic rallery. My position in life, and the exaggerated halo with which, in my case, as in all others, the talents of eminent youth were injudiciously invested, made me courted by all, especially by the daughters of Eve. I was sometimes nearly the victim of hackneyed experience—sometimes I trifled with affections, which my parental instructions taught me never to respect. On the whole, I considered myself as one of the most important personages in the country, possessing the greatest talents, the profoundest knowledge of men and affairs, and the most perfect acquaintance with society. When I look back upon myself at this period, I have difficulty in conceiving a more unamiable character.

XI.

IN the third year of my political life, the prime minister suddenly died. Here was a catastrophe! Who was to be his successor? Here was a fruitful theme for speculation and intrigue. Public opinion pointed to my father, who indeed, if qualification for the post were only considered, had no competitor; but Baron Fleming was looked upon by his brother nobles with a jealous eye, and although not unwilling to profit by his labours, they were chary of permitting them too uncontrolled a scope. He was talked of as a new man: he was treated as scarcely national. The state was not to be placed at the disposal of an adventurer. He was not one of themselves. It was a fatal precedent, that the veins of the prime minister should be filled with any other blood but that of their ancient order. Even many of his colleagues did not affect to conceal their hostility to his appointment, and the Count de Moltke, who was supposed to possess every quality that should adorn the character of a first minister, was openly announced as the certain successor to the vacant office. The Count de Moltke was a frivolous old courtier, who had gained his little experience in long service in the household, and, even were he appointed, could only anticipate the practicability of carrying on affairs by implicit confidence in his rival. The Count de Moltke was a tool.

Skilful as my father was in controlling and veiling his emotion, the occasion was too powerful even for his firmness. For the first time in his life he sought a confidant, and, firm in the affection of a son, he confessed to me, with an agitation which was alone sufficient to express his meaning, how entirely he had staked his felicity on this cast. He could not refrain from bitterly dilating on the state of society, in which secret influence, and the prejudices of a bigoted class, should for a moment permit one, who had devoted all the resources of a high intellect to the welfare of his country, to be placed in momentary competition, still more in permanent inferiority with such an inflexible nonentity as the Count de Moltke.

Every feeling in my nature prompted me to energy. I counselled my father to the most active exertions, but although subtle, he was too cautious, and where he was himself concerned, even timorous. I had no compunction, and no fear. I would scruple at no means which could ensure our end. The feeling of society, was in general, in our favour. Even among the highest class, the women were usually on the side of my father. Baroness Engel, who was the evening star that beamed unrivalled in all our assemblies, and who fancied herself a little Dutchess de Longueville, delighted in a political intrigue. I affected to make her our confidante. We resolved together that the only mode was to render our rival ridiculous. I wrote an anonymous pamphlet in favour of the appointment of the Count de Moltke. It took in everybody, until in the last page they read my panegyric of his cream cheeses. It was in vain that the Count de Moltke, and all his friends, protested that his excellency had never made a cream cheese in the whole course of his life. The story was too probable not to be true. He was just the old fool who would make a cream cheese. I secured the channel of our principal journals. Each morning teemed with a diatribe against backstairs influence, the prejudices of a nobility who were behind their age, and indignant histories of the maladministration of court favourites. The evening, by way of change, brought only an epigram, sometimes a song. The fashion took: all the youth were on our side. One day, in imitation of the Tre Giuli, we published a whole volume of epigrams, all on cream cheeses. The baroness was moreover an inimitable caricaturist. The shops were filled with infinite scenes, in which a ludicrous old fribble, such as we might fancy a French marquis before the Revolution, was ever committing something irresistibly ludicrous. In addition to all this, I hired ballad singers, who were always chanting in the public walks, and even under the windows of the palace, the achievements of the unrivalled manufacturer of cream cheeses.

In the mean time my father was not idle. He had discovered that the Count de Bragnaes, one of the most influential nobles in the country, and the great supporter of De Moltke, was ambitious of becoming Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and that De Moltke had hesitated in pledging himself to this arrangement, as he could not perceive how affairs could be carried on if my father was entirely dismissed. My father opened a secret negotiation with De Bragnaes, and shook before his eyes the glittering seals he coveted. De Bragnaes was a dolt, but my father required only tools, and felt himself capable of fulfilling the duties of the whole ministry. This great secret was not concealed from me. I opposed the arrangement, not only because De Bragnaes was absolutely insufficient, but because I wished to introduce into the cabinet Baron Engel.

The post of chief minister had now been three weeks vacant, and the delay was accounted for by the illness of the sovereign, who was nevertheless in perfect health. All this excitement took place at the very season we were all assembled in the capital for the purposes of society. My father was everywhere, and each night visible. I contrasted the smiling indifference of his public appearance with the agonies of ambition, which it was my doom alone to witness.

I was alone with my father in his cabinet when a royal messenger summoned him to the presence. The king was at a palace about ten miles from the city. It did not in any way follow from the invitation that my father was successful: all that we felt assured of was, that the crisis had arrived. We exchanged looks, but not words. Intense as was suspense, business prevented me from attending my father, and waiting in the royal antechamber to hear the great result. He departed.

I had to receive an important deputation, the discussion of whose wishes employed the whole morning. It was with extreme difficulty that I could command my attention. Never in my life had I felt so nervous. Each moment a messenger entered, I believed that he was the important one. No carriage dashed into the court-yard that did not to my fancy bear my father. At last the deputation retired, and then came private interviews and urgent correspondence.

It was twilight. The servant had lit one burner of the lamp, when the door opened, and my father stood before me. I could scarcely refrain from crying out. I pushed out the astonished waiting-man, and locked the door.

My father looked grave, serious, I thought a little depressed. "All is over," thought I, and in an instant I began speculating on the future, and had created much, when my father's voice called me back to the present scene.

"His majesty, Contarini," said my father in a dry, formal manner, as if he were speaking to one who had never witnessed his weakness—"His majesty has been graciously pleased to appoint me to the supreme office of president of his council; and as a further mark of his entire confidence and full approbation of my past services, he has thought fit to advance me to the dignity of count."

Was this frigid form that stood unmoved before me the being whom, but four-and-twenty hours ago, I had watched trembling with his high passions? Was this curt, unimpassioned tone, the voice in which he should have notified the crowning glory of his fortunes to one who had so struggled in their behalf? I could scarcely speak. I hardly congratulated him.

"And your late post, sir?" I at length inquired.

"The seals of this office will be held by the Baron de Bragnaes."

I shrugged my shoulders in silence.

"The king is not less aware than myself that his excellency can bring but a slight portion of intellectual strength to the new cabinet; that he is one indeed about to be placed in a position, to discharge the duties of which he is incapable; but his majesty as well as myself, has unbounded confidence in the perfect knowledge, the energetic assiduity, and the distinguished talents of the individual who will fulfil the duties of under-secretary. He will be the virtual head of this great department. Allow me to be the first to congratulate Count Contarini Fleming on his new dignity, and his entrance into the service of his sovereign."

I rushed forward, I seized his hand. "My dear father," I said, "I am quite overwhelmed. I dreamed not of this. I never thought of myself, I thought only of you."

He pressed my hand, but did not lose his composure. "We dine together to-day alone," he said, "I must now see De Bragnaes. At dinner I will tell you all. Nothing will be announced till to-morrow. Your friend, Engel, is not forgotten."

He quitted the chamber. The moment he disappeared I could no longer refrain from glancing in the mirror. Never had I marked so victorious a visage. An unnatural splendour sparkled in my eye, my lip was impressed with energy, my nostril dilated with triumph. I stood before the tall mirror, and planted my foot, and waved my arm. So much more impressive is reality than imagination! Often, in reverie, had I been an Alberoni, a Ripperda, a Richelieu; but never had I felt, when moulding the destinies of the wide globe, a title of the triumphant exultation which was afforded by the consciousness of the simple fact that I was an under-secretary of state.

XII.

I HAD achieved by this time what is called a great reputation. I do not know that there was any one more talked of, and more considered in the country, than myself. I was my father's only confidant, and secretly his only counsellor. I managed De Bragnæs admirably, and always suggested to him the opinion, which I at the same time requested. He was a mere cipher. As for the Count de Moltke, he was very rich, with an only daughter, and my father had already hinted at, what I had even turned in my own mind, a union with the wealthy, although not very pleasing, offspring of the maker of cream cheeses.

At this moment, in the zenith of my popularity and power, the Norbergs returned to the capital. I had never seen them since the mad morning which, with all my boasted callousness, I ever blushed to remember, for the count had, immediately after my departure, been appointed to a very important, although distant government. Nor had I ever heard of them. I never wished to. I drove their memory from my mind; but Christiana, who had many correspondents, and among them the baroness, had, of course, heard much of me.

Our family was the first they called upon, and, in spite of the mortifying awkwardness of the meeting, it was impossible to avoid it, and therefore I determined to pay my respects to them immediately. I was careful to call when I knew I could not be admitted, and the first interview finally took place at our own house. Christiana received me with the greatest kindness, although with increased reserve, which might be accounted for by the time that had elapsed since we last met, and the alteration that had since taken place both in my age and station. In all probability, she looked upon my present career as a sufficient guaranty that my head was cleared of the wild fancies of my impetuous boyhood, and rejoicing in this accomplishment, and anticipating our future and agreeable acquaintance, she might fairly congratulate herself on the excellent judgment which had prompted her to pass over in silence my unpardonable indiscretion.

Her manner put me so completely at my case that, in a moment after my salute, I wondered I could have been so foolish as to have brooded over it. The countess was unaltered, except that she looked perhaps more beautiful. She was a rare creation that time loved to spare. That sweet, and blooming, and radiant face, and that tall, and shapely, and beaming form—not a single bad passion had ever marred their light and grace, all the freshness of an innocent heart had embalmed their perennial loveliness.

The party seemed dull. I, who was usually a great talker, could not speak. I dared not attempt to be alone with Christiana. I watched her only at a distance, and indicated my absorbing mood to others only by my eurt and discouraging answers. When all was over, I retired to my own rooms exceedingly gloomy and dispirited.

I was in these days but a wild beast, who thought himself a civilized and human being. I was profoundly ignorant of all that is true and excellent. An unnatural system, like some grand violence of nature, had transformed the teeming and beneficent ocean of my mind into a sandy and arid desert. I had not then discovered even a faint adumbration of the philosophy of our existence. Blessed by nature with a heart that is the very shrine of sensibility, my infamous education had succeeded in rendering me the most selfish of my species.

But nature, as the philosophic Winter impressed upon me, is stronger than education, and the presence of this woman, this sudden appearance, amid my corrupt, and heartless, and artificial life, of so much innocence, and so much love, and so much simplicity, they fell upon my callous heart like the first rains upon a Syrian soil, and the refreshed earth responded to the kindly influence by an instant recurrence to its nature.

I recoiled with disgust from the thought of my present life; I flew back with rapture to my old aspirations. And the beautiful, for which I had so often and so early sighed, and the love that I felt indispensable to my panting frame, and the deep sympathy for all creation that seemed my being, and all the dazzling and extending glory that had hovered, like a halo, round my youthful visions—they returned—they returned in their might and their splendour, and when I remembered what I was, I buried my face in my hands and wept.

I retired to my bed, but I could not sleep. I saw no hope, yet I was not miserable. Christiana could never be mine. I did not wish her to be. I could not contemplate such an incident. I had prided myself on my profligacy, but this night avenged my innate purity. I threw off my factitious passions. It was the innocence of Christiana that exercised over me a spell so potent. Her unsophisticated heart awoke in me a passion for the natural and the pure. She was not made to be the heroine of a hackneyed adventure. To me she was not an individual, but a personification of Nature. I gazed upon her only as I would upon a beautiful landscape, with an admiring sympathy which ennobles my feelings, invigorates my intellect, and calls forth the latent poetry of my being.

The thought darted into my mind in a moment. I cannot tell how it came. It seemed inspiration, but I responded to it with an eager, and even fierce sympathy. Said I that the thought darted into my mind? Let me recall the weak phrase, let me rather say, that a form rose before me in the depth of the dull night, and that form was myself. That form was myself, yet also another. I beheld a youth who, like me, had stifled the breathing forms of his young creation; who, like me, in the cold wilderness of the world, looked back with a mournful glance at the bright gates of the sweet garden of fancy he had forfeited. I felt the deep and agonizing struggle of his genius and his fate; and my prophetic mind, bursting through all the thousand fetters that had been forged so cunningly to bind it in its cell, the inspiration of my nature, that beneficent demon who will not desert those who struggle to be wise and good—tore back the curtain of the future, and I beheld, seated on a glorious throne on a proud Acropolis, one to whom a surrounding and enthusiastic people offered a laurel crown. I laboured to catch the fleeting features and the changing countenance of him who sat upon the throne. Was it the strange youth, or was it indeed myself?

I jumped out of bed. I endeavoured to be calm. I asked myself, soberly, whether I had indeed seen a vision, or whether it were but the invisible phantasm of an ecstatic reverie? I looked round me; there was nothing. The moonbeam was stationary on the wall. I opened the window and looked out upon the vast, and cold, and silent street. The bitterness of the night cooled me. The pulsations of my throbbing head subsided. I regained my bed, and instantly sank into a sweet sleep.

The aunt of the Countess Fleming had died, and left to my stepdane the old garden-house, which is not perhaps forgotten. As I had always continued on the best possible terms with the countess, and, indeed, was in all points quite her standard of perfection, she had, with great courtesy, permitted me to make her recently-acquired mansion my habitation, when important business occasionally made me desire for its transaction a spot less subject to constant interruption than my office and my home.

To the garden-house I repaired the next morning at a very early hour. I was so eager that I ordered, as I dismounted, my rapid breakfast, and in a few minutes, this being despatched, I locked myself up in my room, giving orders not to be disturbed, except by a message from my father.

I took up a pen. I held it in the light. I thought to myself what will be its doom, but I said nothing. I began writing some hours before noon, nor did I ever cease. My thoughts, my passion, the rush of my invention, were too quick for my pen. Page followed page; as a sheet was finished I threw it on the floor; I was amazed at the rapid and prolific production, yet I could not stop to wonder. In half a dozen hours I sank back utterly exhausted, with an aching frame. I rang the bell, ordered some refreshment, and walked about the room. The wine invigorated me, and warmed up my sinking fancy, which however required little fuel. I set to again, and it was midnight before I retired to my bed.

The next day I again rose early, and, with a bottle of wine at my side, for I was determined not to be disturbed, I dashed at it again. I was not less successful. This day I finished my first volume.

The third morning I had less inclination to write. I read over and corrected what I had composed. This warmed up my fancy, and in the afternoon I executed several chapters of my second volume.

Each day, although I had not in the least lost my desire of writing, I wrote slower. It was necessary for me each day to read my work from the beginning, before I felt the existence of the characters sufficiently real to invent their actions. Nevertheless, on the morning of the seventh day, the second and last volume was finished.

My book was a rapid sketch of the development of the poetic character. My hero was a youth whose mind was ever combating with his situation. Gifted with a highly poetic temperament, it was the office of his education to counteract all its ennobling tendencies. I traced the first indication of his predisposition, the growing consciousness of his powers, his reveries, his loneliness, his doubts, his moody misery, his ignorance of his art, his failures, his despair. I painted his agonizing and ineffectual efforts to exist like those around him. I poured forth my own passion, when I described the fervour of his love.

All this was serious enough, and the most singular thing is that all this time, it never struck me that I was delineating my own character. But now comes the curious part. In depicting the scenes of society in which my hero was forced to move, I suddenly dashed, not only into the most slashing satire, but even into malignant personality. All the bitterness of my heart, occasioned by my wretched existence among their false circles, found its full vent. Never was any thing so imprudent. Everybody figured, and all parties and opinions alike suffered. The same hand that immortalized the cream cheeses of poor Count de Moltke, now avenged his wrongs.

For the work itself, it was altogether a most crude performance, teeming with innumerable faults. It was entirely deficient in art. The principal character, although forcibly conceived, for it was founded on truth, was not sufficiently developed. Of course the others were much less so. The incidents were unnatural, the serious characters exaggerations, the comic ones caricatures; the wit was too often flippant, the philosophy too often forced; yet the vigour was remarkable, the license of an uncurbed imagination not without its charms, and, on the whole, there breathed a freshness which is rarely found, and which, perhaps, with all my art and knowledge, I may never again afford: and indeed when I recall the magnificent enthusiasm, the glorious heat, with which this little work was written, I am convinced that, with all its errors, the spark of true creation animated its fiery page.

Such is the history of "Manstein," a work which exercised a strange influence on my destiny.

XIII.

I PERSONALLY intrusted my novel to the same bookseller to whom I had anonymously submitted my tragedy. He required no persuasion to have the honour of introducing it to the world, and had he hesitated, I would myself have willingly undertaken the charge, for I was resolved to undergo the ordeal. I swore him to the closest secrecy, and, as mystery is part of the craft, I had confidence that his interest would prompt him to maintain his honour.

All now being finished, I suddenly and naturally resumed my obvious and usual character. The pouring forth had relieved my mind, and the strong feelings that prompted it having subsided, I felt a little of the lassitude that succeeds exertion. That reaction, to which ardent and inexperienced minds are subject, now also occurred. I lost my confidence in my effusion. It seemed impossible that any thing I had written could succeed, and I felt that nothing but decided success could justify a person in my position to be an author. I had determined to recall the rash deposit, but a mixture of false shame and lingering hope that I might yet be happily mistaken, dissuaded me. I resolved to think no more of it. It was an inconsiderate venture, but secrecy would preserve me from public shame, and as for my private mortification, I should at least derive from failure a beneficial conviction of my literary incompetency, and increased energy to follow up the path which fortune seemed to destine for my pursuit. Official circumstances occurred also at this moment, which imperatively demanded all my attention, and which indeed interested my feelings in no ordinary degree.

The throne of my royal master had been guaranteed to him by those famous treaties which, at the breaking up of that brilliant vision, the French empire, had been vainly considered by the great European powers as ensuring the permanent settlement of Europe. A change of dynasty had placed the king in a delicate position, but by his sage councils and discreet conduct the last burst of the revolutionary storm passed over without striking his diadem. One of the most distinguished instances of the ministerial dexterity of my father was the discovery of a latent inclination in certain of our powerful allies, to favour the interests of the abdicated dynasty, and ultimately to dispute the succession, which, at the moment, distracted by the multiplicity of important and engrossing interests, they deemed themselves too hastily to have recognised. In this conjuncture, an appeal to arms on our part was idle, and all to which we could trust in bringing about a satisfactory adjustment of this paramount question, was diplomatic ingenuity. For more than three years, secret, but active negotiations had been on foot to attain our end, and circumstances had now occurred which induced us to believe that, by certain combinations, the result might be realized.

I took a very great interest in these negotiations, and was the only person out of the cabinet to whom they were confided. The situation of the prince royal, himself a very accomplished personage, but whose unjust unpopularity offered no obstacle to the views of his enemies, extremely commanded my sympathy: the secrecy, importance, and refined difficulty of the transactions called forth all the play of my invention. Although an affair which, according to etiquette, should have found its place in the Foreign Office, my father, on his promotion, did not think it fitting to transfer a business of so delicate a nature to another functionary, and he contrived to correspond upon it with foreign courts in his character of first minister. As his secretary, I had been privy to all the details, and I continued therefore to assist him in his subsequent proceedings.

My father and myself materially differed as to the course expedient to be pursued. He flattered himself that every thing might be brought about by negotiation, in which he was indeed unrivalled, and he often expatiated to me on the evident impossibility of the king having recourse to any other measures. For myself, when I remembered the time that had already passed without in any way advancing our desires, and believed, which I did most firmly, that the conduct of the great continental powers in this comparatively unimportant affair was only an indication of their resolution to promote the system on which they had based all the European relations—I myself could not refrain from expressing a wish to adopt a very different and far more earnest conduct.

In this state of affairs I was one day desired by my father to attend him at a secret conference with the ambassadors of the great powers. My father flattered himself that he might this day obtain his long-desired end, and so interested was the monarch in the progress, as well as the result, of our consultations, that he resolved to be present himself, although incognito.

The scene of the conference was the same palace whither my father had been summoned to receive the notification of his appointment as first minister.

I can well recall the feelings with which, on the morning of the conference, I repaired to the palace with my father. We were muffled up in our pelisses, for the air was very sharp, but the sun was not without influence, and shone with great brilliancy. There are times when I am influenced by a species of what I may term happy audacity, for it is a mixture of recklessness and self-confidence which has a very felicitous effect upon the animal spirits. At these moments, I never calculate consequences, yet every thing seems to go right. I feel in good fortune—the ludicrous side of every thing occurs to me,—I think of nothing but grotesque images,—I astonish people by bursting into laughter, apparently without a cause. Whatever is submitted to me I turn into ridicule. I shrug my shoulders and speak epigrams.

I was in one of these moods to-day. My father could not comprehend me. He was very serious, but instead of sympathizing with all his grave hopes and dull fears, I did nothing but ridicule their excellencies, whom we were going to meet, and perform to him an imaginary conference, in which he also figured.

We arrived at the palace. I became a little sobered. My father went to the king. I entered a large Gothic hall, where the conference was to take place. It was a fine room, hung with trophies, and principally lighted by a large Gothic window. At the farther end, near the fire, and partitioned off by a large Indian screen, was a round table, covered with green cloth, and surrounded by seats. The Austrian minister arrived. I walked up and down the hall with him for some minutes, ridiculing diplomacy. He was one of those persons who believe you have a direct object in every thing you say, and my contradictory opinions upon all subjects were to him a fruitful source of puzzled meditation. He thought I was one whose words ought to be marked, and I believe that my nonsense has often occasioned him a sleepless night. The other ministers soon assembled, and in a few minutes, a small door opened at the top of the hall, and the king and my father appeared. We bowed, and took our seats, I, being secretary, seated myself at the desk, to take notes for the drawing up of the protocols.

We believed that the original idea of considering the great treaties as only a guaranty to the individual, and not to his successors, originated at Vienna. Indeed, it was the early acquaintance of my father with the Austrian minister that first assisted him in ascertaining this intention. We believed that the Russian cabinet had heartily entered into this new reading, that Prussia supported it only in deference to the court of St. Petersburg, and that France was scarcely reconciled to the proposed derangement by the impression that it naturally assisted those principles of government by a recurrence to which the cabinet of Versailles then began to be convinced they could alone maintain themselves.

Such had been our usual view of the state of opinion with respect to this question. It had been the object of my father to induce the French court to join with that of St. James's in a strong demonstration in favour of the present system, and to indicate, in the event of that demonstration being fruitless, the possibility of their entering with the king into a tripartite party treaty, framed in pursuance of the spirit of the invalidated one. He trusted that to-day this demonstration would be made.

We entered into business. The object of our opponents was to deny that the tendency of certain acts, of which we complained, was inimical to the present dynasty, but to refrain from proving their sincerity, by assenting to a new guaranty, on the plea that it was unnecessary, since the treaties must express all that was intended. Hours were wasted in multiplied discussions as to the meaning of particular clauses in particular treaties, and as to precedents to justify particular acts. Hours were wasted, for we did not advance. At length my father recurred to the spirit, rather than the letter of the affair, and in urging the necessity for the peace of Europe and other high causes, that this affair should be settled without delay, he gave an excellent opportunity for the friends he had anticipated to come forward. They spoke, but indeed it was very vague and unsatisfactory. I marked the lip of the Austrian minister curl as if in derision, and the Russian arranged his papers as if all now were finished.

I knew my father well enough by this time to be convinced that, in spite of his apparently unaltered mien, he was bitterly disappointed and annoyed. The king looked gloomy. There was a perfect silence. It was so awkward that the Austrian minister inquired of me the date of a particular treaty, merely to break the dead pause. I did not immediately answer him.

The whole morning my fancy had been busied with the most grotesque images. I had never before a moment impressed with the gravity of the proceedings. The presence of the king alone prevented me from constant raillery. When I recollected the exact nature of the business on which we were assembled, and then called to mind the characters who took part in the discussion, I could scarcely refrain from laughter. "Voltaire would soon settle this," I thought, "and send Messieurs the Austrian, and the Russian, and the Prussian, with their mustachios, and bussar jackets, and furs, to their own country. What business have they to interfere with ours?" I was strongly impressed with the tyrannical injustice and wicked folly of the whole transaction. The great diplomatists appeared to me so many wild beasts ready to devour our innocent lamb of a sovereign, parleying only from jealousy who should first attack him.

The Austrian minister repeated his question as to the treaty. "It matters not," I replied; "let us now proceed to business." He looked a little surprised. "Gentlemen," I continued, "you must be quite aware, that this is the last conference his majesty can permit us to hold upon a subject which ought never to have been discussed. The case is very simple, and demands but little consideration. If the guaranty we justly require be not granted, his majesty must have recourse to a popular appeal. We have no fear about the result. We are prepared for it. His majesty will acquire a new, and, if possible, a stronger title to his crown, and see what you will occasion by your squeamishness to authenticate the right of a sovereign, who, although not the offspring of a dynasty, acquired his throne not by the voice of the people, and has been constantly recognised by all your courts; you will be the direct cause of a most decided democratic demonstration in the election of a king by the people alone. For us, the result has no terrors. Your excellencies are the best judges whether your royal masters possess any territories in our vicinity which may be inoculated with our dangerous example."

I was astounded by my audacity. Not till I had ceased speaking had I been aware of what I had dared to do. Once I shot a rapid glance at my father. His eyes were fixed on the ground, and I thought a little pale. As I withdrew my glance, I caught the king's fiery eye, but its expression did not discourage me.

It is difficult to convey an idea of the success of my boldness. It could not enter the imagination of the diplomatists that any one could dare to speak, and particularly under such circumstances, without instructions and without authority. They looked upon me only as the mouthpiece of the royal intentions. They were alarmed at our great, and unwonted, and unexpected resolution, at the extreme danger and invisible results of our purposes. The English and French ministers, who watched every turn, made a vehement representation in our favour, and the conference broke up with an expression of irresolution and surprise in the countenances of our antagonists, quite unusual with them; and which promised a speedy attainment of the satisfactory arrangement which shortly afterwards took place.

The conference broke up, my father retired with the king, and desired me to wait for him in the hall. I was alone. I was excited. I felt the triumph of success. I felt that I had done a great action. I felt all my energies. I walked up and down the hall in a frenzy of ambition, and I thirsted for action. There seemed to me no achievement of which I was not capable, and of which I was not ambitious. In imagination I shook thrones and founded empires. I felt myself a being born to breathe in an atmosphere of revolution.

My father came not. Time wore away, and the day died. It was one of those stern sublime sunsets, which is almost the only appearance in the north in which nature enchanted me. I stood at the window gazing at the burnished masses that, for a moment, were suspended, in their fleeting and capricious beauty, on the far horizon. I turned aside and looked on the rich trees suffused with the crimson light, and ever and anon irradiated by the dying shoots of a golden ray. The deer were stealing home to their bowers, and I watched them till their golden and glancing forms gradually lost their lustre in the declining twilight. The glory had now departed, and all grew dim. A solitary star alone was shining in the gray sky, a bright and solitary star.

And as I gazed upon the sunset, and the star, and the dim beauties of the coming eve, my mind grew calm. And all the bravery of my late reverie passed away. And I felt indeed a disgust for all the worldliness on which I had been lately pondering. And there arose in my mind a desire to create things beautiful as that golden sun, and that glittering star.

I heard my name. The hall was now darkened. In the distance stood my father. I joined him. He placed his arm affectionately in mine, and said to me, "My son, you will be prime minister of * * * *"; perhaps something greater."

XIV.

As we drove home, every thing seemed changed since the morning. My father was in high spirits, for him, even elated; I, on the contrary, was silent and thoughtful. This evening there was a ball at the palace, which, although little inclined, I felt obliged to attend.

I arrived late; the king was surrounded by a brilliant circle, and conversing with his usual felicitous affability. I would have withdrawn when I had made my obeisance, but his majesty advanced a step, and immediately addressed me. He conversed with me for some time. Few men possess a more captivating address than this sovereign. It was difficult at all times not to feel charmed, and now I was conscious that this mark of his favour recognised no ordinary claims to his confidence. I was the object of admiring envy. That night there were few in those saloons, crowded with the flower of the land, who did not covet my position. I alone was insensible to it. A vision of high mountains and deep blue lakes mingled with all the artificial splendour that dazzled around. I longed to roam amid the solitude of nature, and disburthen a mind teeming with creative sympathy.

I drew near a group which the pretty Baroness Engel was addressing with more than her usual animation. When she caught my eye, she beckoned me to join her, and said, "O! Count Contarini, have you read Manstein?"

"Manstein," I said, in a careless tone, "what is it?"

"O! you must get it directly. The oddest book that ever was written. We are all in it, we are all in it."

"I hope not."

"O, yes! all of us, all of us. I have not had time to make out the characters, I read it so quickly. My man only sent it to me this morning. I must get a key. Now you, who are so clever, make me one."

"I will look at it, if you really recommend me."

"You must look at it. It is the oddest book that was ever written. Immensely clever, I assure you, immensely clever. I cannot exactly make it out."

"That is certainly much in its favour. The obscure, as you know, is a principal ingredient of the sublime."

"How odd you are! But really, now, Count Contarini, get Manstein. Every one must read it. As for your illustrious principal, Baron de Bragnaes—he is really hit off to the life."

"Indeed!" I said, with concealed consternation.

"O! no one can mistake it. I thought I should have died with laughing. But we are all there. I am sure I know the author."

"Who is it? who is it?" eagerly inquired the group.

"I do not know, mind," observed the baroness.

"It is only conjecture, merely a conjecture. But I always find out everybody."

"O! that you do," said the group.

"Yes, I find them out by the style."

"How clever you are!" exclaimed the group, "but who is it?"

"O, I shall not betray him. Only I am quite convinced I know who it is."

"Pray, pray, tell us," entreated the group.

"You need not look around, Matilda, he is not here. A friend of yours, Contarini. I thought that young Moskovsky was in a great hurry to run off to St. Petersburg. And he has left us a legacy. We are all in it, I assure you," she exclaimed, to the one nearest, in an under, but decisive tone.

I breathed again. "Young Moskovsky! 'To be sure it is,'" I observed, with an air of thoughtful conviction.

"To be sure it is. Without reading a line, I have no doubt of it. I suspected that he meditated something. I must get Manstein directly, if it be by young Moskovsky. Any thing that young Moskovsky writes must be worth reading. What an excellent letter he writes! You are my oracle, Baroness Engel; I have no doubt of your discrimination; but I suspect that a certain correspondence with a brilliant young Muscovite has assisted you in your discovery."

"Be contented," rejoined the baroness, with a smile of affected mystery and pique, "that there is one who can enlighten you, and be not curious as to the source. Ah! there is Countess Norberg—how well she looks to-night!"

I walked away to salute Christiana. As I moved through the elegant crowd, my nervous ear constantly caught half phrases, which often made me linger. "Very satirical—very odd—very personal—very odd, indeed—what can it all be about? Do you know? No, I do not—do you? Baroness Engel—all in it—must get it—very witty—very flippant. Who can it be? Young Moskovsky. Read it at once without stopping—never read any thing so odd—ran off to St. Petersburg—always thought him very clever. Who can the Duke of Twaddle mean? Ah! to be sure—I wonder it did not occur to me."

I joined Christiana. I waltzed with her. I was on the point, once or twice, of asking her if she had read "Manstein," but did not dare. After the dance we walked away. Mademoiselle de Moltke, who, although young, was not charming, but very intellectual, and who affected to think me a great genius, because I had pasquinaded her father, stopped us.

"My dear countess, how do you do? You look most delightfully to-night. Count Contarini, have you read Manstein? You never read any thing! How can you say so! but you always say such things. You must read Manstein. Everybody is reading it. It is full of imagination, and very personal—very personal, indeed. Baroness Engel says we are all in it. You are there. You are Horace de Beaufort, who thinks every thing and everybody a bore—exactly like you, count, exactly—what I have always said of you. Adieu! mind you get Manstein, and then come and talk it over with me. Now do, that's a good creature!" And this talkative Titania tripped away.

"You are wearied, Christiana, and these rooms are insufferably hot. You had better sit down."

We seated ourselves in a retired part of the room. I observed an unusual smile upon the face of Christiana. Suddenly she said, with a slight flush, and not without emotion, "I shall not betray you, Contarini, but I am convinced that you are the author of Manstein."

I was very agitated—I could not immediately speak. I was ever different to Christiana to what I was to other people. I could not feign to her. I could not dissemble. My heart always opened to her, and it seemed to me almost blasphemy to address her in any other language but truth.

"You know me better than all others, Christiana. Indeed, you alone know me. But I would sooner hear that any one was considered the author of Manstein than myself."

"You need not fear that I shall be indiscreet, but rest assured it cannot long be a secret."

"Indeed!" I said: "why not?"

"O! Contarini, it is too like."

"Like whom?"

"Nay! you affect ignorance."

"Upon my honour, Christiana, I do not. Have the kindness to believe that there is at least one person in the world to whom I am not affected. If you mean that Manstein is a picture of myself, I can assure you most solemnly that I never less thought of myself than when I drew it. I thought it was an ideal character."

"It is that very circumstance that occasions the resemblance; for you, Contarini, whatever you may appear in this room, you are an ideal character."

"You have read it?" I asked.

"I have read it," she answered, seriously.

"And you do not admire it? I feel you do not. Nay! conceal nothing from me, Christiana. I can bear truth."

"I admire its genius, Contarini. I wish that I could speak with equal approbation of its judgment. It will, I fear, make you many enemies."

"You astonish me, Christiana. I do not care for enemies. I care for nobody but for you. But why should it make me enemies?"

"I hope I am mistaken. It is very possible I am mistaken. I know not why I talk upon such subjects. It is foolish—it is impertinent; but the interest, the deep interest I have always taken in you, Contarini, occasions this conversation, and must excuse it."

"Dear Christiana, how good, how very good you are!"

"And all these people whom you have ridiculed—surely, Contarini, you have enough already who envy you—surely, Contarini, it was most imprudent!"

"People ridiculed! I never meant to ridicule any person in particular. I wrote with rapidity. I wrote of what I had seen and what I felt. There is nothing but truth in it."

"You are not in a position, Contarini, to speak truth."

"Then I must be in a very miserable position, Christiana."

"You are what you are, Contarini. All must admire you. You are in a very envied, I will hope, a very enviable position."

"Alas! Christiana, I am the most miserable fellow that breathes upon this broad world."

She was silent.

"Dearest Christiana," I continued, "I speak to you as I would speak to no other person. Think not that I am one of those who deem it interesting to be considered unhappy. Such trifling I despise. What I say to you I would not confess to another human being. Among these people my vanity would be injured to be considered miserable. But I am unhappy, really unhappy, most desolately wretched. Envidable position! But an hour since I was meditating how I could extricate myself from it! Alas! Christiana, I cannot ask you for counsel, for I know not what I desire, what I could wish; but I feel—each hour I feel more keenly, and never more keenly than when I am with you, that I was not made for this life, nor this life for me."

"I cannot advise you, Contarini. What—what can I advise? But I am unhappy to find that you are. I grieve, I grieve deeply, that one apparently with all that can make him happy, should still miss felicity. You are yet very young, Contarini, and I cannot but believe that you will still attain all you desire, and all that you deserve."

"I desire nothing. I know not what I want. All that I know is, that what I possess I abhor."

"Ah! Contarini, beware of your imagination."

XV.

THE storm that had been apprehended by the present affection of Christiana surely burst. I do not conceive that my publisher betrayed me. I believe internal evidence settled the affair. In a fortnight it was acknowledged by all that I was the author of "Manstein," and all were surprised that this authorship could, for a moment, have been a question. I can give no idea of the outcry. Everybody was in a passion—affected to be painfully sensitive of their neighbours' wrongs. The very personality was ludicrously exaggerated. Everybody took a delight in detecting the originals of my portraits. Various keys were handed about, all different, and not content with recognising the very few decided sketches from life there really were, and which were sufficiently obvious, and not very malignant, they mischievously insisted, that not a human shadow glided over my pages which might not be traced to its substance, and protested that the Austrian minister was the model of an old woman.

Those who were ridiculed insisted that the ridicule called in question the very first principles of society. They talked of confidence violated which never had been shared, and faith broken which never had been pledged. Never was so much nonsense talked about nothing since the days of the schoolmen. But nonsense, when earnest, is impressive, and sometimes takes you in. If you are in a hurry, you occasionally mistake it for sense.

All the people who had read "Manstein," and been very much amused with it, began to think they were quite wrong, and that it was a very improper and wicked book, because this was daily reiterated in their ears by half a dozen bores, who had gained an immortality which they did not deserve. Such conduct, it was universally agreed, must not be encouraged. Where would it end? Everybody was alarmed. Men passed me in the street without notice—I received anonymous letters—and even many of my intimates grew cold. As I abhor explanations, I said nothing; and although I was disgusted with the folly of much that I heard, I contradicted nothing, however ridiculously false, and felt confident that, in time, the world would discover that they had been gulled into fighting the battle of a few individuals whom they despised. I found even a savage delight in being an object, for a moment, of public astonishment, and fear, and indignation. But the affair getting at last troublesome, I fought young De Bragnæs with swords in the Deer Park, and having succeeded in pinking him, it was discovered that I was more amiable. For the rest, out of my immediate circle, the work had been from the first decidedly successful.

In all this not very agreeable affair, I was delighted by the conduct of Christiana. Although she seriously disapproved of what was really objectionable in "Manstein," and although she was of so modest and quiet a temper, that she unwillingly exercised that influence in society to which her rank, and fortune, and rare accomplishments entitled her, she suddenly became my most active and violent partisan, ridiculed the pretended wrongs and mock propriety that echoed around her, and declaring that the author of "Manstein" had only been bold enough to print that which all repeated, rallied them on their hypocrisy. Baroness Engel also was faithful, although a little jealous of the zeal of Christiana, and between them they laughed down the cabal, and so entirely turned the public feeling, that in less than a month it was universally agreed that "Manstein" was a most delightful book, and the satire, as they daintily phrased it, "perfectly allowable."

Amid all this tumult my father was silent. From no look, from no expression of his, could I gain a hint either of his approval or his disapprobation. I could not ascertain even if he had seen the book. The Countess Fleming of course read it immediately, and had not the slightest conception of what it was about. When she heard it was by me, she read it again, and was still more puzzled, but told me she was delighted. When the uproar took place, instead of repeating, which she often did, all the opinions she had caught, she became quite silent, and the volumes disappeared from her table. The storm blew over, and no bolt had shivered me, and the volumes crept forth from their mysterious retirement.

About two months after the publication of "Manstein," appeared a new number of the great critical journal of the north of Europe. One of the works reviewed was my notorious production. I tore open the leaves with a blended feeling of desire and fear, which I can yet remember. I felt prepared for the worst. I felt that such grave censors, however impossible it was to deny the decided genius of the work, and however eager they might be to hail the advent of an original mind,—I felt that it was but reasonable and just that they should disapprove of the temper of the less elevated portions, and somewhat dispute the moral tendency of the more exalted.

With what horror, with what blank despair, with what supreme, appalling astonishment, did I find myself, for the first time in my life, a subject of the most reckless, the most malignant, and the most adroit ridicule. I was scarified—I was scalped. They scarcely condescended to notice my dreadful satire except to remark, in passing, by-the-by, I appeared to be as ill-tempered as I was imbecile. But all my eloquence, and all my fancy, and all the strong expression of my secret feelings—these ushers of the court of Apollo fairly laughed me off Parnassus, and held me up to public scorn, as exhibiting the most lamentable instance of mingled pretension and weakness, and the most ludicrous specimen of literary delusion that it had ever been their unhappy office to castigate, and, as they hoped, to cure.

The criticism fell from my hand. A film floated over my vision, my knees trembled. I felt that sickness of heart that we experience in our first serious scrape. I was ridiculous. It was time to die.

What did it signify? What was authorship to me? What did I care for their flimsy fame,—I, who yet not of age, was an important functionary of the state, and who might look to its highest confidence and honours. It was really too ludicrous. I tried to laugh. I did smile very bitterly. The insolence of these fellows! Why! if I could not write, surely I was not a fool. I had done something. Nobody thought me a fool. On the contrary, everybody thought me a rather extraordinary person. What would they think now? I felt a quail.

I buried my face in my hands. I summoned my thoughts to their last struggle. I penetrated into my very soul—and I felt the conviction, that literary creation was necessary to my existence, and that for it I was formed. And all the beautiful and dazzling forms that had figured in my youthful visions rose up before me, crowned monarchs, and radiant heroes, and women brighter than day, but their looks were mournful, and they extended their arms with deprecating anguish, as if to entreat me not to desert them. And in the magnificence of my emotions, and the beauty of my visions, the worldly sarcasms that had lately so shaken me, seemed something of another and a lower existence, and I marvelled that, for a moment, this thin, transient cloud could have shadowed the sunshine of my soul. And I arose, and lifted up my arm to heaven, and waved it like a banner, and I swore by the nature that I adored, that in spite of all opposition I would be an author, ay! the greatest of authors, and that far climes and distant ages should respond to the magic of my sympathetic page.

The agony was past. I mused in calmness over the plans that I should pursue. I determined to ride down to my father's castle, and there mature them in solitude. Haunt of my early boyhood, fragrant bower of Egeria, sweet spot where I first scented the bud of my spring-like fancy, willingly would I linger in thy green retreats, no more to be wandered over by one who now feels that he was ungrateful to thy beauty!

Now that I had resolved, at all costs, to quit my country, and to rescue myself from the fatal society in which I was placed, my impartial intelligence, no longer swayed by the conscious impossibility of emancipation, keenly examined and ascertained the precise nature and condition of my character. I perceived myself a being educated in systematic prejudice. I observed that I was the slave of custom, and never viewed any incident in relation to man in general, but only with reference to the particular and limited class of society of which I was a member. I recognised myself as selfish and affected. I was entirely ignorant of the principles of genuine morality, and I deeply felt that there was a total want of nature in every thing connected with me. I had been educated without any regard to my particular, or to my general nature; I had nothing to assist me in my knowledge of myself, and nothing to guide me in my conduct to others. The consequence of my unphilosophical education was my utter wretchedness.

I determined to re-educate myself. Conceiving myself a poet, I resolved to pursue a course which should develop and perfect my poetic power; and never forgetting that I was a man, I was equally earnest in a study of human nature to discover a code of laws which should regulate my intercourse with my fellow-creatures. For both these sublime purposes, it was necessary that I should form a comprehensive acquaintance with nature in all its varieties and conditions; and I resolved therefore to travel. I intended to detail all these feelings to my father, to conceal nothing from him, and request his approbation and assistance. In the event of his opposition, I should depart without his sanction, for to depart I was resolved.

I remained a week at the castle, musing over these projects, and entirely neglecting my duties, in the fulfilment of which, ever since the publication of "Manstein," I had been very remiss. Suddenly, I received a summons from my father to repair to him without a moment's delay.

I hurried up to town, and hastened to his office. He was not there, but expecting me at home. I found him busied with his private secretary, and apparently very much engaged. He dismissed his secretary immediately, and then said, "Contarini, they are rather troublesome in Norway. I leave town instantly for Bergen with the king. I regret it, because we shall not see each other for some little time. His majesty has had the goodness, Contarini, to appoint you secretary of legation at the court of London. Your appointment takes place at once, but I have obtained you leave of absence for a year. You will spend this attached to the legation at Paris. I wish you to be well acquainted with the French people before you join their neighbours. In France and England you will see two great practical nations. It will do you good. I am sorry that I am so deeply engaged now. My chasseur, Lausanne, will travel with you. He is the best travelling servant in the world. He served me when I was your age. He is one of the few people in whom I have unlimited confidence. He is not only clever, but he is judicious. You will write to me as often as you can. Strelamb," and here he rang the bell, "Strelamb has prepared all necessary letters and bills for you." Here the functionary entered: "Mr. Strelamb," said my father, "while you explain those papers to Count Contarini, I will write to the Duke of Montfort."

I did not listen to the private secretary, I was so astonished. My father, in two minutes, had finished his letter. "This may be useful to you, Contarini. It is to an old friend, and a powerful man. I would not lose time about your departure, Contarini. Mr. Strelamb, is there no answer from Baron Engel?"

"My lord, the carriage waits," announced a servant.

"I must go. Adieu! Contarini. Write when you arrive at Paris. Mr. Strelamb, see Baron Engel to-night, and send me off a courier with his answer. Adieu! Contarini."

He extended me his hand. I touched it very slightly. I never spoke. I was thunderstruck.

Suddenly I started up and rang the bell. "Send me Lausanne!" I told the servant.

Lausanne appeared. Had my astonishment not been excited by a greater cause, I might have felt considerable surprise at my father delegating to me his confidential domestic. Lausanne was a Swiss, about my father's age, with a frame of iron, and all the virtues of his mountains. He was, I believe, the only person in whom my father placed implicit trust. But I thought not of this then. "Lausanne, I understand you are now in my service."

He bowed.

"I have no doubt I shall find cause to confirm the confidence which you have enjoyed in our house for more than twenty years. Is every thing ready for my departure?"

"I had no idea that your excellency had any immediate intention to depart."

"I should like to be off to-night, good Lausanne, Ay! this very hour. When can I go?"

"Your excellency's wardrobe must be prepared. Your excellency has not given Carl any directions."

"None. I do not mean to take him. I shall travel only with you."

"Your excellency's wardrobe—"

"May be sufficiently prepared in an hour, and Paris must supply the rest. In a word, Lausanne, can I leave this place by daybreak to-morrow? Think only of what is necessary. Show some of your old energy."

"Your excellency may rest assured," said Lausanne, after some reflection, "that every thing will be prepared by that time."

"It is well. Is the countess at home?"

"The Countess quitted town yesterday on a visit to the Countess de Norberg."

"The Countess de Norberg! I should have seen her too. Go, Lausanne, and be punctual. Carl will give you the keys. The Countess de Norberg, Christiana!—Yes! I should have seen her. Ah! It is as well. I have no friends, and my adieus are brief, let them not be bitter. Farewell to the father that has no feeling, and thou, too, Scandinavia, stern soil in which I have too long lingered—think of me hereafter as of some exotic bird, who for a moment lost its way in your cold heaven, but now has regained its course, and wings its flight to a more brilliant earth and a brighter sky!"

PART THE THIRD.

I.

On the eighteenth day of August, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, I praise the Almighty Giver of all goodness, that, standing upon the height of Mount Jura, I beheld the whole range of the High Alps, with Mont Blanc in the centre, without a cloud: a mighty spectacle rarely beheld, for, on otherwise cloudless days, these sublime elevations are usually veiled.

I accepted this majestic vision as a good omen. It seemed that nature received me in her fullest charms. I was for some time so entranced that I did not observe the spreading and shining scene that opened far beneath me. The mountains, in ranges, gradually diminishing, terminated in isolated masses, whose enormous forms, in deep shade, beautifully contrasted with the glittering glaciers of the higher peaks, and rose out of a plain covered with fair towns and bright chateaux, embosomed in woods of chestnut, and vines festooning in orchards and corn-fields. Through the centre of the plain, a deep blue lake wound its way, which, viewed from the height of Jura, seemed like a purple girdle carelessly thrown upon some imperial robe.

I had remained in Paris only a few days, and, without offering any explanation to our minister, or even signifying my intention to Lausanne, had quitted that city with the determination of reaching Venice without delay. Now that it is probable I may never again cross the mountains, I often regret that I neglected this opportunity of becoming more acquainted with the French people. My head was then full of fantasies, and I looked upon the French as an anti-poetical nation; but I have since often regretted that I neglected this opportunity of becoming acquainted with a race who exercise so powerful an influence over civilization.

I had thought of Switzerland only as of a rude barrier between me and the fair object of my desires. The impression that this extraordinary country made upon me was perhaps increased by my previous thoughts having so little brooded over its idea. It was in Switzerland that I first felt how constantly to contemplate sublime creation develops the poetic power. It was here that I first began to study nature. Those forests of black gigantic pines rising out of the deep snows; those tall white cataracts leaping like headstrong youth into the world, and dashing from their precipices as if allured by the beautiful delusion of their own rainbow mist; those mighty clouds sailing beneath my feet, or clinging to the bosoms of the dark green mountains, or boiling up like a spell from the invisible and unfathomable depths; the fell avalanche, fleet as a spirit of evil, terrific when its sound suddenly breaks upon the almighty silence, scarcely less terrible when we gaze upon its crumbling and pallid frame, varied only by the presence of one or two blasted firs; the head of a mountain loosening from its brother peak, rooting up, in the roar of its rapid rush, a whole forest of pines, and covering the earth for miles with elephantine masses; the supernatural extent of landscape that opens to us new worlds; the strong eagles, and the strange wild birds that suddenly cross you in your path, and stare, and shrieking fly—and all the soft sights of joy and loveliness that mingle with these sublime and savage spectacles, the rich pastures, and the numerous flocks, and the golden bees, and the wild flowers, and the carved and painted cottages, and the simple manners and the primeval grace—wherever I moved, I was in turn appalled or enchanted, but whatever I beheld, new images ever sprang up in my mind, and new feelings ever crowded on my fancy.

There is something magical in the mountain air.

My heart is light, my spirits cheerful, every thing is exhilarating. I am in every respect a different being to what I am in lowlands. I cannot even think, I dissolve into a delicious reverie, in which every thing occurs to me without effort. Whatever passes before me gives birth in my mind to a new character, a new image, a new train of fancies. I sing, I shout, I compose aloud, but without premeditation, without any attempt to guide my imagination by my reason. How often, after journeying along the wild mule-track, how often, on a sunny day, have I suddenly thrown myself upon the turf, revelled in my existence, and then as hastily jumped up and raised the wild birds with a wilder scream. I think that these involuntary bursts must have been occasioned by the unconscious influence of extreme health. As for myself, when I succeed in faintly recalling the rapture which I have experienced in these solitary rambles, and muse over the flood of fancy which then seemed to pour itself over my whole being, and gush out of every feeling and every object, I contrast with mortification those warm and pregnant hours with this cold record of my maturer age.

I remember that when I first attempted to write, I had a great desire to indulge in simile, and that I never could succeed in gratifying my wish. This inability, more than any other circumstance, convinced me that I was not a poet. Even in "Manstein," which was written in a storm, and without any reflection, there are, I believe, few images, and those probably are all copied from books. That which surprised and gratified me most, when roving about Switzerland, was the sudden development which took place of the faculty of illustrating my thoughts and feelings. Every object that crossed me in some way associated itself with my moral emotions. Not a mountain, or lake, or river, not a tree, or flower, or bird, that did not blend with some thought, or fancy, or passion, and become the lively personification of conceptions that lie sleeping in abstraction.

It is singular that, with all this, I never felt any desire to write. I never thought of writing. I never thought of the future, or of man, or fame. I was content to exist. I began from this moment to suspect, what I have since learned firmly to believe, that the sense of existence is the greatest happiness, and that deprived of every worldly advantage, which is supposed so necessary to our felicity, life, provided a man be not immured in a dungeon, must nevertheless be inexpressibly delightful. If, in striking the balance of sensation, misery were found to predominate, no human being would permit himself to exist; but however vast may be the wretchedness occasioned to us by the accidents of life, the certain sum of happiness, which is always supplied by our admirably contrived being, ever supports us under the burden. Those who are sufficiently interested with my biography to proceed with it, will find, as they advance, that this is a subject on which I am qualified to offer an opinion.

I returned from these glowing rambles to my head-quarters, which was usually Geneva. I returned like the bees laden with treasure. I mused over all the beautiful images that had occurred to me, and all the new characters that had risen in my mind, and all the observations of nature which hereafter would perhaps permit me to delineate what was beautiful. For the moment that I mingled again with men I wished to influence them. But I had no immediate or definite intention of appealing to their sympathies. Each hour I was more conscious of the long apprenticeship that was necessary in the cunning craft for which, I conceived, I possessed a predisposition. I thought of "Manstein" as of a picture painted by a madman in the dark, and when I remembered that crude performance, and gazed upon the beauty, and the harmony, and the fitting parts of the great creations around me, my cheek has often burned even in solitude.

In these moments rather of humility than despondence, I would fly for consolation to the blue waters of that beautiful lake, whose shores have ever been the favourite haunt of genius, the fair and gentle Leman.

Nor is there indeed in nature a sight more lovely than to watch at decline of day the last embrace of the sun lingering on the rosy glaciers of the White Mountain. Soon, too soon the great luminary dies, the warm peaks subside into purple, and then die into a ghostly white; but soon, ah! not too soon, the moon springs up from behind a mountain, flings over the lake a stream of light, and the sharp glaciers glitter like silver.

I have often passed the whole night upon these enchanted waters, contemplating their beautiful variety; and, indeed, if any thing can console one for the absence of the moon and stars, it would be to watch the lightning, on a dark night, on this superb lake. It is incessant, and sometimes in four or five different places at the same time. In the morning, Lemn loses its ultramarine tint, and is covered with the shadows of mountains and cha-teaux.

In mountain valleys it is very beautiful to watch the effect of the rising and setting of the sun. The high peaks are first illumined, the soft yellow light then tips the lower elevations, and the bright golden showers soon bathe the whole valley, except a dark streak at the bottom, which is often not visited by sunlight. The effect of sunset is perhaps still more lovely. The highest peaks are those which the sun loves most. One by one, the mountains, relatively to their elevations, steal into darkness, and the rosy tint is often suffused over the peaks and glaciers of Mont Blanc, while the whole world below is enveloped in the darkest twilight.

What is it that makes me long to dwell upon these scenes, which, with all their loveliness, I have never again visited? Is it indeed the memory of their extreme beauty, or of the happy hours they afforded me, or is it because I am approaching a period of my life which I sometimes feel I shall never have courage to delineate?

II.

THE thunder roared, the flashing lightning revealed only one universal mist, the wind tore up the pines by their roots, and flung them down into the valley, the rain descended in inundating gusts.

When once I had resolved to quit Geneva, my desire to reach Venice returned upon me in all its original force. I had travelled to the foot of the Simplon without a moment's delay, and now I had the mortification to be detained there in a wretched mountain village, intersected by a torrent whose roar was deafening, and with large white clouds sailing about the streets.

The storm had lasted three days; no one had ever heard of such a storm at this time of the year; it was quite impossible to pass; it was quite impossible to say when it would end, or what would happen. The poor people only hoped that no evil was impending over the village of Brigg. As for myself, when, day after day, I awoke only to find the thunder more awful, the lightning more vivid, and the mist more gloomy, I began to believe that my two angels were combatting on the height of Simplon, and that some supernatural, and perhaps beneficent power, would willingly prevent me from entering Italy.

I retired to bed, I flung my cloak upon a chair opposite a blazing wood-fire, and I soon fell asleep. I dreamed that I was in the vast hall of a palace, and that it was full of reverend and bearded men in rich dresses. They were seated at a council table, upon which their eyes were fixed, and I, who had recently entered, stood aside. And suddenly their president raised his head, and observed me, and beckoned to me with much dignity. And I advanced to him, and he extended to me his hand, and said, with a gracious smile, "You have been long expected."

The council broke up, the members dispersed, and by his desire, I followed the president. And we entered another chamber, which was smaller, but covered with pictures, and on one side of the door was a portrait of Julius Cæsar, and on the other one of myself. And my guide turned his head, and pointing to the paintings, said, "You see you have been long expected. There is a great resemblance between you and your uncle."

And my companion suddenly disappeared, and being alone, I walked up to a large window, but I could distinguish nothing, except when the lightning revealed the thick gloom. And the thunder rolled over the palace. And I knelt down and prayed, and suddenly the window was irradiated, and the bright form of a female appeared. Her fair hair reached beneath the waist, her countenance was melancholy, yet seraphic. In her hand she held a crucifix. And I said, "O blessed Magdalen, have you at last returned? I have been long wandering in the wilderness, and methought you had forgotten me. And indeed I am about again to go forth, but Heaven frowns upon my pilgrimage." And she smiled and said, "Sunshine succeeds to storm. You have been long expected." And as she spoke, she vanished, and I looked again through the window, and beheld a beautiful city very fair in the sun. Its marble palaces rose on each side of a broad canal, and a multitude of boats skimmed over the blue water. And I knew where I was. And I descended from the palace to the brink of the canal, and my original guide saluted me, and, in his company, I entered a gondola.

A clap of thunder broke over the very house, and woke me. I jumped up in my bed. I stared. I beheld sitting in my room the same venerable personage in whose presence I had, the moment before, found myself. The embers of the fire shot forth a faint and flickering light. I felt that I had been asleep. I felt that I had dreamed. I even remembered where I was. I was not in any way confused. Yet before me was this mysterious companion, gazing upon me with the same gracious dignity with which he had at first beheld me in the palace. I remained sitting up in my bed, staring with starting eyes, and open mouth. Gradually his image became fainter and fainter. His features melted away, his form also soon dissolved, and I discovered only the empty chair and hanging cloak.

I jumped out of bed. The storm still raged. A bell was tolling. Nothing is more awful than a bell tolling in a storm. It was about three hours past midnight. I called Lausanne.

"Lausanne," I said, "I am resolved to cross the mountain by sunrise, come what come may. Offer any rewards, make what promises you please—but I am resolved to cross—even in the teeth of an avalanche." Although I am a person easily managed in little matters, and especially by servants, I spoke in a tone which Lausanne sufficiently knew me to feel was decisive. He was not one of those men who make or imagine difficulties, but, on the contrary, fruitful in discovering expedients, yet he seemed not a little surprised, and slightly hesitated.

"Lausanne," I said, "if you think it too dangerous to venture, I release you from your duty. But cross the mountain, and in two or three hours, I shall, even if I cross it alone."

He quitted the room. I threw a fresh log upon the fire, and repeated to myself, "I have been long expected."

III.

BEFORE six o'clock, all was prepared. Beside the postilions, Lausanne engaged several guides. I think we must have been about six hours ascend ing, certainly not more, and this does not much exceed the usual course. I had occasion on this, as I have since at many other conjunctures, to observe what an admirable animal is man when thrown upon his own resources in danger. The coolness, the courage, the perseverance, the acuteness, and the kindness with which my companions departed themselves, were as remarkable as they were delightful. As for myself, I could do nothing but lean back in the carriage, and trust to their experience and energy. It was indeed awful. We were almost always enveloped in mist, and if a violent gust, for a moment, dissipated the vapour, it was only to afford a glimpse of the precipices on whose very brink we were making our way. Nothing is more terrific than the near roar of a cataract in the dark. It is horrible. As for myself, I will confess that I was more than once fairly frightened, and when the agitated shouts of my companions indicated the imminence of the impending danger, I felt very much like a man who had raised the devil that he cannot lay.

The storm was only on the lower part of the mountain. As we ascended, it became clearer. The scene was perfect desolation. At length we arrived at a small table-land, surrounded by slight elevations, the whole covered with eternal snows. Cataracts were coursing down these hills in all directions, and the plain was covered with the chaotic forms of crumbled avalanches. The sky was a thick dingy white. My men gave a loud shout of exultation, and welcomed me to the summit of Simplon.

Here I shook hands, and parted with my faithful guides. As I was drinking a glass of brandy, and enveloping myself in my furs, the clouds broke towards Italy, and a beautiful streak of blue sky seemed the harbinger of the Ausonian Heaven. I felt in high spirits, and we dashed down the descent with an ease and rapidity that pleasantly reminded me, by the contrast, of our late labour.

A dashing descent down one of the High Alps is a fine thing. It is very exciting to scamper through one of those sublime tunnels, cut through solid rocks six thousand feet above the ocean,—to whirl along those splendid galleries over precipices whose terminations are invisible,—to gallop through passes, as if you were flying from the companions of the avalanches, which are dissolving at your feet,—to spin over bridges spanning a roaring and rushing torrent, and to dash through narrow gorges backed with eternal snows peeping over the nearer and blacker background.

It was a sudden turn. Never shall I forget it. I called to Lausanne to stop, and notwithstanding the difficulty, they clogged the wheels with stones. It was a sudden turn of the road. It came upon me like a spirit. The quick change of scenery around me had disturbed my mind, and prevented me from dwelling upon the idea. So it came upon me unexpectedly, most, most unexpectedly. Ah! why did I not then die! I was too happy. I stood up to gaze for the first time upon Italy, and the tears stole down my cheek.

Yes! yes! I at length gazed upon those beautiful and glittering plains. Yes! yes! I at length beheld those purple mountains, and drank the balmy breath of that fragrant and liquid air. After such longing, after all the dull misery of my melancholy life, was this great boon indeed accorded me! Why, why did I not then die? I was indeed, indeed too happy!

IV.

I AWOKE. I asked myself, "Am I indeed in Italy?" I could scarcely refrain from shouting with joy. While dressing, I asked many questions of Lausanne, that his answers might assure me of this incredible happiness. When he left the room, I danced about the chamber like a madman.

"Am I indeed in Italy?" My morning's journey was the most satisfactory answer. Although, of late, the business of my life had been only to admire nature, my progress was nevertheless one uninterrupted gaze.

Those azure mountains, those shining lakes, those gardens, and palaces, and statues, those cupolated convents crowning luxuriant wooded hills, and flanked by a single, but most graceful tree, the undulation of shore, the projecting headland, the receding bay, the roadside uninclosed, yet bounded with walnut, and vine, and fig, and acacia, and almond-trees, bending down under their bursting fruit, the wonderful effect of light and shade, the trunks of every tree looking black as ebony, and their thick foliage, from the excessive light, quite thin and transparent in the sunshine, the white sparkling villages, each with a church with a tall thin tower, the large melons trailing over the marble wall,—and, above all, the extended prospect, so striking after the gloom of Alpine passes, and so different in its sunny light from the reflected, unearthly glare of eternal snows,—yes, yes, this indeed was Italy! I could not doubt my felicity, even if I had not marked, with curious admiration, the black eyes and picturesque forms that were flashing and glancing about me in all directions.

Milan, with its poetic opera, and Verona, gay amid the mingling relics of two thousand years, and Vicenza, with its Palladian palaces and gates of triumph, and pensive Padua, with its studious colonnades, I tore myself from their attractions. Their choicest memorials only accelerated my progress, only made me more anxious to gain the chief seat of the wonderful and romantic people, who had planted in all their marketplaces the winged lion of St. Mark, and raised between Roman amphitheatres and feudal castles, their wild and Saracenic piles.

I was upon the Brenta, upon that river over which I had so often mused beneath the rigour of a Scandinavian heaven; the Brenta was before me with all those villas, which in their number, their variety, and their splendour, form the only modern creation that can be placed with the Baie of imperial Rome. I had quitted Padua at a very early hour to reach Venice before sunset. Halfway, the horses jibbed on the sandy road, and the carriage broke a spring. To pass the time while this accident was repairing, Lausanne suggested to me to visit a villa at hand, which was celebrated for the beauty of its architecture and gardens. It was inhabited only by an old domestic, who attended me over the building. The vast suite of chambers, and their splendid, although ancient decorations, were the first evidence I had yet encountered of that domestic magnificence of the Venetians of which I had heard so much. I walked forth into the gardens alone, to rid myself of the garrulous domestic. I proceeded along a majestic terrace, covered with orange trees, at the end of which was a very beautiful chapel. The door was unlocked, and I entered. An immense crucifix of ebony was placed upon the altar, and partly concealed a picture fixed over the holy table. Yet the picture could not escape me. O! no, it could not escape me; for it was the original of that famous Magdalen that had, so many years before, and in so different a place, produced so great a revolution in my feelings. I remained before it some time, and as I gazed upon it, the history of my life was again acted before me. I quitted the chapel, revolving in my mind this strange coincidence, and crossing the lawn I came to a temple which a fanciful possessor had dedicated to his friends. Over the portal was an inscription. I raised my sight, and read, "Enter; you have been long expected!"

I started, I looked around, all was silent. I turned pale; I hesitated to go in. I examined the inscription again. My courage rallied, and I found myself in a small, but elegant banqueting-house, furnished, but apparently long disused. I threw myself into a seat at the head of the table, and full of a rising superstition, I almost expected that some of the venerable personages of my dream would enter to share my feast. They came not; half an hour passed away; I rose, and without premeditation, I wrote upon the wall, "If I have been long expected, I have at length arrived. Be you also obedient to the call."

V.

An hour before sunset, I arrived at Fusini, and beheld, four or five miles out at sea, the towers and cupolas of Venice suffused with a rich golden light, and rising out of the bright blue waters. Not an exclamation escaped me. I felt like a man who has achieved a great object. I was full of calm exultation, but the strange incident of the morning made me serious and pensive.

As our gondolas glided over the great Lagune, the excitement of the spectacle reanimated me. The buildings, that I had so fondly studied in books and pictures, rose up before me. I knew them all; I required no cicerone. One by one, I caught the hooded cupolas of St. Mark, the tall Campanile red in the sun, the Moresco palace of the doges, the deadly Bridge of Sighs, and the dark structure to which it leads. Here my gondola quitted the Lagune, and, turning up a small canal, and passing under a bridge which connected the quays, stopped at the steps of a palace.

I ascended a staircase of marble, I passed through a gallery crowded with statues, I was ushered into spacious apartments, the floors of which were marble, and the hangings satin. The ceilings were painted by Tintoretto and his scholars, and were full of Turkish trophies and triumphs over the Ottomanite. The furniture was of the same rich material as the hangings; and the gilding, although of two hundred years duration, as bright and burnished as the costly equipment of a modern palace. From my balcony of blinds, I looked upon the great Lagune. It was one of those glorious sunsets which render Venice, in spite of her degradation, still famous. The sky and sea vied in the brilliant multiplicity of their blended tints. The tall shadows of her Palladian churches flung themselves over the glowing and transparent wave out of which they sprang. The quays were crowded with joyous groups, and the black gondolas flitted, like sea serpents, over the red and rippling waters.

I hastened to the Place of St. Mark. It was crowded and illuminated. Three gorgeous flags waved on the mighty staffs which are opposite the church in all the old drawings, and which once bore the standards of Candia, and Cyprus, and the Morea. The coffee-houses were full, and gay parties, seated on chairs in the open air, listened to the music of military bands, while they refreshed themselves with confectionary so rich and fanciful, that it excites the admiration and the wonder of all travellers, but which I have since discovered in Turkey to be oriental. The variety of costume was also great. The dress of the lower orders in Venice is still unchanged: many of the middle classes yet wear the cap and cloak. The Hungarian and the German military, and the bearded Jew, with his black velvet cap and flowing robes, are observed with curiosity. A few days also before my arrival, the Austrian squadron had carried into Venice a Turkish ship and two Greek vessels, who had violated the neutrality. Their crews now mingled with the crowd. I beheld, for the first time, the haughty and turbaned Ottoman, sitting cross-legged on his carpet under a colonnade, sipping his coffee and smoking a long chibouque, and the Greeks, with their small red caps, their high foreheads, and arched eyebrows.

Can this be modern Venice, I thought? Can this be the silent, and gloomy, and decaying city, over whose dishonourable misery I have so often wept! Could it ever have been more enchanting? Are not these indeed still subjects of a doge, and still the bridegrooms of the ocean? Alas! the brilliant scene was as unusual as unexpected, and was accounted for by its being the feast-day of a favourite saint. Nevertheless, I rejoiced at the unaccustomed appearance of the city at my entrance, and still I recall with pleasure the delusive moments, when strolling about the Place of St. Mark the first evening that I was in Venice, I for a moment mingled in a scene that reminded me of her lost light-heartedness, and of that unrivalled gayety that so long captivated polished Europe.

The moon was now in her pride. I wandered once more to the quay, and heard for the first time a serenade. A juggler was conjuring in a circle under the walls of my hotel, and an itinerant opera was performing on the bridge. It is by moonlight that Venice is indeed an enchanted city. The effect of the floods of silver light upon the twinkling fretwork of the Moresco architecture, the perfect absence of all harsh sounds, the never-ceasing music on the waters, produce an effect upon the mind which cannot be experienced in any other city. As I stood gazing upon the broad track of brilliant light that quivered over the Lagune, a gondolier saluted me. I entered his boat, and desired him to row me to the Grand Canal.

The marble palaces of my ancestors rose on each side, like a series of vast and solemn temples. How sublime were their broad fronts bathed in the mystic light, whose softening tints concealed the ravages of time, and made us dream only of their eternity! And could these great creations ever die! I viewed them with a devotion which I cannot believe could have been surpassed in the most patriotic period of the republic. How willingly would I have given my life to have once more filled their mighty halls with the proud retainers of their free and victorious nobles!

As I proceeded along the canal, and retired from the quarter of St. Mark, the sounds of merriment gradually died away. The light string of a gita.

alone twinkled in the distance, and the lamp of a gondola, swiftly shooting by, indicated some gay, perhaps anxious youth, hastening to the rendezvous of festivity and love. The course of the canal bent, and the moon was hid behind a broad, thick arch, which, black, yet sharply defined, spanned the breadth of the water. I beheld the famous Rialto.

Was it possible? was it true? was I not all this time in a reverie gazing upon a drawing in De Winter's studio? Was it not some delicious dream—some delicious dream, from which, perhaps this moment, I was about to be roused to cold, dull life? I struggled not to wake, yet from a nervous desire to move, and put the vision to the test, I ordered the gondolier to row to the side of the canal, jumped out, and hurried to the bridge. Each moment I expected that the arch would tremble and part, and that the surrounding palaces would dissolve into mist, that the lights would be extinguished, and the music cease, and that I should find myself in my old chamber in my father's house.

I hurried along, I was anxious to reach the centre of the bridge before I woke. It seemed like the crowning incident of a dream, which, it is remarkable, never occurs, and which, from the very anxiety it occasions, only succeeds in breaking our magical slumbers.

I stood upon Rialto; I beheld on each side of me, rising out of the waters, which they shadowed with their solemn image, those colossal and gorgeous structures raised from the spoils of the teeming orient, with their pillars of rare marbles, and their costly portals of jasper, and porphyry, and agate; I beheld them ranged in majestic order, and streaming with the liquid moonlight. Within these walls my fathers revelled!

I bowed my head, and covered my face with my hands. I could gaze no more upon that fair, but melancholy vision.

A loud but melodious chorus broke upon the air. I looked up, I marked the tumultuous waving of many torches, and heard the trampling of an approaching multitude. They were at the foot of the bridge. They advanced, they approached. A choir of priests, bearing in triumph the figure of a saint, and followed by a vast crowd carrying lights, and garlands, and banners, and joining in a joyful hymn, swept by me. As they passed, they sang this verse—

“Wave your banners! Sound, sound your voices! for he has come, he has come! Our saint and our lord! He has come, in pride and in glory, to greet with love his Adrian bride.”

It is singular, but these words struck me as applicable to myself. The dream at the foot of the Alps, and the inscription in the garden on the Brenta, and the picture in the chapel, there was a connexion in all these strange incidents which indeed harmonized with my early life and feelings, I fully believed myself the object of an omnipotent destiny, over which I had no control. I delivered myself up, without a struggle, to the eventful course of time. I returned home pensive, yet prepared for a great career, and as the drum of the Hungarian guard sounded, as I entered the Lagune, I could not help fancying that its hurried note was ominous of surprise and consternation. I remembered that when a boy, sauntering with Musæus, I believed that I had a predisposition for conspiracies, and I could not forget that, of all places in the world, Venice was the one in which I should most desire to find myself a conspirator.

I returned to the hotel, but as I was little inclined to slumber, I remained walking up and down the gallery, which, on my arrival, amid the excitement of so many distracting objects, I had but slightly noticed. I was struck by its size and its magnificence, and as I looked upon the long row of statues gleaming in the white moonlight, I could not refrain from pondering over the melancholy fortunes of the high race who had lost this sumptuous inheritance, commemorating even in its present base uses, their noble exploits, magnificent tastes, and costly habits.

Lausanne entered. I inquired if he knew to what family of the republic this building had originally belonged?

“This was the Palazzo Contarini, sir.”

I was glad that he could not mark my agitation.

“I thought,” I rejoined, after a moment's hesitation, “I thought the Palazzo Contarini was on the Grand Canal.”

“There is a Palazzo Contarini on the Grand Canal, sir, but this is the original palace of the house. When I travelled with my lord, twenty-five years ago, and was at Venice, the Contarini family still maintained both establishments.”

“And now?” I inquired. This was the first time that I had ever held any conversation with Lausanne; for although I was greatly pleased with his talents, and could not be insensible to his ever-watchful care, I had from the first suspected that he was a secret agent of my father, and, although I thought fit to avail myself of his abilities, I had studiously withheld from him my confidence.

“The family of Contarini is, I believe extinct,” replied Lausanne.

“Ah!” Then thinking that something should be said to account for my ignorance of that with which apparently I ought to have been well acquainted, I added in a careless voice. “We have never kept up any intercourse with our Italian connexions, which I do not regret, for I shall not enter into society here.”

The moment that I had uttered this, I felt the weakness of attempting to mystify Lausanne, who probably knew much more of the reasons of this non-intercourse than myself. He was moving away when I called him back with the intention of speaking to him fully upon this subject of my early speculations. I longed to converse with him about my mother, and my father's youth, about every thing that had happened.

“Lausanne,” I said.

He returned. The moon shone brightly upon his imperturbable and inscrutable countenance. I saw only my father's spy. A feeling of false shame prevented me from speaking. I did not like frankly to confess my ignorance upon such delicate subjects to one who would, in all probability, affirm his inability to enlighten me, and I knew enough of him to be convinced that I could not acquire by stratagem that which he would not willingly communicate.

“Lausanne,” I said, “take lights into my room. I am going to bed.”

VI.

ANOTHER sun rose upon Venice, and presented to me the city whose image I had so early acquired. In the heart of a multitude there was stillness. I looked out from the balcony on the crowded quays of yesterday; one or two idle porters were stretched in sleep on the scorching pavement, and a solitary gondola stole over the gleaming waters. This was all.

It was the Villeggiatura, and the absence of the nobility from the city invested it with an aspect even more deserted than it would otherwise have possessed. I cared not for this. For me indeed, Venice, silent and desolate, owned a greater charm than it could have commanded with all its feeble imitation of the worthless bustle of a modern metropolis. I congratulated myself on the choice season of the year in which I had arrived at this enchanting city. I do not think that I could have endured to have been disturbed by the frivolous sights and sounds of society, before I had formed a full acquaintance with all those marvels of art that command our constant admiration, while gliding about the lost capital of the doges, and before I had yielded a free flow to those feelings of poetic melancholy which swell up in the soul as we contemplate this memorable theatre of human action, wherein have been performed so many of man's most famous and most graceful deeds.

If I were to assign the particular quality which conduces to that dreamy and voluptuous existence which men of high imagination experience in Venice, I should describe it as the feeling of abstraction, which is remarkable in that city, and peculiar to it. Venice is the only city which can yield the magical delights of solitude. All is still and silent. No rude sound disturbs your reveries; fancy, therefore is not put to flight. No rude sound distracts your self-consciousness. This renders existence intense. We feel every thing. And we feel thus keenly in a city not only eminently beautiful, not only abounding in wonderful creations of art, but each step of which is hallowed ground, quick with associations, that in their more various nature, their nearer relation to ourselves, and perhaps their more picturesque character, exercise a greater influence over the imagination than the more antique story of Greece and Rome. We feel all this in a city too, which, although her lustre be indeed dimmed, can still count among her daughters maidens fairer than the orient pearls with which her warriors once loved to deck them. Poetry, Tradition, and Love,—these are the graces that have invested with an ever-charming cæstus this aphrodite of cities.

As for myself, ere the year drew to a close, I was so captivated with the life of blended contemplation and pleasure that I led in this charming city, that I entirely forgot my great plan of comprehensive travel, that was to induce such important results, and not conceiving that earth could yield me a spot where time could flow on in a more beautiful and tranquil measure, more exempt from worldly anxiety, and more free from vulgar thoughts, I determined to become a Venetian resident. So I quitted the house of my fathers, which its proprietor would not give up to me, and in which, under its present fortune, I could not bear to live, converted Lausanne into a major-domo, and engaged a palace on the Grand Canal.

VII.

THERE is in Venice a very ancient church situate in an obscure quarter of the city, whither I was in the habit of often resorting. It is full of the tombs of Contarini. Two doges under their fretwork canopies, with their hands crossed over their breasts, and their heads covered with their caps of state, and reposing on pillows, lie on each side of the altar. On the platform before the church, as you ascend the steps from your gondola, is a colossal statue of a Contarini, who defeated the Genoese. It is a small church, built and endowed by the family. To this day there they sing masses for their souls.

One sunshiny afternoon I entered this church, and repaired as was my custom to the altar, which, with its tombs, was partially screened from the body of the building, being lighted by the large window in front, which considerably overtopped the screen. They were singing a mass in the nave, and I placed myself at the extreme side of the altar in the shade of one of the tombs, and gazing upon the other. The sun was nearly setting, the opposite tomb was bathed with the soft, warm light which streamed in from the window. I remained watching the placid and heroic countenance of the old doge, the sunlight playing on it, till it seemed to smile. The melodious voices of the choir, praying for Contarini, came flowing along the roof with so much sentiment and sweetness, that I was soon wrapped in self-oblivion, and although my eye was apparently fixed upon the tomb, my mind wandered in delightful abstraction.

A temporary cessation of the music called me to myself. I looked round, and to my surprise beheld a female figure kneeling before the altar. At this moment, the music recommenced. She evidently did not observe me. She threw over her shoulders the black veil with which her face had hitherto been covered. Her eyes were fixed upon the ground; her hands raised, and pressed together in prayer. I had never beheld so beautiful a creature. She was very young, her countenance perfectly fair, but without colour, or tinted only with the transient flush of devotion. Her features were very delicate, yet sharply defined. I could mark her long eyelashes touching her cheek; and her dark hair, parted on her white brow, fell on each side of her face in tresses of uncommon length and lustre. Altogether she was what I had sometimes fancied as the ideal of a Venetian beauty. As I watched her, her invocation ceased, and she raised her large dark eyes with an expression of melancholy that I never shall forget.

And as I gazed upon her, instead of feeling agitated and excited, a heaviness crept over my frame, and a drowsiness stole over my senses. Enraptured by her presence, anxiously desirous to ascertain who she might be, I felt to my consternation, each moment more difficulty in moving, even in seeing. The tombs, the altar, the kneeling suppliant, moved confusedly together, and mingled into mist, and sinking back on the tomb which supported me, I fell, as I supposed, into a deep slumber.

I dreamed that a long line of Venetian nobles, two by two, passed before me, and, as they passed, they saluted me, and the two doges were there, and as they went by, they smiled and waved their bonnets. And suddenly there appeared my father alone, and he was dressed in a northern dress, the hunting dress I wore in the forest of Jonsterna, and he stopped and looked upon me with great severity, and I withdrew my eye, for I could not bear his glance, and when I looked up again he was not there, but the lady of the altar. She stood before me clinging to a large crucifix, a large crucifix of ebony, the same that I had beheld in the chapel in the gardens on the Brenta. The tears hung quivering on her agitated countenance. I would have rushed forward to console her, but I woke.

I woke, I looked around, I remembered every thing. She was not there. It was twilight, and the tombs were barely perceptible. All was silent, I stepped forth from the altar into the body of the church. A single acolyte was folding up the surplices and placing them in a trunk. I inquired if he had seen any lady go out. He had seen nothing. He stared at my puzzled look, which was the look of a man roused from a very vivid dream. I went forth; one of my gondoliers was lying on the steps: I asked him also if he had seen any lady go out. He assured me that no person had come forth except the priests. Was there any other way? They believed not. I endeavoured to re-enter the church to examine, but it was locked.

VIII.

If ever the science of metaphysics ceases to be a frivolous assemblage of unmeaning phrases, and we attempt to acquire that knowledge of our nature which is doubtless open to us by the assistance of facts instead of words; if ever, in short, the philosophy of the human mind be based on demonstration instead of dogma, the strange incident just related, will perhaps not be considered the wild delusion of a crack-brained visionary. For myself, I have no doubt that the effect produced upon me by the lady in the church was a magnetic influence, and that the slumber which, at the moment, occasioned me so much annoyance, and so much astonishment, was nothing less than a luminous trance.

I knew nothing of these high matters then, and I returned to my palace in a state of absolute confusion. It was so reasonable to believe that I had fallen asleep, and that the whole was a dream. Every thing was thus most satisfactorily accounted for. Nevertheless I could not overcome my strong conviction, that the slumber which I could not deny, was only a secondary incident, and that I had positively, really, absolutely beheld kneeling before the altar that identical and transcendent form, that in my dream or vision I had marked clinging to the cross.

I examined the gondoliers on my return home. I elicited nothing. I examined myself the whole evening. I resolved that I had absolutely seen her. I attended at the church the next day; nothing occurred. I spoke to the priests. I engaged one to keep a constant observation. Nothing ever transpired.

The Villeggiatura was over, the great families returned, the carnival commenced. Venice was full and gay. There were assemblies every evening. The news that a young foreign nobleman had come to reside at Venice, of course, quickly spread. My establishment, my quality, and, above all, my name, ensured me a hospitable reception, although I knew not a single individual, and, of course, had not a single letter. I did not encourage their attentions. I went nowhere, except to the opera, which opened with the carnival. I have a passion for instrumental music, but I admire little the human voice, which appears to me, with all our exertions, a poor instrument. Sense and sentiment too are always sacrificed to dexterity and caprice. A grand orchestra fills my mind with ideas,—I forget every thing in the stream of invention. A prima donna is very ravishing, but while I listen, I am a mere man of the world, or hardly sufficiently well-bred to conceal my weariness.

The effect of music upon the faculty of invention is a subject on which I have long curiously observed, and deeply meditated. It is a finer prelude to creation than to execution. It is well to meditate upon a subject under the influence of music, but to execute, we should be alone, and supported only by our essential and internal strength. Were I writing, music would produce the same effect upon me as wine. I should, for a moment, feel an unnatural energy and fire, but, in a few minutes, I should discover that I shadowed forth only phantoms, my power of expression would die away, and my pen would fall upon the insipid and lifeless page. The greatest advantage that a writer can derive from music is, that it teaches most exquisitely the art of development. It is in remarking the varying recurrence of a great composer to the same theme, that a poet may learn how to dwell upon the phasis of a passion, how to exhibit a mood of mind under all its alternations, and gradually to pour forth the full tide of feeling.

The last week of the carnival arrived, in which they attempted to compress all the frolic which should be diffused over the rest of the forty days, which, it must be confessed, are dull enough. At Venice, the beauty and the wildness of the carnival still lingered. St. Mark's Place was crowded with masks. It was even more humorous to observe these grotesque forms in repose than in action; to watch a monster with a nose a foot long, and asses' ears, eating an ice, or a mysterious being with a face like a dolphin, refreshing herself with a fan as huge as a parasol. The houses were covered with carpets and tapestry, every place was illuminated, and everybody pelted with sweetmeats and sugarplums. No one ever seemed to go to bed; the water was covered with gondolas, and everybody strummed a guitar.

During the last nights of the carnival, it is the practice to convert the opera-house into a ball-room, and on these occasions, the highest orders are masked. The scene is indeed very gay and amusing. In some boxes, a standing supper is always ready, at which all guests are welcome. But masked you must be. It is even strict etiquette on these occasions for ladies to ramble about the theatre unattended, and the great diversion of course is the extreme piquancy of the incognito conversations, since, in a limited circle, in which few are unknown to each other, it is, of course, not difficult to impregnate this slight parley with a sufficient quantity of Venetian salt.

I went to one of these balls, as I thought something amusing might occur. I went in a domino, and was careful not to enter my box, lest I should be discovered. As I was sauntering along one of the rooms near the stage, a female mask saluted me.

"We did not expect you," she said.

"I only came to meet you," I replied.

"You are more gallant than we supposed you to be."

"The world is seldom charitable," I said

"They say you are in love."

"You are the last person to consider that wonderful."

"Really quite chivalric. Why! they said you were quite a wild man."

"But you, signora, have tamed me."

"But do you know they say you are in love?"

"Well! doubtless with a charming person."

"O! yes, a very charming person. Do you know they say you are Count Narcissus, and in love with yourself?"

"Do they indeed! They seem to say vastly agreeable things, I think. Very witty, upon my honour."

"O! very witty, no doubt of that, and you should be a judge of wit, you know, because you are a poet."

"You seem to know me well."

"I think I do. You are the young gentleman, are you not, who has quarrelled with his papa?"

"That is a very vague description."

"I can give you some further details."

"O! pray spare me, and yourself."

"Do you know I have written your character?"

"Indeed! It is doubtless as accurate as most others."

"O! it is founded upon the best authorities. There is only one part imperfect. I wish to give an account of your works. Will you give me a list?"

"I must have an equivalent, and something more interesting than my own character."

"Meet me to-night at the Countess Malbrizzi's."

"I cannot, I do not know her."

"Do not you know, that in carnival time, a mask may enter any house? After the ball, all will be there. Will you meet me? I am now engaged."

This seemed the opening of an adventure which youth is not inclined to shun. I assented, and the mask glided away, leaving me in great confusion and amazement at her evident familiarity with my history.

IX.

I ARRIVED at the steps of the Malbrizzi palace amid a crowd of gondolas. I ascended without any announcement into the saloons, which were full of guests. I found, to my great annoyance, that I was the only mask present. I felt that I had been fairly taken in. I perceived that I was an object of universal attention. I had a great inclination to make a precipitate retreat. But on reflection, I determined to take a rapid survey before my departure, and then retire with dignity. Leaning against a pillar, I flattered myself I appeared quite at my ease.

A lady, whom I had already conjectured to be the mistress of the mansion, advanced and addressed me. Time had not yet flown away with her charms.

"Signor Mask," she said, "ever welcome, and doubly welcome, if a friend."

"I fear I have no title to admission within these walls, except the privilege of the season."

"I should have thought otherwise," said the lady. "if you be one for whom many have inquired."

"You must mistake me for another. It is not probable that any one would inquire after me."

"Shall I tell you your name?"

"Some one has pretended to give me that unnecessary information already to-night."

"Well! I will not betray you, but I am silent in the hope that you will, ere midnight, reward me for my discretion by rendering it unnecessary. We trust that the ice of the north will melt beneath our Venetian sun. You understand me?" So saying, she glided away.

I could not doubt that this lady was the Countess Malbrizzi, and that she was the female mask who had addressed me in the opera-house. She evidently knew me. I had not long to seek for the source whence she attained this knowledge. The son of the Austrian minister at our court, and who had himself been attached to the legation, passed by me. His uncle was Governor of Venice. Every thing was explained.

I moved away, intending to retire. A group, in the room I entered, attracted my attention. Several men were standing round a lady apparently entreating her, with the usual compliments and gesticulations, to play upon the guitar. Her face was concealed from me; one of her suite turned aside, and notwithstanding the difference of her rich dress, I instantly recognised the kneeling lady of the church. I was extremely agitated. I felt the inexplicable sensation that I had experienced on the tomb. I was fearful that it might end in as mortifying a catastrophe. I struggled against the feeling, and struggled successfully. As I thus wrestled with my mind, I could not refrain from gazing intently upon the cause of my emotion. I felt an overwhelming desire to ascertain who she might be. I could not take my eyes from her. She impressed me with so deep an interest, that I entirely forgot that any other human beings were present. It was fortunate that I was masked. My fixed stare must have excited great curiosity.

As I stood thus gazing upon her, and as each moment her image seemed more vividly impressed upon my brain, a chain round her neck snapped in twain, and a diamond cross suspended to it fell to the ground. The surrounding cavaliers were instantly busied in seeking for the fallen jewel. I beheld, for the first time, her tall and complete figure. Our eyes met.

To my astonishment, she suddenly grew pale, she ceased conversing, she trembled, and sank into a chair. A gentleman extended to her the cross, she received it, her colour returned, a smile played upon her features, and she rose from her seat.

The countess passed me. I saluted her. "I now wish you to tell me," I said, "not my own name, but the name of another person. Will you be kind?"

"Speak."

"That lady," I said, pointing to the group, "I have a very great wish to know who that lady may be."

"Indeed!" said the countess, "I have a great wish also that your curiosity should be gratified. That is Signora Alceste Contarini."

"Contarini!" I exclaimed, "how wonderful! I mean to say, how singular! that is, I did not know—"

"That there were any other Contarinis but your excellency, I suppose."

"It is idle to wear this disguise," I said, taking off my mask, and letting my domino slip to the ground. "I have ever heard that it was impossible to escape the penetration of the Countess Malbrizzi."

"My penetration has not been much exercised to-night, count; but I assure you I feel gratified to have been the means of inducing you to enter a society, of which the Baroness Fleming was once the brightest ornament. Your mother was my friend."

"You have, indeed, the strongest claim then to the respect of her son. But this young lady—"

"Is your cousin, an orphan, and the last of the Contarinis. You should become acquainted. Permit me to introduce you." I accompanied her. "Alceste, my love," continued the countess, "those should not be unknown to each other whom nature has intended to be friends. Your cousin, Count Contarini Fleming, claims your acquaintance."

"I have not so many relations that I know not how to value them," said Alceste, as she extended me her hand. The surrounding gentlemen moved away. We were alone. "I arrived so unexpectedly at Venice, that I owe to a chance my introduction to one whose acquaintance I should have claimed in a more formal manner."

"You are merely, then, a passing visitor? We heard it was your intention to become a resident."

"I have become one. It has been too difficult for me to gain this long-desired haven, again to quit it without a very strong cause. But when I departed from my country, it was for the understood purpose of making a very different course. My father is not so violent a Venetian as myself, and, for aught I know, conceives me now in France or England. In short, I have played truant, but I hope you will pardon me."

"To love Venice is with me so great a virtue," she replied, with a smile, "that, I fear, instead of feeling all the impropriety of your conduct, I sympathize too much with this violation of duty."

"Of course you could not know my father. You may have heard of him. It has always been to me a source of deep regret that he did not maintain his connexion with my mother's family. I inherit something even more Venetian than her name. But the past is too painful for my father to love to recall it. My mother, you know—"

"I am an orphan, and can feel all your misfortune. I think our house is doomed."

"I cannot think so when I see you." She faintly smiled, but her features settled again into an expression of deep melancholy, that reminded me of her countenance in the church.

"I think," I observed, "this is not the first time I have had the pleasure of seeing you."

"Indeed! I am not aware of our having before met."

"I may be wrong. I dare say you will think me very strange. But I cannot believe it was a dream, though certainly I was—but really it is too ridiculous. You know the church where are the tombs of our family?"

"Yes!" Her voice was low, but quick. I fancied she was not quite at ease.

"Well! I cannot help believing that we were once together before that altar."

"Indeed! I have returned to Venice a week. I have not visited the church since we came back."

"O! this must have been a month ago. It certainly is very strange; I suppose it must have been a dream; I have sometimes odd dreams, and yet—it is in consequence of that supposed meeting in the church that I recognised you this evening, and immediately sought an introduction."

"I know the church well. To me—I may say to us," she added, with a gentle inclination of the head, "it is, of course, a spot very interesting."

"I am entirely Venetian. I have no thought for any other country. This is not a new sentiment excited by the genius of the place. It was as strong amid the forests and snows of the north, as strong, I may truly say, when a child, as at this moment, when I would peril my life and fortunes in her service."

"You are indeed enthusiastic. Alas! enthusiasm is little considered here. We are, at least, still light-hearted, but what cause we have for gayety, the smilers perhaps know. It is my misfortune not to be one of them. And yet resignation is all that is left us, and—"

"And what?" I asked, for she hesitated.

"Nothing," she replied, "nothing. I believe I was going to add, it is better to forget."

"Never! The recollection of the past is still glory. I would sooner be a Contarini amid our falling palaces, than the mightiest noble of the most flourishing of modern empires."

"What will your father say to such romanee?"

"I have no father. I have no friend, no relative in the world, except yourself. I have disclaimed my parentage, my country, my allotted career, and all their rights, and honours, and privileges, and fame, and fortune. I have, at least, sacrificed all these for Venice; for, trifling as the circumstances may be, I can assure you this, merely to find myself a visitant of that enchanting city, I have thrown to the winds all the duties and connexions of my past existence."

"But why bind your lot to the fallen and the irredeemable? I have no choice but to die where I was born, and no wish to quit a country from which spring all my associations; but you—you have a real country, full of real interests to engage your affections and exercise your duties. In the north you are a man—your career may be active, intelligent and useful; but the life of a Venetian is a dream, and you must pass your days like a ghost gliding about a city fading in a vision."

"It is this very character that interests me. I have no sympathy with reality. What vanity is all the empty bustle of common life! It brings to me no gratification; on the contrary, most degrading annoyance. It develops all the lowering attributes of my nature. In the world, I am never happy but in solitude; and in solitude so beautiful and so peculiar as Venice, my days are indeed a dream, but a dream of long delight. I gaze upon the beautiful, and my mind responds to the inspiration, for my thoughts are as lovely as my visions."

"Your imagination supports you. It is a choice gift. I feel too keenly my reality."

"At least, I cannot imagine that you should either feel, or give rise to, any other feelings but those that are enchanting."

"Nay! a truce to compliments. Let me hear something worthier from you."

"Indeed," I said, seriously, "I was not thinking of compliments, nor am I in a mood for such frivolities. Yet I wish not to conceal, that in meeting you this evening, I have experienced the most gratifying incident of my life."

"I am happy to have met you—if, indeed, it is possible to be happy about any thing."

"Dear Alceste—may I call you Alceste?—why should so fair a brow be clouded?"

"It is not unusually gloomy—my heaven is never serene. But, see! the rooms are nearly empty, and I am waited for."

"But we shall soon meet again?"

"I shall be here to-morrow. I reside with my maternal uncle, Count Delfini. I go out but little, but to-morrow I shall certainly be here."

"I shall not exist until we again meet. I entreat you, fail not."

"O! I shall certainly be here; and, in the mean time, you know," she added, with a smile, "you can dream."

"Farewell, dear Alceste! you cannot imagine how it grieves me to part."

"Adieu!—shall I say Contarini?"

X.

To say that I was in love, that I was in love at first sight—these are weak, worldly phrases to describe the profound and absorbing passion that filled my whole being. There was a mystical fulfilment in our meeting, the consciousness of which mingled with my adoration, and rendered it quite supernatural. This was the Adrian bride that I had come to greet. This was the great and worthy object of so many strange desires, and bewildering dreams, and dark coincidences. I returned to my palace—I threw myself into a chair, and sat for hours in mute abstraction. At last, the broad light of morning broke into the chamber—I looked up, glanced round at the ghastly chandeliers, thought of the coming eve, and retired.

In the evening I hurried to the opera. I did not see Alceste. I entered the box of the countess. A young man rose as I entered, and retired. "You see," I said, "your magic has in a moment converted me into a man of the world."

"I am not the enchantress," said the countess, "although I willingly believe you are enchanted."

"What an agreeable assembly you introduced me to last night!"

"I hope that I shall find you a constant guest."

"I fear that you will find me too faithful a votary. I little imagined, in the morning, that I could lay claim to relationship with so interesting a person as your charming young friend."

"Alceste is a great favourite of mine."

"She is not here, I believe, to-night?"

"I think not—Count Delfini's box is opposite, and empty."

"Count Delfini is, I believe, some connexion—"

"Her uncle. They will be soon, as you are perhaps aware, nearer connected."

"Indeed!" I said.

"You know that Alceste is betrothed to his son, Count Grimani. By-the-by, he quitted the box as you entered. You know him?"

I sank back in my chair—I turned pale.

"Do you admire this opera?" I inquired.

"It is a pretty imitation."

"Very pretty."

"We shall soon change it."

"Very soon."

"They have an excellent opera at St. Petersburg, I understand. You have been there?"

"Yes—no—I understand very excellent. This house is very hot." I rose up, bowed, and abruptly departed.

I instantly quitted the theatre, covered myself up in my cloak, threw myself down in my gondola, and groaned. In a few minutes I arrived home, I was quite unexpected. I ran up stairs. Lausanne was about to light the candles. I sent him away. I was alone in the large, dark chamber, which seemed only more vast and gloomy for the bright moon.

"Thank God!" I exclaimed, "I am alone. Why do I not die! Betrothed! It is false; she cannot be another's. She is mine; she is my Adrian bride. Destiny has delivered her to me. Why did I pass the Alps! Heaven frowned upon the passage. Yet I was expected. I was long expected. Poh! she is mine. I would cut her out from the heart of a legion. Is she happy? Her heaven is never serene." Mark that. I will be the luminary to dispel these clouds. Betrothed! Infamous jargon! She belongs to me. Why did I not stab him! Is there ne'er a bravo in Venice that will do the job! Betrothed! What a word! what an infamous, what a ridiculous word! She is mine, and she is betrothed to another. Most assuredly, if she be only to be attained by the destruction of the city, she shall be mine. A host of Delfinis shall not balk me.

"Now this is no common affair. It shall be done, and it shall be done quickly. I cannot doubt she loves me. It is as necessary that she should love me, as that I should adore her. We are bound together by Fate. We belong to each other: 'I have been long expected.'

"Ah! were these words a warning or a prophecy? Have I arrived too late! Let it be settled at once, this very evening. Suspense is madness. She is mine, most assuredly she is mine. I will not admit for a moment that she is not mine. That idea cannot exist in my thoughts. It is the end of the world, it is doomsday for me. Most assuredly, she is my Adrian bride, my bride, not my betrothed merely, but my bride.

"Let me be calm. I am calm. I never was calmer in my life. Nothing shall ruffle, nothing shall discompose me. I will have my rights. This difficulty will make our future lives more sweet. We shall smile at it in each other's arms. Grimani Delfini! If there be blood in that name, it shall flow. Sooner than another should possess her, she should herself be sacrificed. A solemn sacrifice, a sweet and solemn sacrifice, consecrated by my own doom! I would lead her to the altar like Iphigenia. I—

"O! inscrutable, inexorable destiny, which must be fulfilled! Doom that mortals must endure, and cannot direct—lo! I kneel down before thee, and I pray!—Let it end, let it end, let it end at once! This suspense is insanity. Is she not mine! Didst thou not whisper it in the solitude of the north, didst thou not confirm it amid the thunder of the Alps, didst thou not reanimate my drooping courage, even amid this fair city I so much love, this land of long and frequent promise! And shall it not be! Do I exist, do I breathe, and think, and dare—am I a man, and a man of strong passions and deep thoughts—and shall I, like a vile beggar upon my knees, crave the rich heritage that is my own right! If she be not mine, there is no longer Venice, no longer human existence, no longer a beautiful and everlasting world. Let it all cease; let the whole globe crack and shiver; let all nations and all human hopes expire at once; let chaos come again, if this girl be not my bride!"

I determined to go to the Malbrizzi palace. My spirit rose as I ascended the stairs. I felt confident she was there. Her form was the first that occurred to me as I entered the saloon. Several persons were around her, among them Grimani Delfini. I did not care. I had none of the jealousy of petty loves. She was unhappy, that was sufficient; and if there were no other way of disentangling the mesh, I had a sword that should cut this Gordian knot in his best blood. I saluted her. She presented me to her cousin. I smiled upon one who, at all events, should be my victim.

"I hope that we shall make Venice agreeable to you, count," said Grimani.

"There is no doubt," I replied.

We conversed for some time on indifferent subjects. My manner was elated. I entered into the sparkling contest of conversation with success. The presence of Alceste was my inspiration. I would not quit her side, and in time, we were once more alone.

"You are ever gay," she remarked.

"My face is most joyful when my heart is most gloomy. Happiness is tranquil. Why were you not at the opera?"

"I go out very little."

"I went there only to meet you. I detest these assemblies. You are always surrounded by a crowd of moths. Will you dance?"

"I have just refused Grimani."

"I am glad of it. I abhor dancing. I only asked you to monopolize your company."

"And what have you been doing to-day? Have you seen all our spectacles?"

"I have just risen. I did not go to bed last night. I sat up musing over our strange meeting."

"Was it so strange?"

"It was stranger than you imagine."

"You are mysterious."

"Every thing is mysterious, although I have been always taught the reverse."

"I believe, too," she remarked, with a pensive air and in a serious tone, "that the courses of this world are not so obvious as we imagine."

"The more I look upon you, the more I am convinced that yesterday was not our first meeting. We have been long acquainted."

"In dreams?"

"What you please. Dreams, visions, prophecies, I believe in them all. You have often appeared to me, and I have often heard of you."

"Dreams are doubtless very singular."

"They come from heaven. I could tell you stories of dreams that would indeed surprise you."

"Tell me."

"When I was about to pass the Alps,—but really it is too serious a narrative for such a place. Do you know the villa of the temple on the Brenta?"

"Assuredly, for it is my own."

"Your own! Then you are indeed mine."

"What can you mean?"

"The temple, the temple—"

"And did you write upon the wall?"

"Who else! Who else! But why I wrote—that I would tell you."

"Let us walk to these rooms. There is a terrace, where we shall be less disturbed."

"And where we have been long expected."

"Ah!"

XI.

"It is wonderful, most wonderful!" and she leaned down and plucked a flower.

"I wish I were that flower," I said.

"It resembles me more than you, Contarini," and she threw it away.

"I see no resemblance."

"It is lost."

I picked it up and placed it in my bosom.

"It is found," I replied, "and cherished."

"We are melancholy," said Alceste, "and yet we are not happy. Your philosophy—is it quite correct?"

"I am happy you should resemble me, because I wish it."

"Good wishes do not always bring good fortunes."

"Destiny bears to us our lot, and destiny is perhaps our own will."

"Alas! my will is brighter than my doom!"

"Both should be beautiful, and shall—"

"O talk not of the future. Come, Contarini, come, come, away."

XII.

SHALL I endeavour to recall the soft transport which this night suffused itself over my being? I existed only for one object; one idea only was impressed upon my brain. The next day passed in a delicious listlessness and utter oblivion of all cares and duties. In the evening, I rose from the couch on which I had the whole day reclined musing on a single thought, and flew to ascertain whether that wizard Imagination had deceived me, whether she were, indeed, so wondrous fair and sweet, and that this earth could indeed be graced by such surpassing loveliness.

She was not there. I felt her absence as the greatest misfortune that had ever fallen upon me. I could not anticipate existing four-and-twenty hours without her presence. I lingered in expectation of her arrival. I could hear nothing of her. Each moment I fancied she must appear. It seemed impossible that so bitter a doom awaited me, as that I should not gaze this night upon her beauty. She did not come. I remained to the last, silent and anxious, and returned home to a sleepless bed.

The next morning I called at the Delfini palace, to which I had received an invitation. Morning was an unusual time to call, but for this I did not care. I saw the old count and countess, and her ladyship's cavalier, who was the most frivolous and ancient Adonis I had ever witnessed. I talked with them all, all of them with the greatest good humour, in the hope that Alceste would at length appear. She did not. I ventured to inquire after her. I feared she might be unwell. She was quite well, but engaged with her confessor. I fell into one of my silent rages, kicked the old lady's poodle, snubbed the cavalier, and stalked away.

In the evening, I was careful to be at the Malbrizzi palace. The Delfini were there, but not Alceste. I was already full of suspicions, and had been brooding the whole morning over a conspiracy. "Alceste is not here," I observed to the countess, "is she unwell?"

"Not at all. I saw her this morning. She was quite well.—I suppose Count Grimani is jealous"

"Hah!" thought I, "has it already come to that?"

Let us begin, then. I feel very desperate. This affair must be settled. Fed by her constant presence and her smiles, the flame of my passion could for a time burn with a calm and steady blaze—but I am getting mad again. I shall die if this state of things last another day. I have half a mind to invite him to the terrace, and settle it at once. Let me see, cannot I do more?"

I mused a moment, quitted the saloon, called the gondola, and told them to row me to the Delfini palace.

We glided beneath that ancient pile. All was dark, save one opened window, whence proceeded the voice of one singing. I knew that voice. I motioned to the gondoliers to rest upon their oars.

"'Tis the Signora Contarini," whispered Tita, who was acquainted with the family.

We floated silently beneath her window. Again she sang.

I marked a rose bedewed with tears, a white and virgin rose; and I said, "O! rose, why do you weep, you are too beautiful for sorrow!" And she answered, "Lady, mourn not for me, for my grief comes from Heaven."

She was silent. I motioned to Tita, who, like many of the gondoliers, was gifted with a fine voice, to answer. He immediately sang a verse from one of the favourite ballads of his city. While he sang, I perceived her shadow, and presently I observed her in the middle of the apartment. I plucked from my breast a flower, which I had borne for her to the Malbrizzi palace, and cutting off a lock of my hair, I tied it round the rose, and threw it into the chamber.

It fell upon the table. She picked it up, she stared at it for some moments, she smiled, she pressed it to her lips.

I could restrain myself no longer. I pushed the gondola alongside the palace, clambered up the balcony, and entered the room.

She started, she nearly shrieked, but restrained herself.

"You are surprised, Alceste, perhaps you are displeased. They are endeavouring to separate us; I cannot live without you."

She clasped her hands, and looked up to heaven with a glance of anguish.

"Yes! Alceste," I exclaimed, advancing, "let me express what my manner has never attempted to conceal; let me express to you my absolute adoration. I love you, my Alceste, I love you with a passion as powerful as it is pure, a passion which I cannot control, a passion which ought not to be controlled."

She spoke not, she turned away her head and deprecated my advances with her extended arms.

"Alceste, I know all. I know the empty, the impious ceremony that has doomed you to be the bride of a being whom you must abhor. My Alceste is not happy. She herself told me her heaven was not serene—the heaven in whose light I would forever lie."

I advanced, I stole her hand, I pressed it to my lips. Her face was hidden in her arm, and that reclined upon a pillar.

There was for a moment silence. Suddenly she withdrew her hand, and said, in a low, but distinct voice, "Contarini, this must end."

"End! Alceste, I adore you. You—you dare not say you do not love me. Our will is not our own. Destiny has linked us together, and Heaven has interposed to consecrate our vows. And shall a form, a dull, infamous form, stand between our ardent and hallowed loves!"

"It is not that, Contarini, it is not that, though that were much. No, Contarini, I am not yours."

"Not mine, Alceste! not mine! Look upon me. Think who I am, and dare to say you are not mine. Am I not Contarini Fleming? Are not you my Adrian bride? Heaven has delivered you to me."

"Alas! alas! Heaven keeps me from you."

"Alceste, you see kneeling before you one who is indeed nothing, if fame be what some deem. I am young, Alceste, the shadow of my mind has not yet fallen over the earth. Yet there is that within me,—and at this moment I prophesy,—there is that within me which may yet mould the mind and fortunes of my race—and of this heart, capable of these things, the fountains are open, Alceste, and they flow for you. Disdain them not, Alceste; pass them not by with carelessness. In the desert of your life, they will refresh you—yes, yes, they can indeed become to you a source of all felicity.

"I love you with a love worthy of your being; I love you as none but men like me can love. Blend not the thought of my passion with the commonplace affections of the world. Is it nothing to be the divinity of that breathing shrine of inspiration, my teeming mind? O! Alceste, you know not the world to which I can lead you, the fair and glorious garden in which we may wander forever!"

"I am lost!" she exclaimed, "but I am yours."

I caught her in my arms; yea! I caught her in my arms, that dark-eyed daughter of the land I loved. I sealed her sweet lips with passionate kisses. Her head rested on my breast; and I dried with embraces her fast-flowing tears.

XIII.

I HAD quitted Alceste so abruptly that I had made no arrangements for our future meeting. Nor indeed for some time could I think of any thing but my present and overflowing joy. So passionately was I entranced with all that had happened, so deeply did I muse over all that had been said and done, so sweetly did her voice linger in my ear, and so clearly did her fond form move before my vision, that hours elapsed before I felt again the craving of again beholding her. I doubted not that I should find her at the Malbrizzi palace. I was disappointed, but my disappointment was not bitter like the preceding eve. I felt secure in our secret loves, and I soon quitted the assembly again to glide under her window. All was dark. I waited, Tita again sang. No light appeared, no sound stirred.

I resolved to call at the palace, to which I had received the usual general invitation. The family were out, and at the Pisani palace. I returned to Madame Malbrizzi's. I looked about for my young Austrian acquaintance. I observed him, I fell into conversation. I inquired if he knew Count Pisani, and on his answering in the affirmative, I requested him to accompany me there. We soon arrived at the Pisani palace. I met the Delfini, but no Alceste. I spoke to the countess. I listened to several stories about her lap-dog; I even anticipated her ancient cavalier in picking up her glove. I ventured to inquire after Alceste. They believed she was not quite well. I quitted the palace, and repaired again to the magical window. Darkness and silence alone greeted me. I returned home, more gloomy than anxious.

In the morning, Lausanne brought me a letter. I broke the seal with a trembling hand and with a faint blush. I guessed the writer. The words seemed traced by love. I read.

"I renounce our vows, I retract my sacred pledge, I deliver to the winds our fatal love.

"Pity me, Contarini, hate me, despise me, but forget me.

"Why do I write? Why do I weep? I am nothing, O! I am nothing. I am blotted out of this fair creation, and the world that should bring me so many joys, brings me only despair.

"Do not hate me, Contarini, do not hate me. Do not hate one who adores you. Yes! adore—for even at this dread moment, when I renounce your love, let me pour forth my adoration.

"Am I insensible? am I unworthy of the felicity, that for an instant we thought might be mine? O! Contarini, no one is worthy of you, and yet I fondly believe my devotion might compensate for my imperfectness.

"To be the faithful companion of his life, to be the partner of his joy and sorrow, to sympathize with his glory, and to solace his grief—I ask no more, I ask no more thou Heaven! Wilt thou not smile upon me! Wilt thou, for whom I sacrifice so much, wilt thou not pity me!

"All is silent. There is no sign. No heavenly messenger tells me I may be happy. Alas! alas! I ask too much, I ask too much. It is too great a prize. I feel it, I believe it. My unworthiness is great, but I am its victim.

"Contarini, let this console you. I am unworthy of you. Heaven has declared I am unworthy of you. Were I worthy of you, Heaven would not be cruel. O! Contarini, let this console you. You are destined for higher joys. Think not of me, Contarini, think not of me, and I—I will be silent.

"Silent! and where? O! world, that I now feel that I could love, beautiful, beautiful world—thou art not for me, thou art not for me, and Heaven, Heaven, to whom I offer so much, surely, surely, in this agony it will support me.

"I must write, although my pen refuse to inscribe my woe; I must write, although my fast-flowing tears bathe out the record of my misery. O! my God! for one moment uphold me. Let the future at least purchase me one moment of present calm! Let me spare, at least, him! Let me at least, in this last act of my love, testify my devotion by concealing my despair.

"You must know all, Contarini, you must know all. You must know all, that you may not hate me. Think me not light, think me not capricious. It is my constancy that is fatal, it is my duty that is my death.

"You love our country, Contarini, you love our Italy. Fatal, fatal Italy! O! Contarini, fly, fly away from us. Cross again those Alps that Heaven frowned upon you as you passed. Unhappy country! I am the victim of thy usages, who was born to breathe amid thy beauty. You know the customs of this land. The convent is our school—it leads to the cloister, that is too often our doom. I was educated at a Tuscan convent. I purchased my release from it, like many of my friends, and the price was my happiness, which I knew not then how to prize. The day that I quitted the convent, I was the betrothed bride of Grimani Delfini. I was not then terrified by that, the memory of which now makes me shudder. It is a common, though an unhallowed incident.

"I entered that world of which I had thought so much. My mind developed with my increased sphere of knowledge. Let me be brief. I soon could not contemplate without horror the idea of being the bride of a man I could not love. There was no refuge. I postponed, by a thousand excuses, our union. I had recourse to a thousand expedients to dissolve it. Vain struggling of a slave! In my frenzy, the very day that you entered Italy, I returned to Florence on the excuse of visiting a friend, and secretly devoted myself to the cloister. The abbess, allured by the prospect of attaining my property for her institution, became my confidant, and I returned to Venice only to make in secret the necessary preparations for quitting it for ever.

"The Delfinis were on the Brenta. I repaired one day to the villa which you visited, and which, though uninhabited, became, from having been the favourite residence of my father, a frequent object of my visits. As I walked along the terrace, I perceived for a moment and at a distance, a stranger crossing the lawn. I retired into the chapel, where I remained more than an hour. I quitted the chapel and walked to the temple. I was attracted by some writing on the wall. I read it, and although I could ascribe to it no definite meaning, I could not help musing over it. I sat down in a chair at the head of the table. Whether I were tired by the walk, or overpowered by the heat, I know not, but an unaccustomed drowsiness crept over my limbs, and I fell asleep. I not only fell asleep, but, O! Contarini, I dreamed, and my dream was wonderful and strange.

"I found myself alone in the cloisters of a convent, and I heard afar the solemn chant of an advancing procession. It became louder and louder, and soon I perceived the nuns advancing, with the abbess at their head. And the abbess came forward to claim me, and to my horror, her countenance was that of Grimani Delfini. And I struggled to extricate myself from her grasp, and suddenly the stranger of the morning rushed in and caught me in his arms, and the cloister melted away, and I found myself in a beautiful country, and I woke.

"The sun had set. I returned home, pensive and wayward. Never had I thought of my unhappy situation with more unhappiness. And each night the figure of the stranger appeared to me in my dreams, and each day I procrastinated my return to Florence. And in the agitation which these strange dreams produced, I determined to go and pray at the tombs of my fathers. I quitted the villa Delfini with a single female attendant, and returned to it the same day. I entered the church through a private door from the adjoining building, which was a house of charity founded by our family.

"You know the rest, Contarini, you know the rest. We met. The stranger of my dreams stood before me. My heart before that meeting—already yours, and when you whispered to me—you too—

"Wo! wo! why are we not happy! You said that Heaven had brought us together. Alas! Contarini, Heaven, Heaven has parted us. I avoided you, Contarini, I flew from the spell which each instant grew stronger. You sought me. I yielded. Yes! I yielded, but long vigils shall atone for that fatal word.

"Go, Contarini, go forth in glory and in pride. I will pray for you. I will ever think of you, I will ever think of my best, my only beloved. All the prosperity human imagination can devise, and heavenly love can grant, hover over you! You will be happy, you must be happy. For my sake you will be happy—and I—I am alone, but I am alone with my Redeemer,

"ERE you have received this, I shall have crossed the Apennines—pursuit is hopeless; and my Contarini will, I am sure, respect my vow."

It was read. My spirit was never more hushed in my life—I was quite calm. She might be in a convent, and it might be necessary to burn the convent down, and both of us might probably perish in the flames. But what was death to the threatened desolation? I sent for Lausanne. "Lausanne," I said, "I have a very high opinion of your talents and energy. I have hitherto refrained from putting them to the test, for particular reasons. A circumstance has occurred in which I require not only their greatest exertion, but devotion and fidelity. If you accomplish my wish, you are no longer my servant, you are my friend for life. If you fail, it matters little, for I shall not survive. But if you betray me, Lausanne—" and I looked through his very soul.

"The consequences may be fatal to me. I understand you. When I entered your service, you are under a mistake if you consider my fidelity restricted."

"It is well; I place implicit trust in you. Signora Contarini has quitted Venice suddenly. Her present abode is a secret. She informs me that she has departed for Tuscany, and is by this time in a convent. This may be to mislead me, or to gain time—I wish to ascertain it."

"There will be no difficulty, my lord," said Lausanne, with a smile. "There are no secrets in Venice to the rich."

"It is well. I shall remain in this room until I hear from you. I care not how much is expended. Away; and for God's sake, Lausanne, bring me good news."

XIV.

I WALKED up and down the room without stopping. Not an idea crossed my mind. In two hours Lausanne returned.

"Well, well?" I exclaimed.

"There is, I think, little doubt that the signora departed for the villa Delfini. She may now have quitted it. I sent Tita to the palace, as he is acquainted with the household. This is all he could elicit."

"The gondola, the gondola. Rest you here, Lausanne, and let me know when I return what ships are about to leave the port. Tell the banker I shall want money—a considerable sum; two thousand sequins; and let the bills be ready for my signature. And, Lausanne," I added in a low tone, "I may require a priest. Have your eye upon some fellow who will run over the ceremony without asking questions. If I be any time absent, say I have gone to Trieste."

My gondoliers skimmed along. We were soon at Fusina. I shook my purse to the postillion. The horses were ready in an instant. I took Tita with me, as he knew the servants. We dashed off at a rate which is seldom achieved on those dull, sandy roads. We hurried on for three or four hours. I told Tita to have his eye for any of the Delfini household. As we were passing the gate of the villa of the temple, he turned round on the box and said, "By the blood of the holy Baptist, your excellency, there is the little Maria, Signora Alceste's attendant. She just now entered that side door. I knew her by the rose-coloured ribands which I gave her last carnival."

"Did she see us?"

"I think not, for the baggage would have smiled."

"Drive back a hundred yards."

It was sunset. I got out of the carriage, and stole into the gardens of the villa unperceived. I could see no lights in the building. From this I inferred that Alceste was perhaps only paying a farewell visit to her father's house. I ran along the terrace, I observed no one. I gained the chapel. I instinctively trod very lightly. I glanced in at the window. I perceived a form kneeling before the altar. There was a single candle. The kneeling figure leaned back with clasped hands. The light fell upon the countenance. I beheld the face of Alceste Contarini.

I opened the door gently, but it roused her. I entered.

"I come," I said, "to claim my bride."

She screamed, she jumped upon the altar, and clung to the great ebony cross. It was the same figure, and the same attitude, that I beheld in my vision in the church.

"Alceste," I said, "you are mine. There is no power in heaven or earth, there is no infernal influence that can prevent you from being mine. You are as much part of me as this arm with which I now embrace you." I tore her from the cross, I carried her fainting form out of the chapel.

The moon had risen. I rested on a bank, and watched with blended passion and anxiety her closed eyes. She was motionless, and her white arms drooped down apparently without life. She breathed, yes! she breathed. That large eye opened, and darkened into light. She gazed around with an air of vacancy. A smile, a faint, sweet smile played upon her face. She slightly stretched her beautiful frame, as if again to feel her existence, and moved her beautiful arms, as if to try whether she yet retained power over her limbs. Again she smiled, and exclaiming "Contarini!" threw them round my neck.

"O! my Alceste, my long-promised Alceste, you are indeed mine."

"I am yours, Contarini. Do with me what you like."

XV.

WE WALKED to the temple, in order that she might compose herself before her journey. I sat down in the same chair, but not alone. Alceste was in my arms. Happiness is indeed tranquil, for our joy was full, and we were silent. At length I whispered to her that we must go. She rose, and we were about to leave the temple, when she would go back and kiss my inscription.

She remembered the maid, whom I had forgotten. I sent Tita to tell his friend that a carriage had arrived from Madame Malbrizzi's for his mistress, who was obliged suddenly to return, and that she was to remain behind. I wrapped Alceste in my cloak and placed her in my arms in the carriage, and then returned to Venice.

The gondola glided swiftly to my palace. I carried Alceste out, and bore her in my arms to her apartment. She entreated that I would not, for a moment, quit her. I was obliged therefore to receive Lausanne's report at the door. There was no vessel immediately about to depart, but a ship had quitted the port that morning for Candia, and was still beating about in the offing. He had himself seen the captain, who was content to take passengers, provided they would come out to him. This suited my plans. Lausanne had induced the captain to lie-to till the morning. A priest, he told me, was waiting.

I broke to Alceste, lying exhausted upon the sofa, the necessity of our instant departure, and our instant union. She said it was well; that she should never be at ease till she had quitted Venice, and that she was ready. I postponed our marriage until the night, and insisted upon her taking some refreshment, but she could not eat. I gave directions to Lausanne to prepare for our instant departure. I resolved to take Tita with me, with whom I was well pleased.

I was anxious about the marriage, because, although I believed it invalid in a Catholic country without a dispensation, it would, as I conceived, hold good in Protestant law. I was careful of the honour of the Contarinis, and at this moment, was not unmindful of the long line of northern ancestry, which I did not wish my child to disgrace.

The ingenuity of Lausanne was always remarkable at conjunctures like the present. The magic of his character was his patience. This made him quicker and readier, and more successful than all other men. He prepared every thing, and anticipated wants of which we could not think.

Two hours before midnight, I was united, by the forms of the Catholic church, to Alceste Contarini, the head of the most illustrious house in Europe, and the heiress of a fortune, which, in spite of its decay, was not unworthy of her birth. Two servants were the only witnesses of an act, to fulfil which she imagined herself to peril her eternal welfare, and which exercised a more certain and injurious influence over her worldly fortunes and reputation.

At daybreak, Lausanne roused me, saying that the wind was favourable, and we must be off. He had already despatched Tita to the ship with all our baggage. I rose, wrote to my banker, informing him that I should be absent some time, and requesting him to manage every thing for my credit, and then I kissed my still sleeping wife. The morning light fell upon her soft face. A slight flush melted away as I gazed upon her, and she opened her eyes and smiled. Never had she looked more beautiful. I would have given half my fortune to have been permitted to remain at Venice in tranquillity and peace.

But doubly sweet is the love that is gained by danger, and guarded by secrecy. All was prepared. We stepped, perhaps for the last time, into a gondola. The gray sea was before us, we soon reached the ship, Tita and the captain were standing at the ladder-head. The moment that we embarked the sails were set, and a dashing breeze bore us along out of the gulf. Long ere noon, that Venice, with its towers and cupolas, which I had forfeited so much to visit, and all those pleasant palaces wherein I could have lived forever, had faded into the blue horizon.

XVI.

THE ship was an imperial merchant brig. The wife of the captain was on board, a great convenience for Alceste, who was without female attendance, and with the exception of some clothes the provident Lausanne had obtained from Tita's sister, without a wardrobe. But these are light hardships for love, and the wind was favourable, and the vessel fleet. We were excellent sailors, and bore the voyage without inconvenience, and the novelty of the scene, and the beauty of the sea amused and interested us.

I imbibed from this voyage a taste for a sea life, which future wanderings on the waters have only confirmed. I never find the sea monotonous. The variations of weather, the ingenious tactics, the rich sunsets, the huge, strange fish, the casual meetings, and the original and racy character of mariners, and perhaps also the frequent sight of land, which offers itself in the Mediterranean, afford me constant amusement. I do not think that there is in the world a kinder-hearted and more courteous person than a common sailor. As for their attentions to Alceste they were even delicate, and I am sure, that although a passionate lover, I might have taken many a hint from their vigilant solicitude. Whenever she was present their boisterous mirth was instantly repressed. She never walked the deck that a ready hand was not quick in clearing her path of any impediments, and ere I could even discover she was weary, their watchful eyes anticipated her wants, and they proffered her a rude but welcome seat. Ah! what a charming voyage was this, when my only occupation was to look upon an ever-smiling face, and to be assured a thousand times each hour, that I was the cause of all this happiness.

Lausanne called me one morning on deck. Our port was in sight. I ran up; I beheld the highlands of Candia—a rich, wild group of lofty blue mountains, and in the centre, the snowy peak of Mount Ida. As we approached, the plain, extending from the base of the mountains to the coast, became perceptible, and soon a town and harbour.

We were surrounded by boats full of beings in bright and strange costumes. A new world, a new language, a new religion, were before us. Our deck was covered with bearded and turbaned men. We stared at each other in all this picturesque confusion, but Lausanne, and especially Tita, who spoke Greek, and knew Candia well, saved us from all anxiety. We landed, and, thanks to being in a Turkish province, there was no difficulty about passports, with which we were unprovided, and a few sequins saved the captain from explaining why his passengers were not included in his ship's papers. We landed, and were lodged in the house of a Greek, who officiated as a European vice-consul.

The late extraordinary incidents of our lives had followed each other with such rapidity, that when we woke in the morning, we could scarcely believe that it was not at all a dream. We looked round our chamber with its strange furniture, and stared at the divans, and small, high windows, shadowed with painted glass, and smiled. Our room was darkened, but, at the end, opened an arch bright in the sun. Beautiful strange plants quivered in the light. The perfume of orange-trees filled our chamber, and the bees were clustering in the scarlet flowers of the pomegranate. Amid the pleasing distraction of these sweet sounds and scents we distinguished the fall of a fountain.

We stole forward to the arch like a prince and princess just disenchanted in a fairy tale. We stepped into a court paved with marble, and full of rare shrubs. The fountain was in the centre. Around it were delicate mats of Barbary, and small bright Persian carpets; and crouching on a scarlet cushion was a white gazelle.

I stepped out, and found our kind host, who spoke Italian. I sent his lovely daughter, Alexina, whose cheeks were like a cleft of pomegranate, to my wife. As for myself, by Lausanne's advice, I took a Turkish bath, which is the most delightful thing in the world, and when I was reduced to a jelly, I repaired to our host's divan, where his wife, and three other daughters, all equally beautiful, and dressed in long flowing robes of different coloured velvets richly embroidered, and caps of the same material, with tassels of gold, and covered with pearls, came forward. One gave me a pipe seven feet long, another fed me with sweetmeats, a third pressed her hand to her heart, as she presented me coffee in a small cup of porcelain, resting in a filagree frame, and a child, who sparkled like a fairy, bent her knee, as she proffered me a vase of sherbet. I felt like a pasha, and the good father translated my compliments.

I thought that Alceste would never appear, and I sent Lausanne to her door fifty times. At length she came, and in a Greek dress, which they had insisted upon her wearing. I thought we should have both expired with laughing. We agreed that we were perfectly happy.

This was all very delightful, but it was necessary to arrange our plans. I consulted Lausanne. I wished to engage a residence in a retired part of the island. We spoke to our host. He had a country house, which would exactly suit us, and desired a tenant. I sent Lausanne immediately to examine it. It was only fifteen miles away. His report was most satisfactory, and I, at once, closed with the consul's offer.

The house was a long, low building, in the eastern style, with plenty of rooms. It was situated on a very gentle, green hill, the last undulation of a chain of Mount Ida, and was perfectly embowered with gardens, and plantations of olive and orange. It was about two miles from the sea, which appeared before us in a wild and rocky bay. A peasant, who cultivated the gardens, with his wife and children, two daughters just breaking into womanhood, and a young son, were offered to us as servants. Nothing could be more convenient. Behold us at length at rest!

XVII.

I HAVE arrived at a period of my life which, although it afforded me the highest happiness that was ever the lot of man, of which the recollection is now my never-ceasing solace, and to enjoy the memory of which is alone worth existence, cannot prove very interesting to those who have been sufficiently engaged by my history to follow me to my retirement in ancient Crete.

My life was now monotonous, for my life was only love.

I know not the palling of passion, of which some write. I have loved only once, and the recollection of the being to whom I was devoted, fills me at this moment with as much rapture, as when her virgin charms were first yielded to my embrace. I cannot comprehend the sneers of witty rakes, at what they call constancy. If beings are united by any other consideration but love, constancy is of course impossible, and I think, unnecessary. To a man who is in love, the thought of another woman is uninteresting, if not repulsive. Constancy is human nature. Instead of love being the occasion of all the misery of this world, as is sung by fantastic bards, I believe that the misery of this world is occasioned by there not being love enough. This opinion, at any rate, appears more logical. Happiness is only to be found in a recurrence to the principles of human nature, and these will prompt very simple manners. For myself, I believe that permanent union of the sexes should be early encouraged; nor do I conceive that general happiness can ever flourish but in societies where it is the custom for all the males to marry at eighteen. This custom, I am informed, is not unusual in the United States of America, and its consequence is a simplicity of manners, and a purity of conduct, which Europeans cannot comprehend, but to which they must ultimately have recourse. Primeval barbarism, and extreme civilization, must arrive at the same results. Men, under those circumstances, are actuated by their organization; in the first instance, instinctively; in the second, philosophically. At present, we are all in the various gradations of the intermediate state of corruption.

I could have lived with Alceste Contarini in a solitude for ever. I desired nothing more than to enjoy existence with such a companion. I would have communicated to her all my thoughts and feelings. I would have devoted to her solitary ear the poetry of my being. Such a life might not suit others. Others influenced by a passion not less ardent, may find its flame fed by the cares of life, cherished by its duties and its pleasures, and flourishing amid the travail of society. All is an affair of organization. Ours would differ. Among all men, there are some points of similarity and sympathy. There are few alike, there are some perfectly unlike the mass. The various tribes that people this globe in all probability, spring from different animals. Until we know more of ourselves, what use are our systems! For myself, I can conceive nothing more idle or more useless than what is styled moral philosophy. We speculate upon the character of man; we divide and we subdivide; we have our generals, our sages, our statesmen. There is not a modification of mind that is not mapped in our great atlas of intelligence. We cannot be wrong, because we have studied the past, and we are famous for discovering the future when it has taken place. Napoleon is first consuls, and would found a dynasty. There is no doubt of it. Read my character of Cromwell. But what use is the discovery, when the consul is already tearing off his republican robe, and snatching the imperial diadem? And suppose, which has happened, and ma and will happen again, suppose a being of a different organization to Napoleon or Cromwell placed in the same situation,—a being gifted with a combination of intelligence hitherto unknown, where then is our moral philosophy, our nice study of human nature? How are we to speculate upon results, which are to be produced by unknown causes? What we want is to discover the character of a man at his birth, and found his education upon his nature. The whole system of moral philosophy is a delusion, fit only for the play of sophists in an age of physiological ignorance.

I leave these great speculations for the dreariness of future hours. Alceste calls me to the golden sands, whither it is our wont to take our sunset walk.

A Grecian sunset! The sky is like the neck of a dove, the rocks and waters are bathed with a violet light. Each moment it changes; each moment it shifts into more graceful and more gleaming shadows. And the thin white moon is above all, the thin white moon, followed by a single star—like a lady by a page.

XVIII.

WE had no books, no single source of amusement but our own society, and yet the day always appeared a moment. I did indeed contrive to obtain for Alceste what was called a mandolin, and which, from its appearance, might have been an ancient lyre. But it was quite unnecessary. My tongue never stopped the whole day. I told Alceste every thing. All about my youthful scrapes and fancies, and Muses and my battle, and Winter, and Christiana, and the confounded tragedy, and, of course, Manstein. If I for a moment ceased, she always said "go on." On I went, and told the same stories over again, which she reheard with the same interest. The present was so delightful to me, that I cared little to talk about the past, and always avoided the future. But Alceste would sometimes turn the conversation to what might happen, and as she now promised to heighten our happiness by bringing us a beautiful stranger to share our delightful existence, the future began to interest even me.

I had never written to my father since I arrived at Paris. Every time I drew a bill I expected to find my credit revoked, but it was not so. And I therefore willingly concluded that Lausanne prized him of every thing, and that he thought fit not to interfere. I had never written to my father, because I cannot dissemble, and as my conduct ever since I quitted France had been one continued violation of his commands and wishes, why, correspondence was difficult, and could not prove pleasing. But Alceste would talk about my father, and it was therefore necessary to think of him. She shuddered at the very name of Italy, and willingly looked forward to a settlement in the north. For myself, I was exceedingly happy, and my reminiscences of my fatherland were so far from agreeable, that I was careless as to the future, and although I already began to entertain the possibility of a return, I still wished to pass some considerable time of our youth inviolate by the vulgar cares of life, and under the influence of a glowing sky.

In the mean time we rambled about the mountains on our little, stout Candiotte horses, or amused ourselves in adorning our residence. We made a new garden. We collected every choice flower, and rare bird, and beautiful animal that we could assemble together. Alceste was wild for a white gazelle ever since we had seen one in the consul's court. They came from a particular part of Arabia, and are rare. Yet one was obtained, and two of its fawn-coloured brethren. I must confess that we found these elegant and poetical companions extremely troublesome and stupid. They are the least sentimental and domestic of all creatures. The most sedulous attention will not attach them to you, and I do not believe they are ever fairly tame. I dislike them, in spite of their liquid eyes and romantic reputation, and infinitely prefer what are now my constant and ever delightful company, some fine, faithful, honest, intelligent, thoroughbred English dogs.

We had now passed nearly eight months in this island. The end of the year was again advancing. O! the happy, the charming evenings, when fearing of my Alceste, that it grew too cool to walk, we sat within the house, and the large lamp was lit, and the faithful Lausanne brought me my pipe, and the confounded gazelle kicked it over, and the grinning Tita handed us our coffee, and my dear, dear Alceste sang me some delicious Venetian melody, and then I left off smoking, and she left off singing, and we were happier and happier every day.

Talk of fame and romance—all the glory and adventure in the world are not worth one single hour of domestic bliss! It sounds like a claptrap, but the solitary splendour with which I am now surrounded, tells me, too earnestly, it is truth.

XIX.

THE hour approached that was to increase my happiness, my incredible happiness. Blessed, infinitely blessed as I was, bountiful Heaven was about to shower upon me a new and fruitful joy. In a few days I was to become a father. We had obtained from the town all necessary attendance: an Italian physician, whose manner gave us confidence, a sage woman of great reputation, were at our house. I had myself been cautious that my treasure should commit no imprudence. We were full of love and hope. My Alceste was not quite well. The physician recommended great quiet. She was taking her siesta, and I stole from her side, because my presence ever excited her, and she could not slumber.

I strolled down to the bay, and mused over the character of a father. My imagination dwelt only upon this idea. I discovered, as my reverie proceeded, the fine relations that must subsist between a parent and a child. Such thoughts had made no impression upon me before. I thought of my own father, and the tears stole down my cheek. I vowed to return to him immediately, and give ourselves up to his happiness. I prayed to Heaven to grant me a man-child. I felt a lively confidence that he would be choicely gifted. I resolved to devote myself entirely to his education. My imagination wandered in dreams of his perfect character, of his high accomplishments, his noble virtues, his exalted fame. I conceived a philosopher who might influence his race, a being to whom the regeneration of his kind was perhaps allotted.

My thoughts had rendered me unconscious of the hour; the sun had set without my observation; the growing twilight called me to myself. I looked up, I beheld in the distance Alceste. I was surprised, displeased, alarmed. I could not conceive any thing more imprudent than her coming forth in the evening, and in her situation. I ran forward to reprimand her with a kiss, to fold her shawl more closely round her, and bear her in my arms to the house. I ran forward, speaking at the same time. She faintly smiled. I reached her. Lo! she was not there! A moment before, she was on the wide sands. There was no cavern near in which she could have entered. I stood amazed, thunderstruck. I shouted "Alceste."

The shout was answered. I ran back. Another shout; Tita came to me running. His agitated face struck me with awe. He could not speak; he seized my arm and dragged me along. I ran to the house. I did not dare to inquire the cause. Lausanne met me at the threshold. His countenance was despair. I stared like a bewildered man, I rushed to her room. Yet I remember the group leaning round our bed. They moved aside. I saw Alceste. She did not see me. Her eyes were closed, her face pale and changed, her mouth had fallen.

"What," I said, "what is all this? Doctor, doctor, how is she?"

The physician shook his head.

I could not speak. I wrung my hands, more from the inability of thought and speech, than grief, by which I was not influenced.

"Speak, speak!" I at length said, "is she dead?"

"My lord——"

"Speak, speak, speak!"

"It appears to me to be desperate.

"It is impossible! Dead! She cannot be dead. Bleed her, bleed her, sir, before me. Dead! Did you say dead? Nonsense, nonsense! Alceste, Alceste, speak to me. Say you are not dead, only say you are not dead. Bleed her, sir, bleed her."

To humour me, he took up his lancet and opened another vein. A few dull drops oozed out.

"Ah!" I exclaimed, "See! she bleeds! She is not dead. Alceste, Alceste! you are not dead! Lausanne, do something, Lausanne. For God's sake, Lausanne, save her. Do something, Lausanne. My good Lausanne, do something!"

He affected to feel her pulse. I staggered about the room, wringing my hands.

"Is she better?" I inquired.

No one answered.

"Doctor, save her! Tell me she is better, and I give you half—my whole fortune."

The poor physician shook his head. He attempted nothing. I rushed to Lausanne, and seized his arm.

"Lausanne, I can trust you. Tell me the truth. Is it all over?"

"It has too long been over."

"Ah!" I waved my hands, and shrieked, and fell.

XX.

WHEN my self-consciousness was restored, I found myself in another room. I was lying in a divan in the arms of Lausanne. I had forgotten every thing. I called Alceste. Then the remembrance rushed into my brain.

"Is it true," I said, "Lausanne, is it true?"

His silence was an answer. I rose, and walked up and down the room once or twice, and then I said, in a low voice, "Take me to the body, Lausanne."

I leaned upon his arm and entered the chamber of our joys. Even as I entered, I indulged the wild hope that I should find it unoccupied. I could not believe it. Yes, yes, she was dead!

Tall candles were burning in the room; the walls were hung with solemn drapery. I advanced to the bedside. I took her hand. I motioned to Lausanne to retire. We were alone, alone once more. But how alone? I doubted of every thing. I doubted of my existence. I thought my heart would burst. I wondered why any thing still went on. Why was not all over? I looked round with idiot eyes, and opened mouth. A horrid contortion was chiselled on my face.

Suddenly I seized the corpse in my arms, and fiercely embraced it. I thought I could reanimate it. I felt so much I thought I could reanimate it. I struggled with death. Was she dead? Was she really dead? It had a heavy leaden feel. I let her drop from my arms. She dropped like a lifeless trunk. I looked round with a silly grin.

It was morning time. The flames of the candles looked haggard. There was a Turkish dagger in the closet. I remembered it. I ran to the closet. I cut off her long tresses. I rolled them round my neck. I locked the door. I stole out of the window. I cunningly watched to observe whether I were followed. No one was stirring, or no one suspected me. I scudded away fleetly. I rushed up the hills. I never stopped. For hours I could never have stopped. I have a faint recollection of chasms, and precipices, and falling waters. I leaped every thing. I found myself at length on a peak of Mount Ida.

A wide view of the ocean opened before me. As I gazed upon it, my mind became inflamed,—the power of speech was restored to me,—the poetry of my grief prevailed.

"Fatal ocean! fatal ocean!" I exclaimed,—"A curse upon thy waves, for thou wafted us to death. Green hills! green valleys! a blight upon thy trees and pastures, for she cannot gaze upon them! And thou, red sun! her blood is upon thy beams. Halt in thy course, red sun! halt! and receive my curse!"

"Our house has fallen, the glorious house has fallen; and the little ones may now rise. Eagle! fly away and tell my father he is avenged. For lo! Venice has been my doom, and here on this toppling crag, I seal all things, and thus devote Contarini Fleming to the infernal gods."

I sprang forward, I felt myself in the air. My brain spun round, my sight deserted me, I fell.

XXI.

WHEN I can again recall existence, I found myself in my own house. I was reclining on the divan propped up by cushions. My left arm was in a sling: my head bandaged. I looked around me without thought, and then I relapsed into apathy. Lausanne was in the room, and passed before me. I observed him, but did not speak. He brought me refreshment, which I took without notice. The room was darkened. I knew nothing of the course of time, nor did I care or inquire. Sometimes Lausanne quitted the apartment, and then Tita took his place. Sometimes he returned, and changed my bandages and my dress, and I fell asleep. Awake I had no thought, and slumbering I had no dreams.

I remained in this state, as I afterward learned, six weeks. One day I looked up, and seeing Tita, spoke in a faint voice, and asked for Lausanne. He ran immediately for him, and while he was a moment absent, I rose from my couch and tore the curtain from the window. Lausanne entered and came up to me, and would have again led me to my seat, but I bid him "lighten the room."

I desired to walk forth into the air, and leaning on his arm, I came out of the house. It was early morn, and I believe the sense of the fresh air had attracted and revived me. I stood for a moment vacantly gazing upon the distant bay, but I was so faint that I could not stand, and Spiro, the little Greek boy, ran and brought me a carpet and a cushion, and I sat down. I asked for a mirror, which was unwillingly afforded me; but I insisted upon it. I viewed without emotion my emaciated form, and my pallid, sunken visage. My eyes were dead and hollow, my cheek-bones prominent and sharp, my head shaven, and covered with a light turban. Nevertheless, the feeling of the free, sweet air was grateful, and from this moment I commenced gradually to recover.

I never spoke, except to express my wants, but my appetite returned, my strength increased, and each day, with Lausanne's assistance, I walked for a short time in the garden. My arm, which had been broken, resumed its power; my head, which had been severely cut, healed. I ventured to walk only with the aid of a stick. Gradually I extended my course, and, in time, I reached the seaside. There, in a slight recess formed by a small headland, I would sit with my back against a high rock, feel comforted that earth was hidden from my sight, and gaze for hours in vacancy upon the ocean and the sky. At sunset I stole home. I found Lausanne always about, evidently expecting me. When he perceived me returning, he was soon by my side, but by a way that I could not observe him, and, without obtrusion or any appearance of officiousness, led, or rather carried me to my dwelling.

One morning I bent my way to a small green valley, which opened on the other side of our gardens. It had been one of our most favourite haunts. I know not why I resorted to it this morning, for, as yet, her idea had never crossed my mind, any more than her name my lips. I had an indefinite conviction that I was a lost and fallen man. I knew that I had once been happy, that I had once mingled in a glorious existence; but I felt with regard to the past as if it were another system of being, as if I had suddenly fallen from a star, and lighted on a degenerate planet.

I was in our valley, our happy valley. I stood still, and my memory seemed to return. The tears stole down my face. I remembered the cluster of orange trees under which we often sat. I plucked some leaves, and I pressed them to my lips. Yet I was doubtful, uncertain, incredulous. I scarcely knew who I was. Not indeed that I was unable to feel my identity, not indeed that my intelligence was absolutely incapable of fulfilling its office, but there seemed a compact between my body and my mind that existence should proceed without thought.

I descended into the vale. A new object attracted my attention. I approached it without suspicion. A green mount supported a stone, on which was boldly, but not rudely sculptured,

"ALCESTE, COUNTESS CONTARINI FLEMING."

A date recorded her decease.

"It must have been many years ago," was my first impression; "I am Contarini Fleming, and I remember Alceste well, but not in this country, surely not in this country. And yet those orange trees—"

"My wife, my lost, my darling wife, O! why am I alive! I thought that I was dead! I thought that I had flung myself from the mountain-top to join you—and it was all a dream!"

I threw myself upon the tomb, and my tears poured forth in torrents, and I tore up the flowers that flourished upon the turf, and kissed them, and tossed them in the air.

There was a rose, a beautiful white rose, delicate and fragrant; and I gathered it, and it seemed to me like Alceste. And I sat gazing upon this fair flower, and as my vision was fixed upon it, the past grew up before me, and each moment I more clearly comprehended it. The bitterness of my grief overcame me. I threw away the rose, and a moment after, I was sorry to have lost it. I looked for it. It was not at my feet. My desire for the flower increased. I rose from the tomb, I looked around for the lost treasure. My search led me to the other side of the tablet, and I read the record of the death of my still-born son.

XXII.

"WE must leave this place, Lausanne, and at once."

His eye brightened when I spoke.

"I have seen all that you have done, Lausanne, it is well, very well. I owe you much. I would have given much for her hair, more than I can express. But you are not to blame. You had much to do."

He left the room for a moment, and returned,—returned with the long, the beautiful tresses of my beloved.

"O! you have made me so happy. I never thought that I should again know what joy was. How considerate! How very good!"

He broke to me gently that he had found the tresses around my neck. I rubbed my forehead, I summoned my scattered thoughts,—"I remember something," I replied, "but I thought it was a dream. I fancied that in a dream I had quitted the house."

He told me all. He told me that, after three days' search, he had found me among the mountains, hanging to the rough side of the precipice, shattered, stark, and senseless. The bushes had caught my clothes, and prevented a fatal fall.

XXIII.

A SHIP was about to leave the port for Leghorn. And why not go to Leghorn? Anywhere but Venice. Our arrangements were soon made. I determined to assent to the request of his father in taking little Spiro, who was a favourite of Alceste, and had charge of her gazelles. A Greek father is very willing to see his son anywhere but among the Turks. I promised his family not only to charge myself with his future fortunes, but also to remit them an annual allowance through the consul, provided they cherished the tomb of their late mistress, and in a fortnight I was again on board.

The mountains of Candia were long in sight, but I avoided them. Our voyage was very long, although not unpleasant. We were often becalmed. The air and change of scene benefited me much. I wonderfully resumed my old habits of revery, and as I paced the deck, which I did all day without ceasing, I mused over the past with feelings of greater solace than I ever anticipated could associate with it. I was consoled by the remembrance of our perfect love. I could not recall on either of our parts a single fretful word, a single occasion on which our conduct had afforded either of us an anxious, or even annoying moment. We never had enjoyed those lovers' quarrels which are said to be so sweet. Her sufferings had been intense, but they had been brief. It would have been consolatory to have received her last breath, yet my presence might have occasioned her greater agony. The appearance of her spirit assured me that, at the moment of her departure, her last thought was for me. The conviction of her having enjoyed positive happiness supported me. I was confident that had it been possible to make the decision, she would not have yielded her brief and beautiful career for length of days unilluminated by the presence of him who remained to consecrate her memory by his enduring love—perhaps by his enduring page.

Ah! old feelings returned to me. I perceived that it was impossible to exist without some object, and fame and poetic creation offered themselves to my void heart. I remembered that the high calling to which I was devoted had been silently neglected. I recollected the lofty education and loftier results that travel was to afford, and for which travel was to prepare me. I reminded myself that I had already proved many new passions, become acquainted with many new modifications of feeling, and viewed many new objects. My knowledge of man and nature was very much increased. My mind was full of new thoughts, and crowded with new images.

As I thus mused, that separation of the mere individual from the universal poet, which ever occurred in these high communings, again took place. My own misfortunes seemed but petty incidents to one who could exercise an illimitable power over the passions of his kind. If, amid the common losses of common life, the sympathy of a single friend can bear its balm, could I find no solace, even for my great bereavement, in the love of nations, and the admiration of ages?

Thus reflecting, I suddenly dashed into invention, and in my almost constant walks on deck, I poured forth a crowd of characters, and incidents, and feelings, and images, and moulded them into a coherent, and, as I hoped, a beautiful form. I longed for the moment when I could record them on a scroll more lasting than my memory, and upheld by this great purpose, I entered with a calm, if not cheerful countenance, the famous port of Leghorn.

PART THE FOURTH.

I.

I WAS at length at Florence. The fair city so much vaunted by poets at first greatly disappointed me. I could not reconcile myself to those unfinished churches like barns, and those gloomy palaces like prisons. The muddy Arno was not poetical, and the sight of the whole place and the appearance of the surrounding hills, in spite of their white villas, seemed to me confined, monotonous, and dull. Yet there is a charm in Florence, which, although difficult precisely to define, is in its influence very great and growing, and I scarcely know a place that I would prefer for a residence. I think it is the character of art, which both from ancient associations, and its present possessions, is forcibly impressed upon this city. It is full of invention. You cannot stroll fifty yards, you cannot enter a church or a palace, without being favourably reminded of the power of human thought. It is a famous memorial of the genius of the Italian middle ages, when the mind of man was in one of its spring-tides, and in which we mark so frequently what at the present day we too much underrate—the influence of individual character.

In Florence, the monuments are not only of great men, but of the greatest. You do not gaze upon the tomb of an author, who is merely a great master of composition, but of one who formed the language. The illustrious astronomer is not the discoverer of a planet, but the revealer of the whole celestial machinery. The artist and the politician are not merely the first sculptors and statesmen of their time, but the inventors of the very art and the very craft in which they excelled.

The study of the fine arts mutually assists each other. In the formation of my style, I have been perhaps more indebted to music and to painting, even than to the great masters of literary composition. The contemplation of the Venetian school had developed in me a latent love of gorgeous eloquence, dazzling incident, brilliant expression, and voluptuous sentiment. These brought their attendant imperfections, exaggeration, effeminacy, the obtrusion of art, the painful want of nature. The severe simplicity of the Tuscan masters chastened my mind. I mused over a great effect produced almost by a single mean. The picture that fixed my attention by a single group illustrating a single passion, was a fine and profitable study. I felt the power of nature delineated by a great master, and how far from necessary to enforce her influence, were the splendid accessories with which my meditated compositions would rather have encumbered than adorned her. I began to think more of the individual than the species, rather of the motives of man, than of his conduct. I endeavoured to make myself as perfect in the dissection of his mind, as the Florentine in the anatomy of his body. Attempting to acquire the excellence of my models, I should probably have imbibed their defects; their stiff, and sombre, and arid manner; their want of variety and grace. The Roman school saved me from this, and taught me that a very chaste or severe conception might be treated in a very glowing or genial style. But after all, I prefer the Spanish to the Italian painters. I know no one to rival Murillo. I know no one who has blended with such felicity the high ideal with the extreme simplicity of nature. Later in life, I found myself in his native city, in that lovely Seville, more lovely from his fine creations than even from the orange bowers that perfume its gates, and the silver stream that winds about its plain.

I well remember the tumult of invention in which I wandered day after day amid the halls and galleries of Florence. Each beautiful face that flitted before me was a heroine, each passion that breathed upon the canvass was to be transferred to the page. I conceived at one time the plan of writing a series of works in the style of each school. The splendour of Titian, the grace of Raffaele, the twilight tints of that magician, Guercino, alternately threw my mind into moods analogous to their creations. A portrait of Ippolyto de' Medici in the Pitti palace, of whom I knew nothing, haunted me like a ghost, and I could only lay the spectre by resolving in time to delineate the spirit of Italian feudality. The seraphic Baptist in the wilderness recalled the solitude I loved. I would have poured forth a monologue amid the mountains of Judea, had not Endymion caught my enraptured vision, and I could dream only of the bright goddess of his shadowy love.

I thought only of art. I sought the society of artists and collectors. I unconsciously adopted their jargon. I began to discourse of copies, and middle tints, and changes of style. I was in great danger of degenerating into a dilettante. Little objects as well as great, now interested me. I handled a bronze and speculated upon its antiquity. Yet even these slight pursuits exercised a beneficial tendency upon a mind wild, irregular, and undisciplined; nor do I believe that any one can long observe even fine carvings and choice medals, without his taste becoming more susceptible, and delicate, and refined.

My mind was overflowing with the accumulated meditation and experience of two years; an important interval in all lives, passed in mine in constant thought and action, and in a continual struggle with new ideas and novel passions. The desire of composition became irresistible. I recurred to the feelings with which I entered Leghorn, and from which I had been diverted amid the distraction produced by the novelty, the beauty, and the variety of surrounding objects. With these feelings, I quitted the city, and engaged the Villa Caponi, situated on a green and gentle swell of the Apennines, near the tower of Galileo.

II^o

If there were any thing in the world for which I now entertained a sovereign contempt, it was my unfortunate Manstein. My most malignant critic must have yielded to me in the scorn which I lavished on that immature production, and the shame with which I even recollected its existence. No one could be more sensible of its glaring defects, for no one thought more of them, and I was so familiar with its less defective parts, that they had lost all their relish, and appeared to me as weak, and vapid, and silly as the rest. I never labour to delude myself. I never gloss over my faults. I exaggerate them. I can afford to face truth, for I feel capable of improvement. And indeed I have never yet experienced that complacency with which, it is said, some authors regard their offspring, nor do I think that this paternal fondness will ever be my agreeable lot. I am never satisfied. No sooner have I executed some conception, than my mind soars above its creation, and meditates a higher flight in a purer atmosphere. The very exercise of power only teaches me, that it may be wielded for a greater purpose.

I prepared myself for composition in a very different mood to that in which I had poured forth my feverid erudities in the garden-house. Calm and collected, I constructed characters on philosophical principles, and mused over a chain of action which should develop the system of our existence. All was art. I studied contrasts and grouping, and metaphysical analysis was substituted for anatomical delineation. I was not satisfied that the conduct of my creations should be influenced merely by the general principles of their being. I resolved that they should be the very impersonations of the moods and passions of our mind. One was ill-regulated will; another offered the formation of a moral being; materialism sparkled in the wild gayety and reckless caprice of one voluptuous girl, while spirit was vindicated in the deep devotion of a constant and enthusiastic heroine. Even the lighter temperaments were not forgotten. Frivolity smiled, and shrugged his shoulders before us, and there was even a deep personification of cynic humour.

Had I executed my work in strict unison with my plan, it would doubtless have been a very dull affair. For I did not yet possess sufficient knowledge of human nature to support me in such a creation, nor was I then habituated to those metaphysical speculations, which might have in some degree compensated, by their profundity, for their want of entertainment. But nature avenged herself, and extricated me from my dilemma.

I began to write; my fancy fired, my brain inflamed; breathing forms rose up under my pen, and jostled aside the cold abstractions, whose creation had cost such long musing. In vain I endeavoured to compose without enthusiasm, in vain I endeavoured to delineate only what I had pre-conceived, in vain I struggled to restrain the flow of unbidden invention. All that I had seen and pondered passed before me, from the proud moment that I stood upon Mount Jura to the present ravishing hour that I returned to my long estranged art.

Every tree, every cloud, every star and mountain, every fair lake and flowing river, that had fed my fancy with their sweet suggestions in my rambling hours, now returned and illumined my pages with their brightness and their beauty. My mind teemed with similes. Thought and passion came veiled in metaphoric garb. I was delighted, I was bewildered. The clustering of their beauty seemed an evidence of poetic power: the management of these bright guests was an art of which I was ignorant. I received them all. I found myself often writing only that they might be accommodated.

I gave up to this work many long and unbroken hours. I was determined that it should not suffer from a hurried pen. I often stopped to meditate. It was in writing this book, that I first learned my art. It was a series of experiments. They were at length finished, and my volumes consigned to their fate and northern publisher.

The critics treated me with more courtesy. What seemed to me odd enough then, although no puzzle now, was, that they admired what had been written in haste, and without premeditation and generally disapproved of what had cost me much forethought, and been executed with great care. It was universally declared a most unequal work, and they were right, although they could not detect the causes of the inequality. My perpetual efforts at being imaginative were highly reprobated. Now my efforts had been entirely the other way. In short, I puzzled them, and no one offered a prediction as to my future career. My book, as a whole was rather unintelligible, but parts were favourites. It was pronounced a remarkable compound of originality and dulness. These critiques, whatever might be their tenor, mattered little to me. A long interval elapsed before they reached Florence, and during that period, I had effectually emancipated myself from the thralldom of criticism.

I have observed, that after writing a book, my mind always makes a great spring. I believe that the act of composition produces the same invigorating effect upon the mind, which some exertion does upon the body. Even the writing of Manstein produced a revolution in my nature, which cannot be traced by any metaphysical analysis. In the course of a few days, I was converted from a hollow-hearted worldling into a noble philosopher. I was indeed ignorant, but I had lost the double ignorance of the Platonists, I was no longer ignorant that I was ignorant. No one could be influenced by a greater desire of knowledge, a greater passion for the beautiful, or a deeper regard for his fellow-creatures. And I well remember when, on the evening that I wrote the last sentence of this more intellectual effort, I walked out upon the terrace with that feeling of satisfaction, which accompanies the idea of a task completed; so far was I from being excited by the hope of having written a great work, that I even meditated its destruction. For, the moment it was terminated, it seemed to me that I had become suddenly acquainted with the long-concealed principles of my art, which, without doubt, had been slenderly practised in this production. My taste, as it were in an instant, became formed, and I felt the conviction, that I could now produce some lasting creation.

I thought no more of criticism. The breath of man has never influenced me much, for I depend more upon myself than upon others. I want no false fame. It would be no delight to me to be considered a prophet, were I conscious of being an impostor. I ever wish to be undeceived; but if I possess the organization of a poet, no one can prevent me from exercising my faculty, any more than he can rob the courser of his fleetness, or the nightingale of her song.

II.

AFTER finishing my work, I read more at Florence than I have at any period of my life. Having formed the principles on which in future I intended to proceed in composition, and considering myself now qualified to decide upon other artists, I determined critically to examine the literary fiction of all countries, to ascertain how far my intentions had been anticipated, and in what degree my predecessors might assist me.

It appears to me that the age of versification has passed. The mode of composition must ever be greatly determined by the manner in which the composition can be made public. In ancient days, the voice was the medium by which we became acquainted with the inventions of a poet. In such a method, where those who listened had no time to pause, and no opportunity to think, it was necessary that every thing should be obvious. The audience who were perplexed would soon become wearied. The spirit of ancient poetry, therefore, is rather material than metaphysical. Superficial, not internal; there is much simplicity and much nature, but little passion and less philosophy. To obviate the haldness, which is the consequence of a style where the subject and the sentiments are rather intimated than developed, the poem was enriched by music, and enforced by action. Occasionally were added the enchantment of scenery, and the fascination of the dance. But the poet did not depend merely upon these brilliant accessories. He resolved that his thoughts should be expressed in a manner different from other modes of communicating ideas. He caught a suggestion from his sister art, and invented metre. And in this modulation, he introduced a new system of phraseology, which marked him out from the crowd, and which has obtained the title of "poetic diction."

His object in this system of words was to heighten his meaning by strange phrases, and unusual constructions. Inversion was invented to clothe a commonplace with an air of novelty; vague epithets were introduced to prop up a monotonous modulation; were his meaning to be enforced, he shrank from wearisome ratiocination and the agony of precise conceptions, and sought refuge in a bold personification, or a beautiful similitude. The art of poetry was to express natural feelings in unnatural language.

Institutions ever survive their purpose, and customs govern us when their cause is extinct. And this mode of communicating poetic invention still remained, when the advanced civilization of man, in multiplying manuscripts, might have made many suspect that the time had arrived when the poet was to cease to sing, and to learn to write. Had the splendid refinement of imperial Rome not been doomed to such rapid decay, and such mortifying and degrading vicissitudes, I believe that versification would have worn out. Unquestionably that empire, in its multitudinous population, scenery, creeds, and customs, offered the richest materials for emancipated fiction; materials, however, far too vast and various for the limited capacity of metrical celebration.

That beneficent Omnipotence, before which we must bow down, has so ordered it, that imitation should be the mental feature of modern Europe; and has ordained that we should adopt a Syrian religion, a Grecian literature, and a Roman law. At the revival of letters, we behold the portentous spectacle of national poets communicating their inventions in an exotic form. Conscious of the confined nature of their method, yet unable to extricate themselves from its fatal ties, they sought variety in increased artifice of diction, and substituted for the melody of the lyre the barbaric clash of rhyme.

A revolution took place in the mode of communicating thought. Now, at least, it was full time that we should have emancipated ourselves forever from sterile metre. One would have supposed that the poet who could not only write, but even print his inventions, would have felt that it was both useless and unfit that they should be communicated by a process invented when his only medium was simple recitation. One would have supposed that the poet would have rushed with desire to the new world before him, that he would have seized the new means that permitted him to revel in a universe of boundless invention; to combine the highest ideal creation with the infinite delineation of teeming nature; to unravel all the dark mysteries of our bosoms, and all the bright purposes of our being; to become the great instructor and champion of his species; and not only delight their fancy, and charm their senses, and command their will, but demonstrate their rights, illustrate their necessities, and expound the object of their existence; and all this too in a style charming and changing with its universal theme, now tender, now sportive, now earnest, now profound, now sublime, now pathetic, and substituting for the dull monotony of metre, the most various, and exquisite, and inexhaustible melody.

When I remember the trammels to which the poet has been doomed, and the splendour with which consummate genius has invested them, and when, for a moment, I conceive him bursting asunder his bonds, I fancy I behold the sacred bird snapping the golden chain that binds him to Olympus, and soaring even above Jove!

IV.

I HAD arrived at Florence in a very feeble and shattered state of health, of which, however, as I had never been an habitual invalid, I thought little. My confidence in my energy had never deserted me. Composition, however, although I now wrote with facility, proved a greater effort than I had anticipated. The desire I felt of completing my purpose had successfully sustained me throughout, but, during its progress, I was too often conscious of an occasional, but increasing languor, which perplexed and alarmed me. Perfect as might be my conception of my task, and easy as I ever found its execution when I was excited, I invariably experienced, at the commencement, a feeling of inertness, which was painful and mortifying. As I did not dream of physical inability, I began to apprehend that, however delightful might be the process of meditation, that of execution was less delicious. Sometimes I even for a moment feared that there might be a lurking weakness in my nature, which might prevent me from ever effecting a great performance.

I remember one evening as I was meditating in my chamber, my watch lying upon the table, and the hour nine, I felt, as I fancied, disturbed by the increased sound of that instrument. I moved it to the other side of the table, but the sound increased, and assured that it was not occasioned by the supposed cause, and greatly disturbed, I rang for Lausanne, and mentioned the inconvenience. Lausanne persisted in hearing nothing, but as the sound became even more audible, and as I now believed that some reptile might be in the room, he examined it in all parts. Nothing was perceived; the hum grew louder, and it was not until I jumped up from my seat to assist him in his examination, that I discovered by the increased sound, occasioned by my sudden rise, that the noise was merely in my own ears. The circumstance occasioned me no alarm. It inconvenienced me for the evening. I retired at an earlier hour, passed, as usual, a restless and dreamy night, but fell asleep towards the morning, and rose tolerably fresh.

I can write only in the morning. It is then I execute with facility all that I have planned the ensuing eve. And this day, as usual, I resumed my pen, but it was not obedient. I felt not only languid and indolent, but a sensation of faintness which I had before experienced and disregarded, came over me, and the pen fell from my hand. I rose and walked about the room. My extremities were cold, as of late in the morning I had usually found them. The sun was shining brightly over the sparkling hills. I felt a great desire to warm myself in his beams. I ordered my horse.

The ride entirely revived me. I fancied that I led perhaps too sedentary a life. I determined, immediately that my book was finished, that I would indulge in more relaxation. I returned home with more appetite than usual, for since my return from Candia, I had almost entirely lost my relish for food, and my power of digestion. In the evening I was again busied in musing over the scene which was to be painted on the coming morn. Suddenly I heard again the strange noise. I looked at my watch. It was exactly nine o'clock. It increased rapidly. From the tick of a watch, it assumed the loud confused moaning of a bell tolling in a storm, like the bell I had heard at the foot of the Alps. It was impossible to think. I walked about the room. It became louder and louder. It seemed to be absolutely deafening. I could compare it to nothing but the continuous roar of a cataract. I sat down, and looked around me in blank despair.

Night brought me no relief. My sleep, ever since the death of Alceste, had been very troubled and broken, and of late, had daily grown less certain, and less refreshing. Often have I lain awake the whole night, and usually have risen exhausted and spiritless. So it was on this morning. Cold, faint, and feeble, the principle of life seemed to wax fainter and fainter. I sent for my faithful companion: "Lausanne," I said, "I begin to think that I am very ill."

Lausanne felt my pulse, and shook his head. "There is no wonder," he replied. "You have scarcely any circulation. You want stimulants. You should drink more wine, and you should give up writing for a time. Shall I send for a physician?"

I had no confidence in medicine. I resolved to exert myself. Lausanne's advice I fancied sounded well. I drank some wine: I felt better; but as I never can write under any inspiration but my own, I resolved to throw aside my pen, and visit Pisa for a fortnight, where I could follow his prescription with the additional advantage of change of scene.

My visit to Pisa benefited me. I returned, and gave the last finish to my work.

V.

ALL the Italian cities are delightful; but an elegant melancholy pervades Pisa that is enchanting. What a marble group is formed by the cathedral, the wonderful Baptistery, the Leaning Tower, and the Campo Santo; and what an indication of the ancient splendour of the republic! I wish that the world consisted of a cluster of small states. There would be much more genius, and, what is of more importance, much more felicity. Federal unions would preserve us from the evil consequences of local jealousy, and might combine in some general legislation of universal benefit. Italy might then revive, and even England may regret that she has lost her heptarchy.

In the Campo Santo you trace the history of art. There too, which has not been observed, you may discover the origin of the Arabesques of Raffaële. The Leaning Tower is a stumbling-block to architectural antiquaries. An ancient fresco in the Campo proves the intention of the artist. All are acquainted with the towers of Bologna; few are aware that in Saragossa the Spaniards possess a rival of the architectural caprice of the Pisans.

To this agreeable and silent city I again returned, and wandered in meditation and the stillness of its palaces. I consider this the period of my life in which whatever intellectual power I possess became fully developed. All that I can execute hereafter is but the performance of what I then planned, nor would a patriarchal term of life permit me to achieve all that I then meditated. I looked forward to the immediate fulfilment of my long hopes, to the achievement of a work which might last with its language, and the attainment of a great and permanent fame.

I was now meditating over this performance. It is my habit to contrive in my head the complete work, before I have recourse to the pen which is to execute it. I do not think that meditation can be too long, or execution too rapid. It is not merely characters and the general conduct of the story that I thus prepare, but the connexion of every incident, often whole conversations, sometimes even slight phrases. A very tenacious memory, which I have never weakened by having recourse to other modes of reminiscence, supports me in this process, which, however, I should confess is a very painful and exhausting effort.

I revolved this work in my mind for several months without ever having recourse to paper. It was never out of my consciousness. I fell asleep musing over it: in the morning my thoughts clustered immediately upon it, like bees on a bed of unexhausted flowers. In my rides, during my meals, in my conversations on common topics, I was indeed the whole time musing over this creation.

The profound thinker always suspects that he is superficial. Patience is a necessary ingredient of genius. Nothing is more fatal than to be seduced by the first flutter of the imagination into composition. This is the cause of so many weak and unequal works, of so many worthy ideas thrown away, and so many good purposes marred. Yet there is a bound to meditation; there is a moment when further judgment is useless. There is a moment when a heavenly light rises over the dim world you have been so long creating, and bathes it with life and beauty. Accept this omen that your work is good, and revel in the sunshine of composition.

I have sometimes half believed, although the suspicion is mortifying, that there is only a step between his state who deeply indulges in imaginative meditation and insanity. For I well remember that at this period of my life, when I indulged in meditation to a degree which would now be impossible, and I hope unnecessary, that my senses sometimes appeared to be wandering. I cannot describe the peculiar feeling I then experienced, for I have failed in so doing to several eminent surgeons and men of science with whom I have conversed respecting it, and who were curious to become acquainted with its nature. But I think it was, that I was not always assured of my identity, or even existence, for I sometimes found it necessary to shout aloud to be sure that I lived, and I was in the habit very often at night of taking down a volume, and looking into it for my name, to be convinced that I had not been dreaming of myself. At these times there was an incredible acuteness, or intenseness, in my sensations. Every object seemed animated, and, as it were, acting upon me. The only way that I can devise to express my general feeling is, that I seemed to be sensible of the rapid whirl of the globe.

All this time my health was again giving way, and all my old symptoms gradually returning. I set them at defiance. The nocturnal demon having now come back in all its fulness, I was forced to confine my meditations to the morning, and in the evening I fled for refuge and forgetfulness to the bottle. This gave me temporary relief, but entirely destroyed my remaining power of digestion. In the morning I regularly fainted as I dressed. Still I would not give in, and only postponed the commencement of my work until my return to Florence, which was to occur in a few days.

I rode the journey through the luxuriant Val d'Arno, attended by Tita. Lausanne and Spiro had returned the previous day. It was late in the evening when I arrived at the villa. I thought, as I got off my horse, that the falls of Niagara could not overpower the infernal roaring that I alone heard. I entered, and threw myself on a sofa. It came at last. What it was I knew not. It felt like a rushing of blood into my brain. I moaned, threw out my arm, and wildly caught at the bell. Lausanne entered, and I was lying apparently lifeless.

VI.

DURING the whole course of my life, my brain had been my constant source of consolation. As long as I could work that machine, I was never entirely without an object and a pleasure. I had laughed at physical weaknesses while that remained untouched; and unquestionably I should have sunk under the great calamity of my life, had it not been for the sources of hope and solace which this faithful companion opened to me. Now it was all over: I was little better than an idiot.

Physician followed physician, and surgeon surgeon, without benefit. They all held different opinions, yet none were right. They satirized each other in private interviews, and exchanged compliments in consultations. One told me to be quiet, another to exert myself; one declared that I must be stimulated, another that I must be soothed. I was, in turn, to be ever on horseback, and ever on a sofa. I was bled, blistered, boiled, starved, poisoned, electrified, galvanised, and at the end of a year found myself with exactly the same oppression on my brain, and the additional gratification of remembering that twelve months of existence had worn away without producing a single idea. Such are the inevitable consequences of consulting men who decide by precedents which have no resemblance, and never busy themselves about the idiosyncrasy of their patients.

I had been so overwhelmed by my malady, and so conscious that upon my cure my only chance of happiness depended, that I had submitted myself to all this treatment without a murmur, and religiously observed all their contradictory directions. Being of a sanguine temperament, I believed every assertion, and every week expected to find myself cured. When, however, a considerable period of time had elapsed without any amelioration, I began to rebel against these systems which induced so much exertion and privation, and were productive of no good. I was quite desperate of cure, and each day I felt more keenly, that if I were not cured, I could not live. I wished therefore to die unmolested. I discharged all my medical attendants, and laid myself down like a sick lion in his lair.

I never went out of the house, and barely out of a single room. I scarcely ever spoke, and only for my wants. I had no acquaintance, and I took care that I should see no one. I observed a strict diet, but fed every day. Although air, and medicine, and exercise were to have been productive of so much benefit to me, I found myself, without their assistance, certainly not worse, and the repose of my present system, if possible, rendered my wretched existence less burthensome.

Lausanne afterwards told me that he supposed I had relapsed into the state in which I fell immediately after my great calamity, but this was not the case. I never lost my mind or memory: I was conscious of every thing, I forgot nothing. But I had lost the desire of exercising them. I sat in moody silence, revolving in revery, without the labour of thought, my past life and feelings.

I had no hopes of recovery. It was not death that terrified me, but the idea that I might live, and for years, in this hopeless and unprofitable condition. When I contrasted my recent lust of fame, and plans of glory, and indomitable will, with my present woful situation of mysterious imbecility, I was appalled with the marvellous contrast, and I believed that I had been stricken by some celestial influence for my pride and wanton self-sufficiency.

VII.

I WAS in this gloomy state, when one morning Lausanne entered my room; I did not notice him, but continued sitting with my eyes fixed on the ground, and my chin upon my breast. At last he said, "My lord, I wish to speak to you."

"Well!"

"There is a stranger at the gate, a gentleman who desires to see you."

"You know I see no one," I replied rather harshly.

"I know it, and have so said. But this gentleman—"

"Good God! Lausanne, is it my father?"

"No. But it is one who may perhaps come from him."

"I will see him."

The door opened, and there entered Winter.

Long years, long and active years had passed since we parted. All had happened since. I thought of my boyhood, and it seemed innocent and happy, compared with the misery of the past and present. Nine years had not much altered my friend, but me—

"I fear, count," said Winter, "that I am abusing the privilege of an old friend in thus insisting upon an entrance, but I heard of your residence in this country and your illness at the same time, and being at Florence I thought you would perhaps pardon me."

"You are one of the few persons whom I am glad to see under all circumstances, even under those in which I now exist."

"I have heard of your distressing state."

"Say my hopeless state. But let us not converse about it. Let us speak of yourself. Let me hope you are as happy as you are celebrated."

"As for that, well enough. But if we are to talk about celebrity, let me claim the honours of a prophet, and congratulate a poet whom I predicted."

"Alas! dear Winter," I said, with a faint smile, "talk not of that, for I shall die without doing you honour."

"There is no one of my acquaintance who has less chance of dying."

"How so?" I remarked, rather quickly, for when a man really believes he is dying, he does not like to lose the interest which such a situation produces. "If you knew all—"

"I know all—much more, too, than your physician who told me."

"And you believe, then, that I cannot look forward even to death, to terminate this miserable existence?"

"I do not consider it miserable, and therefore I should be sorry if there were any thing to warrant such an anticipation."

"And I can assure you, chevalier," and I spoke very sincerely and solemnly, "that I consider existence, on the terms I now possess it, an intolerable burthen. And nothing but the chance, for I cannot call it hope, of amelioration, prevents me from terminating it."

"If you remember right, you considered existence equally an intolerable burthen when, as a boy, you first experienced feelings which you were unable to express."

"Well! what inference do you draw?"

"That it is not the first time you have quarrelled with nature."

"How so?" I eagerly replied, and I exerted myself to answer him, "is disease nature?"

"Is your state disease?"

"I have no mind."

"You reason."

"My brain is affected."

"You see."

"You believe, then, that I am a hypochondriac?"

"By no means! I believe your feelings are real and peculiar, but it does not therefore follow that they are evil."

"Perhaps," I said, with a dry smile, "you believe them beneficent?"

"I do certainly," he replied.

"In what respect?"

"I believe, that as you would not give nature a holiday, she is giving herself one."

I was silent, and mused. "But this infernal brain?" I replied.

"Is the part of the machinery that you have worked most; and therefore the weakest."

"But how is it to be strengthened?"

"Not by medicine. By following exactly a contrary course to that which enfeebled it."

"For fifteen months an idea has not crossed my brain."

"Well! you are the better for it; and fifteen months more—"

"Alas! what is life! At this age I hoped to be famous."

"Depend upon it, you are in the right road, but rest assured you must go through every trial that is peculiar to men of your organization. There is no avoiding it. It is just as necessary as that life should be the consequence of your structure. To tell you the truth, which is always best, I only came here to please your father. When he wrote to me of your illness, I mentioned to him that 't must have its course. that there was nothing to be alarmed about, and that it was just as much a part of your necessary education as travel or study. But he wished me to see you, and so I came."

"My poor father! Alas! my conduct to him—"

"Has been just what it ought to be, just what it necessarily must have been, just exactly what my own was to my father. As long as human beings are unphilosophically educated, these incidents will take place."

"Ah! my dear Winter, I am a villain. I have never even written to him."

"Of course you have not. Your father tried to turn you into a politician. Had he not forced you to write so many letters then, you would not have omitted to write to him now. The whole affair is simple as day. Until men are educated with a reference to their organization, there will be no end to domestic fraecas."

"You ever jest, my friend. I have not ventured on a joke for many a long month."

"Which is a pity; for, to tell you the truth, although your last work is of the tender and sublime, and maketh fair eyes weep, I think your forte is comic."

"Do you, indeed?"

"Ah! my dear Contarini, those two little volumes of Manstein—"

"O! mention not the name. Infamous, unadulterated trash!"

"Ah! exactly as I thought of my first picture, which after all has a freshness and a freedom I have never exceeded,—but Manstein, my dear Contarini, it certainly was very impertinent. I read it at Rome. I thought I should have died. All our friends. So very true!"

"Will you stay with me? I feel a good deal better since you have been here, and what you tell me of my father delights me. Pray, pray stay. Well! you are indeed kind. And if I feel very ill, I will keep away."

"O! I should like to see you in one of your fits."

VIII.

"I TAKE a glass of wine," said Winter at dinner.

"My dear friend. I have taken one."

"Take another. Here is your father's health."

"Well, then, here is yours. How is the finest of old men?"

"Flourishing and happy."

"And your mother?"

"Capital!"

"And you have never returned?"

"No! and never will, while there are such places as Rome and Naples."

"Ah! I shall never see them."

"Pooh! the sooner you move about the better."

"My good friend, it is impossible."

"Why so! Do not confound your present condition with the state you were in a year ago. Let me feel your pulse. Capital! You seem to have an excellent appetite. Don't be ashamed to eat. In cases like yours, the art is to ascertain the moment to make exertion. I look upon yours as a case of complete exhaustion. If there be any thing more exhausting than love, it is sorrow, and if there be any thing more exhausting than sorrow, it is poetry. You have tried all three. Your body and your mind both required perfect repose. I perceive that your body has sufficiently rested. Employ it; and in another year you will find your mind equally come round."

"You console me. But where shall I go? Home?"

"By no means. You require beauty and novelty. At present I would not go even to the south of this country. It will remind you too much of the past. Put yourself entirely in a new world. Go to Egypt. It will suit you. I look upon you as an Oriental. If you like, go to South America. Tropical scenery will astonish and cure you. Go to Leghorn, and get into the first ship that is bound for a country with which you are unacquainted."

IX.

WINTER remained with me several days, and before he had quitted Florence I had written to my father. I described to him my forlorn situation, my strong desire to see him, and I stated the advice which did not correspond with my wishes. I asked for his counsel, but said nothing of the great calamity. I was indeed myself extremely unwilling to return home in my present state, but this unwillingness I concealed.

I received an answer from my father by a special courier, an answer the most affectionate. He strongly recommended me to travel for some time, expressed his hope and confidence that I should entirely recover, and that I should return and repay him for all his anxiety. All that he required was, that I should frequently correspond with him. And ever afterward, I religiously respected his request.

A ship was about to sail from Leghorn to Cadiz. Spain appeared an interesting country, and one of which I knew nothing. It is the link between Europe and Africa. To Spain therefore I resolved to repair; and in a few days I again quitted Italy, and once more cast my fortunes on the waters!

PART THE FIFTH.

I.

EUROPE and AFRIC! I have wandered amid the tombs of Troy, and stood by the altar of Medea, yet the poetry of the Hellespont, and the splendour of the Symplegades must yield to the majesty of the Straits of Calpe.

Like some lone Titian, lurid and sublime, his throne the mountains and the clouds his crown, the melancholy Mauritania sits apart, and gazes on the mistress he has lost.

And lo! from out the waves that kiss her feet, and bow before her beauty, she softly rises with a wanton smile. Would she call back her dark-eyed lover, and does the memory of that bright embrace yet dwell within the hallowed sanctuary of her heart?

It was a glorious union. When were maidens fairer and more faithful—when were men more gentle and more brave? When did all that can adorn humanity more brightly flourish, and more sweetly bloom? Alas! for their fair cities, and fine gardens, and fresh fountains! Alas! for their delicate palaces, and glowing bowers of perfumed shade!

Will you fly with me from the dull toil of vulgar life? Will you wander for a moment amid the plains of Granada? Around us are those snowy and purple mountains, which a caliph wept to quit. They surrounded a land still prodigal of fruits, in spite of a Gothic government. You are gazing on the rows of blooming aloes, that are the only enclosures, with their flowery forms high in the warm air; you linger among those groves of Indian fig: you stare with strange delight at the first sight of the sugar-cane. Come away, come away, for on you green and sunny hill, rises the ruby gate of that precious pile whose name is a spell, and whose vision is romance.

Let us enter Alhambra!

See! here is the Court of Myrtles, and I gather you a sprig. Mark how exquisitely every thing is proportioned, mark how slight, and small, and delicate! And now we are in the Court of Columns, the far-famed Court of Columns. Let us enter the chambers that open round this quadrangle. How beautiful are their deeply carved and purple roofs, studded with gold, and the wall entirely covered with the most fanciful fret-work, relieved with that violet tint, which must have been copied from their Andalusian skies. Here you may sit in the coolest shade, reclining on your divan with your beads or pipe, and view the most dazzling sunlight in the court, which assuredly must scorch the flowers, if the faithful lions ever ceased from pouring forth that element which you must travel in Spain or Africa to honour. How many chambers! The Hall of the Ambassadors ever the most sumptuous. How fanciful is its mosaic ceiling of ivory and tortoise-shell, mother-of-pearl and gold! And then the Hall of Justice with its cedar roof, and the Harem, and the baths—all perfect. Not a single roof has yielded, thanks to those elegant horse-shoe arches and those crowds of marble columns, with their oriental capitals. What a scene! Is it beautiful? O! conceive it in the time of the Boabdils—conceive it with all its costly decorations, all the gilding, all the imperial purple, all the violet relief, all the scarlet borders, all the glittering inscriptions and precious mosaics, burnished, bright, and fresh. Conceive it full of still greater ornaments, the living groups with their splendid, and vivid, and picturesque costume, and above all their rich and shining arms, some standing in conversing groups, some smoking in sedate silence, some telling their beads, some squatting round a storer. Then the bustle and the rush, and the coming horsemen, all in motion, and all glancing in the most brilliant sun.

Enough of this! I am alone. Yet there was one being with whom I could have loved to roam in these imaginative halls, and found no solitude in the sole presence of her most sweet society.

Alhambra is a strong illustration of what I have long thought, that however there may be a standard of taste, there is no standard of style. I must place Alhambra with the Parthenon, the Pantheon, the Cathedral of Seville, the Temple of Dendera. They are different combinations of the same principles of taste. Thus we may equally admire Eschylus, Virgil, Calderon and Ferdousi. There never could have been a controversy on such a point, if mankind had not confused the ideas of taste and style. The Saracenic architecture is the most inventive and fanciful, but at the same time the most fitting and delicate that can be conceived. There would be no doubt about its title to be considered among the finest inventions of man if it were better known. It is only to be found in any degree of European perfection in Spain. Some of the tombs of the Mamlouk sultans in the desert round Cairo, wrongly styled by the French "the tombs of the caliphs," are equal, I think, to Alhambra. When a person sneers at the Saracenic, ask him what he has seen? Perhaps a barbarous, although picturesque building, called the Ducal Palace, at Venice. What should we think of a man, who decided on the architecture of Agrippa by the buildings of Justinian, or judged the age of Pericles by the restoration of Hadrian? Yet he would not commit so great a blunder. There is a Moorish palace, the Alcazar at Seville, a huge mosque at Cordova turned into a cathedral, with partial alteration, Alhambra at Granada, these are the great specimens in Europe, and sufficient for all study. There is a shrine and chapel of a Moorish saint at Cordova, quite untouched, with the blue mosaic and the golden honeycomb roof, as vivid and as brilliant as when the santon was worshipped. In my life have I never seen any work of art more exquisite. The materials are the richest, the ornaments the most costly, and in detail, the most elegant and the most novel, the most fanciful and the most flowing, that I ever contemplated. And yet nothing at the same time can be conceived more just than the proportion of the whole, and more mellowed than the blending of the parts, which indeed Palladio could not excel.

II.

A SPANISH city sparkling in the sun, with its white walls and verdant jalousies, is one of the most cheerful and most brilliant of the works of man. Figaro is in every street, and Rosina in every balcony.

The Moorish remains, the Christian churches, the gay, national dress, a gorgeous priesthood, ever producing, in their dazzling processions and sacred festivals, an effect upon the business of the day, the splendid pictures of a school of which we know nothing, theatres, alamedas, tertullas, bull fights, boleros,—here is matter enough for amusement within the walls, and now let us see how they pass their time out of them.

When I was in the south of Spain the whole of Andalusia was overrun with robbers. These bands, unless irritated by a rash resistance, have of late seldom committed personal violence, but only lay you on the ground and clear out your pockets. If however you have less than an ounce of gold, they shoot you. That is their tariff, which they have announced at all the principal towns, and it must be confessed is a light one. A weak government resolves society into its original elements, and robbery in Spain has become more honourable than war, inasmuch as the robber is paid, and the soldier is in arrear. The traveller must defend himself. Some combine, some compromise, merchants travel in corsarios or caravans well armed, persons of quality take a military escort, who, if cavalry, scamper off the moment they are attacked, and if infantry, remain and participate in the plunder. The government is only anxious about the post, and to secure that pay the brigands black mail.

The country is thinly populated, with few villages or farmhouses, but many towns and cities. It chiefly consists of immense plains of pasture larwhich, sunburnt in the summer, were a good preparation for the desert and intervening mountainous districts, such as the Sierra Morena, famous in Cervantes, the Sierra Nivada of Granada, and the Sierra da Ronda, a country like the Abruzzi, entirely inhabited by brigands and smugglers, and which I once explored. I must say that the wild beauty of the scenery entirely repaid me for some peril and very great hardship. Returning from this district towards Cadiz, you arrive at Oren, one of the finest mountain passes in the world. Its precipices and cork woods would have afforded inexhaustible studies to Salvator. All this part of the country is full of pictures, and of a peculiar character. I recommend Castellar to an adventurous artist.

I travelled over Andalusia on horseback, and in spite of many warnings, without any escort, or any companions but Lausanne and Tita, and little Spiro, and the muleteers who walk and occasionally increase the burden of a sumpter steed. In general, like all the Spanish peasants, they are tall, finely made fellows, looking extremely martial with their low, round, black velvet hats and coloured sashes, embroidered jackets and brilliant buttons. We took care not to have too much money, and no baggage that we could not stow in our saddle bags. I even followed the advice of an experienced guide, and was as little ostentatious as possible of my arms, for to a Spanish bandit, foreign pistols are sometimes a temptation, instead of a terror. Such prudent humility will not, however, answer in the East, where you cannot be too well, or too magnificently armed.

We were, in general, in our saddles at four o'clock, and stopped, on account of the heat, from ten till five in the evening, and then proceeded for three or four hours more. I have travelled through three successive nights, and seen the sun set and rise, without quitting my saddle, which all men cannot say. It is impossible to conceive any thing more brilliant than an Andalusian summer moon. You lose nothing of the landscape, which is only softened, not obscured, and absolutely the beams are warm. Generally speaking, we contrived to reach, for our night's bivouac, some village, which usually boasts a place called a posada. If this failed, there was sometimes a convent, and were we unfortunate in this expedient, we made pillows of our saddles, and beds of our cloaks. A posada is in fact a khan, and a very bad one. The same room holds the cattle, the kitchen, the family, and boards and mats for travellers to sleep on. Your host affords no provisions, and you must cater as you proceed, and, what is more, cook when you have catered. Yet the posada, in spite of so many causes, is seldom dirty; and for the Spaniards, notwithstanding their reputation, I claim the character of the most cleanly nation in Europe. Nothing is more remarkable than the delicacy of the cover orders. All that frequent whitewash and constant ablution can effect against a generating sun, they employ. You would think that a Spanish woman had no other occupation than to maintain the cleanliness of her chamber. Most assuredly they are a clean people. They have too much self-respect not to be clean. I once remember Lausanne rating a muleteer, who was somewhat tardy in his preparations. "What!" exclaimed the peasant, reproachfully, "would you have me go without a clean shirt?" Now when we remember that this man only put on his clean shirt to toil on foot for thirty or forty miles, we may admire his high feeling, and doubt whether we might match this incident even by that wonder, an English postilion.

Certainly the Spaniards are a noble race. They are kind and faithful, courageous and honest, with a profound mind, that will nevertheless break into rich humour, and a dignity which, like their passion, is perhaps the legacy of their oriental sires.

But, see! we have gained the summit of the hill. Behold! the noble range of the Morena mountains extends before us, and at their base is a plain worthy of such a boundary. Yon river, winding amid bowers of orange, is the beautiful Guadalquivir, and that city, with its many spires and mighty mosque, is the famous Cordova!

III.

THE court-yard was full of mules, a body of infantry were bivouacking under the colonnades. There were several servants, all armed, and a crowd of muleteers with bludgeons.

"'Tis a great lady from Madrid, sir," observed Tita, who was lounging in the court.

I had now been several days at Cordova, and intended to depart at sunset for Granada. The country between these two cities is more infested by brigands than any tract in Spain. The town was rife with their daring exploits. Every traveller during the last month had been plundered, and only the night before my arrival, they had, in revenge for some attempt of the governor to interfere, burned down a farmhouse a few miles without the gates.

When I entered the hotel, the landlord came up to me, and advised me to postpone my departure for a few hours, as a great lady from Madrid was about to venture the journey, and depart at midnight towards Malaga with a strong escort. He doubted not that she would consent with pleasure to my joining their party. I did not feel, I fear, as grateful for his proposition as I ought to have been. I was tired of Cordova—I had made up my mind to depart at a particular hour. I had hitherto escaped the brigands—I began to suspect that their activity was exaggerated. At the worst, I apprehended no great evil. Some persons always escaped, and I was confident in my fortune.

"What is all this?" I inquired of Lausanne.

"'Tis a great lady from Madrid," replied Lausanne.

"And have you seen her?"

"I have not, sir, but I have seen her husband."

"O! she has a husband—then I certainly will not stop. At sunset we go."

In half an hour's time the landlord again entered my room, with an invitation from the great lady and her lord to join them at dinner. Of course I could not refuse, although I began to suspect that my worthy host, in his considerate suggestions, had perhaps been influenced by other views than merely my security.

I repaired to the saloon. It was truly a Gil Blas scene. The grandee, in an undress uniform, and highly imposing in appearance, greeted me with dignity. He was of middle age, with a fine form and a strongly marked, true Castilian countenance, but very handsome. The senora was exceedingly young, and really very pretty, with infinite vivacity and grace. A French valet leaned over the husband's chair, and a duenna, broad and supercilious, with beady jet eyes, mahogany complexion, and cocked-up nose, stood by her young mistress, refreshing her with a huge fan.

After some general and agreeable conversation, the senior introduced the intended journey, and understanding that I was about to proceed in the same direction, offered me the advantage of his escort. The dama most energetically impressed upon me the danger of travelling alone, and I was brutal enough to suspect that she had more confidence in foreign aid than in the courage of her countrymen.

I was in one of those ungallant fits that sometimes come over men of shattered nerves. I had looked forward with moody pleasure to a silent moonlit ride. I shrunk from the constant effort of continued conversation. It did not appear that my chivalry would be grievously affected in an almost solitary cavalier deserting a dame environed by a military force and a band of armed retainers. In short, I was not seduced by the prospect of security, and rash enough to depart alone.

The moon rose. I confess our anxiety. The muleteer prophesied an attack. "They will be out," said he, "for the great lady; we cannot escape." We passed two travelling friars on their mules, who gave us their blessing; and I observed to-night by the road-side more crosses than usual, and each of these is indicative of a violent death. We crossed an immense plain, and entered a broken mule-track through uneven ground. We were challenged by a picquet, and I, who was ahead, nearly got shot for not answering. It was a corsario of armed merchants returning from the fair of Ronda. We stopped and made inquiries, but could learn nothing, and we continued our journey for several hours in silence, by the most brilliant moon. We began to hope we had escaped, when suddenly a muleteer informed us that he could distinguish a trampling of horse in the distance. Ave Maria! a cold perspiration came over us. Decidedly they approached. We drew up out of pure fear. I had a pistol in one hand and my purse in the other, to act according to circumstances. The band were clearly in sight. I was encouraged by finding that they were a rather uproarious crew. They turned out to be a company of actors travelling to Cordova. There were dresses and decorations, scenery and machinery, all on mules and donkeys—the singers rehearsing an opera, the principal tragedian riding on an ass, and the buffo most serious, looking as grave as night, with a cigar, and in greater agitation than all the rest. The women were in side-saddles like sedans, and there were whole panniers of children. Some of the actresses were chanting an ave, while, in more than one instance, their waists were encircled by the brawny arm of a more robust devotee. All this irresistibly reminded me of Cervantes.

Night waned, and, instead of meeting robbers, we discovered that we had only lost our way. At length we stumbled upon some peasants sleeping in the field amid the harvest, who told us that it was utterly impossible to regain our road; and so, our steeds and ourselves being equally wearied, we dismounted, and turned our saddles into pillows.

I was roused, after a couple of hours' sound slumber, by the Rosario, a singing procession, in which the peasantry congregate to their labours.

It is most effective, full of noble chants and melodious responses, that break upon the still fresh air, and your fresher feelings, in a manner truly magical. This is the country for a national novelist. The out-door life of the natives induces a variety of most picturesque manners, while their semi-civilization makes each district retain, with barbarous jealousy, their peculiar customs.

I heard a shot at no great distance. It was repeated. To horse, to horse! I roused Lausanne and Tita. It occurred to me directly. Shots were interchanged. We galloped in the direction of the sound, followed by several peasants, and firing our pistols. Two or three runaway soldiers met us. "Carraho! Scoundrels, turn back!" we cried. In a few minutes we were in sight of the combat. It was a most unequal one, and nearly finished. A robber had hold of the arm of the great lady of Madrid, who was dismounted, and seated on a bank. Her husband was leaning on his sword, and evidently agreeing to a capitulation. The servants seemed still disposed to fight. Two or three wounded men were lying on the field—soldiers, and mules, and muleteers, running about in all directions.

Tita, who was an admirable shot, fired the moment he was within reach, and brought down his man. I ran up to the lady, but not in time to finish her assailant, who was off in a flash. The robbers, surprised, disorderly, and plundering, made no fight, and we permitted them to retreat with some severe loss.

Exclamations, gratitude, hysterics. Lausanne in the mean time produced order. The infantry rallied, the mules re-assembled, the baggage was again arranged. The travellers were the Marquis and Marchioness of Santiago, who were about to pay a visit to their relative, the Governor of Malaga. I remained with them until we reached Granada, when the most dangerous portion of this journey was completed, and I parted from these agreeable persons, with a promise to visit them on my arrival at their place of destination.

IV.

THERE is not a more beautiful and solemn temple in the world than the great cathedral of Seville. When you enter from the glare of a Spanish sky, so deep is the staining of the glass, and so small and few the windows, that, for a moment, you feel in darkness. Gradually the vast design of the Gothic artist unfolds itself to your vision: gradually rises up before you the profuse sumptuousness of the high altar, with its tall images, and velvet and gold hangings, its gigantic railings of brass and massy candlesticks of silver—all revealed by the dim and perpetual light of the sacred and costly lamps.

You steal with a subdued spirit over the marble pavement. All is still, save the hushed muttering of the gliding priests. Around you are groups of kneeling worshippers, some prostrate on the ground, some gazing upwards with their arms crossed in mute devotion, some beating their breasts and counting their consoling beads. Lo! the tinkling of a bell. The mighty organ bursts forth. Involuntarily you fall upon your knees, and listen to the rising chanting of the solemn choir. A procession moves from an adjoining chapel. A band of crimson acolytes advance, waving their censers, and the melody of their distant voices responds to the deep-toned invocations of the nearer canons.

There are a vast number of chapels in this cathedral on each side of the principal nave. Most of them are adorned with masterpieces of the Spanish school. Let us approach one. The light is good, and let us gaze through this iron railing upon the picture it encloses.

I see a saint falling upon his knees, and extending his enraptured arm to receive an infant god. What mingled love, enthusiasm, devotion, reverence, blend in the countenance of the holy man! But, O! that glowing group of seraphim, sailing and smiling in the sunny splendour of that radiant sky—who has before gazed upon such grace, such ineffable and charming beauty? And in the background is an altar, whereon is a vase holding some lilies, that seem as if they were just gathered. There is but one artist who could have designed this picture, there is but one man who could have thus combined ideal grace with natural simplicity, there is but one man who could have painted that diaphanous heaven and those fresh lilies. Inimitable Murillo!

V.

A SPANISH bull-fight taught me fully to comprehend the rapturous exclamation of "Panem et Circenses!" The amusement apart, there is something magnificent in the assembled thousands of an amphitheatre. It is the trait in modern manners which most effectually recalls the nobility of antique pastime. The poetry of a bull-fight is very much destroyed by the appearance of the cavaliers. Instead of gay, gallant knights, bounding on caroling steeds, three or four shapeless, unwieldy beings, cased in armour of stuffed leather, and looking more like Dutch burgomasters than Spanish chivalry, enter the lists on limping rips. The bull is, in fact, the executioner for the dogs, and an approaching bull-fight is a respite for any doomed steed throughout all Seville.

The tauridors, in their varying, fanciful, costly, and splendid dresses, compensate, in a great measure, for your disappointment. It is difficult to conceive a more brilliant band. These are ten or a dozen footmen, who engage the bull unarmed, distract him as he rushes at one of the cavaliers by unfolding, and dashing before his eyes a glittering scarf, and saving themselves from an occasional charge by practised agility, which elicits great applause. The performance of these tauridors is, without doubt, the most graceful, the most exciting, and the most surprising portion of the entertainment.

The ample theatre is nearly full. Be careful to sit on the shady side. There is the suspense experienced at all public entertainments, only here upon a great scale. Men are gliding about selling fans and refreshments. The governor and his suite enter their box. A trumpet sounds! all is silent.

The knights advance, poising their spears, and for a moment trying to look graceful. The tauridors walk behind them, two by two. They proceed around, and across the lists. They bow to the viceregal party, and commend themselves to the Virgin, whose portrait is suspended above.

Another trumpet! a second, and a third blast. The governor throws the signal. The den opens, and the bull bounds in. The first spring is very fine. The animal stands for a moment still, staring, stupified. Gradually his hoof moves; he paws the ground; he dashes about the sand. The knights face him with their extended lances at due distance. The tauridors are all still. One flies across him, and waves his scarf. The enraged bull makes at the nearest horseman. He is frustrated in his attack. Again he plants himself, lashes his tail, and rolls about his eye. He makes another charge, and this time, the glance of the spear does not drive him back. He gores the horse, rips up its body, the steed staggers and falls. The bull rushes at the rider, and his armour will not now preserve him, but, just as his awful horn is about to avenge his future fate, a skilful tauridor skims before him, and flaps his nostrils with his scarf. He flies after his new assailant, and immediately finds another. Now, you are delighted by all the evolutions of this consummate band: occasionally they can only save themselves by leaping the barrier. The knight, in the mean time, rises, escapes, and mounts another steed.

The bull now makes a rush at another horseman. The horse dexterously veers aside. The bull rushes on, but the knight wounds him severely in the flank with his lance. The tauridors now appear armed with darts. They rush with extraordinary swiftness and dexterity at the now infuriated animal, plant their galling weapons in different parts of his body, and scud away. To some of their darts are affixed fireworks, which ignite by the pressure of the stab. The animal is then as bewildered as infuriated. The amphitheatre echoes to his roaring, and witnesses the greatest efforts of his rage. He flies at all, staggering and streaming with blood; at length, breathless, and exhausted, he stands at bay, his black swollen tongue hanging out, and his mouth covered with foam.

'Tis horrible. Throughout, a stranger's feelings are for the bull: although this even the fairest Spaniard cannot comprehend. As it is now evident that the noble victim can only amuse them by his death, there is a universal cry for the matador; and the matador, gayly dressed, appears amid a loud cheer. The matador is a great artist. Strong nerves must combine with quickness, and great experience, to form an accomplished matador. It is a rare character, highly prized. Their fame exists after their death, and different cities pride themselves on producing, or possessing the eminent.

The matador plants himself before the bull, and shakes a red cloak suspended over a drawn sword. This last insult excites the lingering energy of the dying hero. He makes a violent charge, the mantle falls over his face, and the sword enters his spine, and he falls amid thundering shouts. The death is instantaneous, without a struggle and without a groan. A car, decorated with flowers and ribands, and drawn by oxen, now appears, and bears off the body in triumph.

I have seen eighteen horses killed in a bull-fight, and eight bulls. But the sport is not always in proportion to the slaughter. Sometimes the bull is a craven, and then, if after having recourse to every mode of excitement he will not charge, he is kicked out of the arena, amid the jeers and hisses of the audience. Every act of skill on the part of the tauridors elicits applause, nor do the spectators hesitate, if necessary, to mark their temper by a contrary method. On the whole, it is a magnificent but barbarous spectacle, and however disgusting the principal object, the accessories of the entertainment are so brilliant and interesting, that, whatever may be their abstract disapprobation, those who have witnessed a Spanish bull-fight, will not be surprised at the passionate attachment of the Spanish people to their national pastime.

VI.

THERE is a calm voluptuousness about Spanish life that wonderfully accorded with the disposition in which I then found myself; so that, had my intellect been at command, I do not know any place where I would more willingly have indulged it. The imagination in such a country is ever at work, and beauty and grace are not scared away by those sounds and sights, those constant cares and changing feelings, which are the proud possession of lands which consider themselves more blessed.

You rise early, and should breakfast lightly, although a table covered with all fruits, renders that rather difficult to those who have a passion for the most delightful productions of nature, and would willingly linger over a medley of grape, and melon, and gourd, and prickly pear. In the morning, you never quit the house, and these are hours which might be delightfully employed under the inspiration of a climate which is itself poetry, for it sheds over every thing a golden hue, which does not exist in the objects themselves illuminated. I could then indulge only in a calm reverie, for I found the least exertion of mind instantly aggravate all my symptoms. But to exist, and to feel existence more tolerable, to observe and to remember, to record a thought that suddenly starts up, or catch a new image which glances over the surface of the mind—this was still left to me. But the moment that I attempted to meditate or combine, to ascertain a question that was doubtful, or in any way to call the higher powers of intellect into play, that moment I felt a lost man. My brain seemed to palpitate with frenzy. An indescribable feeling of idiocy came over me, and for hours I was plunged into a state of the darkest despair. When the curse had subsided to its usual dull degree of horror, my sanguine temper called me again to life and hope. My general health had never been better, and this supported me under the hardships of Spanish travelling. I never for a moment gave way to my real feelings, except under a paroxysm, and then I fled to solitude. But I resolved to pursue this life only for a year, and if at the end of that period I found no relief, the convent and the cloister should at least afford me repose. This was a firm determination.

But 'tis three o'clock, and all this time we should be at dinner. The Spanish kitchen is not much to my taste, being rich and rather gross. And yet for a pleasant, as well as a picturesque dish, commend me to an olla podrida! After dinner, comes the famed siesta. I generally slept for two hours. I think this practice conducive to health in hot climates. The aged however are apt to carry it to excess. By the time you have risen, and made your toilet, it is the hour to steal forth, and call upon any agreeable family, whose tertulla you may choose to honour, which you do, after the first time, uninvited, and with them you take your chocolate. This is often in the air; under the colonnade of the patio, or interior quadrangle of the mansion. Here you while away the time with music and easy talk, until it is cool enough for the Alameda, or public promenade. At Cadiz and Malaga, and even at Seville, up the Guadalquivir, you are sure of a delightful breeze from the water. The sea-breeze comes like a spirit. The effect is quite magical. As you are lolling in listless languor in the hot and perfumed air, an invisible guest comes dancing into the party, and touches all with an enchanted wand. All start, all smile. It has come, it is the sea-breeze. There is much discussion, whether it be as strong as, or whether weaker than the night before. The ladies furl their fans, and seize their mantillas; the cavaliers stretch their legs, and give sign of life. All rise. You offer your arm to Dolores or Catalina, and in ten minutes you are on the Alameda. What a change! All is now life and liveliness. Such bowing, such kissing, such fluttering of fans, such gentle criticisms of gente friends! But the fan is the most wonderful part of the whole scene. A Spanish lady, with her fan, might shame the tactics of a troop of horse. Now she unfurls it with the slow pomp and conscious elegance of the bird of Juno; now she flutters it with all the languor of the listless beauty, now with all the liveliness of a vivacious one. Now, in the midst of a very tornado, she closes it with a whirl which makes you start. Pop! In the midst of your confusion, Dolores taps you on the elbow; you turn round to listen, and Catalina pokes you in your side. Magical instrument! In this land it speaks a particular language, and gallantry requires no other mode to express its most subtle conceits, or its most unreasonable demands, than this delicate machine. Yet we should remember that here, as in the north, it is not confined to the delightful sex. The cavalier also has his fan, and that the habit may not be considered an indication of effeminacy, learn that, in this scorching clime, the soldier will not mount guard without this solace.

But night wears on. We seat ourselves, we take a fanal, and fanciful refreshment which also, like the confectionary of Venice, I have since discovered to be oriental. Again we stroll. Midnight clears the public walk, but few Spanish families retire until a much later hour. A solitary bachelor, like myself, still wanders, lingering where the dancers softly move in the warm moonlight, and indicate, by the grace of their eager gestures, and the fulness of their languid eyes, the fierceness of their passion. At length the castanet is silent, the tinkling of the last guitar dies away, and the cathedral clock breaks up your reverie. You, too, seek your couch, and amid a sweet flow of loveliness, and light, and music, and fresh air, thus dies a day in Spain.

VII.

THE Spanish women are very interesting. What we associate with the idea of female beauty, is not perhaps very common in this country. There are seldom those seraphic countenances, which strike you dumb, or blind, but faces in abundance which will never pass without commanding admiration. Their charms consist in their sensibility. Each incident, every person, every word, touches the fancy of a Spanish lady, and her expressive features are constantly confuting the creed of the Moslem. But there is nothing quick, harsh, or forced about her. She is extremely unaffected, and not at all French. Her eyes gleam rather than sparkle, she speaks with vivacity, but in sweet tones, and there is in all her carriage, particularly when she walks, a certain dignified grace which never deserts her, and which is very remarkable.

The general female dress in Spain is of black silk, called a basquina, and a black silk shawl, with which they usually envelope their heads, called a mantilla. As they walk along in this costume in an evening, with their soft dark eyes dangerously conspicuous, you willingly believe in their universal charms. They are remarkable for the beauty of their hair. Of this they are very proud, and indeed its luxuriance is only equalled by the attention which they lavish on its culture. I have seen a young girl of fourteen, whose hair reached her feet, and was as glossy as the curl of a contessa. All day long, even the lowest order are brushing, curling, and arranging it. A fruit-woman has her hair dressed with as much care as the Dutchess of Ossuna. In the summer, they do not wear their mantilla over their heads, but show their combs, which are of very great size. The fashion of these combs varies constantly. Every two or three months you may observe a new form. It is the part of the costume of which a Spanish woman is most proud. The moment that a new comb appears, even a servant wench will run to the melter's with her old one, and thus, with the cost of a dollar or two, appear the next holiday in the newest style. These combs are worn at the back of the head. They are of tortoise-shell, and with the very fashionable, they are white. I sat next to a lady of high distinction at a bull-fight at Seville. She was the daughter-in-law of the captain general of the province, and the most beautiful Spaniard I ever met. Her comb was white, and she wore a mantilla of blonde, without doubt extremely valuable, for it was very dirty. The effect, however, was charming. Her hair was glossy black, her eyes like an antelope's, and all her other features deliciously soft. She was further adorned, which is rare in Spain, with a rosy cheek, for in Spain our heroines are rather sallow. But they counteract this slight defect by never appearing until twilight, which calls them from their bowers, fresh, though languid, from the late siesta.

The only fault of the Spanish beauty is, that she too soon indulges in the magnificence of embonpoint. There are, however, many exceptions. At seventeen, a Spanish beauty is poetical. Tall, lithe, and clear, and graceful as a jennet, who can withstand the summer lightning of her soft and languid glance! As she advances, if she do not lose her shape, she resembles Juno rather than Venus. Majestic she ever is, and if her feet be less twinkling than in her first bolero, look on her hand, and you'll forgive them all.

VIII.

AT Malaga, I again met the Santiagos, and through their medium, became acquainted with a young French nobleman, who had served in the late expedition against Algiers, and retired from the army in consequence of the recent revolution in his native country. The rapturous tone in which he spoke of the delights of oriental life, and of his intention to settle permanently in Egypt, or some other part of the Ottoman empire, excited in me a great desire to visit those countries, for which my residence in a Grecian isle had somewhat prepared me. And on inquiry at the quay, finding that there was a vessel bound for the Ionian isles at present in harbour, and about to sail, I secured our passage, and in a few days quitted the Iberian peninsula.

IX.

IN sight of the ancient Coreyra, I could not forget, that the island I beheld had given rise to one of the longest and most celebrated, and most fatal of ancient wars. The immortal struggle of the Peloponnesus was precipitated, if not occasioned, by a feeling of colonial jealousy. There is a great difference between ancient and modern colonies. A modern colony is a commercial enterprise, an ancient colony was a political settlement. In the emigration of our citizens, hitherto, we have merely sought the means of acquiring wealth; the ancients, when their brethren quitted their native shores, wept and sacrificed, and were reconciled to the loss of their fellow-citizens solely by the constraint of stern necessity, and the hope that they were about to find easier subsistence, and to lead a more cheerful and commodious life. I believe that a great revolution is at hand in our system of colonization, and that Europe will soon recur to the principles of the ancient polity.

Old Coreyra is now the modern Corfu—a lovely isle, with all that you hope to meet in a Grecian sea—gleamy waters, woody bays, the cyprus, the olive, and the vine, a clear sky and a warm sun. I learned here that a civil war raged in Albania and the neighbouring provinces of European Turkey, and, in spite of all advice, I determined, instead of advancing into Greece, to attempt to penetrate to the Turkish camp, and witness, if possible, a campaign. With these views, I engaged a small vessel to carry me to Prevesa.

X.

I WAS now in the Ambracian Gulf, those famous waters, where the soft triumvir gained greater glory by defeat than attends the victory of harsher warriors.—The site is not unworthy of the beauty of Cleopatra. From the sinuosity of the land, this gulf appears like a vast lake, walled in on all sides by mountains more or less distant. The dying glory of a Grecian eve bathed with warm lights, a thousand promontories, and gentle bays, and infinite undulations of purple outline. Before me was Olympus, whose austere peak glittered yet in the sun; a bend of the shore alone concealed from me the islands of Ulysses and of Sappho.

As I gazed upon this scene, I thought almost with disgust of the savage splendour and turbulent existence in which perhaps I was about to mingle; I recurred to the feelings in the indulgence of which I could alone find felicity, and from which an inexorable destiny seemed resolved to shut me out.

Hark! the clang of the barbaric horn, and the wild clash of the cymbal. A body of Turkish infantry marched along the shore. I landed, and learned, for the first time, of the massacre of the principal rebel beys at Monastir, at a banquet given by the grand-vizier on pretence of arranging all differences. My host, a Frank, experienced in the Turkish character, checked me, as I poured forth my indignation at this savage treachery. "Live a little longer in these countries before you hazard an opinion as to their conduct. Do you indeed think that the rebel beys of Albania were so simple as to place the slightest trust in the vizier's pledge. The practice of politics in the East may be defined by one word—dissimulation. The most wary disssembler is the most consummate statesman. The Albanian chiefs went up to the divan in full array, and accompanied by a select body of their best troops. They were resolved to overawe the vizier, perhaps they even meditated, with regard to him, the very stroke which he had put in execution against themselves. He was the most skilful disssembler, that is all. His manner threw them off their guard. With their troops bivouacking in the court-yard, they did not calculate that his highness could contrive to massacre the troops by an ambush, and would dare, at the same moment, to attack the leaders by their very attendants at the banquet. There is no feeling of indignation in the country at the treachery of the conqueror, though a very strong sentiment of rage, and mortification, and revenge."

I learned that the grand-vizier had rejoined the main army, and was supposed to have advanced to Yanina, the capital; that in the mean time, the country between this city and the coast was overrun with prowling bands, the remnants of the rebel army, who, infuriate and flying, massacred, burned, and destroyed all persons and all property. This was an agreeable prospect. My friend dissuaded me from my plans, but, as I was unwilling to relinquish them, he recommended me to sail up to Salora, and from thence journey to Arta, where I might seek assistance from Kalio Bey, a Moslem chief, one of the most powerful and wealthy of the Albanian nobles, and ever faithful to the Porte.

To Salora I consequently repaired, and the next day succeeded in reaching Arta, a town once as beautiful as its site, and famous for its gardens, but now a mass of ruins. The whole place was razed to the ground, the minaret of the principal mosque alone untouched, and I shall never forget the effect of the muezzin with his rich, and solemn, and sonorous voice, calling us to adore God in the midst of all this human havoc.

I found the Bey of Arta keeping his state, which, notwithstanding the surrounding desolation, was not contemptible, in a tenement which was not much better than a large shed. He was a very handsome, stately man, grave but not dull, and remarkably mild and bland in his manner. His polished courtesies might perhaps be ascribed to his recent imprisonment in Russia, where he was treated with so much consideration that he mentioned it to me. I had lived in such complete solitude in Candia, and had there been so absorbed by passion, that I really was much less acquainted with Turkish manners than I ought to have been. I must confess that it was with some awe that for the first time in my life I entered the divan of a great Turk, and found myself sitting cross-legged on the right hand of a bey, smoking an amber-mouthed chibouque, sipping coffee, and paying him compliments through an interpreter.

There were several guests in the room, chiefly his officers. They were, as the Albanians in general, finely formed men, with expressive countenances, and spare forms. Their picturesque dress is celebrated, though to view it with full effect it should be seen upon an Albanian. The long hair and the small cap, the crimson velvet vest and jacket, embroidered and embossed with golden patterns of the most elegant and flowing forms, the white and ample kilt, the ornamented buskins, and the belt full of silver-sheathed arms,—it is difficult to find humanity in better plight.

There was a considerable appearance of affairs, and of patriarchal solitude in the divan of Kalio Bey. It is possible that it was not always as busy, and that he was not uninfluenced by the pardonable vanity of impressing a stranger with his importance and beneficence. Many persons entered, and casting off their slippers at the door, advanced and parleyed; to some was given money, to all directions, and the worthy bey doled out his piastres and his instructions with equal solemnity. At length, I succeeded in calling my host's attention to the purport of my visit, and he readily granted me an escort of twenty of his Albanians. He was even careful that they should be picked men, and, calculating that I might reach the capital in two days, he drew his writing materials from his belt, and gave me a letter to a Turkish bimbashce, or colonel, who was posted with his force in the mountains I was about to pass, and under the only roof which probably remained between Arta and Yanina. He pressed me to remain his guest, though there was little, he confessed, to interest me, but I was anxious to advance, and so, after many thanks, I parted from the kind Kalio Bey.

XI.

By daybreak we departed, and journeyed for many hours over a wild range of the ancient Pindus, stopping only once for a short rest at a beautiful fountain of marble. Here we all dismounted, and lighted a fire, boiled the coffee, and smoked our pipes. There were many fine groups, but little Spiro was not as delighted as I expected at finding himself once more among his countrymen.

An hour before sunset we found ourselves at a vast, but dilapidated khan, as big as a Gothic castle, situated on a high range, and built for the accommodation of travellers from the capital to the coast, by the great Ali Pasha, when his long, sagacious, and unmolested reign permitted him to develop, in a country which combines the excellences of Western Asia and Southern Europe, some of the intended purposes of a beneficent nature. This khan had now been converted into a military post, and here we found the Turkish commander, to whom Kalio Bey had given me a letter. He was a young man of very elegant and pleasing exterior, but unluckily could not understand a word of Greek, and we had no interpreter. What was to be done? Proceed we could not, for there was not an inhabited place before Yanina, and here was I sitting before sunset on the same divan with my host, who had entered the place to receive me, and would not leave the room while I was there, without the power of communicating an idea. I was in despair, and also very hungry, and could not therefore, in the course of an hour or two, plead fatigue as an excuse for sleep, for I was ravenous, and anxious to know what prospect of food existed in this wild and desolate mansion. So we smoked. It is a great resource. But this wore out, and it was so ludicrous smoking and looking at each other, and dying to talk, and then exchanging pipes by way of compliment, and then pressing our hands to our hearts by way of thanks. At last it occurred to me that I had some brandy, and that I would offer my host a glass, which might serve as a hint for what should follow so vehement a schnaps. Mashallah! the effect was indeed miraculous. My mild friend smacked his lips, and instantly asked for another cup. We drank it in coffee-cups. A bottle of brandy was despatched in quicker time, and fairer proportions, than had ever solemnized the decease of the same portion of Burgundy. We were extremely gay. The bimbashee ordered some dried figs, talking all the time, and indulging in the most graceful pantomime, examining my pistols, inquiring about percussion locks, which greatly surprised him, handing his own more ornamented although less effective weapons, for my inspection, and finally making out Greek enough to misunderstand most ludicrously every observation communicated. But all was taken in good part, and I never met such a jolly fellow in the course of my life.

In the mean time I became painfully ravenous, for the dry, round, unsugary fig of Albania is a great whetter. At last I asked for bread. The bimbashee gravely bowed, and said, "Leave it to me, take no thought," and nothing more occurred. I prepared myself for hungry dreams, when to my great astonishment and delight, a capital supper was brought in, accompanied, to my equal horror, by wine. We ate with our fingers. It was the first time I had performed such an operation. You soon get used to it, and dash, but in turn, at the choice morsels with perfect coolness. One, with a basin and ewer, is in attendance, and the whole process is by no means so terrible as it would first appear to European habits. For drinking—we really drank with a rapidity which, with me, was unprecedented. The wine was not bad, but, had it been poison, the forbidden juice was such a compliment from a Moslem, that I must quaff it all. We quaffed it in rivers. The bimbashee called for brandy. Unfortunately there was another bottle. We drank it all. The room turned round, the wild attendants, who sat at our feet, seemed dancing in strange whirls, the bimbashee shook hands with me, he shouted Italian, I Turkish. "Buono, buono," he had caught up,—"Pecche, pecche," was my rejoinder, which, let me inform the reader, although I do not even now know much more, is very good Turkish. He roared, he patted me on the back. I remember no more.

In the middle of the night I awoke. I found myself sleeping on the divan, rolled up in its sacred carpet. The bimbashee had wisely reeled to the fire. The thirst I felt was like that of Loises. All were sleeping except two, who kept up, during the night, the great wood-fire. I rose, lightly stepping over my sleeping companions, and the shining arms, that here and there informed me that the dark mass wrapped up in a capote was a human being. I found Abraham's bosom in a flagon of water. I think I must have drunk a gallon at the draught. I looked at the wood-fire, and thought of the blazing blocks in the hall of Jonsterna, asked myself whether I were indeed in the mountain fastness of a Turkish chief, and shrugging my shoulders went to sleep, and woke without a headache.

XII.

I PARTED from my jovial host the next morning very cordially, and gave him my pipe, as a memorial of having got tipsy together.

After having crossed one more range of steep mountains, we descended into a vast plain, over which we journeyed for some hours, the country presenting the same mournful aspect which I had too long observed: villages in ruins, and perfectly desolate—khans deserted, and fortresses razed to the ground—olive woods burnt up, and fruit trees cut down. So complete had been the work of destruction, that I often unexpectedly found my horse stumbling amid the foundation of a village, and what at first appeared the dry bed of a torrent, often turned out to be the backbone of the skeleton of a ravaged town. At the end of the plain, immediately backed by very lofty mountains, and jutting into the beautiful lake that bears its name, we suddenly came upon the city of Yanina: suddenly, for a long tract of gradually rising ground had hitherto concealed it from our sight. At the distance I first beheld it, this city, once, if not the largest, one of the most thriving and brilliant in the Turkish dominions, was still imposing, but when I entered, I soon found that all preceding desolation had been only preparatory to the vast scene of destruction now before me. We proceeded through a street winding in its course, but of very great length. Ruined houses, mosques with their tower only standing, streets utterly razed—these are nothing. We met great patches of ruin a mile square, as if an army of locusts had had the power of desolating the works of man, as well as those of God. The great heart of the city was a sea of ruin,—arches and pillars, isolated and shattered, still here and there jutting forth, breaking the uniformity of the annihilation, and turning the horrible into the picturesque. The great Bazaar, itself a little town, had been burned down only a few days before my arrival, by an infuriate band of Albanian warriors, who heard of the destruction of their chiefs by the grand vizier. They revenged themselves on tyranny by destroying civilization.

But while the city itself presented this mournful appearance, its other characteristics were any thing but sad. At this moment a swarming population, arrayed in every possible and fanciful costume, buzzed and bustled in all directions. As I passed on, and myself of course not unobserved, where a Frank had not penetrated for nine years, a thousand objects attracted my restless attention and roving eye. Every thing was so strange and splendid, that for a moment I forgot that this was an extraordinary scene even for the East, and gave up my fancy to full credulity in the now almost obsolete magnificence of oriental life. I longed to write an Eastern tale. Military chieftains, clothed in the most brilliant colours and sumptuous furs, and attended by a cortege of officers equally splendid, continually passed us. Now for the first time a dervish saluted me; and now a delhi, with his high cap, reined in his desperate steed, as the suite of some pasha blocked up some turning of the street. It seemed to me that my first day in a Turkish city brought before me all the popular characteristics of which I had read, and which I expected occasionally to observe during a prolonged residence. I remember, as I rode on this day, I observed a Turkish sheikh in his entirely green vestments, a scribe with his writing materials in his girdle, an ambulatory physician and his boy. I gazed about me with a mingled feeling of delight and wonder.

Suddenly a strange, wild, unearthly drum is heard, and at the end of the street, a huge camel, with a slave sitting cross-legged on its neck, and playing upon an immense kettledrum, appears, and is the first of an apparently interminable procession of his Arabian brethren. The camels were very large, they moved slowly, and were many in number. There were not less than a hundred moving on one by one. To me who had then never seen a caravan, it was a novel and impressive spectacle. All immediately hustled out of the way of the procession, and seemed to shrink under the sound of the wild drum. The camels bore corn for the vizier's troops encamped without the walls.

At length I reached the house of a Greek physician, to whom I carried letters. My escort repaired to the quarters of their chieftain's son, who was in the city in attendance on the grand vizier, and for myself I was glad enough once more to stretch my wearied limbs under a Christian roof.

XIII.

THE next day, I signified my arrival to the kehaya bey of his highness, and delivered, according to custom, a letter, with which I had been kindly provided by an eminent foreign functionary. The ensuing morning was fixed for my audience. I repaired at the appointed hour to the celebrated fortress palace of Ali Pasha, which, although greatly battered by successive sieges, is still inhabitable, and still affords a very fair idea of its pristine magnificence. Having passed through the gates of the fortress, I found myself in a number of small dingy streets, like those in the liberties of a royal castle. These were all full of life, stirring and excited. At length I reached a grand square, in which, on an ascent, stands the palace. I was hurried through courts and corridors, full of guards, and pages, and attendant chiefs, and in short every variety of Turkish population; for among the orientals all depends upon one brain, and we, with our subdivisions of duty, and intelligent and responsible deputies, can form no idea of the labour of a Turkish premier. At length I came to a vast, irregular apartment, serving as the immediate antechamber of the hall of audience.

This was the first thing of the kind I had ever yet seen. In the whole course of my life I had never mingled in so picturesque an assembly. Conceive a chamber of very great dimensions, full of the choicest groups of an oriental population, each individual waiting by appointment for an audience, and probably about to wait for ever. It was a sea of turbans, and crimson shawls, and golden scarfs, and ornamented arms. I marked with curiosity the haughty Turk stroking his beard, and waving his beads; the proud Albanian strutting with his tarragan, or cloak, dependent on one shoulder, and touching with impatient fingers his silver-sheathed arms; the olive-visaged Asiatic, with his enormous turban and flowing robes, gazing, half with wonder and half with contempt, at some scarlet colonel of the newly-disciplined troops in his gorgeous, but awkward imitation of Frank uniforms; the Greek, still servile, though no more a slave; the Nubian eunuch, and the Georgian page.

In this chamber, attended by the drogouman, who presented me, I remained about ten minutes—too short a time. I never thought I could have lived to wish to kick my heels in a ministerial antechamber. Suddenly I was summoned to the awful presence of the pillar of the Turkish empire, the man who has the reputation of being the main-spring of the new system of regeneration, the renowned Redschid, an approved warrior, a consummate politician, unrivalled as a dissembler in a country where dissimulation is the principal portion of moral culture. The hall was vast, entirely covered with gilding and arabesques, inlaid with tortoise-shell and mother-of-pearl. Here, squatted up in a corner of the large divan, I bowed to a little ferocious-looking, shrivelled, care-worn man, plainly dressed, with a brow covered with wrinkles, and a countenance clouded with anxiety and thought. I entered the shed-like divan of the kind, and comparatively insignificant Kalio Bey with a feeling of awe; I seated myself on the divan of the grand vizier of the Ottoman empire, who, as my attendant informed me, had destroyed, in the course of the last three months, not in war, "upwards of four thousand of my acquaintance," with the self-possession of a morning visit. At a distance from us, in a group on his left-hand, were his secretary, and his immediate suite. The end of the saloon was lined with tchawooshes, or lackeys, in waiting, in crimson dresses with long silver canes.

Some compliments passed between us. I congratulated his highness on the pacification of Albania, and he rejoined, that the peace of the world was his only object, and the happiness of his fellow-creatures his only wish. Pipes and coffee were then brought, and then his highness waved his hand, and in an instant the chamber was cleared.

He then told me that he had read the letter, that the writer was one whom he much loved, and that I should join the army, although, of course, I was aware that, as a Frank, I could hold no command. I told him that such was not my desire, but that, as I intended to proceed to Stamboul, it would be gratifying to me to feel that I had co-operated, however humbly, in the cause of a sovereign whom I greatly admired. A Tartar now arrived with despatches, and I rose to retire, for I could perceive that the vizier was overwhelmed with business, and although courteous, moody and anxious. He did not press me to remain, but desired that I would go and visit his son, Amin Pasha, to whose care he had consigned me.

Amin, Pasha of Yanina, was a youth of eighteen, but apparently ten years older. He was the reverse of his father: incapable in affairs, refined in manners, plunged in debauchery, and magnificent in dress. I found him surrounded by his favourites and flatterers, lolling on his divan in a fanciful hussar uniform of blue cloth covered with gold and diamonds, and worn under a Damascus pelisse of thick maroon silk, lined with white fox furs. I have seldom met with a man of more easy address, and more polished breeding. He paid many compliments to the Franks, and expressed his wish to make a visit to the English at Corfu. As I was dressed in regimentals, he offered to show me his collection of military costumes, which had been made for him principally at Vienna. He also ordered one of his attendants to bring his manuscript book of cavalry tactics, which were unfortunately all explained to me. I mention these slight traits to show how eagerly the modern Turks pique themselves on European civilization. After smoking, and eating sweetmeats, a custom indicative of friendship, he proposed that I should accompany him to the camp, where he was about to review a division of the forces. I assented. We descended together, and I found a boy with a barb magnificently caparisoned, waiting at the portal: of both of these Amin begged my acceptance. Mounting, we proceeded to the camp, nor do I think that the cortege of the young pasha consisted of less than a hundred persons, who were all officers of his household, or of the cavalry regiment which he commanded.

XIV.

I GLADLY believe that the increased efficiency of the Turkish troops compensates for their shorn splendour and sorry appearance. A shaven head, covered with a tight red cloth cap, a small blue jacket of coarse cloth, huge trousers of the same material, puckered out to the very stretch of art, yet sitting tight to the knee and calf, mean accoutrements, and a pair of dingy slippers—behold the successor of the superb janissary! Yet they perform their manœuvres with precision, and have struggled even with the Russian infantry with success. The officer makes a better appearance. His dress, although of the same fashion, is of scarlet, and of the finest cloth. It is richly embroidered, and the colonel wears upon his breast a star and crescent of diamonds. At the camp of Yanina, however, I witnessed a charge of delhis with their cimets, and a more effective cavalry I never wish to lead.

We returned to the city, and I found that apartments were allotted to me in the palace, whither Lausanne and the rest had already repaired. In the evening the vizier sent to me the first singer in Turkey, with several musicians. The singer chanted for an hour in a wild, piercing voice, devoid both of harmony and melody, a triumphant ballad on the recent massacre of Veli Bey and his rebel coadjutors. Nothing appears to me more frightful than Turkish music, yet it produces on those who are accustomed to it a very great effect, and my room was filled with strangers who hastened to listen to the enchanting and exciting strain. The Turkish music is peculiar and different from that of other Eastern nations. I have seldom listened to more simple and affecting melodies than those with which the boatmen are wont to soothe their labours.

The dancing girls followed, and were more amusing, but I had not then witnessed the Alwyn of Egypt.

A week flew away at Yanina in receiving and returning visits from pashas, agas, and selictars, in smoking pipes, sipping coffee, and tasting sweetmeats. Each day the vizier, or his son, sent me provisions ready prepared from their table, and indicated by some attention their considerate kindness. There is no character in the world higher bred than a Turk of rank. Some of these men, too, I found extremely intelligent, deeply interested in the political amelioration of their country, and warm admirers of Peter the Great. I remember with pleasure the agreeable hours I have spent in the society of Mehemet Aga, Selictar of the Pasha of Lepanto, a warrior to whom the obstinate resistance of Varna is mainly to be attributed, and a remarkably enlightened man. Yet even he could not emancipate himself from their fatalism. For I remember when once conversing with him on the equipments of the cavalry, a subject in which he was very much interested, I suggested to him the propriety of a corps of cuirassiers. "A cuirass cannot stop the ball that bears your fate," he replied, shrugging up his shoulder, and exclaiming Mashallah!

While I was leading this novel and agreeable life, news arrived that the Pasha of Scutari, who had placed himself at the head of the insurgent janissaries, and was the champion of the old party, had entered Albania at the head of sixty thousand men, to avenge the massacre of the boys.

XV.

THE grand vizier set off the same night with ten thousand men, reached Okhrida by forced marches, attacked and routed a division of the rebel troops before they supposed him to be apprized of their movements, and again encamped at Monastir, sending urgent commands to Yanina for his son to advance with the rest of the army. We met his Tartar on our march, and the divisions soon joined. After a day's rest, we advanced, and entered the pashalic of Scutari.

The enemy, to our surprise, avoided an engagement. The fierce, undisciplined warriors were frightened at our bayonets. They destroyed all before us, and hung with their vigilant cavalry on our exhausted rear. We had advanced on one side of Scutari; on the other we had penetrated into Romelia. We carried every thing before us, but we were in want of supplies, our soldiers were without food, and a skilful general and disciplined troops might have cut off all our communications.

Suddenly the order was given to retreat. We retreated slowly, and in excellent order. Two regiments of the newly-organized cavalry, with whom I had the honour to act, covered the rear, and were engaged in almost constant skirmishing with the enemy. This skirmishing is very exciting. We concentrated, and again encamped at Okhridi.

We were in hopes of now drawing the enemy into an engagement, but he was wary. In this situation the vizier directed that in the night a powerful division under the command of Mehemet, Pasha of Lepanto, he who stabbed Ali Pasha, should fall back to Monastir with the artillery, and take up a position in the mountains. The ensuing night his highness, after having previously spiked some useless guns, scattered about some tents and baggage-wagons, and given a general appearance of a hurried and disorderly retreat, withdrew in the same direction. The enemy instantly pursued, rushed on, and attacked us full of confidence. We contented ourselves by protecting our rear, but still retreated, and appeared anxious to avoid an engagement. In the evening, having entered the mountain passes, and reached the post of the Pasha of Lepanto, we drew up in battle array.

It was a cloudy morning among the mountains, and some time before the mist drew away. The enemy appeared to be in great force, filling the gorge through which we had retreated, and encamped on all the neighbouring eminences. When they perceived us, a large body instantly charged with the famous janissary shout, the terror of which I confess. I was cold, somewhat exhausted, for I had tasted no food for two days, and for a moment my heart sunk.

They were received, to their surprise, by a well-directed discharge of artillery from our concealed batteries. They seemed checked. Our ranks opened and a body of five thousand troops instantly charged them with the bayonet. 'This advance was sublime, and so exciting that, what with the shouts and cannonading, I grew mad, and longed to rush forward. The enemy gave way. Their great force was in cavalry, which could not act among the mountains. They were evidently astonished and perplexed. In a few minutes they were routed. The vizier gave orders for a general charge and pursuit, and in a few minutes I was dashing over the hills in rapid chase of all I could catch, cutting, firing, shouting, and quite persuaded that a battle was, after all, the most delightful pastime in the world.

The masses still charging, the groups demanding quarter, the single horsemen bounding over the hills, the wild scared steeds without a rider, snorting and plunging, the dense smoke clearing away, the bright arms and figures flashing, ever and anon, in the moving obscurity, the wild shouts, the strange and horrible spectacles, the solitary shots and shrieks now heard in the decreasing uproar, and the general feeling of energy, and peril, and triumph—it was all wonderful, and was a glorious moment in existence.

The enemy was scattered like chaff. To rally them was impossible; and the chiefs, in despair, were foremost in flight. They offered no resistance, and the very men who, in the morning, would have been the first to attack a battery, sabre in hand, now yielded in numbers without a struggle to an individual. There was a great slaughter, a vast number of prisoners, and plunder without end. My tent was filled with rich arms, and shawls, and stuffs, and embroidered saddles. Lausanne and Tita were the next day both clothed in splendid Albanian dresses, and little Spiro plundered the dead as became a modern Greek.

I reached my tent, I dismounted from my horse, I leaned upon it from exhaustion. An Albanian came forward, and offered a flask of Zitza wine. I drank it at a draught, and assuredly experienced the highest sensual pleasure. I took up two Cachemere shawls, and a gun mounted in silver, and gave them to the Albanian. Lucky is he who is courteous in the hour of plunder!

The vizier I understood to be at Okhrida, and I repaired to that post over the field of battle. The moon had risen, and tinged with its white light all the prominent objects of the scene of destruction; groups of bodies, and, now and then, a pallid face, distinct and fierce; steeds, and standards, and arms, and shattered wagons. Here and there a moving light showed that the plunderer was still at his work, and, occasionally seated on the carcass of a horse, and sometimes on the corpse of a human being, were some of the fortunate survivors, smoking with admirable coolness, as if there were not on earth such a fearful mystery as death.

I found the victorious Redschid seated on a carpet in the moonlight in a cypress grove, and surrounded by attendants, to whom he was delivering instructions, and distributing rewards. He appeared as calm and grave as usual. Perceiving him thus engaged, I mingled with the crowd, and stood aside, leaning on my sword: but observing me, he beckoned me to advance, and pointing to his carpet, he gave me the pipe of honour from his own lips. As I seated myself by his side, I could not help viewing this extraordinary man with great interest and curiosity. A short time back, at this very place, he had perpetrated an act which would have rendered him infamous in a civilized land; the avengers meet him, as if by fate, on the very scene of his bloody treachery, and—he is victorious. What is life!

So much for the battle of Bitoglia or Monastir, a very pretty fray, although not as much talked of as Austerlitz or Waterloo, and which probably would have remained unknown to the great mass of European readers, had not a young Frank gentleman mingled, from a silly fancy, in its lively business.

XVI.

THE effect of the battle of Bitoglia was the complete pacification of Albania, and the temporary suppression of the conspiracies in the adjoining provinces. Had it been in the power of the Porte to have supported, at this moment, its able and faithful servant, it is probable that the authority of the sultan would have been permanently consolidated in these countries. As it is, the finest regions in Europe are still the prey of civil war, in too many instances excited by foreign powers, for their miserable purposes, against a prince, who is only inferior to Peter the Great, because he has profited by his example.

For myself, perceiving that there was no immediate prospect of active service, I determined to visit Greece, and I parted from his highness with the hope that I might congratulate him at Stamboul.

XVII.

A COUNTRY of promontories, and gulfs, and islands clustering in an azure sea, a country of wooded vales and purple mountains, wherein the cities are built on plains, covered with olive woods, and at the base of an Acropolis, crowned with a temple or a tower. And there are quarries of white marble, and vines, and much wild honey. And wherever you move is some fair and elegant memorial of the poetic past, a lone pillar on the green and silent plain once echoing with the triumphal shouts of sacred games, the tomb of a hero, or the fane of a god. Clear is the sky, and fragrant is the air, and, at all seasons, the magical scenery of this land is coloured with that mellow tint, and invested with that pensive character, which, in other countries, we conceive to be peculiar to autumn, and which beautifully associate with the recollections of the past. Enchanting Greece!

XVIII.

IN the Argolic Gulf I found myself in the very heart of the Greek tragedy; Nauplia and Sparta, the pleasant Argos, and the rich Mycene, the tomb of Agamemnon, and the palace of Clytemnestra. The fortunes of the house of Atreus form the noblest of all legends. I believe in that destiny before which the ancients bowed. Modern philosophy, with its superficial discoveries, has infused into the breast of man a spirit of skepticism, but I think that, ere long, science will again become imaginative, and that, as we become more profound, we may become also more credulous. Destiny is our will, and our will is our nature. The son who inherits the organization with the father, will be doomed to the same fortunes as his sire, and again the mysterious matter in which his ancestors were moulded may, in other forms, by a necessary attraction, act upon his fate. All is mystery, but he is a slave who will not struggle to penetrate the dark veil.

I quitted the Morea without regret. It is covered with Venetian memorials, no more to me a source of joy, and bringing back to my memory a country on which I no longer loved to dwell. I cast anchor in a small but secure harbour. I landed. I climbed a hill. From it I looked over a vast plain, covered with olive woods, and skirted by mountains. Some isolated hills, of every picturesque form, rose in the plain at a distance from the terminating range. On one of these I beheld a magnificent temple bathed in the sunset. At the foot of the craggy steep on which it rested was a walled city of considerable dimensions, in front of which rose a Doric temple of exquisite proportion, and apparently uninjured. The violet sunset threw over this scene a colouring becoming its loveliness, and, if possible, increasing its refined character. Independent of all associations, it was the most beautiful spectacle that had ever passed before a vision always musing on sweet sights, yet I could not forget that it was the bright capital of my youthful dreams, the fragrant city of the violet crown, the fair, the sparkling, the delicate ATHENS!

XIX.

THE illusion vanished when I entered Athens. I found it in scarcely a less shattered condition than the towns of Albania. Ruined streets, and roofless houses, and a scanty population. The women were at Egina in security; a few males remained behind to watch the fortune of war. The Acropolis had not been visited by travellers for nine years, and was open to inspection for the first time the very day I entered. It was still in possession of the Turks, but the Greek Commission had arrived to receive the keys of the fortress. The ancient remains have escaped better than we could hope. The Parthenon and the other temples on the Acropolis have necessarily suffered in the sieges, but the injury is only in detail; the general effect is not marred, although I observed many hundred shells and cannon-balls lying about.

The Theseum has not been touched, and looks, at a short distance, as if it were just finished by Cimon. The sumptuous columns of the Olympium still rise from their stately platform, but the Choric monument is sadly maimed, although, as I was assured, by English sailors, and not Eastern barbarians. Probably the same marine monsters, who have commemorated their fatal visit to Egypt, and the name of the fell craft that waited them there, by covering the granite pillar of Pompey with gigantic characters in black paint.

The durability of the Parthenon is wonderful. As far as I could observe, had it not been for the repeated ravages of man, it might at this day have been in as perfect condition as in the age of Pericles. Abstract time it has defied. Gilt and painted, with its pictures and votive statues, it must have been one of the most brilliant creations of human genius. Yet we err if we consider this famous building as an unparalleled effort of Grecian architecture. Compared with the temples of Ionia and the Sicilian fanes, compared even with the Olympium at its feet, the Parthenon could only rank as a church with a cathedral.

In art, the Greeks were the children of the Egyptians. The day may yet come when we shall do justice to the high powers of that mysterious and imaginative people. The origin of Doric and Ionic invention must be traced amid the palaces of Carnac and the temples of Luxoor. For myself I confess I ever gaze upon the marvels of art with a feeling of despair. With horror I remember that, through some mysterious necessity, civilization seems to have deserted the most favoured regions and the choicest intellects. The Persian, whose very being is poetry, the Arab, whose subtle mind could penetrate into the very secret shrine of nature, the Greek, whose acute perceptions seemed granted only for the creation of the beautiful—these are now unlettered slaves in barbarous lands. The arts are yielded to the flat-nosed Franks. And they toil, and study, and invent theories to account for their own incompetence. Now it is the climate, now the religion, now the government, every thing but the truth, every thing but the mortifying suspicion that their organization may be different, and that they may be as distinct a race from their models, as they undoubtedly are from the Kalnuck and the Negro.

XX.

WHATEVER may have been the faults of the ancient governments, they were in closer relation to the times, to the countries, and to the governed, than ours. The ancients invented their governments according to their wants; the moderns have adopted foreign policies, and then modelled their conduct upon this borrowed regulation. This circumstance has occasioned our manners and our customs to be so confused, and absurd, and unphilosophical. What business had we, for instance, to adopt the Roman law?—a law foreign to our manners, and consequently disadvantageous. He, who profoundly meditates upon the situation of modern Europe, will also discover how productive of misery has been the senseless adoption of oriental customs by northern people. Whence came that divine right of kings, which has deluged so many countries with blood?—that pastoral and Syrian law of tithes, which may yet shake the foundation of so many ancient institutions?

XXI.

EVEN as a child, I was struck by the absurdity of modern education. The duty of education is to give ideas. When our limited intelligence was confined to the literature of two dead languages, it was necessary to acquire those languages in order to obtain the knowledge which they embalmed. But now each nation has its literature, each nation possesses, written in its own tongue, a record of all knowledge, and specimens of every modification of invention. Let education, then, be confined to that national literature, and we should soon perceive the beneficial effects of this revolution upon the mind of the student. Study would then be a profitable delight. I pity the poor Gothic victim of the grammar and the lexicon. The Greeks, who were masters of composition, were ignorant of all languages but their own. They concentrated their study of the genius of expression upon one tongue. To this they owe that blended simplicity and strength of style, which the imitative Romans, with all their splendour, never attained

To the few, however, who have leisure or inclination to study foreign literatures, I will not recommend them the English, the Italian, the German, since they may rightly answer, that all these have been in great part founded upon the classic tongues, and therefore it is wise to ascend to the fountain head; but I will ask them for what reason they would limit their experience to the immortal languages of Greece and Rome? Why not study the Oriental? Surely, in the pages of the Persians and the Arabs, we might discover new sources of emotion, new modes of expression, new trains of ideas, new principles of invention, and new bursts of fancy.

These are a few of my meditations amid the ruins of Athens. They will disappoint those who might justly expect an ebullition of classic rapture from one who has gazed upon Marathon by moonlight, and sailed upon the free waters of Salamis. I regret their disappointment, but I have arrived at an age when I can think only of the future. A mighty era is at hand, prepared by the blunders of long centuries. Ardently I hope that the necessary change in human existence may be effected by the voice of philosophy alone: but I tremble and I am silent. There is no bigotry so terrible as the bigotry of a country that flatters itself that it is philosophical.

XXII.

UNDERSTANDING that the Turkish squadron I left at Prevesa had arrived in the Negropont, I passed over, and paid a visit to its commander, with whom I was acquainted, Halil Pasha. Halil informed me that all remained quiet in Albania, but that Redschid did not venture to return. He added that he himself was about to sail from Stamboul immediately, and proposed that I should accompany him. His offer suited me, and as the wind was fair, in a few hours we were all on board.

I had a most splendid view of Sunium, its columns against a dark cloud looked like undriven snow, and we were soon among the Cyclades. Sixteen islands were in sight, and we were now making our course in the heart of them. An archipelago by sunset is lovely—small isles of purple and gold studding the glowing waters. The wind served well through the night, but we were becalmed the next day off Mitylene. In the afternoon, a fresh breeze sprung up and carried us to the Dardanelles.

We were yet, I believe, upwards of a hundred miles from Constantinople. What a road to a great city! narrower and much longer than the Straits of Gibraltar, but not with such sublime shores. Asia and Europe look more kindly on each other than Europe and her more sultry sister. I found myself, the next morning, becalmed off Troy: a vast hilly, uncultivated plain, a scanty rill, a huge tumulus, some shepherds and their flocks—behold the kingdom of Priam, and the successors of Paris!

A signal summoned us on board, the wind was fair and fresh. We scudded along with great swiftness, passing many towns and fortresses. Each dome, each minaret, I thought was Constantinople. At last it came; we were in full sight. Masses of habitations, grouped on gentle acclivities, rose on all sides out of the water, part in Asia, part in Europe; a gay and confused vision of red buildings, and dark-green cypress groves, hooded domes, and millions of minarets. As we approached, the design became more obvious. The groups formed themselves into three considerable cities, intersected by arms of the sea. Down one of these, rounding the seraglio point, our vessel held her course. We seemed to glide into the heart of the capital. The water was covered with innumerable boats as swift as gondolas, and far more gay, curiously carved, and richly gilt. In all parts swarmed a showy population. The characteristic of the whole scene was brilliancy. The houses glittered, the waters sparkled, and flocks of white and sacred birds glanced in the golden air, and skimmed over the blue wave. On one side of the harbour was moored the Turkish fleet, dressed out in all their colours. Our course was ended, and we cast our anchor in the famous Golden Horn.

XXIII.

No picture can ever convey a just idea of Constantinople. I have seen several that are faithful, as far as they extend, but the most comprehensive can only exhibit a small portion of this extraordinary city. By land or by water, in every direction, passing up the Golden Horn to the valley of Sweet Waters, or proceeding on the other hand down the famous Bosphorus to Buyukkere, and Terapia, to the Euxine, what infinite novelty! New kiosks, new hills, new windings, new groves of cypress, and new forests of chestnut, open on all sides.

The two most wonderful things at Constantinople are the Bosphorus and the bazaar. Conceive the ocean a stream not broader than the Rhine, with shores with all the beauty and variety of that river, running between gentle slopes covered with rich woods, gardens, and summer palaces, cemeteries, and mosques, and villages, and bounded by sublime mountains. The view of the Euxine from the heights of Terapia, just seen through the end of the straits, is like gazing upon eternity.

The bazaar is of a very different order, but not less remarkable. I never could obtain from a Turk any estimate of the ground it covered. Several in the habit of daily attendance have mentioned to me that they often find themselves in divisions they have not before visited. Fancy a Parisian panorama passage, fancy perhaps a square mile covered with these arcades, intersecting each other in all directions, and full of every product of the empire, from diamonds to dates. This will give you some idea of the great bazaar at Constantinople. The dealers, in every possible costume, sit cross-legged on their stalls, and dealers in the same article usually congregate together. The armourers, the grocers, the pipemakers, the jewellers, the shawl-sellers, the librarians, all have their distinct quarter. Now you walk along a range of stalls, filled with the most fanciful slippers, cloth and leather of all colours embroidered with gold, or powdered with pearls: now you are in the street of confectionary, and now you are cheapening a Damascus sabre in the bazaar of arms, or turning over a vividly illuminated copy of Hafiz in that last stronghold of Turkish bigotry, the quarter of the venders of the Koran. The magnificence, novelty, and variety of goods on sale, the whole nation of shopkeepers all in different dress, the crowds of buyers from all parts of the world—I only hint at these traits. Here every people has a characteristic costume; Turks, Greeks, Jews, and Armenians are the staple population, the latter are numerous. The Armenians wear round, and very unbecoming black caps, and flowing robes; the Jews a black hat wreathed with a white handkerchief; the Greeks black turbans. The Turks are fond of dress, and indulge in all combinations of costume. Of late, among the young men in the capital, it has been the fashion to discard the huge turban, and the ample robes, and they have formed an exceedingly ungraceful dress upon the Frank. But vast numbers cling to the national costume, especially the Asiatics, renowned for the prodigious height and multifarious folds of their head-gear.

XXIV.

HALIL PASHA paid me a visit one day at my residence on the Bosphorus, and told me that he had mentioned my name to the sultan, who had expressed a desire to see me. As it is not etiquette for the padishah to receive Franks, I was of course as sensible of the high honour as I was anxious to become acquainted with the extraordinary man who was about to confer it.

The sultan was at this moment at a palace on the Bosphorus, not far from Tophana. Hither on the appointed day I repaired with Halil, and the drogouman of the Porte. We were ushered into a chamber, where a principal officer of the household received us, and where I smoked out of a pipe tipped with diamonds, and sipped coffee perfumed with roses in cups studded with precious stones.

When we had remained here for about half an hour, Mustapha, the private secretary and favourite of the sultan, entered, and after saluting us, desired us to follow him. We proceeded along a corridor, at the end of which stood two or three eunuchs, richly dressed, and then the door opened, and I found myself in an apartment of moderate size, painted with indifferent arabesques in fresco, and surrounded with a divan of crimson velvet and gold. Seated upon this, with his feet on the ground, his arms folded, and in a hussar dress, was the grand signor.

As we entered, he slightly touched his heart, according to the fashion of the Orientals, and Mustapha, setting us an example, desired us to seat ourselves. I fancied, and I was afterward assured of the correctness of my observation, that the sultan was very much constrained, and very little at his ease. The truth is, he is totally unused to interviews with strangers, and this was for him a more novel situation than for me. His constraint wore off as conversation proceeded. He asked a great many questions, and often laughed, turning round to Mustapha with a familiar nod when my replies pleased him. He inquired much about the Albanian war. Without flattering my late commander, it was in my power to do him service. He asked me what service I had before seen, and was evidently surprised when I informed him I was only an amateur. He then made many inquiries as to the European forces, and, as I answered them, I introduced some opinions on politics which interested him. He asked me who I was. I told him I was the son of the prime minister of —, a power always friendly to the Ottoman. His eyes sparkled, and he repeated several times, "It is well, it is well;" meaning, I suppose, that he did not repent of the interview. He told me that in two years' time he should have two hundred thousand regular infantry. That if the Russian war could have been postponed another year, he should have beat the Muscovites; that the object of the war was to crush his schemes of regeneration; that he was betrayed at Adrianople as well as at Varna. He added that he had only done what Peter the Great had done before him, and that Peter was thwarted by unsuccessful wars, yet at last succeeded.

I, of course, expressed my conviction that his highness would be as fortunate.

The padishah then abruptly said that all his subjects should have equal rights, that there should be no difference between Moslemin and infidel, that all who contributed to the government had a right to the same protection,

Here Mustapha nodded to Halil, and we rose, and bowing, quitted the presence of a really great man.

I found, at the portal, a fine Arabian, two Cachemere shawls, a scarlet cloak of honour, with the collar embroidered with gold, and fastened with diamond clasps, a sabre, and two superb pipes. This was my reward for charging with the Turkish cavalry at Bitoglia.

XXV.

ONE of the most curious things at Constantinople is the power you have in the capital of the East of placing yourselves in ten minutes in a lively Frank town. Such is Pera. I passed there the winter months of December and January in very agreeable and intelligent society. My health improved, but my desire of wandering increased. I began to think that I should now never be able to settle in life. The desire of fame did not revive. I felt no intellectual energy, I required nothing more than to be amused. And having now passed four or five months at Stamboul, and seen all its wonders, from the interior of its mosques to the dancing dervishes, I resolved to proceed. So, one cold morning of February, I crossed over to Scutari, and pressed my wandering foot upon Asia.

PART THE SIXTH.

I.

I WAS now in the great peninsula of Asia Minor, a country admirably fortified by nature, abounding in vast, luxuriant, and enchanting plains, from which a scanty population derive a difficult subsistence, and watered by broad rivers rolling through solitude.

As I journeyed along I could not refrain from contrasting the desolation of the present with the refinement of the past, and calling up a vision of the ancient splendour of this famous country. I beheld those glorious Greek federations that covered the provinces of the coast with their rich cultivation and brilliant cities. Who has not heard of the green and bland Ionia, and its still more fruitful, although less picturesque sister, the rich Æolia? Who has not heard of the fame of Ephesus, and the Anacreontic Teios; Chios, with its rosy wine, and Cnidos, with its rosy goddess? Colophon, Priene, Phocæa, Samos, Miletos, the splendid Halicarnassus, and the sumptuous Cos—magnificent cities abounding in genius and luxury, and all that polished refinement that ennobles life! Everywhere around these free and famous citizens disseminated their liberty and their genius, in the savage Tauris, and on the wild shores of Pontus; on the banks of the Borysthènes, and by the waters of the rapid Tyras. The islands in their vicinity shared their splendour and their felicity; the lyric Lesbos, and Tenedos with its woods and vines, and those glorious gardens, the fortunate Cyprus and the prolific Rhodes.

Under the empire of Rome, the peninsula of Asia did not enjoy a less eminent prosperity. The interior provinces vied in wealth and civilization with the ancient colonies of the coast. Then the cavalry of Cappadocia and Paphlagonia were famous as the Lycian mariners, the soldiers of Pontus, and the bowmen of Armenia; then Galatia sent forth her willing and welcome tribute of corn, and the fruitful Bithynia rivalled the Pamphylian pastures, the vines of Phrygia, and the Pisidian olives. Tarsus, Ancyra, Sardos, Cæsarea, Sinope, Anisus, were the great and opulent capitals of these flourishing provinces. Alexandria rose upon the ruins of Tyre, and Nicæa and Nicomedia ranked with the most celebrated cities.

And now the tinkling bell of the armed and wandering caravan was the only indication of human existence!

It is in such scenes as these, amid the ruins of ancient splendour, and the recollection of vanished empire, that philosophers have pondered on the nature of government, and have discovered, as they fancied, in the consequences of its various forms, the causes of duration or of decay, of glory or of humiliation. Freedom, says the sage, will lead to prosperity, and despotism to destruction.

Yet has this land been regulated by every form of government that the ingenuity of man has devised. The federal republic, the military empire, the oriental despotism, have in turn controlled its fortunes. The deputies of free states have here assembled in some universal temple which was the bond of union between their cities; here has the proconsul presided at his high tribunal; and here the pasha reposes in his divan. The Pagan fane, and the Christian church, and the Turkish mosque, have here alike been erected to form the opinions of the people. The legends of Chaos and Olympus are forgotten, the sites of the Seven Churches cannot even be traced, and all that is left are the revelations of the son of Kahrîda, a volume, the whole object of which is to convert man into a fanatic slave.

Is there then no hope? Is it an irrevocable doom, that society shall be created only to be destroyed? When I can accept such a dogma, let me also believe that the beneficent Creator is a malignant demon. Let us meditate more deeply, let us at length discover that no society can long subsist that is based upon metaphysical absurdities.

The law that regulates man must be founded on a knowledge of his nature, or that law leads him to ruin. What is the nature of man? In every clime and in every creed we shall find a new definition.

Before me is a famous treatise on Human Nature, by a professor of Königsberg. No one has more profoundly meditated on the attributes of his subject. It is evident that in the deep study of his own intelligence, he has discovered a noble method of expounding that of others. Yet when I close his volumes can I conceal from myself that all this time I have been studying a treatise upon the nature—not of man, but—of a German?

What then! Is the German a different animal from the Italian! Let me inquire in turn whether you conceive the negro of the Gold Coast to be the same being as the Esquimaux, who tracks his way over the polar snows?

The most successful legislators are those who have consulted the genius of the people. But is it possible to render that which is the occasional consequence of fine observation, the certain result of scientific study?

One thing is quite certain, that the system we have hitherto pursued to attain a knowledge of man has entirely failed. Let us disembarass ourselves of that "moral philosophy," which has filled so many volumes with words. History will always remain a pleasant pastime; it never could have been a profitable study. To study man from the past is to suppose, that man is ever the same animal, which I do not. Those who speculated on the career of Napoleon had ever a dog's-careed annalist to refer to. The past equally proved that he was both a Cromwell and a Washington. Prophetic past! He turned out to be the first. But suppose he had been neither; suppose he had proved a Sylla?

Man is an animal, and his nature must be studied as that of all other animals. The Almighty Creator has breathed his spirit into us, and we testify our gratitude for this choice boon by never deigning to consider what may be the nature of our intelligence. The philosopher, however, amid this darkness, will not despair. He will look forward to an age of rational laws and beneficent education. He will remember that all the truth he has attained has been by one process. He will also endeavour to become acquainted with himself by demonstration, and not by dogma.

II.

ONE fair spring morning, with a clear blue sky and an ardent but not intense sun, I came in sight of the whole coast of Syria; very high and mountainous, and the loftiest ranges covered with snow.

I had sailed from Smyrna through its lovely gulf, vaster and more beautiful than the Ambracian, found myself in a new archipelago, the Sporades, and having visited Rhodes and Cyprus, engaged, at the last island, a pilot, to take us to the most convenient Syrian port.

Syria is, in fact, an immense chain of mountains, extending from Asia Minor to Arabia. In the course of this great chain, an infinity of branches constantly detach themselves from the parent trunk, forming on each side, either towards the desert or the sea, beautiful and fertile plains. Washed by the Levantine wave, on one side we behold the once luxurious Antioch, now a small and dingy Turkish town. The traveller can no longer wander in the voluptuous woods of Daphne. The palace and the garden pass away with the refined genius and the delicate taste that create them, but nature is eternal, and even yet the valley of the Orontes offers, under the glowing light of an eastern day, scenes of picturesque beauty that Switzerland cannot surpass. The hills of Laodicea, once famous for their wine, are now celebrated for producing the choicest tobacco of the East. Tripoli is a flourishing town, embosomed in wild groves of Indian figs, and famous for its fruits and silks. Advancing along the coast we reach the ancient Berytus, whose tobacco vies with Laodicea, and whose silk surpasses that of Tripoli. We arrive at all that remains of the superb Tyre; a small peninsula and a mud village. The famous Acre is still the most important place upon the coast, and Jaffa, in spite of so many wars, is yet fragrant amid its gardens and groves of lemon trees.

The towns on the coast have principally been built on the sites and ruins of the ancient cities whose names they bear. None of them have sufficient claims to the character of a capital; but on the other side of the mountains we find two of the most important of oriental cities—the populous Aleppo and the delicious Damascus; nor must we forget Jerusalem, that city sacred in so many creeds!

In ancient remains, Syria is only inferior to Egypt. All have heard of the courts of Baalbec, and the columns of Palmyra. Less known, because only recently visited, and visited with extreme danger, are the vast ruins of magnificent cities in the Arabian vicinity of the Lake Asphalines.

The climate of this country is as various as its formation. In the plains is often experienced that intense heat so fatal to the European invader; yet the snow that seldom falls upon the level ground, or falls only to vanish, rests upon the heights of Lebanon, and, in the higher lands, it is not difficult at all times to discover exactly the temperature you desire. I travelled in Syria at the commencement of the year, when the short, but violent rainy season had just ceased. It is not easy to conceive a more beautiful and fruitful land. The plains were covered with that fresh green tint so rare under an Eastern sky, the orange and lemon trees were clothed both with fruit and blossom, and then too I first beheld the huge leaf of the banana, and tasted, for the first time, the delicate flavour of its unrivalled fruit. From the great extent of the country, and the consequent variation of climate, the Syrian can always command a succession, as well as a variety of luxuries. The season of the pomegranate will commence in Antioch when it ends in Jaffa, and when you have exhausted the figs of Beiroot, you can fly to the gardens of Damascus. Under the worst government that perhaps ever oppressed its subjects, Syria still brings forth the choice productions of almost every climate; corn and cotton, maize and rice, the sugar-cane of the Antilles, and the indigo and cochineal of Mexico. The plains of Antioch and of Palestine are covered with woods of the finest olives, the tobaccos of the coast are unrivalled in any country, and the mountains of Lebanon are clothed with white mulberry trees, that afford the richest silks, or with vineyards that yield a wine that justly bears the name of Golden.

The inhabitants of this country are various as its productions, and its mutable fortunes. The Ottoman conqueror is now the lord, and rules the posterity of the old Syrian Greeks and of the Arabs, who were themselves once predominant. In the mountains, the independent and mysterious Druses live in freedom under their own emir, and, in the ranges near Antioch, we find the Ansarce tribes, who, it is whispered, yet celebrate the most singular rites of paganism. In the deserts around Aleppo wander the pastoral Kourds and the warlike Turkman, and from Tadmor to Gaza, the whole Syrian desert is traversed by the famous Bedouin.

There is a charm in oriental life, and it is—repose. Upon me, who had been bred in the artificial circles of corrupt civilization, and who had so freely indulged the course of my impetuous passions, this character made a very forcible impression. Wandering over those plains and deserts, and sojourning in those silent and beautiful cities, I experienced all that serenity of mind which I can conceive to be the enviable portion of the old age of a virtuous life. The memory of the wearing cares, and corroding anxieties, and vaunted excitement of European life, filled me with pain. Keenly I felt the vanity and littleness of all human plans and aspirations. Truly may I say, that on the plains of Syria, I parted forever with my ambition. The calm enjoyment of existence appeared to me, as it now does, the highest attainable felicity; nor can I conceive that any thing could tempt me from my solitude, and induce me once more to mingle with mankind, with whom, I fear, I have too little in common, but the strong conviction that the fortunes of my race depended on my effort, or that I could materially advance the great amelioration of their condition, in the practicability of which I devoutly believe.

III.

I GALLOPED over an illimitable plain, covered with a vivid, though scanty pasture, and fragrant with aromatic herbs. A soft, fresh breeze danced on my cheek, and brought vigour to my frame. Day after day I journeyed, and met no sign of human existence, no village, no culture, no resting-place, not even a tree. Day after day I journeyed, and the land indicated no termination. At an immense distance, the sky and the earth mingled in a uniform horizon. Sometimes, indeed, a rocky vein shot out of the soil; sometimes, indeed, the land would swell into long undulations; sometimes, indeed, from a dingle of wild bushes, a gazelle would rush forward, stare, and bound away.

Such was my first wandering in the Syrian desert! But remember it was the burst of spring, I could conceive nothing more delightful, nothing more unlike what I had anticipated. The heat was never intense, the breeze was ever fresh and sweet, the nocturnal heavens luminous and clear to a degree which it is impossible to describe. Instead of that uniform appearance, and monotonous splendour I had hitherto so often gazed on, the stars were of different tints and forms. Some were green, some white, some red; and, instead of appearing as if they only studded a vast and azure vault, I clearly distinguished them, at different distances, floating in ether.

I no longer wondered at the love of the Bedouins for their free and unsophisticated earth. It appeared to me, that I could have lived in the desert forever. At night we rested. Our camels bore us water in goat-skins, cakes of fuel, which they themselves produced, and scanty, although sufficient, provisions. We lit our fire, pounded our coffee, and smoked our pipes, while others prepared our simple meal, bread made at the instant, and on the cinders, a slice of dried meat, and a few dates.

I have described the least sterile of the deserts, and I have described it at the most favourable period. In general, the soil of the Syrian wilderness is not absolutely barren. The rains cover it with verdure, but these occur only for a very few weeks, when the rigour of a winter day arrests the clouds, and they dissolve into showers. At all other seasons they glide over the scorched and heated plain, which has neither hills nor trees to attract them. It is then the want of water which is the occasion of this sterility. In the desert there is not even a brook, springs are rare, and generally brackish, and it is on the artificial wells, stored by the rains, that the wanderer chiefly depends.

From the banks of the Euphrates to the shores of the Red Sea; from the banks of the Nile to the Persian Gulf, over a spread of country three times the extent of Germany, nature, without an interval, ceases to produce. Beneficent nature! Let us not wrong her; for even in a land apparently so unfavoured, exists a numerous and happy race. As you wander along, the appearance of the desert changes. The wilderness, which is comparatively fertile in Syria, becomes rocky when you enter Arabia, and sandy as you proceed. Here, in some degree, we meet with the terrible idea of the desert prevalent in Europe; but it is in Africa, in the vast and unexplored regions of Lybia and Zahara, that we must seek for that illimitable and stormy ocean of overwhelming sand, which we associate with the popular idea of the desert.

The sun was nearly setting when an Arab horseman, armed with his long lance, was suddenly observed on an eminence in the distance. He galloped towards us, wheeled round and round, scudded away, again approached, and our guide, shouting, rode forward to meet him. They entered into earnest conversation, and then joined us. Abdallah, the guide, informed me that this was an Arab of the tribe I intended to visit, and that we were very near their encampment.

The desert was here broken into bushy knolls, which limited the view. Advancing and mounting the low ridge on which we had at first observed the Bedouin, Abdallah pointed out to me, at no great distance, a large circle of low black tents, which otherwise I might not have observed, or have mistaken them in the deceptive twilight for some natural formation. On the left of the encampment was a small grove of palm trees, and when he had nearly gained the settlement, a procession of women in long blue robes, covering with one hand their faces with their veils, and with the other supporting on their heads a tall and classically formed vase, advanced with a beautiful melody, to the fountain, which was screened by the palm trees.

The dogs barked, some dark faces and long matchlocks suddenly popped up behind the tents. The Bedouin, with a shout, galloped into the encampment, and soon reappeared with several of his tribe. We dismounted. I entered into the interior court of the camp, which was filled with camels and goats. There were few persons visible, although as I was conducted along to the tent of the chief, I detected many faces staring at me from behind the curtains of their tents. The pavilion of the sheikh was of considerable size. He himself was a man advanced in years, but hale and lively; his long white beard curiously contrasting with his dark visage. He received me sitting on a mat, his son standing on his right hand, without his slippers, and a young grandchild squatting by his side.

He welcomed me with the usual oriental salutation, touching his forehead, his mouth, and his heart, while he exclaimed, "Salam;" thus indicating that all his faculties and feelings were devoted to me. He motioned that we should seat ourselves on the unoccupied mats, and taking from his mouth a small pipe of date wood, gave it to his son to bear to me. A servant instantly began pounding coffee. I then informed him, through Abdallah, that having heard of his hospitality and happy life, I had journeyed even from Damascus to visit him; that I greatly admired the Bedouin character, and I eulogized their valour, their independence, their justice, and their simplicity.

He answered that he liked to be visited by Franks, because they were wise men, and requested that I would feel his pulse.

I performed this ceremony with becoming gravity, and inquired whether he were indisposed. He said that he was well, but that he might be better. I told him that his pulse was healthy and strong for one of his age, and I begged to examine his tongue, which greatly pleased him, and he observed that he was eighty years of age, and could ride as well, and as long as his son.

Coffee was now brought. I ventured to praise it. He said it was well for those who had not wine. I observed that wine was not suited to these climes, and that although a Frank, I had myself renounced it. He answered that the Franks were fond of wine, but that for his part he had never tasted it, although he should like once.

I regretted that I could not avail myself of this delicate hint, but Lausanne produced a bottle of eau de Cologne, and I offered him a glass. He drank it with great gravity, and asked for some for his son, observing it was good raki, but not wine. I suspected from this that he was not totally unacquainted with the flavour of the forbidden liquor, and I dared to remark with a smile that raki had one advantage over wine, that it was not forbidden by the prophet. Unlike the Turks, who never understand a jest, he smiled, and then said that the book (meaning the Koran) was good for men who lived in cities, but that God was everywhere.

Several men now entered the tent, leaving their slippers on the outside, and some saluting the sheikh as they passed, seated themselves.

I now inquired after horses, and asked him whether he could assist me in purchasing some of the true breed. The old sheikh's eyes sparkled as he informed me that he possessed four mares of pure blood, and that he would not part with one, not even for fifty thousand piastres. After this hint I was inclined to drop the subject, but the sheikh seemed interested by it, and inquired if the Franks had any horses?

I answered that some Frank nations were famous for their horses, and mentioned the English, who had bred a superb race from the Arabs. He said he had heard of the English, and asked me which was the greatest nation of the Franks? I told him there were several equally powerful, but perhaps that the English nation might be fairly described as the most important. He answered, "Ay! on the sea, but not on the land."

I was surprised by the general knowledge indicated by this remark, and more so when he further observed that there was another nation stronger by land. I mentioned the Russians. He had not heard of them, notwithstanding the recent war with the Porte. The French? I inquired. He knew the French, and then told me he had been at the siege of Acre, which explained all this intelligence. He then inquired if I were an Englishman? I told him my country, but was not astonished that he had never heard of it. I observed that when the old man spoke, he was watched by his followers with the greatest attention, and they grinned with pride and exultation at his knowledge of the Franks, showing their white teeth, elevating their eyes, and exchanging looks of wonder.

Two women now entered the tent, at which I was surprised. They had returned from the fountain, and wore small black masks, which covered the upper part of their face. They knelt down at the fire, and made a cake of bread, which one of them handed to me. I now offered to the sheikh my own pipe, which Lausanne had prepared. Coffee was again handed, and a preparation of sour milk and rice, not unpalatable.

I offered the sheikh renewed compliments on his mode of life, in order to maintain conversation; for the chief, although like the Arabs in general, of a very lively temperament, had little of the curiosity of what are considered the more civilized orientals, and asked very few questions.

"We are content," said the sheikh.

"Then, believe me, you are in the condition of no other people," I replied.

"My children," said the sheikh, "hear the words of the wise man! If we lived with the Turks," continued the chieftain, "we should have more gold and silver, and more clothes, and carpets, and baths; but we should not have justice and liberty. Our luxuries are few, but our wants are less."

"Yet you have neither priests nor lawyers?"

"When men are pure, laws are useless: when men are corrupt, laws are broken."

"And for priests?"

"God is everywhere."

The women now entered with a more substantial meal, the hump of a young camel. I have seldom eaten any thing more delicate and tender. This dish was a great compliment, and could only have been offered by a wealthy sheikh. Pipes and coffee followed.

The moon was shining brightly when, making my excuses, I quitted the pavilion of the chieftain, and went forth to view the humours of the camp. The tall camels crouching on their knees in groups, with their outstretched necks, and still and melancholy visages, might have been mistaken for works of art, had it not been for the process of rumination. A crowd was assembled round a fire, before which a poet recited impassioned verses. I observed the slight forms of the men, short and meager, agile, dry, and dark, with teeth dazzling white, and quick, black glancing eyes. They were dressed in cloaks of coarse black cloth, apparently of the same stuff as their tents, and few of them, I should imagine, exceeded five feet two or three inches in height. The women mingled with the men, although a few affected to conceal their faces on my approach. They were evidently deeply interested in the poetic recital. One passage excited their loud applause. I inquired its purport of Abdallah, who thus translated it to me. A lover beholds his mistress, her face covered with a red veil. Thus he addresses her.

"O! withdraw that veil, withdraw that red veil! Let me behold the beauty that it shrouds! Yes!

let that rosy twilight fade away, and let the full moon rise to my vision!"

Beautiful! Yet more beautiful in the language of the Arabs, for in that rich tongue there are words to describe each species of twilight, and where we are obliged to have recourse to an epithet, the Arabs reject the feeble and unnecessary aid.

It was late ere I retired, and I stretched myself on my mat, musing over this singular people, who combined primitive simplicity of habits with the most refined feelings of civilization, and who in a great degree appeared to me to offer an evidence of that community of property, and that equality of condition, which have hitherto proved the despair of European sages, and fed only the visions of their fanciful Utopias.

IV.

A SYRIAN village is very beautiful in the centre of a fertile plain. The houses are isolated, and each surrounded by palm trees; the meadows divided by rich plantations of Indian fig, and bounded by groves of olive.

In the distance rose a chain of severe and savage mountains. I was soon wandering, and for hours, in the wild, stony ravines of these shaggy rocks. At length, after several paces, I gained the ascent of a high mountain. Upon an opposite height, descending as a steep ravine, and forming with the elevation on which I rested, a dark and narrow gorge, I beheld a city entirely surrounded, by what I should have considered in Europe an old feudal wall, with towers and gates. The city was built upon an ascent, and, from the height on which I stood, I could discern the terrace and the cupola of almost every house, and the wall upon the other side rising from the plain; the ravine extending only on the side to which I was opposite. The city was in a bowl of mountains. In the front was a magnificent mosque, with beautiful gardens and many light and lofty gates of triumph; a variety of domes and towers rose in all directions from the buildings of bright stone.

Nothing could be conceived more wild, and terrible, and desolate than the surrounding scenery, more dark, and stony, and severe; but the ground was thrown about in such picturesque undulations, that the mind, full of the sublime, required not the beautiful; and rich, and waving woods, and sparkling cultivation would have been misplaced. Except Athens, I had never witnessed any scene more essentially impressive. I will not place this spectacle below the city of Minerva. Athens and the holy city in their glory must have been the finest representations of the beautiful and the sublime—the holy city, for the elevation on which I stood was the Mount of Olives, and the city on which I gazed was JERUSALEM!

V.

THE dark gorge beneath me was the vale of Jehoshaphat; farther on, was the fountain of Siloah. I entered by the gate of Bethlehem, and sought hospitality at the Latin convent of Terra Santa.

Easter was approaching, and the city was crowded with pilgrims. I had met many caravans in my progress. The convents of Jerusalem are remarkable. That of the Armenian Christians, at this time, afforded accommodation for four thousand pilgrims. It is a town of itself, and possesses within its walls streets and shops. The Greek convent held perhaps half as many. And the famous Latin convent of Terra Santa, endowed by all the monarchs of Catholic Christendom, could boast only of one pilgrim—myself! The Europeans have ceased to visit the holy sepulchre.

As for the interior of Jerusalem, it is hilly and clean. The houses are of stone, and well built, but, like all Asiatic mansions, they offer nothing to the eye but blank walls and dull portals. The mosque I had admired was the famous Mosque of Omar, built upon the supposed site of the temple. It is perhaps the most beautiful of Mohammedan temples; but the Frank, even in the Eastern dress, will enter it at the risk of his life. The Turks of Syria have not been contaminated by the heresies of their enlightened sultan. In Damascus, it is impossible to appear in the Frank dress without being pelted; and although they would condescend, perhaps, at Jerusalem, to permit an infidel dog to walk about in his national dress, he would not escape many a curse, and many a scornful expression of "Giaour!" There is only one way to travel in the East with ease, and that is with an appearance of pomp. The Turks are much influenced by the exterior, and although they are not mercenary, a well-dressed and well-attended infidel will command respect.

VI.

THE church of the Holy Sepulchre is nearly in the middle of the city, and professedly built upon Mount Calvary, which it is alleged was levelled for the structure. Within its walls they have contrived to assemble the scenes of a vast number of incidents in the life of the Saviour, with a highly romantic violation of the unity of the place. Here the sacred feet were anointed, there the sacred garments parcelled, from the pillar of the scourging to the rent of the rock, all is exhibited in a succession of magical scenes. The truth is, the whole is an ingenious imposture of a comparatively recent date, and we are indebted to that favoured individual, the Empress Helen, for this exceedingly clever creation, as well as for the discovery of the true cross. The learned believe, and with reason, that Calvary is at present, as formerly, without the walls, and that we must seek for this celebrated elevation in the lofty hill now called Sion.

The church is a spacious building, surrounded by a dome. Attached to it are the particular churches of the various Christian sects, and many chapels and sanctuaries. Mass in some part or other is constantly celebrating, and companies of pilgrims may be observed in all directions visiting the holy places, and offering their devotions. Latin, and Armenian, and Greek friars are everywhere moving about. The court is crowded with the venders of relics and rosaries. The church of the Sepulchre itself is a point of common union, and in its bustle and lounging character, rather reminded me of an exchange than a temple.

One day as I was pacing up and down this celebrated building, in conversation with a very ingenious Neapolitan friar, experienced in the East, my attention was attracted by one who, from his sumptuous dress, his imposing demeanour, self-satisfied air, and the coolness with which, in a Christian temple, he waved in his hand a rosary of Mecca, I for a moment considered a Moslem. "Is it customary for the Turks to visit this place?" I inquired, drawing the attention of my companion to the stranger.

"The stranger is not a Turk," answered the friar, "though I fear I cannot call him a Christian. It is Marigny, a French traveller. Do you not know him? I will introduce you. He is a man of distinguished science, and has resided some months in this city, studying Arabic."

We approached him, and the friar made us acquainted.

"Salem Aleikoum! Count. Here at least is no Inquisition. Let us enjoy ourselves. How mortifying, my good brother Antony, that you cannot burn me!"

The friar smiled, and was evidently used to this rillery.

"I hope yet to behold the Kaaba," said Marigny, "it is at least more genuine than any thing we here see."

"Truth is not truth to the false," said Brother Antony.

"What, you reason!" exclaimed Marigny, "Stick to faith and infallibility, my good friend Antonio. I have just been viewing the rent in the rock. It is a pity, holy father, that I have discovered that it is against the grain."

"The greater the miracle," said the friar.

"Bravo! you deserve to be a bishop."

"The church has no fear of just reasoners," observed Brother Antony.

"And is confuted, I suppose, only by the unjust," rejoined Marigny.

"Man without religion is a wild beast," remarked the friar.

"Which religion?" inquired Marigny.

"There is only one true religion," said Brother Antony.

"Exactly; and in this country, Master Antony remember you are an infidel."

"And you, they say, are a Moslem."

"They say wrong. I believe in no human revelation, because it obtrudes the mind of another man into my body, and must destroy morality, which can only be discovered by my own intelligence."

"All is divine revelation," said a stranger who joined us.

"Ah! Werner," said Marigny, "you see we are at our old contests."

"All is divine revelation," repeated Werner, "for all comes from God."

"But what do you mean by God?"

"I mean the great luminous principle of existence, the first Almighty Cause from whom we are emanations, and in whose essence we shall again mingle."

"I asked for bread and you give me a stone. I asked for a fact, and you give me a word. I cannot annex an idea to what you say. Until my Creator gift me with an intelligence that can comprehend the idea of his existence, I must conclude that he does not desire that I should busy myself about it."

"That idea is implanted in our breasts," said Werner.

"Innate!" exclaimed Marigny, with a sneer.

"And why not innate?" replied Werner, solemnly. "Is it impossible for the Great Being who created us, to create us with a sense of his existence?"

"Listen to these philosophers," said Brother Antony; "I never heard two of them agree. I must go to mass."

"Mr. Werner and myself, count," said Marigny, "are about to smoke a pipe with Besso, a rich Hebrew merchant here. He is one of the finest-hearted fellows in the world, and generous as he is rich. Will you accompany us? You will greatly honour him, and find in his divan some intelligent society."

VII.

MARIGNY was a skeptic, and an absolute materialist, yet he was influenced by noble views, for he had devoted his life to science, and was now, at his own charge, about to penetrate into the interior of Africa, by Sennaar. Werner was a German divine, and a rationalist, tauntingly described by his companion as a devout Christian, who did not believe in Christianity. Yet he had resided in Palestine and Egypt nearly four years, studying their language and customs, and accumulating materials for a history of the miraculous creed whose miracles he explained. Both were men of remarkable intellectual powers, and the ablest champions of their respective systems.

I accompanied these new acquaintances to the house of Besso, and was most hospitably received and sumptuously entertained. I have seldom met a man with more easy manners and a more gracious carriage than Besso, who, although sincere in his creed, was the least bigoted of his tribe. He introduced us to his visiter, his friend, and correspondent, Sheriff Effendi, an Egyptian merchant, and who fortunately spoke the lingua Franca with facility. The other guest was an Englishman, by name Benson, a missionary, and a very learned, pious, and acute man.

Such was the party in whose society I generally spent a portion of my day during my residence at Jerusalem, and I have often thought, that were the conversations to which I have there listened recorded, a volume might be sent forth of more wit and wisdom than are now usually met with. The tone of discussion was, in general, metaphysical and scientific, varied with speculations principally on African travel, a subject with which Sheriff Effendi was well acquainted. In metaphysics, sharp were the contests between Benson, Marigny, and Werner, and on all sides ably maintained. I listened to them with great interest. Besso smiled, and Sheriff Effendi shrugged his shoulders.

Understanding this mild and intelligent Moslem in a few days about to join the caravan over the desert through Gaza to Egypt, I resolved to accompany him. I remember well that on the eve of our departure, one of those metaphysical discussions arose in which Marigny delighted. When it terminated, he proposed, that as our agreeable assembly was soon about to disperse, each of us should inscribe, on a panel of the wall, some sentence as a memorial of his sojourn.

Benson wrote first, "For us in Adam all die, so in Christ all men shall be made alive."

Werner wrote, "Glory to Christ! The supernatural has destroyed the natural."

Marigny wrote, "Knowledge is human."

Besso wrote, "I will not believe in those who must believe in me."

Sheriff Effendi wrote, "God is great. Man should be charitable."

Contarini Fleming wrote, "Time."

These are the words that were written in the house of Besso, the Hebrew, residing at Jerusalem, near the gate of Sion. Amen! Travel teaches toleration

VIII.

PERCHANCE, while I am writing these pages, some sage may be reading, in the once mysterious inscriptions of the most ancient of people, some secret which may change the foundations of human knowledge. Already the chronology of the world assumes a new aspect, already in the now intelligible theology of Egypt, we have discovered the origin of Grecian polytheism, already we have penetrated beyond the delusive veil of Ptolemaic transmutation: Isis has yielded to Athor, and Osiris to Kneph. The scholar discards the Grecian nomenclature of Sesostris and Memnon. In the temples of Carnac, he discovers the conquests of Rameses, and in the palaces of Medinet Abou, the refined civilization of Amenoph.

Singular fate of modern ages, that beneficent Omnipotence has willed, that for all our knowledge, we should be indebted to the most insignificant of ancient states. Our divine instruction is handed down to us by an Arabian tribe, and our profane learning flows only from the clans of the Ægean!

Where are the records of the great Assyrian monarchy? Where are the books of the Medes and Persians? Where the learned annals of the Pharaohs?

Fortunate Jordan! Fortunate Ilissus! I have waded through the sacred waters; with difficulty, I traced the scanty windings of the classic stream. Alas! for the exuberant Tigris; alas! for the mighty Euphrates; alas! for the mysterious Nile!

A river is suddenly found flowing through the wilderness; its source is unknown. On one side are interminable wastes of sand; on the other a rocky desert and a narrow sea. Thus it rolls on for five hundred miles, throwing up on each side, to the extent of about three leagues, a soil fertile as a garden. Within a hundred and fifty miles of the sea it divides into two branches, which wind through an immense plain, once the granary of the world. Such is Egypt!

From the cataracts of Nubia to the gardens of the Delta, in a course of twelve hundred miles, the banks of the Nile are covered at slight intervals with temples and catacombs, pyramids and painted chambers. The rock temples of Ipsambol, guarded by colossal forms, are within the roar of the second cataract: avenues of sphinxes lead to Derr, the chief town of Nubia: from Derr to the first cataract, the Egyptian boundary, a series of rock temples conduct to the beautiful and sacred buildings of Philæ: Edfou and Esneh are a fine preparation for the colossal splendour and the massy grace of ancient Thebes.

Even after the inexhaustible curiosity and varied magnificence of this unrivalled record of ancient art, the beautiful Dendera, consummate blending of Egyptian imagination and Grecian taste, will command your enthusiastic gaze; and if the catacombs of Siout, and the chambers of Benihasan prove less fruitful of interest after the tombs of the kings, and the cemeteries of Gornou, before you are the obelisks of Memphis, and the pyramids of Gizeh, Saccarah, and Dashour!

IX.

THE traveller who crosses the desert, and views the Nile with its lively villages, clustered in groves of palm, and its banks entirely lined with that graceful tree, will bless with sincerity "The Father of Waters." 'Tis a rich land, and indeed flowing with milk and honey. The Delta, in its general appearance, somewhat reminded me of Belgium. The soil everywhere is a rich black mud, without a single stone. The land is so uniformly flat, that those who arrive by sea do not detect it until within half a dozen miles, when a palm tree creeps upon the horizon, and then you observe the line of land that supports it. The Delta is intersected by canals which are filled with the rising Nile. It is by their medium, and not by the absolute overflowing of the river, that the country is periodically deluged.

The Arabs are gay, witty, vivacious, and very susceptible and acute. It is difficult to render them miserable, and a beneficent government might find in them the most valuable subjects. A delightful climate is some compensation for a grinding tyranny. Every night as they row along the moonlit river, the boatmen join in a melodious chorus, shouts of merriment burst from each illumined village, everywhere are heard the sounds of laughter and of music, and wherever you stop you are saluted by the dancing girls. These are always graceful in their craft; sometimes very agreeable in their persons. They are gayly, even richly dressed: in bright colours, with their hair braided with pearls, and their necks and foreheads adorned with strings of gold coin. In their voluptuous dance we at once detect the origin of the boleros, and fandangos, and castanets of Spain.

I admire very much the Arab women. They are very delicately moulded. Never have I seen such twinkling feet, and such small hands. Their complexion is clear, and not dark; their features beautifully formed, and sharply defined; their eyes liquid with passion, and bright with intelligence. The traveller is delighted to find himself in an oriental country where the women are not imprisoned, and scarcely veiled. For a long time I could not detect the reason why I was so charmed with Egyptian life. At last I recollected that I had recurred, after a long estrangement, to the cheerful influence of women.

X.

I FOLLOWED the course of the Nile far into Nubia, and did not stop until I was under the tropic of Cancer. Shortly after quitting Egypt the landscape changes. It is perfectly African; mountains of burning sand, vegetation unnaturally vivid, groves of cocoa trees, groups of crocodiles, and an ebony population in a state of nudity, armed with spears of reeds, and shields of the hippopotamus and the giraffe.

The voyage back was tedious, and I was glad, after so much wandering, to settle down in Cairo.

XI.

CAIRO is situated on the base of considerable hills, whose origin cannot be accounted for, but which are undoubtedly artificial. They are formed by the ruins and the rubbish of long centuries. When I witness these extraordinary formations, which are not uncommon in the neighbourhood of eastern cities, I am impressed with the idea of the immense antiquity of oriental society.

There is a charm about Cairo, and it is this,—that it is a capital in a desert. In one moment you are in the stream of existence, and in the other in boundless solitude, or, which is still more awful, the silence of tombs. I speak of the sepulchre of the Mamlouk sultans without the city. They form what may indeed be styled a city of the dead an immense necropolis, full of exquisite buildings, domes covered with fret-work, and minarets carved and moulded with rich and elegant fancy. To me, they proved much more interesting than the far-famed pyramids, although their cones in a distance are indeed sublime,—their gray cones soaring in the light blue sky.

The genius that has raised the tombs of the sultans, may also be traced in many of the mosques of the city—splendid specimens of Saracenic architecture. In gazing upon these brilliant creations, and also upon those of ancient Egypt, I have often been struck by the felicitous system which they display, of ever forming the external ornaments by inscriptions. How far excelling the Grecian and Gothic method! Instead of a cornice of flowers, or an entablature of unmeaning fancy, how superior to be reminded of the power of the Creator, or the necessity of government, the deeds of conquerors, or the discoveries of arts!

XII.

IT was in these solitary rides in the Desert of Cairo, and in these lone wanderings amid the tombs of the sultans, that I first again felt the desire of composition. My mind appeared suddenly to have returned. I became restless, disquieted. I found myself perpetually indulging in audible soliloquy, and pouring forth impassioned monologues. I was pleased with the system of oriental life, and the liberty in which in Egypt Franks can indulge. I felt no inclination to return to Europe, and I determined to cast my lot in this pleasant and fruitful land. I had already spent in Cairo several months, and I now resolved to make it my permanent residence, when I received strange letters from my father. I style them strange, for there breathed throughout a tone of melancholy which with him was quite unusual, and which perplexed me. He complained of ill-health, and expressed a hope that my wanderings were drawing to a close, and that we might again meet. I had been nearly six years absent. Was it possible? Was it indeed six years since I stood upon Mount Jura? And yet in that time how much had happened! How much had I seen, and felt, and learned! What violent passions, what strange countries, what lively action, and what long meditation!

Strange as may have appeared my conduct to my father, I loved him devotedly. An indication of sentiment on his part ever called forth all my latent affection. It was the conviction from which I could never divest myself, that he was one who could spare no portion of his sense for the softer feelings, and that his conduct to me was rather in accordance with the system of society than instigated by what I should consider the feelings of a father—it was this conviction that had alone permitted me so long to estrange myself from his hearth. But now he called me back, and almost in sorrow. I read his letter over and over again, dwelt on all its affection, and on all its suppressed grief. I felt an irresistible desire to hasten to him without a moment's delay. I longed to receive his blessing and his embrace.

I quitted Cairo. The Mahmadie canal was not yet open. I was obliged, therefore, to sail to Rossetto. Thence I crossed the desert in a constant mirage, and arrived at the famous Alexandria. In this busy port I was not long in finding a ship. One was about to sail for Ancona. I engaged a passage, and soon the palms and sands of Egypt vanished from my sight.

XIII.

OUR passage was tedious. The captain was afraid of pirates, and, alarmed in the night, suddenly changed his course, and made for the Barbary coast, by which we lost our wind. We were becalmed off Candia. I once more beheld Mount Ida.

I induced the captain to run into port. I landed once more on that fatal coast. The old consul and his family were still there, and received me with a kindness which reminded me of our first happy meeting. I slept in the same chamber. I woke in the morning—the sun was still shining, the bright plants still quivering in its beams. But the gazelle had gone—the white gazelle had died. And my gazelle—where was she?

I beheld our home—our once happy home. Spiro only was with me, and his family came forth with joy to greet him. I left them. I hastened with tremulous steps to the happy valley. I passed by the grove of orange trees. My strength deserted me. I leaned, nearly fainting, against a tree. At last, I dared to advance a step, and look forward.

I beheld it. Yes! I beheld it, green and verdant, and covered with white roses, but I dared not approach. I wafted it a kiss and a blessing, and rushed like a madman to the shore.

At Ancona, I entered the lazaretto to perform a long quarantine. I instantly wrote to my father, and I despatched a courier to my banker at Florence. I received from him, in a few days, a packet. I opened it with a sad foreboding. A letter in my father's handwriting reassured me. I tore it open—I read.

XIV.

"My beloved Contarini, the hand of death is upon me. Each day my energies decrease. I can conceal from others, but not from myself, my gradual, but certain decay. We shall not meet again, my child—I have a deep conviction we shall not meet again. Yet I would not die without expressing to you my love, without yielding to feelings which I have too long suppressed.

"Child of my affections! receive my blessing. Offspring of my young passion! let me press you, in imagination, to my lone bosom!

"Ah! why are you not with me? why is not my hand in yours? There is much to say—more, more than I can ever express—yet, I must write, for I would not die without my son doing justice to his father.

"As a child, you doubted my love—as a man, in spite of all your struggles, I am conscious you never divested yourself of the agonizing idea. O, my Contarini, what is this life, this life of error, and misconception, and woe!

"My feeble pen trembles in my hand. There is much, there is much to write, much, alas! that never can be written. Why are we parted?

"You think me cold—you think me callous—you think me a hollow-hearted worldling. O! my Contarini, recall the doubt and misery of your early years, and all your wild thoughts, and dark misgivings, and vain efforts—recall all these, and behold the boyhood of your father!

"I, too, believed myself a poet—I, too, aspired to emancipate my kind—I, too, looked forward to a glorious future, and the dazzling vista of eternal fame. The passions of my heart were not less violent than yours, and not less ardent was my impetuous love.

"Wo! wo! the father and the son have been alike stricken. I know all, my Contarini—I know all, my sweet, sweet child. I would have saved you from the bitter lot—I alone would have borne the deep despair.

"Was she fair, my Contarini? Was she beautiful? Alas! there was once one as bright and as glorious—you knew not your mother.

"I can remember the day but as yesterday when I first gazed upon the liquid darkness of her eye. It was at that fatal city I will not name—horrible Venice!

"I found her surrounded by a thousand slaves—I won her from amid this band—against the efforts and opposition of all her family, I won her. Yes! she was my bride—the beautiful daughter of this romantic land—a land to which I was devoted, and for which I would have perilled my life. Alas! I perilled my love! My imagination was fired by that wondrous and witching city. My love of freedom, my hatred of oppression, burned each day with a brighter and more vehement flame. I sighed over its past glory and present degradation, and when I mingled my blood with the veins of Contarini, I vowed I would revive the glory they had themselves created.

"Venice was at that time under the yoke of the French. The recollection of the republic was still fresh in men's minds; the son of the last doge was my relative and my friend. Unhappy Pasmualigo! thy memory demands a tear.

"We conspired. Even now my blood seems to flow with renewed force, when I recall the excitement of our secret meetings in the old Palazzo Contarini, on the Grand Lagune. How often has daylight on the waters reminded us of our long counsels!

"We were betrayed. Timely information permitted me to escape. I bore away my wife. We reached Mantua in safety. Perhaps it was the agitation of the event and the flight—since the tragedy of Candia, I have sometimes thought it might have been a constitutional doom. But that fatal night—why, why recall it? We have both alike suffered. No, no, not alike—for I had my child.

"My child, my darling child, even now your recollection maintains me, even now my cheek warms as I repose upon the anticipation of your glory.

"I will not dwell upon what I now endured. Alas! I cannot leave it to your imagination. Your reality has taught you all. I roved a madman amid the mountains of the Tyrol. But you were with me, my child, you were with me, and I looked upon your mild and pensive eyes, and the wildness of my thoughts died away.

"I recurred to those hopes of poetic fame which had soothed the dull wretchedness of my boyhood. Alas! no flame from heaven descended on my lyre. I experienced only mortification, and so complete was my wretchedness, so desolate my life, so void of hope and cheerfulness, and even the prospect of that common ease that the merest animals require, that had it not been for you, I would have freed myself from the indescribable burthen of my existence. My hereditary estates were confiscated; my friends, like myself, were in exile. We were, in fact, destitute, and I had lost all confidence in my energies.

Thus wo-begone, I entered Vienna, where, fortunately, I found a friend. Mingling in the artificial society of that refined city, those excited feelings, fed by my strange adventures and solitary life, subsided. I began to lose what was peculiar in me, and share much that was general. Worldly feelings sprang up. Some success brought back my confidence. I believed that I was not destitute of power, but had only mistaken its nature. It was a political age. A great theatre seemed before me. I had ever been ambitious. I directed my desires in a new channel, and I determined to be a statesman.

"I had attracted the attention of the Austrian minister. I became his secretary. You know the rest.

"I resolved that my child should be happy. I desired to save him from the misery that clouded my own youth. I would have preserved him from the tyranny of impetuous passions, and the harrowing wo that awaits an ill-regulated mind. I observed in him a dangerous susceptibility that alarmed me. I studied to prevent the indulgence of his feelings. I was kind, but I was calm. His imaginative temperament did not escape me. I perceived only hereditary weakness, and would have prevented hereditary wo. It was my aim to make him a practical man. O! Contarini, it was the anxiety of affection that prevented me from doing justice to your genius.

"My son, my child, my only beloved, could I but once press you in my arms, I should die happy. And even now the future supports me, and I feel the glory of your coming fame irradiating my tomb.

"Why, why cannot we meet? I could say so much, although I would say only I loved you. The pen falls from my hand, the feeble pen, that has signified nothing. Imagine what I would express, my Contarini—love me, love me. Cherish my memory while you receive my blessing."

"Let me fly, let me fly to him instantly!" was my exclamation. I felt the horrors of my imprisonment. I wrung my hands, and stamped from helplessness. There was a packet. I opened it—a lock of rich, dark hair, whose colour was not strange to me, and a beautiful miniature, that seemed a portrait of my beloved, yet I gazed upon the countenance of my mother.

XV.

THERE was yet a letter from my banker, which I long neglected to open. I opened it at last, and learned the death of my remaining parent.

The age of tears was past. That relief was denied me. I looked up to heaven in despair. I flew to a darkened chamber. I buried my face in my hands, and, lone and speechless, I delivered myself up for days to the silent agony of the past.

PART THE SEVENTH.

I.

I LEANED against a column of the temple of Castor. On one side was the palace of the Cæsars; on the other, the colossal amphitheatre of Vespasian. Arches of triumph, the pillars of Pagan temples, and the domes of Christian churches, rose around me. In the distance was the wide Campagna, the Claudian Aqueduct, and the Alban Mount.

Solitude and silence reigned on that sacred road once echoing with the shouts and chariots of three hundred triumphs—solitude and silence, meet companions of imperial desolation! Where are the spoils of Egypt and of Carthage? Where the golden tribute of Iberia? Where the long Gallic trophies? Where are the rich armour and massy cups of Macedon? Where are the pictures and statues of Corinth? Where the libraries of Athens? Where is the broken bow of Parthia? Where the elephants of Pontus, and the gorgeous diadems of the Asian kings?

And where is Rome! All nations rose and flourished only to swell her splendour, and now I stand amid her ruins.

In such a scene, what are our private griefs and petty sorrows? And what is man? I felt my nothingness. Life seemed flat, and dull, and trifling. I could not conceive that I could again become interested in its base pursuits. I believed that I could no longer be influenced by joy or by sorrow. Indifference alone remained.

A man clambered down the steep of the Palatine. It was Winter, flushed and eager from a recent excavation.

"What, count," he exclaimed, "moralizing in the forum!"

"Alas! Winter, what is life?"

"An excellent thing, as long as one can discover as pretty a Torso as I have stumbled upon this morning."

"A Torso! a maimed memorial of the past. The very name is melancholy."

"What is the past to me? I am not dead. You may be. I exist in the present."

"The vanity of the present overpowers me."

"Pooh! I will tell you what, my friend, the period has arrived in your life when you must renounce meditation. Action is now your part. Meditation is culture. It is well to think until a man have discovered his genius, and developed his faculties, but then let him put his intelligence in motion. Act, act, act; act without ceasing, and you will no longer talk of the vanity of life."

"But how am I to act?"

"Create. Man is made to create, from the poet to the potter."

II.

MY father bequeathed me his entire property which was more considerable than I had imagined, the countess and her children being amply provided for by her own estate. In addition to this, I found that he had claimed in my favour the Contarini estates, to which, independent of the validity of my marriage, I was entitled through my mother. After much litigation, the question had been decided in my behalf a few months before my return to Italy. I found myself, therefore, unexpectedly, a very rich man. I wrote to the countess, and received from her a very affectionate reply; nor should I omit that I was honoured by an autograph letter of condolence from the king, and an invitation to re-enter his service.

As I was now wearied with wandering, and desirous of settling down in life, and as I had been deprived of those affections which render home delightful, I determined to find, in the creations of art, some consolation and some substitute for that domestic bliss, which I value above all other blessings. I resolved to create a paradise.

I purchased a large estate in the vicinity of Naples, with a palace and beautiful gardens. I called in the assistance of the first artists in the country, and I availed myself, above all, of the fine taste of my friend Winter. The palace was a Palladian pile, built upon a stately terrace covered with orange and citron trees, and to which you ascended by broad flights of marble steps. The formation of the surrounding country was highly picturesque; hills beautifully peaked or undulating, richly wooded, covered with the cypress and the ilex, and crowned with the stone pine. Occasionally you caught a glimpse of the blue sea and the brilliant coast.

Upon the terrace, on each side of the portal, I have placed a colossal sphinx, which were excavated when I was at Thebes, and which I was fortunate enough to purchase. They are of cream-coloured granite, and as fresh and sharp as if they were finished yesterday. There is a soft majesty and a serene beauty in the countenances, which are very remarkable.

It is my intention to build in these beautiful domains a Saracenic palace, which my oriental collections will befit, but which I hope also to fill with the masterpieces of Christian art. At present, in a gallery, I have placed some fine specimens of the Venetian, Roman, and Eclectic schools, and have ranged between them copies in marble, by Bertolini, of the most celebrated ancient statues. In one cabinet by itself is the gem of my collection, a Magdalen, by Murillo, and in another, a sleeping Cupid, by Canova, over which I have contrived by a secret light to throw a rosy flush, that invests the ideal beauty of the sculptor with still more ideal life. At the end of the gallery I have placed the portraits of my father and of my mother; the latter copied by an excellent artist from the miniature. Between them is a frame of richly carved ivory, enclosing a black velvet veil, studded with white roses, worked in pearls.

Around me, I hope in time to create a scene which may rival in beauty and variety, although not in extent, the villa of Hadrian, whom I have always considered the most sumptuous and accomplished character of antiquity. I have already commenced the foundation of a tower which shall rise at least one hundred and fifty feet, and which I trust will equal in the beauty of design, and the solidity of the masonry, the most celebrated works of antiquity. This tower I shall dedicate to the future, and I intend that it shall be my tomb.

Lausanne has married, and will never quit me. He has promised also to form a band of wind instruments, a solace necessary to solitude. Winter is my only friend and my only visitor. He is a great deal with me, and has a studio in the palace. He is so independent, that he often arrives and quits it without my knowledge; yet I never converse with him without pleasure.

Here let me pass my life in the study and the creation of the beautiful. Such is my desire; but whether it will be my career is, I feel, doubtful. My interest in the happiness of my race is too keen to permit me for a moment to be blind to the storms that lower on the horizon of society. Perchance also the political regeneration of the country to which I am devoted may not be distant, and in that great work I am resolved to participate. Bitter jest, that the most civilized portion of the globe should be considered incapable of self-government!

When I examine the state of the European society with the unimpassioned spirit which the philosopher can alone command, I perceive that it is in a state of transition—a state of transition from feudal to federal principles. This I conceive to be the sole and secret cause of all the convulsions that have occurred, and are to occur.

Circumstances are beyond the control of man; but his conduct is in his own power. The great event is as sure as that I am now penning this prophecy of its occurrence. With us it rests whether it shall be welcomed by wisdom or by ignorance—whether its beneficent results shall be accelerated by enlightened minds, or retarded by our dark passions.

What is the arch of the conqueror, what the laurel of the poet! I think of the infinity of space, I feel my nothingness. Yet if I am to be remembered, let me be remembered as one who, in a sad night of gloomy ignorance and savage bigotry, was prescient of the flaming morning-break of bright philosophy,—as one who deeply sympathized with his fellow-men, and felt a proud and profound conviction of their perfectibility,—as one who devoted himself to the amelioration of his kind, by the destruction of error, and the propagation of truth.

THE
AND
THE RISE OF ISKANDER.

WONDROUS TALE OF ALROY.

* * * * *

SWEET sister! as I wandered on the mountains of Sion, behold! a gazelle came bounding o'er the hills! It perceived me, it started back, it gazed at me with trembling surprise. Ah! fear not! fair creature, I fondly exclaimed, fear not, and flee not away! I too have a gazelle in a distant land; not less beautiful her airy form than thine, and her dark eye not less tremulously bright.

Ah! little did I deem, my sweetest friend, that ere I pressed that beauteous form again, sorrow should dim the radiance of thy smile, and charge that brilliant eye with many a tear! Yet trust thee, dearest, in a brother's love, the purest sympathy of our fallen state! If I recall one gleam of rapture to thy pensive cheek, not in vain I strike my lonely lyre, or throw these laurels at thy fairy feet!

PREFACE.

THE time of this Romance is the twelfth century. At that period, this was the political condition of the East.

The caliphate was in a state of rapid decay. The Seljukian sultans, who had been called to the assistance of the commanders of the faithful, had become, like the mayors of the palace in France, the real sovereigns of the empire. They had carved four kingdoms out of the dominions of the successors of the prophet, which conferred titles on four Seljukian princes, to wit, the sultan of Bagdad, the sultan of Persia, the sultan of Syria, and the sultan of Roum, or Asia Minor.

But these warlike princes, in the relaxed discipline and doubtful conduct of their armies, began themselves to evince the natural effects of luxury and indulgence. They were no longer the same invincible and irresistible warriors who had poured forth from the shores of the Caspian over the fairest regions of the East, and although they still contrived to preserve order in their dominions, they witnessed, with ill-concealed apprehension, the rising power of the kings of Karasme, whose conquests daily made their territories more contiguous.

With regard to the Hebrew people, it should be known that after the destruction of Jerusalem, the eastern Jews, while they acknowledged the supremacy of their conquerors, gathered themselves together for all purposes of jurisdiction, under the control of a native ruler, an asserted descendant of David, whom they dignified with the title of "The Prince of the Captivity." If we are to credit the enthusiastic annalists of this imaginative people, there were periods of prosperity when "the princes of the captivity" assumed scarcely less state, and enjoyed scarcely less power than the ancient kings of Judah themselves. Certain it is that their power increased always in an exact proportion with the weakness of the caliphate, and without doubt in some of the most distracted periods of the Arabian rule, the Hebrew princes rose into some degree of local and temporary importance. Their chief residence was Bagdad, where they remained until the eleventh century, an age fatal in oriental history, and from the disasters of which "the princes of the captivity" were not exempt. They are heard of even in the twelfth century. I have ventured to place one at Hamadan, a favourite residence of the Hebrews, from being the burial place of Esther and Mordecai.

In this state of affairs arose Alroy, a name perhaps unknown to the vast majority of my readers; yet, if I mistake not, a memorable being, and the dry record of whose marvellous career I have long considered as enveloping the richest materials of poetic fiction.

With regard to the supernatural machinery of this romance, it is cabalistical and correct. From the spirits of the tombs to the sceptre of Solomon, authority may be found in the traditions of the Hebrews for all these spiritual introductions.

I believe that the character of oriental life is not unfaithfully portrayed in these pages. It has undergone less changes than the genius of the occident. I have had the advantage of studying the Asiatics in their most celebrated countries and capitals. An existence of blended splendour and repose, varied only by fitful starts of extravagant and overwhelming action, and marvellous vicissitudes of fortune, a strong influence of individual character, a blind submission to destiny, imagination, passion, credulity: these are some of the principal features of society in the most favoured regions of the globe.

And now for my style. I must frankly confess that I have invented a new one. I am conscious of the hazard of such innovation, but I have not adopted my system without long meditation, and a severe examination of its qualities. I have in another work already ventured to express my opinion that the age of versification has passed. I have there observed, "The mode of composition must ever be greatly determined by the manner in which the composition can be made public. In ancient days, the voice was the medium by which we became acquainted with the inventions of a poet. In such a method, where those who listened had no time to pause, and no opportunity to think, it was necessary that every thing should be obvious. The audience who were perplexed would soon become wearied. The spirit of ancient poetry, therefore, is rather material than metaphysical. Superficial, not internal; there is much simplicity and much nature, but little passion, and less philosophy. To obviate the baldness, which is the consequence of a style where the subject and the sentiments are rather intertwined than developed, the poem was enriched by music and enforced by action. Occasionally, were added the enchantment of scenery, and the fascination of the dance. But the poet did not depend merely upon these brilliant accessories. He resolved that his thoughts should be expressed in a manner different from other modes of communicating ideas. He caught a suggestion from his sister art, and invented metre. And in this modulation, he introduced a new system of phrasology, which marked him out from the crowd, and which has obtained the title of 'poetic diction.'

"His object in this system of words was to heighten his meaning by strange phrases, and unusual constructions. Inversion was invented to clothe a commonplace with an air of novelty; vague epithets were introduced to prop up a monotonous modulation; were his meaning to be enforced, he shrank from wearisome ratiocination and the agony of precise conceptions, and sought refuge in a bold personification, or a beautiful similitude. The art of poetry was to express natural feelings in unnatural language.

"Institutions ever survive their purpose, and customs govern us when their cause is extinct. And this mode of communicating poetic invention still remained, when the advanced civilization of man, in multiplying manuscripts, might have made many suspect that the time had arrived when the poet was to cease to sing, and to learn to write. Had the splendid refinement of imperial Rome not been doomed to such rapid decay, and such mortifying and degrading vicissitudes, I believe that versification would have worn out. Unquestionably that empire, in its multifarious population, scenery, creeds and customs, offered the richest materials for emancipated fiction; materials, however, far too vast and various for the limited capacity of metrical celebration.

"That beneficent Omnipotence, before which we must bow down, has so ordered it, that imitation should be the mental feature of modern Europe; and has ordained that we should adopt a Syrian religion, a Grecian literature, and a Roman law. At the revival of letters, we behold the portentous spectacle of national poets communicating their inventions in an exotic form. Conscious of the confined nature of their method, yet unable to extricate themselves from its fatal ties, they sought variety in increased artifice of diction, and substituted for the melody of the lyre, the barbaric clash of rhyme.

"A revolution took place in the mode of communicating thought. Now, at least, it was full time that we should have emancipated ourselves forever from sterile metre. One would have supposed that the poet who could not only write, but even print his inventions, would have felt that it was both useless and unfit that they should be communicated by a process invented when his only medium was simple recitation. One would have supposed, that the poet would have rushed with desire to the new world before him, that he would have seized the new means that permitted him to revel in a universe of boundless invention; to combine the highest ideal creation with the infinite delineation of teeming nature; to unravel all the dark mysteries of our bosoms, and all the bright purposes of our being; to become the great instructor and champion of his species; and not only delight their fancy, and charm their senses, and command their will, but demonstrate their rights, illustrate their necessities, and expound the object of their existence; and all this too in a style charming and changing with its universal theme, now tender, now sportive; now earnest, now profound; now sublime, now pathetic; and substituting for the dull monotony of metre, the most various, and exquisite, and inexhaustible melody.*"

While I have endeavoured to effect my own emancipation from the trammels of the old style, I do not for a moment flatter myself that the new one, which I offer, combines those rare qualities which I anticipate may be the ultimate result of this revolution. But such as it is, it stands upon its own merits, and may lead abler men to achieve abler consequences.

It has been urged by a very ingenious and elegant critic, when commenting, perhaps with the apprehensive indignation of a versifier, upon the passage which I have quoted, "that the melodies of language are the echoes of the melodies of thought: as in hearing martial music, the step involuntarily takes a stately tread, as to gayer airs, a lighter and more buoyant one; so does the elevated idea take a more noble, or the feelings of tenderness a sweeter tone, than those of ordinary discourse."

I perfectly assent to this remark, which was intended to show "the fallacies" of my system. I do not oppose melody because I oppose verse. Thoughts are not always melodious, ideas always noble, and feelings always tender. The curse of metre is, that it makes all thoughts, ideas, and feelings—all action and all passion alike monotonous, and is at the same time essentially limited in its capacity of celebration. As for myself, I never hesitate, although I discard verse, to have recourse to rhythm whenever I consider its introduction desirable, and occasionally even to rhyme. There is no doubt that the style in which I have attempted to write this work is a delicate and difficult instrument for an artist to handle. He must not abuse his freedom. He must alike beware the turgid and the bombastic, the meager and the mean. He must be easy in his robes of state, and a degree of elegance and dignity must accompany him even in the camp and the markethouse. The language must rise gradually with the rising passions of the speakers, and subside in harmonious unison with their sinking emotions.

With regard to the conduct of this tale, it will speedily be observed to be essentially dramatic. Had, indeed, the drama in this country not been a career encompassed with difficulties, I should have made Alroy the hero of a tragedy. But as, at the present day, this is a mode of composition which for any practical effect is almost impossible, I have made him the hero of a dramatic romance. The author, therefore, seldom interferes in the conduct of the story. He has not considered it his duty to step in between the reader and the beings of his imagination, to develop and dwell upon their feelings, or to account for their characters and actions. He leaves them in general to explain every thing for themselves, substituting on his part description for scenery, and occasional bursts of lyric melody for that illustrative music, without which all dramatic representations are imperfect, and which renders the serious opera of the Italians the most effective performance of modern times, and most nearly approaching the exquisite drama of the ancient Greeks.

* Contarini Fleeming.

To the Tale of Aloy I have added the history of a Christian hero placed in a somewhat similar position, but achieving a very different end; and I hope the reader will experience the pleasure of an agreeable contrast in the Rise of the great Iskander.

PART I.

I.

THE cornets sounded a final flourish as the prince of the captivity dismounted from his white mule; his train shouted as if they were once more a people, and had it not been for the contemptuous leer which played upon the countenances of the Moslem bystanders, it might have been taken for a day of triumph rather than of tribute.

"The glory has not departed!" exclaimed the venerable Bostenay, as he entered the hall of his mansion. "It is not as the visit of Sheba unto Solomon; nevertheless the glory has not yet departed. You have done well, faithful Caleb." The old man's courage waxed more vigorous as each step within his own walls the more assured him against the recent causes of his fear—the audible curses and the threatened missiles of the unbelieving mob.

"It shall be a day of rejoicing and thanksgiving," continued the prince; "and look, my faithful Caleb, that the trumpeters be well served. That last flourish was bravely done. It was not as the blast before Jericho; nevertheless it told that the Lord of Hosts was for us. How the accursed Ishmaelites started! Did you mark, Caleb, that tall Turk in green upon my left? By the sceptre of Jacob, he turned pale! O! it shall be a day of rejoicing and thanksgiving! And spare not the wine, nor the flesh-pots for the people. Look you to this, my child, for the people shouted bravely, and with a stout voice. It was not as the great shout in the camp when the ark returned, but, nevertheless, it was boldly done, and showed that the glory had not yet departed. So spare not the wine, my son, and drink to the desolation of Ishmael in the juice which he dare not quaff."

"It has indeed been a great day for Israel!" exclaimed Caleb, echoing his master's exultation.

"Had the procession been forbidden," continued Bostenay, "had it been reserved for me of all the princes to have dragged the accursed tribute upon foot, without trumpets and without guards, by this sceptre, my good Caleb, I really think, that sluggishly as this old blood now runs, I would—but it is needless now to talk—the God of our fathers hath been our refuge."

"Verily, my lord, we were as David in the wilderness of Ziph; but now we are as the Lord's anointed in the stronghold of Engedi!"

"The glory truly has not yet utterly departed," resumed the prince in a more subdued tone; "yet if—I tell you what, Caleb—praise the Lord that you are young."

"My prince may yet live to see the good day."

"Nay, my child, you misinterpret me. Your prince has lived to see the evil day. 'Twas not of the coming that I thought when I bid you praise the Lord because you were young—the more my sin. I was thinking, Caleb, that if your hairs were as mine, if you could call back like me the days that are gone by—the days when it needed no bribe to prove we were princes—the glorious days when we led captivity captive—I was thinking, I say, my son, what a gainful heritage it is to be born after the joys that have passed away."

"My father lived at Babylon," said Caleb.

"O! name it not!—name it not!" exclaimed the old chieftain. "Dark was the day that we lost that second Sion! We were then also slaves to the Egyptian; but verily we ruled over the realm of Pharaoh. Why, Caleb, Caleb, you who know all—the days of toil—the nights restless as a love-sick boy's, which it has cost your prince to gain permission to grace our tribute day with the paltry presence of half a dozen guards—you who know all my difficulties, who have witnessed all my mortification, what would you say to the purse of dirhems, surrounded by seven thousand cimeters?"

"Seven thousand cimeters!"

"Not one less; my father flourished one."

"It was indeed a great day for Israel!"

"Nay, that is nothing. When old Aloy was prince—old David Aloy—for thirty years, good Caleb—thirty long years we paid no tribute to the caliph."

"No tribute! no tribute for thirty years! What marvel then, my prince, that the Philistines have of late exacted interest?"

"Nay, that is nothing," continued old Bostenay, unmindful of his servant's ejaculations. "When Mactador was caliph, he sent to the same Prince David, to know why the dirhems were not brought up, and David immediately called to horse, and attended by all the chief people rode to the palace, and told the caliph that tribute was an acknowledgment made from the weak to the strong to insure protection and support, and inasmuch as he and his people had just garrisoned the city for ten years against the Seljuks, he held the caliph in arrears."

"We shall see an ass mount a ladder,"* exclaimed Caleb with uplifted eyes of wonder.

"It is true though," continued the prince; "often have I heard my father tell the tale. He was then a child, and his mother held him up to see the procession return, and all the people shouted, 'The sceptre has not gone out of Jacob!'"

"It was indeed a great day for Israel."

"Nay, that is nothing. I could tell you such things! But we prattle; our business is not yet done. You to the people; the widow and the orphan are waiting. Give freely, good Caleb, give freely; the spoils of the Canaanite are no longer ours; nevertheless the Lord is still our God, and, after all, even this is a great day for Israel. And Caleb, Caleb, bid my nephew, David Aloy, know that I would speak with him."

"I will do all promptly, good master! We wondered that our honoured lord, your nephew, went not up with the donation this day."

"Who bid you wonder! Begone, sir! How long are you to idle here!—Away!"

"They wonder he went not up with the tribute to-day. Ay! surely—a common talk. This boy will be our ruin: a prudent hand to wield our shattered sceptre! I have observed him from his infancy; he should have lived in Babylon. The old Aloy blood flows in his veins, a stiff-necked race

When I was a youth his grandsire was my friend; I had some fancies then myself. Dreams, dreams! we have fallen on evil days, and yet we prosper. I have lived long enough to feel a rich caravan, laden with the shawls of India, and the stuffs of Samarcand, if not exactly like dancing before the ark, is still a goodly sight. And our hard-hearted rulers, with all their pride, can they subsist without us? Still we wax rich. I have lived to see the haughty caliph sink into a slave, viler far than Israel. And the victorious and voluptuous Seljuks, even now they tremble at the dim mention of the distant name of Arslan. Yet I, Bostenay, and the frail remnant of our scattered tribes, still we exist, and still, thanks to our God, we prosper. But the age of power has past; it is by prudence now that we must flourish. The jibe, the jest, the curse, perchance the blow, Israel must now bear, and with a calm, or even smiling visage. What then? For every jibe and jest, for every curse, I'll have a dirhem; and every blow—let him look to it who is my creditor, or wills to be so. But see, he comes, my nephew! His grandsire was my friend. He thinks I look upon him now; the same Alroy that was the partner of my boyish hours. And yet that fragile form and girlish face but ill consort with the dark passions, and the dangerous fancies, I fear lie hidden in that tender breast. Well, sir?"

"You want me, uncle?"

"What then? Uncles often want what nephews seldom offer."

"I at least can refuse nothing; for I have naught to give."

"You have a jewel which I greatly covet."

"A jewel! See my chaplet! You gave it me, my uncle; it is yours."

"I thank you. Many a blazing ruby, many a soft and shadowy pearl, and many an emerald glowing like a star in the far desert, I behold, my child. They are choice stones, and yet I miss a jewel far more precious, which, when I gave you this rich chaplet, David, I deemed you did possess."

"How do you call it, sir?"

"Obedience."

"'Tis a word of doubtful import, sir; for to obey, when duty is disgrace, is not a virtue."

"I see you read my thought. In a word, I sent for you to know, wherefore you joined me not to-day in offering—"

"Tribute."

"Be it so: tribute. Why were you absent?"

"Because it was a tribute: I pay none."

"But that the dreary course of seventy winters has not erased the memory of my boyish follies, David, I should esteem you mad. Think you, because I am old, I am enamoured of disgrace, and love a house of bondage. If life were a mere question between freedom and slavery, glory and dishonour, all could decide. Trust me, there needs but little spirit to be a moody patriot in a sullen home, and vent your heroic spleen upon your fellow-sufferers, whose sufferings you cannot remedy. But of such stuff your race were ever made. Such deliverers ever abounded in the house of Alroy. And what has been the result? I found you, and your sister, orphan infants, your sceptre broken, and your tribes dispersed. The tribute, which now at least we pay like princes, was then exacted with the scourge, and offered in chains. I collected our scattered people, I re-established our ancient throne, and this day, which you look upon as a day of lu-miliation, and of mourning, is rightly considered by all a day of triumph, and of feasting; for has it not proved, in the very teeth of the Ishmaelites, that the sceptre has not yet departed from Jacob?"

"I pray you, uncle, speak not of these things. I would not willingly forget you are my kinsman, and a kind one. Let there be no strife between us. What my feelings are is nothing. They are my own: I cannot change them. And for my ancestors, if they pondered much, and achieved little, why, then, 'twould seem our pedigree is pure, and I am their true son. At least one was a hero."

"Ah! the great Alroy; you may well be proud of such an ancestor."

"I am ashamed, uncle,—ashamed, ashamed."

"His sceptre still exists. At least, I have not betrayed him. And this brings me to the real purport of our interview. That sceptre I would return."

"To whom?"

"To its right owner, to yourself."

"O! no, no, no—I pray you, pray you, uncle, I pray you not. I do entreat you, sir, upon my knees, forget I have a right as utterly as I myself disclaim it. That sceptre—you have wielded it wisely and well; I do beseech you keep it. Indeed, good uncle, I have no sort of talent for all the busy duties of this post."

"You sigh for glory, yet you fly from toil."

"Toil without glory is a menial's lot."

"You are a boy; you may yet live to learn that the sweetest lot of life consists in tranquil duties and well-earned repose."

"If my lot be repose, I'll find it in a lair."

"Ah! David, David, there is a wilderness in your temper, boy, that makes me often tremble. You are already too much alone, child. And for this, as well as weightier reasons, I am desirous that you should at length assume the office you inherit. What my poor experience can afford to aid you, as your counsellor, I shall ever proffer; and for the rest, our God will not desert you, an orphan child, and born of royal blood."

"Pr'ythee, no more, kind uncle. I have but little heart to mount a throne, which only ranks me as the first of slaves."

"Pooh, pooh, you are young. Live we like slaves? Is this hall a servile chamber? These costly carpets, and these rich divans, in what proud harem shall we find their match? I feel not like a slave. My coffers are full of dirhems. Is that slavish? The wealthiest company of the caravan is ever Bostenay's. Is that to be a slave? Walk the bazaar of Bagdad, and you will find my name more potent than the caliph's. Is that a badge of slavery?"

"Uncle, you toil for others."

"So do we all, so does the bee, yet he is free and happy."

"At least he has a sting."

"Which he can use but once; and when he stings—"

"He dies, and like a hero. Such a death is sweeter than his honey."

"Well, well, you are young, you are young. I once, too, had fancies. Dreams all, dreams all. I willingly would see you happy, child. Come, let that face brighten; after all, to-day is a great day. If you had seen what I have seen, David, you too would feel grateful. Come, let us feast, let us feast. The Ishmaelite, the accursed child of Hagar, he does confess to-day you are a prince: this day also you complete your eighteenth year. The custom of our people now requires you should assume the attributes of manhood. To-day, then, your reign commences; and at our festival I will present the elders to their prince. For a while farewell, my child. Array that face in smiles. I shall most anxiously await your presence."

"Farewell, sir."

He turned his head and watched his uncle as he departed; the bitter expression of his countenance gradually melted away as Bostenay disappeared; dejection succeeded to sarcasm; he sighed, he threw himself upon a couch, and buried his face in his hands.

Suddenly he arose, and paced the chamber with an irregular and moody step. He stopped, he leaned against a column. He spoke in a tremulous and smothered voice.

"O! my heart is full of care, and my soul is dark with sorrow! What am I! What is all this! A cloud hangs heavy o'er my life. God of my fathers! let it burst.

"I know not what I feel—yet what I feel is madness. Thus to be, is not to live, if life be what I sometimes dream, and dare to think it might be. To breathe, to feed, to sleep, to wake and breathe again—again to feel existence without hope; if this be life, why then these brooding thoughts that whisper death were better!

"Away! away! The demon tempts me. But to what, to what? What nameless deed shall desecrate this hand! No, no, it must not be; the royal blood of twice two thousand years, it must not die—die like a dream. O! my heart is full of care, and my soul is dark with sorrow!

"Hark! the trumpets that sound our dishonour. O! but that they sounded to battle! Lord of Hosts! Let me conquer or die! Let me conquer like David, or die, Lord, like Saul.

"Ah! were I in the woods once more, a melancholy child! Each flower, that raised its haughty head, should be the turbaned enemy, and I would wave some sword of straw, and find revenge in every blow, that quelled their painted pride.

"'Tis over now; that sweet, sweet prime, when fancy solaced solitude. Yet I am still alone. But how alone! The madness of the past and the despair of the future—are not these the choice companions of my pleasant life!

"I once remember, when a child, I cried to be a man—and now, methinks, I'll sit me down and cry to be a child. Ah! tears of bliss, though shed in sadness, unutterable joys! No more the sunshine of the breast succeeds those freshening showers of grief; light season of my boyish spring, when care was but a mimic game, and wo a wild delusion!

"Behold this chaplet rich and rare; its stones might deck a soldan's brow! Could I but weep, for each bright tear I'd give a flaming gem; could I but weep, for each soft sob I'd yield a lustrous pearl. Alas! the age of tears is o'er, and yet—my heart is full of care, and my soul is dark with sorrow.

"Why do I live! Ah! could the thought that lurks within my secret heart but answer—not the trumpet's blast when echoing on the noisy hills, could speak as loud or clear. The votary of a false idea, I linger in this shadowy life, and feed on silent images which no eye but mine can gaze on, until, at length, they are invested with all terrible circumstances of life, and breathe, and act, form a stirring world of fate and beauty, time, and death, and glory. And then from out this dazzling wilderness of deeds I wander forth and wake, and find myself in this dull house of bondage, even as I do now. Horrible! horrible!

"God of my fathers! for indeed I dare not style thee God of their wretched sons—yet by the memory of Sinai let me tell thee that some of the antique blood yet beats within these pulses, and there yet is one who fain would commune with thee face to face—commune and conquer.

"And if the promise unto which we cling be not a cheat, why let him come, come, and come quickly, for thy servant Israel, Lord, is now a slave so infamous, so wo-begone, and so contemned, that even when our fathers hung their harps by the sad waters of the Babylonian stream, why, it were paradise again to what we suffer.

"Alas! they do not suffer; they endure and do not feel. Or by this time our shadowy cherubim would guard again the ark. It is the will that is the father to the deed, and he who broods over some long idea, however wild, will find his dream was but the prophecy of coming fate.

"And even now a vivid flash darts through the darkness of my mind—methinks, methinks—Ah! worst of woes to dream of glory in despair. No, no, I live and die a most ignoble thing; beauty and love, and fame and mighty deeds, the smile of women and the gaze of men, and the ennobling consciousness of worth, and all the fiery course of the creative passions—these are not for me and I, Alroy, the long posterity of sacred kings, and with a soul that pants for empire, I stand here extending my vain arm for my lost sceptre, a most dishonoured slave! And do I still exist? Exist! ay, merrily. Hark! Festivity holds her fair revel in these light-hearted walls. We are gay to-day; and yet ere yon proud sun, whose mighty course was stayed before our swords, that now he even does not deign to shine upon: ere yon proud sun shall, like a hero from a glorious field, enter the bright pavilion of his rest; there shall a deed be done.

"My fathers, my heroic fathers, if this feeble arm cannot redeem thy heritage, if the foul boar must still wallow in thy sweet vineyard, Israel, at least, I'll not disgrace you. No! let me perish. The house of David is no more: no more our sacred seed shall lurk and linger, like a blighted thing in this degenerate earth. If we cannot flourish, why then we'll die!"

"O! say not so, my brother!"

A voice broke on the air, so soft, so sweet, so wildly musical—it sounded like a holy bell upon a summer day, a holy bell that calls to prayer, and stills each fierce emotion.

And softly kneeling at his side behold a female form! Her face is hid, her lips are pressed against the hand she gently steals. And now she raises up her head, and waits with tender patience for a glance from one who seldom smiles.

"O! say not so, my brother!"

He turns, he gazes on a face beauteous as a starry night—a starry night in those fair climes where not a cloud is marked in heaven, where all below on earth's so sweet, and all above in air so still, that every passion melts away, and life seems but a fragrant dream.

I, too, have wandered in those lands, and roamed

'mid Jordan's vocal bowers. Ah! could the nightingale that sang to Syria's rose now sing to me, I'd give the fame of coming years to listen to that lay!

He turns, he gazes, and he bends; his heart is full, his voice is low.

"Ah, Miriam! thou queller of dark spirits! is it thou? Why art thou here?"

"Why am I here? Are you not here? and need I urge a stronger plea? O! brother dear, I pray you come, and mingle in our festival! Our walls are hung with flowers you love;* I culled them by the fountain's side; the holy lamps are trimmed and set, and you must raise their earliest flame. Without the gate my maidens wait to offer you a robe of state. Then, brother dear, I pray you come and mingle in our festival."

"Why should we feast?"

"Ah! is it not in thy dear name these lamps are lit—these garlands hung? To-day to us a prince is given, to-day—"

"A prince without a kingdom."

"But not without that which makes kingdoms precious, and which full many a royal heart has sighed for—willing subjects, David."

"Slaves, Miriam, fellow-slaves."

"What we are, my brother, our God has willed; and let us bow and tremble."

"I will not, I cannot tremble."

"Hush, David, hush! It was this haughty spirit that called the vengeance of the Lord upon us."

"It was this haughty spirit that conquered Canaan."

"O! my brother, my dear, dear brother! they told me the dark spirit had fallen on thee, and I came, and hoped thy Miriam might have charmed it. What we have been, Alroy, is a bright dream; and what we may be, at least as bright a hope; and for what we are, thou art my brother. In thy love I find present felicity, and value more thy chance embraces and thy scanty smiles, than all the vanished splendour of our race, our gorgeous gardens, and our glittering halls."

"Who waits without there?"

"Caleb."

"Caleb?"

"My lord."

"Go tell my uncle I presently will join the banquet. Leave me a moment, dearest. I'll soon be with thee. Nay, dry these tears, my life, or let me stop them with a soft kiss."

"O! Alroy, they are not tears of sorrow!"

"God be with thee, angel! fare thee well, though but for a moment. Thou art the charm and consolation of my life. Farewell, farewell."

"I do observe the influence of women very potent over me. 'Tis not of such stuff that they make heroes. I know not love, save that pure affection that does subsist between me and this girl—an orphan and my sister. We are so alike, that when, last Passover, in mimicry, she twined my turban round her graceful head, our uncle called her David."

"The daughters of my tribe, they please me not, though they are passing fair. Were our sons as brave as they are beautiful, we still might dance on Sion. Yet have I often thought that I could pillow this moody brow upon some snowy bosom that were my own, and dwell in the wilderness, far from the sight and ken of man, and all the care, and toil, and wretchedness, that groan, and sweat, and sigh about me, I might haply lose this deep sensation of o'erwhelming wo, that broods upon my being. No matter—life is but a dream and mine must be a dull one."

II.

WITHOUT the gates of Hamadan, a very short distance from the city, was an enclosed piece of elevated ground, in the centre of which rose an ancient sepulchre, the traditionary tomb of Esther and Mordecai.* This solemn and solitary spot was an accustomed haunt of Alroy; and thither escaping from the banquet, about an hour before sunset, he this day repaired.

As he unlocked the massy gate of the burial-place, he heard behind him the trampling of a horse; and before he had again secured the entrance, some one shouted to him.

He looked up, and recognised the youthful and voluptuous Alschiroch, the governor of the city, and brother of the sultan of the Seljuks. He was attended only by a single running footman, an Arab, a detested favourite, and notorious minister of his pleasures.

"Dog!" exclaimed the irritated Alschiroch, "art thou deaf, or obstinate! or both? Are we to call twice to our slaves? Unlock that gate!"

"Wherefore?" inquired Alroy.

"Wherefore! By the holy prophet, he bandies questions with us. Unlock that gate, or thy head shall answer for it!"

"Who art thou," inquired Alroy, "whose voice is so loud? Art thou some holiday Turk, who hast transgressed the orders of thy prophet, and drunken aught but water? Go to, or I will summon thee before thy cadi;" and so saying, he turned towards the tomb.

"By the eyes of my mother, the dog jeers us. But that we are already late, and this horse is like an untamed tiger, I would impale him on the spot. Speak to the dog, Mustapha! manage him!"

"Worthy Hebrew," said the silky Mustapha, advancing, "apparently you are not aware that this is our lord Alschiroch. His highness would fain walk his horse through the burial-ground of thy excellent people, as he is obliged to repair, on urgent matters, to a holy santon, who sojourns on the other side of the hill, and time presses."

"If this be our lord Alschiroch, thou, doubtless, art his faithful slave Mustapha."

"I am, indeed, his poor slave. What, then, young master?"

"Deem thyself lucky that the gate is closed. It was but yesterday thou didst insult the sister of a

* It is the custom of the Hebrews in many of their festivals, especially in the feast of the tabernacle, to hang the walls of their chambers with garlands of flowers.

* I accompanied the priest through the town over much ruin and rubbish, to an enclosed piece of ground, rather more elevated than any in its immediate vicinity. In the centre was the Jewish tomb, a square building of brick, of a mosque-like form, with a rather elongated dome at the top. The door is in the ancient sepulchral fashion of the country, very small, consisting of a single stone of great thickness, and turning on its own pivots from one side. Its key is always in possession of the eldest of the Jews resident at Hamadan. Within the tomb are two sarcophagi, made of a very dark wood, carved with great intricacy of pattern and richness of twisted ornament, with a line of inscription in Hebrew, &c.—Sir R. K. Porter's Travels in Persia, vol. ii. p. 107.

servant of my house. I would not willingly sully my hands with such miserable blood as thine—but away, wretch, away!"

"Holy prophet! who is this dog?" exclaimed the astonished governor.

"'Tis the young Aloy," whispered Mustapha, who had not at first recognised him, "he they call their prince—a most headstrong youth. My lord, we had better proceed."

"The young Aloy! I mark him. They must have a prince, too! The young Aloy! Well, let us away—and, dog!" shouted Alschiroch, rising in his stirrups and shaking his hand with a threatening air, "dog! remember thy tribute!"

Aloy rushed to the gate, but the massy lock was slow to open; and ere he could succeed, the fiery steed had borne Alschiroch beyond pursuit.

An expression of baffled rage remained for a moment on his countenance; for a moment he remained with his eager eye fixed on the route of his vanished enemy, and then he walked slowly towards the tomb; but his excited temper was now little in unison with the still revelry in which he had repaired to the sepulchre to indulge. He was restless and disquieted, and at length he wandered into the woods which rose on the summit of the burial-place.

He found himself at length upon a brow, crested with young pine trees, in the midst of which rose a mighty cedar. He threw himself underneath its thick and shadowy branches, and looked upon a valley small and green; in the midst of which was a marble fountain, the richly carved cupola,* supported by twisted columns, and banded by a broad inscription in Hebrew characters. The bases of the white pillars were covered with wild flowers, or hidden by beds of variegated gourds. The transparent sunset flung over the whole scene a soft but brilliant light.

The tranquil hour, the beauteous scene, the sweetness and the stillness blending their odour and serenity, the gentle breeze that softly rose, and summoned forth the languid birds, to cool their plumage in the twilight air, and wave their radiant wings in skies as bright—Ah! what stern spirit will not yield to the soft genius of subduing eve?

And Aloy gazed upon the beauteous loneliness of earth, and a tear stole down his haughty cheek.

"'Tis singular! but when I am thus alone at this still hour, I ever fancy I gaze upon the Land of Promise. And often in my dreams, some sunny spot, the bright memorial of a roving hour, will rise upon my sight, and when I wake, I feel as if I had been in Canaan. Why am I not? The caravan that bears my uncle's goods across the desert, would bear me too. But I rest here, my miserable life running to seed in the dull misery of this wretched city, and do nothing. Why! the old captivity was empire to our inglorious bondage. We have no Esther now to share their thrones, no politic Mordecai, no purple-vested Daniel. O Jerusalem, Jerusalem! I do believe one sight of thee would nerve me to the sticking point. And yet to

* The vast magnificence and elaborate fancy of the tombs and fountains is a remarkable feature of oriental architecture. The eastern nations devote to these structures the richest and the most durable materials. While the palaces of Asiatic monarchs are in general built only of wood, painted in fresco, the rarest marbles are dedicated to the sepulchre and the spring, which are often richly gilt, and adorned even with precious stones.

gaze upon thy fallen state—my uncle tells me that of the temple not a stone remains. 'Tis horrible. Is there no hope?"

"The bricks are fallen, but we will rebuild with marble; the sycamores are cut down, but we will replace them with cedars."

"The chorus of our maidens, as they pay their evening visit to the fountain's side.* The burden is prophetic.

"Hark again! How beautifully, upon the soft and flowing air, their sweet and mingled voices blend and float!"

"Yet again I will build thee, and thou shalt be built, O Virgin of Israel! Yet again shalt thou deck thyself with thy tabrets, and go forth in the dance of those that make merry. Yet again shalt thou plant vineyards on the mountains of Samaria."

"See! their white forms break through the sparkling foliage of the sunny shrubs as they descend, with measured step, that mild acclivity. A fair society in bright procession: each one clothed in solemn drapery, veiling her shadowy face with modest hand, and bearing on her graceful head a graceful vase. Their leader is my sister.

"And now they reach the fountain side, and dip their vases in the water, pure and beauteous as themselves. Some repose beneath the marble pillars; some, seated mid the flowers, gather sweets, and twine them into garlands; and that wild girl, now that the order's broke, touches with light fingers her moist vase, and showers startling drops of glittering light on her serener sisters. Hark! again they sing?"

"O vine of Sibmah! upon thy summer fruits, and upon thy vintage, a spoiler hath fallen!"

A scream, a shriek, a long wild shriek, confusion, flight, despair! Behold! from out the woods a turbaned man rushes, and seizes the leader of the chorus. Her companions fly on all sides, Miriam alone is left in the arms of Alschiroch.

The water column wildly raising, from the breast of summer ocean, in some warm tropic clime, when the sudden clouds too well discover, the holiday of heaven is over, and the shrieking sea-birds tell a time of fierce commotion, the column rising from the sea, it was not as wild as he—the young Aloy.

Pallid and mad, he swiftly upsprang, and he tore up a tree by its lusty roots, and down the declivity dashing with rapid leaps, panting and wild, he struck the ravisher on the temple with the mighty pine. Alschiroch fell lifeless on the sod, and Miriam fainting into her brother's arms.

And there he stood, fixed and immovable, gazing upon his sister's deathly face, and himself exhausted by passion and his exploit, supporting her cherished but senseless body.

One of the fugitive maidens appeared reconnoitring in the distance. When she observed her

* It is still the custom for the women in the east to repair at sunset in company to the fountain for their supply of water. In Egypt you may observe at twilight the women descending the banks of the Nile in procession from every town and village. Their graceful drapery, their long veils, not concealing their flashing eyes, and the classical forms of their vases, render this a most picturesque and agreeable spectacle.

mistress in the arms of one of her own people, her courage revived, and desirous of rallying her scattered companions, she raised her voice and sang:

"Haste, daughters of Jerusalem, O! haste, for the Lord has avenged us, and the spoiler is spoiled."

And soon the verse was responded to from various quarters of the woods, and soon the virgins re-assembled, singing,

*"We come, O daughter of Jerusalem!
we come; for the Lord has avenged us, and the spoiler is spoiled."*

They gathered round their mistress, and one loosened her veil, and another brought water from the fountain, and sprinkled her reviving countenance. And Miriam opened her eyes and said, "My brother!" And he answered, "I am—here." And she replied, in a low voice, "Fly, David, fly, for the man you have stricken is a prince among the people."

"He will be merciful, my sister; and, doubtless, since he first erred, by this time he has forgotten my offence."

"Justice and mercy; O, my brother, what can these foul tyrants know of either! Already he has perhaps doomed you to some refined and procrustinated torture, already—Ah! what unutterable wo is mine—fly, my brother, fly!"

"Fly, fly, fly!"

"There is no fear, my Miriam; would all his accursed race could trouble us as little as their sometime ruler. See, he sleeps soundly. But his carcass shall not defile our fresh fountain, and our fragrant flowers. I'll stow it in the woods, and stroll here at night to listen to the jackals at their banquet."

"You speak wildly, David. What! No! It is impossible! He is not dead! You have not slain him! He sleeps—he is afraid. He mimics death that we may leave his side and he may rise again in safety. Girls, look to him. David, you do not answer. Brother, dear, dear brother; surely he has swooned. I thought he had fled. Bear water, maidens, to that terrible man. I dare not look upon him."

"Away! I'll look upon him, and I'll triumph. Dead! Alschiroch dead! Why! but a moment since, this clotted carcass was a prince, my tyrant. So we can rid ourselves of them, eh? If the prince fall, why not the people? Dead, absolutely dead, and I his slayer. Hah! at length I am a man. This, this indeed is life. Let me live slaying!"

"Wo! wo! our house is fallen! The wildness of his gestures frightens me. David, David, I pray thee cease. He hears me not, my voice, perchance, is thin. I'm very faint. Maidens, kneel to your prince, and soothe the madness of his passion."

*"Sweet is the voice of a sister in the season of sorrow, and wise is the counsel
of those who love us."*

"Why, this is my Goliath! a pebble or a stick, it is the same. The Lord of Hosts is for us. Rightly am I called David."

"Deliver us from our enemies, O Lord! from those who rise up against us, and those who lie in wait for us."

"Were but this blow multiplied, were but the servants of my uncle's house to do the same, why, we should see again the days of Elah! The Philistine, the foul, lascivious, damnable Philistine; and he must touch my sister. O that all his tribe were here, all, all! I'd tie such firebrands to their foxes' tails, the blaze should light to freedom!"

While he spoke, a maiden, who had not rejoined the company, came running towards them very swiftly with an agitated countenance.

"Fly, fly," she exclaimed; "they come, they come."

Miriam was reclining in an attendant's arms, feeble and faint, but the moment her quick ear caught these words, she sprang up, and seized her brother's arm.

"Alroy! David, David, brother, brother, sweet brother. I beseech thee, listen—I am thy sister, thy Miriam, thy fond, beloved Miriam;—they come, they come, the hard-hearted, wicked men, they come, they come, to kill, perhaps to torture thee, my tender brother. Rouse thyself, David, rouse thyself from this wild, fierce dream: save thyself—fly."

"Ah! is it thou, Miriam? Be easy, love, thou seest he sleepeth soundly. I will collect my senses. I was dreaming of noble purposes and mighty hopes. 'Tis over now. I am myself again. What wouldst thou, my sweet treasure?"

"They come, the fierce retainers of this fallen man: they come to seize thee. Fly, David."

"And leave thee?"

"I and my maidens, we have yet time to escape by the private way we entered our uncle's garden. When in his house we are for a moment safe—as safe as our poor race can ever be. Bostenay is so rich, so wise, so prudent, so learned in man's ways, and knows so well the character and spirit of these men, all will go right: I fear nothing, nothing, nothing. But thou, if thou art here, or to be found, thy blood alone will satiate them. If they be persuaded that thou hast escaped, as I yet pray thou mayest, their late master here, whom they could scarcely love, why—give me thy arm an instant, sweet Beruna, I am rather faint. So, that's well. I was saying, if well bribed, and they may have all my jewels, why, very soon, he will be as little in their memories, as he is now in life. I can scarcely speak—I feel my words wander, or seem to wander; I could swoon, but will not—nay! do not fear, my love, I will reach home. These maidens are my charge. 'Tis in these crises we should show the worth of royal blood. I'll see them safe—or die with them."

"O! my sister, methinks I never knew I was a brother until this hour. My precious Miriam, what is life? what is revenge, or even fame and freedom, without thee? I'll stay."

*"Sweet is the voice of a sister in the season of sorrow, and wise is the counsel
of those who love us."*

"Fly, David, fly."

"Fly whither, and how?"

The neigh of the horse sounded from the thicket.

"Ah! they come, they come!" exclaimed the distracted Miriam.

"All this has come upon us, O Lord, yet have we not forgotten thee, neither have we dealt falsely in thy covenant."

"Hark! again it neighs! It is a horse that calleth to its rider. I see it, I see it. Courage, Miriam! it is no enemy, but a very present friend in time of trouble. It is Alschiroch's coursier. He passed me on it by the tomb ere sunset. I marked it well—a very princely steed."

"Behold, behold, a ram is caught in the thicket by his horns."

"Our God hath not forgotten us! Quick, maidens, bring forth the goodly steed. What! do you tremble! I'll be his groom!"

"Nay! Miriam, beware, beware. It is an untamed beast, wild as the whirlwind. Let me deal with him."

He ran after her, kissed her as he passed, dashed into the thicket, and brought forth the horse.

Short time I ween that stately steed had parted from his desert home; his haughty crest, his eye of fire, the glory of his snorting nostril, betokened well his conscious pride and pure nobility of race. His colour was like the sable night shining with a thousand stars, and he pawed the ground with his delicate hoof, like an eagle flapping its wing.

Alroy vaulted on his back, and reined him with a master's hand.

"Hah!" he exclaimed, "I feel more like a hero than a fugitive. Farewell, my sister; farewell, ye gentle maidens; fare ye well, and cherish my precious Miriam. One kiss, sweet sister," and he bent down and whispered, "Tell the good Bostenay not to spare his gold, love, for I have a deep persuasion, that ere a year shall roll its heavy course, I shall return, and make our masters here pay for this hurried ride and bitter parting. Now for the desert!"

PART II.

I.

SPEED, fleetly speed, thou courser bold, and track the desert's trackless way. Beneath thee is the boundless earth, above thee is the boundless heaven, an iron soil and brazen sky. Speed, swiftly speed, thou courser bold, and track the desert's trackless way!

Ah! dost thou deem these salty plains* lead to thy Yemen's happy groves, and dost thou scent, on the hot breeze, the spicy breath of Araby? A sweet delusion, noble steed, for this briny wilderness leads not to the happy groves of Yemen, and the breath thou scentest on the coming breeze is not the spicy breath of Araby.

The day has died, the stars have risen, with all the splendour of a desert sky, and now the night descending brings solace on her dewy wings, to the fainting form and pallid cheek of the youthful Hebrew prince.

Still the courser onward rushes, still his mighty heart supports him. Season and space, the glowing soil, the burning ray, yield to the tempest of his frame; the thunder of his nerves and lightning of his veins.

Food or water they have none. No genial fount, no grateful tree, rise with their pleasant company. Never a beast or a bird is there, in that hoary desert bare. Nothing breaks the almighty stillness. Even the jackal's felon cry, might seem a soothing melody. A gray wild rat, with snowy whiskers, out of a withered bramble stealing with a youthful snake in its ivory teeth, in the moonlight grins with glee. This is their sole society.

Morn comes, the fresh and fragrant morn, for

* I describe the salty deserts of Persia, a locality which my tale required; but I have ventured to introduce here, and in the subsequent pages, the principal characteristics of the Great Arabian Deserts—the mirage, the simoom, the gazelle, the oasis, which even the guilty sigh. Morn comes, and all is visible. And light falls like a signet on the earth, and its face is turned like wax with a seal. Before them, and also on their right, was the sandy desert; but in the night they had approached much nearer to the mountainous chain, which bounded the desert on the left, and whither Alroy had at first guided the steed.

The mountains were a chain of the mighty Elburz; and as the sun rose from behind a lofty peak, the horse suddenly stopped, and neighed as if asking for water. But Alroy, himself exhausted, could only soothe him with caresses. And the horse, full of courage, understood his master, and neighed again more cheerfully.

For an hour or two the prince and his faithful companion proceeded slowly, but as the day grew on, the heat became so oppressive, and the desire to drink so overwhelming, that Alroy again urged on the steed toward the mountains, where he knew that he should find a well. The courser dashed willingly forward, and seemed to share his master's desire to quit the arid and exhausting wilderness.

More than once the unhappy fugitive debated whether he should not allow himself to drop from his seat and die; no torture that awaited him at Hamadan, that did not seem preferable to the prolonged and inexpressible anguish that he now endured. As he rushed along, leaning on his bearer's neck, he perceived a patch of the desert that seemed of a darker colour than the surrounding sand. Here, he believed, might perhaps be found water. He tried to check the steed, but with difficulty he succeeded, and with still greater difficulty dismounted. He knelt down and feebly raked up the sand with his hands. It was very moist. He nearly fainted over his fruitless labour. At length, when he had dug about a foot deep, there bubbled up some water. He dashed in his hand, but it was salt as the ocean. When the horse saw the water his ears rose, but when he smelt it, he turned away his head and neighed most piteously.

"Alas, poor beast!" exclaimed Alroy, "I am the occasion of thy sufferings, who would be a kind master to thee, if the world would let me. O that we were once more by my own fair fountain! The thought is madness. And Miriam too! I fear I am sadly tender-hearted." He leaned against his horse's back with a feeling of utter exhaustion, and burst into hysteric sobs.

And the steed softly moaned, and turned its head, and gently rubbed its face against his arm, as if to solace him in his suffering. And strange, but Alroy was relieved by having given way to his emotion, and charmed with the fondness of the faithful horse, he leaned down and took water, and threw it over his feet to cool them, and wiped the foam from his face, and washed it, and the horse again neighed.

And now Alroy tried to remount, but his strength failed him, and the horse immediately knelt down and received him. And the moment that the prince was in his seat, the horse rose and again proceeded at a rapid pace in the old direction. Towards sunset they were within a few miles of the broken and rocky ground into which the mountains descended; and afar off Alroy recognised the cupola of the long expected well. With reanimated courage and rallied energies, he patted his courser's neck, and pointed in the direction of the cupola, and the horse pricked up its ears, and increased its pace.

Just as the sun set, they reached the well. Alroy jumped off the horse, and would have led it to the fountain, but the animal would not advance. It stood dreadfully shivering with a glassy eye, and then it bowed its head, and with a groan fell down and died.

II.

NIGHT brings rest; night brings solace; rest to the weary; solace to the sad. And to the desperate night brings despair.

The moon has sunk to early rest; but a thousand stars are in the sky. The mighty mountains rise severe in the clear and silent air. In the forest all is still. The tried wind no longer moans, but has lightly dropped on its leafy couch, and sleeps like man. Silent all but the fountain's drip. And by the fountain's side a youth is lying.

Suddenly a creature steals through the black and broken rocks. Ha, ha! the jackal smells from afar the rich corruption of the courser's clay. Suddenly and silently it steals, and stops and smells. Brave banqueting I ween to-night for all that goodly company. Jackal, and fox, and martin-cat, haste ye now ere morning's break shall call the vulture to his feast, and rob you of your prey.

The jackal lapped the courser's blood, and moaned with exquisite delight. And in a moment a faint bark was heard in the distance. And the jackal peeled the flesh from one of the ribs, and again burst into a shriek of mournful ecstasy.

Hark, their quick tramp! First six, and then three galloping with ungodly glee. And a martencat came rushing down from the woods; but the jackals, fierce in their numbers, drove her away, and there she stood without the circle, panting, beautiful and baffled with her white teeth and glossy skin, and sparkling eyes of rabid rage.*

Suddenly, as one of the half-gorged jackals retired from the main corpse, dragging along a stray member by some still palpitating nerves, the martencat made a spring at her enemy, carried off his prey, and rushed into the woods.

Her wild scream of triumph woke a lion from his lair. His mighty form, black as ebony, moved on a distant eminence, his tail flowed like a serpent. He roared, and the jackals trembled, and immediately ceased from their banquet, turned their heads in the direction of their sovereign's voice. He advanced; he stalked towards them. They retired; he bent his head, examined the carcass with condescending curiosity, and instantly quitted it with royal disdain. The jackals again collected around their garbage. The lion advanced to the fountain to drink. He beheld a man. His mane rose, his tail was wildly agitated, he bent over the sleeping prince, he uttered an awful roar, which woke Alroy.

* At night-fall, especially in Asia Minor, the lonely horse-man will often meet the jackals, at their evening prowl. Their moaning is often heard during the night. I remember, when boating off Troy, the most terrible and singular screams were heard at intervals throughout the night, from a forest on the opposite shore, which a Greek sailor assured me proceeded from a martencat, which had probably found the carcass of some horse.

III.

HE awoke; his gaze met the flaming eyes of the enormous beast fixed upon him with a blended feeling of desire and surprise. He awoke, and from a swoon; but the dreamless trance had refreshed the exhausted energies of the desolate wanderer; in an instant he collected his senses, remembered all that had passed, and comprehended his present situation. He returned the lion a glance as imperious, and fierce, and scrutinizing as his own. For a moment their flashing orbs vied in regal rivalry; but at length the spirit of the mere animal yielded to the genius of the man. The lion cowed, slunk away, stalked with haughty timidity through the rocks, and then sprang into the forest.

IV.

MORN breaks; a joyful light is shed over the blue and starry sky. Pleasant to feel is the breath of dawn. Night brings repose, but day brings joy.

The carol of a lonely bird singing in the wilderness! A lonely bird that sings with glee! Sunny and sweet, and light and clear, its airy notes float through the sky, and thrill with innocent revelry.

The lonely youth on the lonely bird upgazes from the fountain side. High in the air it proudly floats, balancing its crimson wings, and its snowy tail, long, delicate and thin, shines like a sparkling meteor in the sun.

The carol of a lonely bird singing in the wilderness! Suddenly it downward dashes, and thrice with circling grace it flies around the head of the Hebrew prince. Then by his side it gently drops a bunch of fresh and fragrant dates.

'Tis gone, 'tis gone! that cheerful stranger, gone to the palmy land it loves; gone like a bright and pleasant dream. A moment since and it was there, glancing in the sunny air, and now the sky is without a guest. Alas, alas! no more is heard, the carol of that lonely bird singing in the wilderness.

V.

"As thou didst feed Elisha, so also hast thou fed me, God of my fathers!" And Alroy arose, and he took his turban and unfolded it, and knelt and prayed. And then he ate of the dates, and drank of the fountain, and full of confidence in the God of Israel, the descendant of David pursued his flight.

He now commenced the ascent of the mountainous chain, a wearisome and painful toil. Two hours past noon he reached the summit of the first ridge, and looked over a wild and chaotic waste full of precipices and ravines, and dark unfathomable gorges. The surrounding hills were ploughed in all directions by the courses of dried-up cataracts, and here and there a few savage goats browsed on an occasional patch of lean and sour pasture. This waste extended for many miles; the distance formed by a more elevated range of mountains, and beyond these, high in the blue sky, rose the loftiest peaks of Elburz,* shining with sharp glaciers of eternal snow.

* Elburz or Elborus, the highest range of the Caucasus was apparent that Aloy was no stranger in the scene of his flight. He had never hesitated as to his course, and now, after having rested for a short time on the summit, he descended towards the left by a natural but intricate path, until his progress was arrested by a black ravine. Scarcely half a dozen yards divided him from the opposite precipice by which it was formed, but the gulf beneath—no one could shoot a glance at its invisible termination without drawing back with a cold shudder.

The prince knelt down and examined the surrounding ground with great care. At length he raised a small square stone which covered a metallic plate, and taking from his vest a cornelian talisman covered with strange characters,* he knocked thrice upon the plate with the signet. A low solemn murmur sounded around. Presently the plate flew off, and Aloy pulled forth several yards of an iron chain, which he threw over to the opposite precipice. The chain fastened without difficulty to the rock, and was evidently constrained by some magnetic influence. The prince, seizing the chain with both his hands, now swung across the ravine. As he landed, the chain parted from the rock, swiftly disappeared down the opposite aperture, and its covering closed with the same low, solemn murmur as before.

VI.

ALOY proceeded for about a hundred paces through a natural cloister of basalt until he arrived at a large uncovered court of the same formation, which a stranger might easily have been excused for believing to have been formed and smoothed by art. In its centre bubbled up a perpetual spring icy cold; the stream had worn a channel through the pavement, and might be traced for some time wandering among the rocks, until it at length leaped from a precipice, into a gorge below, in a gauzy shower of variegated spray. Crossing the court, Aloy now entered a vast cavern.

The cavern was nearly circular in form, lighted from a large aperture in the top. Yet a burning lamp in a distant and murky corner indicated that its inhabitant did not trust merely to this natural source of the great blessing of existence. In the centre of the cave was a circular and brazen table, sculptured with strange characters and mysterious figures: near it was a couch on which ~~ke~~ several volumes,† Suspended from the walls were a shield, some bows and arrows, and other arms.

As the prince of the captivity knelt down and kissed the vacant couch, a figure advanced from the extremity of the cavern into the light. He was a man of middle age, considerably above the common height, with a remarkably athletic frame, and a strongly marked, but majestic countenance. His black beard descended to his waist, over a dark red robe, encircled by a black girdle embroidered with yellow characters, like those sculptured on the brazen table. Black also was his turban, and black his large and luminous eyes.

The stranger advanced so softly, that Aloy did not perceive him until the prince again rose up.

"Jabaster!" exclaimed the prince.

"Sacred seed of David," answered the cabalist,* "thou art expected. I read of thee in the stars last night. They spoke of trouble."

"Trouble or triumph, time must prove which it is, great master. At present I am a fugitive and exhausted. The bloodhounds track me, but methinks I have baffled them now. I have slain an Ishmaelite."

PART III.

I.

It was midnight. Aloy slept upon the couch: his sleep was troubled. Jabaster stood by his side motionless, and gazing intently upon his slumbering guest.

"The only hope of Israel," murmured the cabalist, "my pupil and my prince! I have long perceived in his young mind the seed of mighty deeds, and o'er his future life have often mused with a prophetic hope. The blood of David, the sacred offspring of a solemn race. There is a magic in his flowing veins my science cannot reach.

"When in my youth I raised our standard by my native Tigris, and called our nation to restore their ark, why, we were numerous, wealthy, potent; we were a people then, and they flocked to it boldly. Did we lack counsel? Did we need a leader? Who can aver Jabaster's brain or arm was ever wanting? And yet the dream dissolved, the glorious vision. O! when I struck down Marvan, and the caliph's camp flung its blazing shadow o'er the bloody river—ah! then indeed I lived. Twenty years of vigil may gain a pardon that I then forgot we lacked the chief ingredient in the spell,—the blood that sleeps beside me.

"I recall the glorious rapture of that sacred strife amid the rocks of Caucasus. A fugitive, a proscribed and outlawed wretch, whose life is common sport, and whom the vilest hind may slay without a bidding. I who would have been Messiah!

* Talismans have not in any degree lost their influence in the East. Most that I have seen have been cut upon cornelian. A very precious one of this nature, obtained at great cost and peril, of the most celebrated sorcerer in Cairo, lies at this moment by my side. It secures to its possessor a constancy of good fortune. Unfortunately its present holder is the exception that proves the rule.

† A cabalistic table, perhaps a zodiac. The books were doubtless Sepher Happehiah, the Book of Wonders; Sepher Haaknech, the Book of the Pen; and Sepher Habbahir, the Book of Light. This last unfolds the most sublime mysteries.

* "Simcon ben Jochai, who flourished in the second century, and was a disciple of Akibha, is called by the Jews, the prince of the cabalists. After the suppression of the sedition, in which his master had been so unsuccessful, he concealed himself in a cave, where, according to the Jewish historians, he received revelations, which he afterwards delivered to his disciples, and which they carefully preserved in the book called Sohar. His master Akibha, who lived soon after the destruction of Jerusalem, was the author of the famous book Jezirah, quoted by the Jews as of divine authority. When Akibha was far advanced in life appeared the famous imposter Barchochebas, who, under the character of the Messiah, promised to deliver his countrymen from the power of the emperor Adrian. Akibha espoused his cause, and afforded him the protection and support of his name, and an army of two hundred thousand men repaired to his standard. The Romans at first slighted the insurrection; but when they found the insurgents spread slaughter and rapine wherever they came, they sent out a military force against them. At first, the issue of the contest was doubtful. The Messiah himself was not taken until the end of four years."—Enfield; Philosophy of the Jews, vol. ii.

"Two methods of instruction were in use among the Jews, the one public, or exoteric; the other secret, or esoteric.

"Burn thy books, Jabaster; break thy brazen tables; forget thy lofty science, cabalist, and read the stars no longer.* But last night I stood upon the gulf which girds my dwelling: in one hand, I held my sacred talisman, that bears the name ineffable; in the other the mystic record of our holy race. I remember that I had evoked spirits, that I had communed with the great departed, and that the glowing heavens were with me a natural language. I recalled, as consolation to my gloomy soul, that never had my science e'er been exercised but for a sacred or a noble purpose. And I remembered Israel, my brave, my chosen, and my antique race,—slaves, wretched slaves. I was strongly tempted to fling me down this perilous abyss, and end my learning and my life together.

"But as I gazed upon the star of David, a sudden halo rose around its rays, and ever and anon a meteor shot from out the silver veil. I read that there was trouble in the holy seed; and now comes this boy, who has done a deed which—"

"The ark, the ark! I gaze upon the ark!"

"The slumberer speaks; the words of sleep are sacred."

"Salvation only from the house of David."

The exoteric doctrine was that which was openly taught the people from the law of Moses, and the traditions of the fathers. The esoteric was that which treated of the mysteries of the divine nature, and other sublime subjects, and was known by the name of the Cabala. The latter was after the manner of the Pythagorean and Egyptian mysteries, taught only to certain persons, who were bound, under the most solemn anathema, not to divulge it. Concerning the miraculous origin and preservation of the Cabala, the Jews relate many marvellous tales. They derive these mysteries from Adam; and assert, that while the first man was in paradise, the angel Rasiel brought him a book from heaven, which contained the doctrines of heavenly wisdom, and that when Adam received this book, angels came down to him to learn its contents; but that he refused to admit them to the knowledge of sacred things entrusted to him alone; that after the fall, this book was taken back into heaven; that after many prayers and tears God restored it to Adam, from whom it passed to Seth. In the degenerate age before the flood, this book was lost, and the mysteries it contained almost forgotten; but they were restored by special revelation to Abraham, who committed them to writing in the book Jezirah.—Vid. Enfield, vol. ii. p. 219.

"The Hebrew word Cabala," says Dom Calmet, "signifies tradition, and the rabbins, who are named Cabalists, apply themselves principally to the combination of certain words, numbers, and letters, by means of which they boasted they could reveal the future, and penetrate the sense of the most difficult passages of Scripture. This science does not appear to have any fixed principles, but depends upon certain ancient traditions, whence its name Cabala. The cabalists have a great number of names which they style sacred, by means of which they raise spirits, and affect to obtain supernatural intelligence."—See Calmet, art. Cabala.

"We spoke before," says Lightfoot, "of the commonness of magic among them, one singular means whereby they kept their own in delusion, and whereby they affronted ours. The general expectation of the nation of Messiah's coming when he did, had this double and contrary effect, that it forwarded those that belonged to God to believe and receive the gospel; and those that did not, it gave encouragement to some to take upon them they were Christ, or some great prophet, and to others it gave some persuasion to be deluded by them. These deceivers dealt most of them with magic, and that cheat ended not when Jerusalem ended, though one would have thought that had been a fair term of not further expecting Messias; but since the people were willing to be deceived by such expectation, there rose up deluders still that were willing to deceive them."—Lightfoot, vol. ii. p. 37.

For many curious details of the cabalistical magic, Vid. Basnage, vol. v. p. 384, &c.

* "The modern Jews," says Basnage, "have a great idea of the influence of the stars." Vol. iv. p. 454. But astrology was most prevalent among the Babylonian rabbins, of whom Jabaster was one. Living in the ancient land of the Chaldeans, these sacred sages imbibed a taste for the mystic lore of their predecessors. The stars moved and formed letters and lines, when consulted by any of the high initiated of the cabalists. This they styled the celestial alphabet.

"A mighty truth; my life too well has proved it. He is more calm. It is the holy hour. I'll steal into the court, and gaze upon the star that sways the fortunes of his royal house."

II.

THE moonbeam fell upon the fountain; the pavement of the court was a flood of light; the rocks rose dark around. Jabaster, seated by the spring, and holding his talisman in his left hand, shaded his sight with the other, as he gazed upon the luminous heavens.

A shriek, his name was called. Alroy, wild and panting, rushed into the court, with extended arms. The cabalist started up, seized him, and held him in his careful grasp, foaming and in convulsions.

"Jabaster, Jabaster!"

"I am here, my child."

"The Lord hath spoken."

"The Lord is our refuge. Calm thyself, son of David, and tell me all."

"I have been sleeping, master; is it not so?"

"Even so, my child. Exhausted by his flight and the exciting narrative of his exploit, my prince laid down upon the couch and slumbered; but I fear that slumber was not repose."

"Repose and I have naught in common now. Farewell forever to that fatal word. I am the Lord's anointed."

"Drink of the fountain, David: it will restore thee."

"Restore the covenant, restore the ark, restore the holy city."

"The spirit of the Lord hath fallen upon him. Son of David, I adjure thee to tell me all that hath passed, I am a Levite; in my hand I hold the name ineffable."

"Take thy trumpet, then, summon the people, bid them swiftly raise again our temple. 'The bricks have fallen, but we will rebuild with marble.' Didst hear that chorus, sir?"

"Unto thy chosen ear alone it sounded."

"Nay, nay, it was not here. And yet Miriam, Miriam, my sister, my sweet sister, how thou wouldst weep, to know that which has happened, tears, tears of joy, girl! Where am I! This is not our fountain. Yet thou didst say, 'The fountain.' Think me not wild. I know thee, I know all. Thou art Jabaster; I am Alroy. But thou didst say, 'The fountain,' and it distracted me, and called back my memory to—"

"God of Israel, lo, I kneel before thee! Here, in the solitude of wildest nature, my only witness here this holy man, I kneel and vow. Lord! I will do thy bidding. I am young, I am very young, O God, and weak; but thou, Lord, art all-powerful. What God is like to thee! Doubt not my courage, Lord, and fill me with thy spirit; but remember, remember her, O Lord, remember Miriam. It is the only worldly thought I have, and it is pure."

"Still of his sister—calm thyself, my son."

"Holy master, thou dost remember when I was thy pupil in this cavern. Thou hast not forgotten those days of tranquil study, those sweet, long wandering nights of sacred science! I was dutiful, and hung upon each accent of thy lore with the devotion that must spring from love."

"I cannot weep, Alroy; but were it in my power, I would yield a tear of homage to the memory of those days."

"How calmly have we sat on some high brow, and gazed upon the stars."

"'Tis very true, sweet child."

"And if thou e'er didst chide me, 'twas half in jest, and only for my silence."

"What would he now infer? No matter, he grows calmer. How solemn is his visage in the moonlight! And yet not Solomon, upon his youthful throne, could look more beautiful."

"I never told thee an untruth, Jabaster."

"My life upon thy faith."

"Fear not the pledge and so believe me—on the mountain brow, watching the stary heavens with thyself, I was not calmer than I feel, sir, now."

"I do believe thee."

"Then, Jabaster, believe as fully I am the Lord's anointed."

"Tell me all, my child."

"Know, then, that sleeping on the couch within, my sleep was troubled. Many dreams I had indefinite and broken. I recall none of their images, except I feel a dim sensation 'twas my lot to live in brighter days than now rise on our race. Suddenly I stood upon a mountain tall and gray, and gazed upon the stars. And as I gazed, a trumpet sounded. Its notes thrilled through my soul. Never have I heard a sound so awful. The thunder, when it broke over the cavern here, and shivered the peak, whose ruins lie around us, was but a feeble worldly sound to this almighty music. My cheek grew pale, I panted even for breath. A flaming light spread over the sky, the stars melted away, and I beheld, advancing from the bursting radiancy, the foremost body of a mighty host.

"O! not when Saul led forth our fighting men against the Philistine, not when Joab numbered the warriors of my great ancestors, did human vision gaze upon a scene of so much martial splendour. Chariots and cavalry, and glittering trains of plumed warriors too robust to need a courser's solace; streams of shining spears, and banners like a sunset; reverend priests swinging their perfumed censers, and prophets hymning with their golden harps a most triumphant future.

"'Joy, joy,' they say, 'to Israel, for he cometh; he cometh in his splendour and his might, the great Messiah of our ancient hopes.'

"And, lo! a mighty chariot now appeared, drawn by strange beasts, whose forms were half obscured by the bright flames on which they seemed to float. In that glorious car a warrior stood, proud and immovable, his form, his countenance—hold my hand, Jabaster, while I speak—that chieftain was myself!"

"Proceed, proceed, my son."

"I started in my dream, and I awoke. I found myself upstirring on my couch. The pageantry had vanished. Naught was seen but the bright moonlight and the gloomy cave. And as I sighed to think I e'er had wakened, and mused upon the strangeness of my vision, a small still voice descended from above and called 'Alroy?' I started, but I answered not. Methought it was my fancy. Again my name was called, and now I murmured—'Lord, I am here, what wouldst thou?' Naught responded, and soon great dread came o'er me, and I rushed out and called to thee, my master."

"It was 'the Daughter of the Voice'* that spake. Since the captivity 'tis the only mode by which the saints are summoned. Oft have I heard of it, but never in these sad degenerate days has its soft aspiration fallen upon us. These are strange tunes and tidings. The building of the temple is at hand. Son of David, my heart is full. Let us to prayer!"

III.

DAY dawned upon Jabaster, still musing in solitude among his rocks. Within the cavern Alroy remained in prayer.

Oft and anxiously the cabalist shot a glance at his companion, and then again relapsed into reverie.

"The time is come that I must to this youth reveal the secrets of my early life. Much will he hear of glory, much of shame. Naught must I conceal, and naught gloss over.

"I must tell how in the plains of Tigris I upraised the sacred standard of our chosen race, and called them from their bondage; how, despairing of his recreant fathers, and inspired by human power alone, I vainly claimed the mighty office for his sacred blood alone reserved. God of my fathers, grant that future service, the humble service of a contrite soul, may, in the coming glory that awaits us, atone for past presumption!"

"But for him great trials are impending. Not lightly must that votary be proved, who fain would free a people. The Lord is faithful to his promise, but the Lord will choose his season and his minister. Courage, and faith, and deep humility, and strong endurance, and the watchful soul temptation cannot sully: these are the fruits we lay upon his altar, and meekly watch if some descending flame will vouchsafe to accept and brightly bless them.

"It is written in the dread volume of our mystic lore, that not alone the Saviour shall spring from out our house of princes, but that none shall rise to free us until, alone and unassisted, he have gained the sceptre Solomon antequely wielded within his cedar palaces.

"That sceptre must he gain. This fragile youth, untried and delicate, unknowing in the ways of this strange world, where every step is danger. How much hardship, how much peril, what withering disappointment, what dull care, what long despondency, what never-ending lures, now lie in ambush for this gentle boy! O! my countrymen, is this thy hope? And I, with all my lore, and all my courage, and all my deep intelligence of man; unhappy Israel, why am I not thy prince!"

second temple for their utmost refuge of revelation. For when Urim and Thummim, the oracle, was ceased, and prophecy was decayed and gone, they had, as they say, certain strange and extraordinary voices upon certain extraordinary occasions, which were their warnings and advertisements in some special matters. Infinite instances of this might be adduced, if they might be believed. Now here it may be questioned, why they call it Bath Kol, the daughter of a voice, and not a voice itself? If the strictness of the Hebrew word Bath be to be stood upon, which always it is not, it may be answered, that it is called the Daughter of a Voice in relation to the oracles of Urim and Thummim. For whereas that was a voice given from off the mercy seat, within the veil, and this, upon the decay of that oracle, came as it were in its place, it might not unfully or improperly be called a daughter or successor of that voice."—Lightfoot, vol. i. p. 435, 436.

Consult also the learned doctor, vol. ii. p. 123, 129; "It was used for a testimony from heaven, but was indeed performed by magic art."

* "Both the Talmudic and the later rabbin," says Lightfoot, "make frequent mention of Bath Kol, or Filia Vocis, or an echoing voice which served under the

"I check the blasphemous thought. Did not his great ancestor, as young and as untried, a beardless stripling, but with a pebble, a small smooth stone, level a mailed giant to the ground, and save his people?"

"He is clearly summoned. The Lord is with him. Be he with the Lord, and we shall prosper."

IV.

It was sunset, on the third day after the arrival of Alroy at the cave of the cabalist, that the prince of the captivity commenced his pilgrimage in quest of the sceptre of Solomon.

Silently the pilgrim and his master took their way to the brink of the ravine, and there they stopped to part—perhaps forever.

"It is a bitter moment, Alroy. Human feelings are not for beings like us, yet they will have their way. Remember, remember all. Cherish the talisman as thy life—nay! welcome death with it pressing against thy heart, sooner than breathe without it. Be firm, be pious. Think of thy ancestors, think of thy God."

"Doubt me not, dear master; if I seem not full of that proud spirit, which was perhaps too much my wont, ascribe it not to fear, Jabaster, nor even to the pain of leaving thee, dear friend. But ever since that sweet and solemn voice summoned me so thrillingly,—I know not how it is,—but a change has come over my temper; yet I am firm, O! firmer far than when I struck down the Ishmaelite. Indeed, indeed, fear not for me. The Lord, that knoweth all things, knows full well I am prepared even to the death. Thy prayers, Jabaster, and——"

"Stop, stop. I do remember me. See this ring: 'tis a choice emerald. Thou mayst have wondered I should wear a bauble. Alroy, I had a brother once: still he may live. When we parted, this was the signal of his love: a love, my child, strong, though we greatly differed. Take it. The hour may come that thou mayst need his aid. It will command it. If he live, he prospers. I know his temper well. He was made for what the worldly deem prosperity. God be with thee, sacred boy: the God of our great fathers—the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob."

They embraced.

"We linger," exclaimed the cabalist, "we linger. O! in vain we quell the feelings of our kind. God, God bless and be with thee. Art sure hast all? thy dagger and thy wallet? That staff has seen some service. I cut it on the Jordan. Ah! that I could be thy mate!" "Twould be nothing then. At the worst, to die together. Such a fate seems sweeter now than parting. I'll watch thy star, my child. Thou weepst! And I too. Why! what is this! Am I indeed Jabaster? One more embrace, and so—we'll not say farewell, but only think it."

PART IV.

I.

TRADITION delivered that the sceptre of Solomon could be found only in the unknown sepulchres of the ancient Hebrew monarchs, and that none might dare to touch it but one of their descendants. Armed with the cabalistic talisman, which was to guide him in his awful and difficult researches, Alroy commenced his pilgrimage to the Holy City. At this time, the love of these sacred wanderings was a reigning passion among the Jews, as well as Christians.

The prince of the captivity was to direct his course to the heart of those great deserts which, in his flight to Hamadan, he had only skirted. Following the track of the caravan, he was to make his way to Babylon, or Bagdad. From the capital of the caliphs, his journey to Jerusalem was one comparatively easy; but to reach Bagdad he must encounter hardship and danger, the prospect of which would have divested any one of hope, who did not conceive himself the object of an omnipotent and particular Providence.

Clothed only in a coarse black frock, common among the Kourds, girded round his centre by a cord, which held his dagger, his head shaven, and covered with a large white turban, which screened him from the heat, his feet protected only by slippers, supported by his staff, and bearing on his shoulders a bag of dried meat and parched corn, and a leathern skin of water, behold a youth toiling over the glowing sands of Persia, whose life had hitherto been a long unbroken dream of domestic luxury and innocent indulgence.

He travelled during the warm night, or the early starlit morn. During the day he rested: happy if he could recline by the side of some charitable well, shaded by a palm tree, or frighten a gazelle from its resting-place among the rough bushes of some wild rocks. Were these resources wanting, he threw himself upon the sand, and made an awning with his staff and turban.

Three weeks had elapsed since he quitted the cavern of the cabalist. Hitherto he had met with no human being. The desert became less arid. A scanty vegetation sprang up from a more genial soil, the ground broke into gentle undulations, his senses were invigorated with the odour of wild plants, and his sight refreshed by the glancing form of some wandering bird, a pilgrim like himself, but more at ease.

Soon sprang up a grove of graceful palm trees, with their tall thin stems, and bending feathery crowns, languid and beautiful. Around, the verdant sod gleamed like an emerald: silver streams, flowing from a bubbling parent spring, wound their white forms within the bright green turf. From the grove arose the softening song of doves, and showers of gay and sparkling butterflies, borne on their tinted wings of shifting light, danced without danger in the liquid air. A fair and fresh oasis!

II.

ALROY reposed in this delicious retreat for two days, feeding on the living dates, and drinking of the fresh water. Fain would he have lingered, nor indeed until he rested had he been sufficiently conscious of his previous exertion. But the remembrance of his great mission made him restless, and steeled him to the suffering which yet awaited him.

At the dawn of the second day of his journey from the oasis, he beheld, to his astonishment, faintly but distinctly traced on the far horizon, the walls and turrets of an extensive city.* Animated by this unexpected prospect, he continued his progress for several hours after sunrise. At length, utterly exhausted, he found refuge from the overpowering heat beneath the cupola of the ruined tomb of some Moslem saint. At sunset he continued his journey, and in the morning found himself within a few miles of the city. He halted and watched with anxiety for some evidence of its inhabitants. None was visible. No crowds or cavalcades issued from the gates. Not a single human being, not a solitary camel moved in the vicinity.

The day was too advanced for the pilgrim to proceed, but so great was his anxiety to reach this unknown settlement, and penetrate the mystery of its silence, that ere sunset Alroy entered the gates.

A magnificent city, of an architecture with which he was unacquainted, offered to his entranced vision its gorgeous ruins and deserted splendour; long streets of palaces, with their rich line of lessening pillars here and there broken by some fallen shaft, vast courts surrounded by ornate and solemn temples, and luxurious baths, adorned with rare mosaics, and yet bright with antique gilding: now an arch of triumph still haughty with its broken friezes, now a granite obelisk covered with strange characters, and proudly towering o'er a prostrate companion; sometimes a void and crumbling theatre, sometimes a long and elegant aqueduct, sometimes a porphyry column, once breathing with the heroic statue that now lies shivered at its base—all suffused with the warm twilight of an eastern eve.

He gazed with wonder and admiration upon the strange and fascinating scene. The more he beheld, the more his curiosity was excited. He breathed with difficulty; he advanced with a blended feeling of eagerness and hesitation. Fresh wonders successively unfolded themselves. Each turn developed a new scene of still and solemn splendour. The echo of his step filled him with awe. He looked around him with an amazed air, a fluttering heart, and changing countenance. All was silent: alone the Hebrew prince stood amid the regal creation of the Macedonian captains. Empires and dynasties flourish and pass away, the proud metropolis becomes a solitude, the conquering kingdom even a desert; but Israel still remains, still a descendant of the most ancient kings breathed amid these royal ruins, and still the eternal sun could never rise without gilding the towers of living Jerusalem. A word, a deed, a single day, a single man, and we might be a nation.

A shout; he turns, he is seized; four ferocious Kourdish bandits grapple and bind him.

III.

THE bandits hurried their captive through a street which appeared to have been the principal way of the city. Nearly at its termination they turned by a small Ionian temple, and clambering over some fallen pillars, they entered a quarter of the city of a more ruinous aspect than that which Alroy had hitherto visited. The path was narrow, often obstructed, and around were signs of devastation for which the exterior of the city had not prepared him.

The brilliant but brief twilight of the orient was fast fading away; a sombre purple tint succeeded to the rosy flush, the distant towers rose black, although defined in the clear and shadowy air, and the moon, which, when he first entered, had studded the heavens like a small white cloud, now glittered with deceptive light.

Suddenly before them rose a huge pile. Oval in shape and formed by tiers of arches, it was evidently much dilapidated, and one enormous, irregular, and undulating rent, extending from the top nearly to the foundation, almost separated the side to which Alroy and his companions advanced.

Clambering up the remainder of this massy wall, the robbers and their prisoner descended into an immense amphitheatre, which seemed vaster in the shadowy and streaming moonlight. In it were groups of men, horses, and camels. In the extreme distance, reclining or squatting on mats and carpets, was a large assembly engaged in a rough but merry banquet. A fire blazed at their side, its red and uncertain flame mingling with the white and steady moonbeam, and throwing a flickering light over their ferocious countenances, their glistening armour, ample drapery, and shawled heads.

"A spy," exclaimed the captors, as they dragged Alroy before the leader of the band.

"Hang him, then," said the chieftain, without even looking up.

"This wine, great Scherirah, is excellent, or I am no true Moslem," said a principal robber; "but you are too cruel; I hate this summary punishment. Let us torture him a little, and extract some useful information."

"As you like, Kisloch," said Scherirah; "it may amuse us. Fellow, where do you come from? He cannot answer. Decidedly a spy. Hang him up."

The captors half untied the rope that bound Alroy, that it might serve him for another purpose; when another of the gentle companions of Scherirah interfered.

"Spies always answer, captain. He is more probably a merchant in disguise."

"And carries hidden treasure," added Kisloch; "these rough coats often cover jewels. We had better search him."

"Ay! search him," said Scherirah, with his rough brutal voice; "do what you like, only give me the bottle. This Greek wine is choice booty. Feed the fire, men. Are you asleep? And then Kisloch, who hates cruelty, can roast him, if he likes."

The robbers prepared to strip their captive. "Friends, friends!" exclaimed Alroy, "for there is no reason why you should not be friends, spare me, spare me. I am poor, I am young, I am innocent. I am neither a spy nor a merchant. I have no plots, no wealth. I am a pilgrim."

"A decided spy," exclaimed Scherirah; "they are ever pilgrims."

"He speaks too well to speak truth," exclaimed Kisloch.

"All talkers are liars," exclaimed Scherirah.

"That is why Kisloch is the most eloquent of the band."

"A jest at the banquet may prove a curse in the field," replied Kisloch.

"Pooh!" exclaimed Scherirah. "Fellows, why do you hesitate? Search the prisoner, I say!"

* In Persia, and the countries of the Tigris and Euphrates, the traveller sometimes arrives at deserted cities of great magnificence and antiquity. Such for instance, is the city of Anneh. I suppose Alroy to have entered one of the deserted capitals of the Seleucidæ. They are in general the haunt of bandits.

They advanced, they seized him. In vain he struggled.

"Captain," exclaimed one of the band, "he wears upon his breast a jewel!"

"I told you so," said the third robber.

"Give it me," said Scherirah.

But Alroy, in despair, at the thought of losing the talisman, remembering the injunction of Jabaster, and animated by supernatural courage, burst from his searchers, and seizing a brand from the fire, held them at bay.

"The fellow has spirit," said Scherirah, calmly.

"Tis pity, it will cost him his life."

"Bold man," exclaimed Alroy, "for a moment hear me! I am a pilgrim, poorer than a beggar. The jewel they talk of is a holy emblem, worthless to you, to me invaluable, and to be forfeited only by my life. You may be careless of that. Beware of your own. The first man who advances, dies. I pray you humbly, chieftain, let me go."

"Kill him!" said Scherirah.

"Stab him!" exclaimed Kisloch.

"Give me the jewel," said the third robber.

"God of David be my refuge, then!" exclaimed Alroy.

"He is a Hebrew, he is a Hebrew," exclaimed Scherirah, jumping up. "Spare him! spare him! my mother was a Jewess."

The assailants lowered their arms, and withdrew a few paces. Alroy still remained upon his guard.

"Valiant pilgrim," said Scherirah, advancing, with a softened voice, "are you for the holy city?"

"The city of my fathers."

"A perilous journey. And whence from?"

"Hamadan."

"A dreary way. You need repose. Your name?"

"David."

"David, you are among friends. Rest and repose in safety. You hesitate. Fear not! The memory of my mother is a charm that always changes me." Scherirah unsheathed his dagger, punctured his arm, and, throwing away his weapon, offered the bleeding member to Alroy. The prince of the captivity touched the open vein with his lips.

"My troth is pledged," said the bandit; "I can never betray him in whose veins my own blood is flowing.*" So saying, he led Alroy to his carpet.

IV.

"Eat, David," said Scherirah.

"I will eat bread," answered Alroy.

"What, have you had so much meat lately that you will refuse this delicate gazelle that I have brought down this morning with my own lance? 'Tis food for a caliph."

"I pray you give me bread."

"O! bread if you like. But that a man should prefer bread to meat, and such meat as this, 'tis miraculous."

"A thousand thanks, good Scherirah; but with our people the flesh of the gazelle is forbidden. It is unclean. Its foot is cloven."

"I have heard of these things," replied Scherirah, with a thoughtful air. "My mother was a Jewess, and my father was a Kourid. Whichever be right, I hope to be saved."

"There is but one God, and Mohammed is his prophet!" exclaimed Kisloch; "though I drink wine. Your health, Hebrew."

"I will join you," said the third robber. "My father was a Guebre, and sacrificed his property to his faith; and the consequence is, his son has got neither."

"As for me," said a fourth robber, of very dark complexion and singularly small bright eyes, "I am an Indian, and I believe in the great golden figure with carbuncle eyes, in the temple of Delhi."

"I have no religion," said a tall negro, in a red turban, grinning with his white teeth; "they have none in my country, but if I had heard of your God before, Calidas, I would have believed in him."

"I almost wish I had been a Jew," exclaimed Scherirah, musing. "My mother was a good woman."

"The Jews are very rich," said the third robber.

"When you get to Jerusalem. David, you will see the Christians," continued Scherirah.

"The accursed Giaours," exclaimed Kisloch, "we are all against them."

"With their white faces," exclaimed the negro.

"And their blue eyes," said the Indian.

"What can you expect of men who live in a country without a sun!" observed the Guebre.

V.

ALROY awoke about two hours after midnight. His companions were in deep slumber. The moon had set, the fire had died away, a few red embers alone remaining; dark masses of shadow hung about the amphitheatre. He arose and cautiously stepped over the sleeping bandits. He was not, in strictness, a prisoner; but who could trust to the caprice of these lawless men? To-morrow might find him their slave, or their companion in some marauding expedition, which might make him almost retrace his steps to the Caucasus or to Hamadan. The temptation to ensure his freedom was irresistible. He clambered up the ruined wall, descended into the intricate windings that led to the Ionic fane, that served him as a beacon, hurried through the silent and starry streets, gained the great portal, and rushed once more into the desert.

A vague fear of pursuit made him continue his course many hours without resting. The desert again became sandy, the heat increased. The breeze that plays about the wilderness, and in early spring is often scented with the wild fragrance of aromatic plants, sank away. A lurid brightness suffused the heavens. An appalling stillness pervaded nature; even the insects were silent. For the first time in his pilgrimage, a feeling of deep despondency fell over the soul of Alroy. His energy appeared suddenly to have deserted him. A low hot wind began to rise, and fan his cheeks with pestiferous kisses, and enervate his frame with its poisonous embrace. His head and limbs ached with a dull sensation, more terrible than pain; his sight was dizzy, his tongue swollen. Vainly he looked around for aid, vainly he extended his forlorn arms, and wrung them to the remorseless heaven. Almost frantic with thirst, the boundless horizon of the desert disappeared, and the unhappy victim, in the midst of his torture, found himself apparently surrounded by bright and running streams, the fleeting waters of the false mirage!

The sun became blood-red, the sky darker, the sand rose in fierce eddies, the moaning wind burst into shrieks and respired a more ardent and still more malignant breath. The pilgrim could no longer sustain himself. * Faith, courage, devotion, deserted him with his failing energies. He strove no longer with his destiny, he delivered himself up to despair and death. He fell upon one knee with drooping head, supporting himself by one quivering hand, and then, full of the anguish of baffled purposes and lost affections, raising his face and arm to heaven, thus to the elements he poured his passionate farewell.

"O life, once vainly deemed a gloomy toil, I feel thy sweetness now; farewell, O life, farewell my high resolves and proud conviction of almighty fame. My days, my short unprofitable days, melt into the past; and death, with which I struggle, horrible death, arrests me in this wildness. O my sister, could thy voice, thy sweet voice but murmur in my ear one single sigh of love; could thine eye with its soft radiance but an instant blend with my dim fading vision, the pang were nothing. Farewell, Miriam! my heart is with thee by thy fountain's side. Fatal blast, bear her my dying words, my blessing. And ye, too, friends, whose too neglected love I think of now, farewell! Farewell my uncle, farewell, pleasant home, and Hamadan's serene and shadowy bowers! Farewell, Jabaster, and the mighty lore of which thou wert the priest and I the pupil! Thy talisman throbs on my faithful heart. Green earth and golden sun, and all the beautiful and glorious sights ye fondly lavish on unthinking man, farewell, farewell! I die in the desert, 'tis bitter. No more, O! never more, for me the hopeful day shall break, and its fresh breeze rise on its cheering wings of health and joy. Heaven and earth, water and air, my chosen country, and my antique creed, farewell, farewell! And thou, too, city of my soul, I cannot name thee, unseen Jerusalem—"

Amid the roar of the wind, the bosom of the earth heaved and opened, swift columns of sand sprang up to the lurid sky, and hurried towards their victim. With the elang of universal chaos, impenetrable darkness descended on the desert.

PART V.

I.

"Now our dreary way is o'er, now the desert's toil is past. Soon the river broadly flowing through its green and palmy banks, to our wearied limbs shall offer baths which caliphs cannot buy. Allah-illah, Allah-hu. Allah-illah, Allah-hu."

"Blessed the man who now may bear a relic from our prophet's tomb, blessed the man who now unfolds the treasures of a distant mart, jewels of the dusky east, and silks of farthest Samarcand. Allah-illah, Allah-hu. Allah-illah, Allah-hu."

"Him the sacred mosque shall greet with a reverence grave and low; him the busy Bezestein shall welcome with confiding smile. Holy merchant, now receive the double triumph of thy toil. Allah-illah, Allah-hu. Allah-illah, Allah-hu."

"The camel jibs, Abdallah! See, there is something in the track."

"By the holy stone,* a dead man. Poor devil! One should never make a pilgrimage on foot. I hate your humble piety. Prick the beast and he will pass the corpse."

"The prophet preaches charity, Abdallah. He has favoured my enterprise, and I will practise his precept. See if he be utterly dead."

It was the Mecca caravan returning to Bagdad. The pilgrims were within a day's journey of the Euphrates, and welcomed their approach to fertile earth with a triumphant chorus. Far as the eye could reach, the long line of their straggling procession stretched across the wilderness, thousands of camels in strings, laden with bales of merchandise, and each company headed by an animal of superior size, leading, with tinkling bells, groups of horsemen, clusters of litters; all the pilgrims armed to their teeth, the van formed by a strong division of Seljukian cavalry, and the rear protected by a Kourdish clan, who guaranteed the security of the pious travellers through their country.

Abdallah was the favourite slave of the charitable merchant Ali. In obedience to his master's orders, he unwillingly descended from his camel, and examined the body of the apparently lifeless Aloy.

"A Kourid, by his dress," exclaimed Abdallah, with a sneer, "what does he here?"

"It is not the face of a Kourid," replied Ali, "perchance a pilgrim from the mountains?"

"Whatever he be, he is dead," answered the slave: "I doubt not an accursed Giaour."

"God is great," exclaimed Ali, "he breathes; the breast of his caftan heaved."

"'Twas the wind," said Abdallah.

"'Twas the sigh of a human heart," answered Ali.

Several pilgrims who were on foot had now gathered round the group.

"I am a hakim,"† observed a dignified Armenian. "I will feel his pulse; 'tis dull, but it beats."

"There is but one God," exclaimed Ali.

"And Mohammed is his prophet," responded Abdallah. "You do not believe in him, you Armenian infidel."

"I am a hakim," replied the dignified Armenian. "Although an infidel, God has granted me skill to cure true believers. Worthy Ali, believe, the boy may yet live."

"Hakim, you shall count your own dirhems if he breathe in my divan in Bagdad," answered Ali; "I have taken a fancy to the boy. God has sent him to me. He shall carry my slippers."

"Give me a camel, and I will save his life."

"We have none," said the servant.

"Walk, Abdallah," said the master.

"Is a true believer to walk to save the life of a Kourid? Master slipper-bearer shall answer for

* The Caaba.—The Caaba is the same to the Mohammedan as the holy sepulchre to the Christian. It is the most unseemly, but the most sacred, part of the mosque at Mecca, and is a small, square stone building.

† i. e. Physician, an almost sacred character in the east. As all Englishmen travel with medicine chests, the Turks are not to be wondered at for considering us physicians.

this, if there be any sweetness in the bastinado," murmured Abdallah.

The Armenian blooded Alroy; the blood flowed slowly but surely. The prince of the captivity opened his eyes.

"There is but one God!" exclaimed Ali.

"The evil eye fall on him!"* muttered Abdallah.

The Armenian took a cordial from his vest, and poured it down his patient's throat. The blood flowed more freely.

"He will live, worthy merchant," said the physician.

"And Mohammed is his prophet," continued Ali.

"By the stone of Mecca, I believe it is a Jew," shouted Abdallah.

"The dog!" exclaimed Ali.

"Pah!" said a negro slave, drawing back with disgust.

"He will die," said the Christian physician, not even binding up the vein.

"And be damned," said Abdallah, jumping again on his camel.

The party rode on, the caravan proceeded. A Kourdish horseman galloped forward. He curbed his steed as he passed Alroy bleeding to death.

"What accursed slave has wounded one of my clan?"

The Kourid jumped off his horse, stripped off a slip of his blue shirt, stanching the wound, and carried the unhappy Alroy to the rear.

The desert ceased, the caravan entered upon a vast but fruitful plain. In the extreme distance might be detected a long undulating line of palm trees. The vanguard gave a shout, shook their tall lances in the air, and rattled their cimeters in rude chorus against their small round iron shields. All eyes sparkled, all hands were raised, all voices sounded, save those that were breathless from overpowering joy. After months' wandering in the sultry wilderness they beheld the great Euphrates.

Broad, and fresh, and magnificent, and serene, the mighty waters rolled through the beautiful and fertile earth. A vital breeze rose from their bosom. Every being responded to their genial influence. The sick were cured, the desponding became sanguine, the healthy and light-hearted broke into shouts of laughter, jumped from their camels, and embraced the fragrant earth, or, wild in their renovated strength, galloped over the plain, and threw their wanton jerreds in the air,† as if to show their suffering and labour had not deprived them of that skill and strength, without which it were vain again to enter the haunts of their less adventurous brethren.

The caravan halted on the banks of the broad river glowing in the cool sunset. The camp was pitched, the plain glittered with tents. The camels falling on their knees, crouched in groups, the merchandise piled up in masses by their sides. The unharnessed horses rushed neighing about the plain, tossing their glad heads, and rolling in the unaccustomed pasture. Spreading their mats, and kneeling towards Mecca, the pilgrims performed their evening orisons. Never was thanksgiving more sincere. They arose; some rushed into the river, some lighted lamps, some pounded coffee.* Troops of smiling villagers arrived with fresh provisions, eager to prey upon such light hearts and heavy purses. It was one of those occasions when the accustomed gravity of the orient disappears. Long through the night the sounds of music and the shouts of laughter were heard on the banks of that starry river, long through the night you might have listened with enchantment to the wild tales of the storier, or gazed with fascination on the wilder gestures of the dancing girls.†

II.

THE great bazaar of Bagdad afforded a very animated and sumptuous spectacle on the day after the arrival of the caravan. All the rare and costly products of the world were collected in that celebrated mart—the shawls of Cashmere and the silks of Syria, the ivory, and plumes, and gold of Africa, the jewels of Ind, the talismans of Egypt, the perfumes and manuscripts of Persia, the spices and gums of Araby, beautiful horses, more beautiful slaves, cloaks of sable, pelisses of ermine, armour alike magnificent in ornament and temper, rare animals, still rarer birds, blue apes in silver collars, white gazelles bound by a golden chain, grayhounds, peacocks, paroquets. And everywhere strange, and busy, and excited groups; men of all nations, creeds, and climes—the sumptuous and haughty Turk, the graceful and subtle Arab, the Hebrew with his black cap and anxious countenance; the Armenian Christian, with his dark flowing robes, and mild demeanour, and serene visage. Here strutted the lively, affected, and superfluous Persian; and there the Circassian stalked with his long hair and chain cuirass. The fair Georgian jostled the ebony form of the merchant of Dongola or Sennaar.

Through the long, narrow, arched, and winding streets of the bazaar, lined on each side with loaded stalls, all was bustle, bargaining, and barter. A passenger approached, apparently of no common rank. Two pages preceded him, beautiful Georgian boys, clothed in crimson cloth, and caps of the

* The origin of the use of coffee is obscure; but there is great reason to believe that it had not been introduced in the time of Alroy. When we consider that the life of an oriental at the present day mainly consists in drinking coffee and smoking tobacco, we cannot resist from asking ourselves, "What did he do before either of these comparatively modern inventions was discovered?" For a long time, I was inclined to suspect that tobacco might have been in use in Asia before it was introduced into Europe; but a passage in old Sandys, in which he mentions the wretched tobacco smoked in Turkey, and accounts for it by that country being supplied by "the dregs of our markets," demonstrates, that in his time, there was no native growth in Asia. Yet the choicest tobaccos are now grown on the coast of Syria, the real Levant. But did the Asiatics smoke any other plant or substance before tobacco? In Syria, at the present day, they smoke a plant called timbac; the Chinese smoke opium; the artificial preparations for the hookah are known to all Indians. I believe, however, that these are all refinements, and for this reason, that in the classic writers, who were as well acquainted with the oriental nations as ourselves, we find no allusion to the practice of smoking. The anachronism of the pipe I have not therefore ventured to commit, and that of coffee will, I trust, be pardoned. See a short Essay on Oriental Smoking, in the New Monthly Magazine for September, 1832, for an account of the eastern tobaccos.

† These dancing girls abound throughout Asia. The most famous are the Alwyn of Egypt, and the Nautch of India. These last are a caste, the first only a profession.

* The superstition of the evil eye is well known, and is prevalent throughout the Levant.

† The Persians are more famous for throwing the jerred than any other nation. A Persian gentleman, while riding quietly by your side, will suddenly dash off at full gallop, then suddenly check his horse, and take a long aim with his lance with admirable precision. I should doubt, however, whether he could hurl a lance a greater distance, or with greater force and effect, than a Nubian, who will fix a mark at sixty yards with his javelin.

same material, setting tight to their heads, with long golden tassels. One bore a blue velvet bag, and the other a clasped and richly bound volume. Four footmen, armed, followed their master, who rode behind the pages on a milk-white mule. He was a man of middle age, eminently handsome. His ample robes concealed the only fault in his appearance, a figure which indulgence had rendered somewhat ample. His eyes were large, and soft, and dark; his nose aquiline, but delicately moulded; his mouth small, and beautifully proportioned; his lip full and red; his teeth regular and dazzling white. His ebony beard flowed, but not at too great a length, in graceful and natural curls, and was richly perfumed; a delicate mustachio shaded his upper lip, but no whisker was permitted to screen the form and shroud the lustre of his oval countenance and brilliant complexion. Altogether, the animal, perhaps, predominated too much in the expression of the stranger's countenance; but genius beamed from his passionate eye, and craft lay concealed in that subtle lip. The dress of the rider was sumptuous. His turban, formed by a scarlet Cashmere shawl, was of great breadth, and, concealing half of his white forehead, increased by the contrast the radiant height of the other. His under vest was of white Damascus silk, stiff with silver embroidery, and confined by a girdle formed by a Brusca scarf of gold stuff, and holding a dagger, whose hilt appeared blazing with brilliants and rubies. His loose and exterior robe was of crimson cloth. His white hands sparkled with rings, and his ears glittered with pendulous gems.

"Who is this?" asked an Egyptian merchant, in a low whisper, of the dealer whose stuffs he was examining.

"Tis the Lord Honain," replied the dealer.

"And who may he be?" continued the Egyptian. "Is he the caliph's son?"

"Poh! a much greater man—his physician."

The white mule stopped at the very stall where this conversation was taking place. The pages halted, and stood on each side of their master—the footmen kept off the crowd.

"Merchant," said Honain, with a gracious smile of condescension, and with a voice musical as a flute, "Merchant, did you obtain me my wish?"

"There is but one God," replied the dealer, who was the charitable Ali, "and Mohammed is his prophet. I succeeded, please your highness, in seeing at Aleppo the accursed Giaour of whom I spoke, and, behold, that which you desired is here." So saying, Ali produced several Greek manuscripts, and offered them to his visiter.

"Hah!" said Honain, with a sparkling eye, "'tis well—their cost?"

"The infidel would not part with them under five hundred dirhems," replied Ali.

"Ibrahim, see that this worthy merchant receive a thousand."

"As many thanks, my Lord Honain."

The caliph's physician bowed gracefully.

"Advance, pages," continued Honain. "Why this stoppage? Ibrahim, see that our way be cleared. What is all this?"

A crowd of men advanced, pulling along a youth, who, almost exhausted, still singly struggled with his ungenerous adversaries.

"The cadi, the cadi," cried the foremost of them, who was Abdallah, "drag him to the cadi."

"Noble lord," cried the youth, extricating himself by a sudden struggle from the grasp of his captors, and seizing the robe of Honain, "I am innocent and injured. I pray thy help."

"The cadi, the cadi," exclaimed Abdallah; "the knave has stolen my ring—the ring given me by my faithful Fatima on our marriage day, and which I would not part with for my master's stores."

The youth still clung to the robe of Honain and, mute from exhaustion, fixed upon him his beautiful and imploring eye.

"Silence!" proclaimed Honain; "I will judge this cause."

"The Lord Honain, the Lord Honain—listen to the Lord Honain."

"Speak, thou brawler; of what hast thou to complain?" said Honain to Abdallah.

"May it please your highness," said Abdallah, in a whining voice, "I am the slave of your faithful servant, Ali. Often have I had the honour of waiting on your highness. This young knave here, a beggar, has robbed me, while slumbering in a coffee-house, of a ring—I have my witnesses to prove my slumbering. 'Tis a fine emerald, may it please your highness, and doubly valuable to me as a love-token from my Fatima. No consideration in the world could induce me to part with it; and so, being asleep—here are three honest men who will prove the sleep—comes this little vagabond, may it please your highness, who, while he pretends to offer me my coffee, takes him my finger, and slips off this precious ring, which he now wears upon his own beggarly paw, and will not restore to me without the bastinado."

"Abdallah is a faithful slave, may it please your highness, and a Hadgee," said Ali, his master.

"And what sayest thou, boy?" inquired Honain.

"That this is a false knave, who lies as slaves ever will."

"Pithy, and perhaps true," said Honain.

"You call me a slave, you young scoundrel!" exclaimed Abdallah; "shall I tell you what you are? Why, your highness, do not listen to him a moment. It is a shame to bring such a creature into your presence; for, by the holy stone, and I am a Hadgee, I doubt little he is a Jew."

Honain grew somewhat pale, and bit his lip. He was perhaps annoyed that he had interfered so publicly in behalf of so unpopular a character as a Hebrew; but he was unwilling to desert one whom a moment before he had resolved to befriend, and he inquired of the youth where he had obtained the ring.

"The ring was given to me by my dearest friend when I first set out upon an arduous pilgrimage not yet completed. There is but one person in the world, except the donor, to whom I would part with it, and with that person I am unacquainted. All this may seem improbable, but all this is true, I have truth alone to support me. I am destitute and friendless; but I am not a beggar, nor will any suffering induce me to become one. Feeling, from various circumstances, utterly exhausted, I entered a coffee-house and laid down, it may have been to die. I could not sleep, although my eyes were shut, and nothing would have aroused me from a tremulous trance which I thought was dying, but this plunderer here, who would not wait until death had permitted him quietly to possess himself of a jewel I value more than life."

"Show me the jewel."

The youth held up his hand to Honain, who felt his pulse, and then took off the ring.

"O, my Fatima!" exclaimed Abdallah.

"Silence, sir!" said Honain. "Page, call a jeweller."

Honain examined the ring very attentively. Whether he were near-sighted, or whether the deceptive light of the covered bazaar prevented him from examining it with ease, he certainly raised his hand to his brow, and for some moments his countenance was invisible.

The jeweller arrived, and pressing his hand to his heart, bowed before Honain.

"Value this ring," said Honain, in a low voice.

The jeweller took the ring, viewed it in all directions with a scrutinizing glance, held it to the light, pressed it to his tongue, turned it over and over, and finally declared he could not sell such a ring under a thousand dirhems.

"Whatever be the justice of the case," said Honain to Abdallah, "art thou ready to part with this ring for a thousand dirhems?"

"Most certainly," said Abdallah.

"And thou, lad, if the decision be in thy favour, wilt thou take for the ring double the worth at which the jeweller prizes it?"

"My lord, I have spoken the truth. I cannot part with that ring for the palace of the caliph."

"The truth for once is triumphant," said Honain. "Boy, the ring is thine; and for thee, thou knave," turning to Abdallah, "liar, thief, and slanderer! for thee the *bastinado thou destined for this innocent youth. Ibrahim, see that he receives five hundred. Young pilgrim, thou art no longer destitute or friendless. Follow me to my palace."

III.

THE arched chamber was of great size and beautiful proportion. The ceiling, encrusted with green fretwork, and studded with silver stars, rested upon clustered columns of white and green marble. In the centre of a variegated pavement of the same material, a fountain rose and fell into a green porphyry basin, and by the side of the fountain, upon a couch of silver, reposed Honain.

He raised his eyes from the illuminated volume on which he had been long intent, he clapped his hands, and a Nubian slave advanced, and folding his arms upon his breast, bowed in silence before his lord.

"How fares the Hebrew boy, Alnaschar?"

"Master, the fever has not returned. We gave him the potion; he slumbered for many hours, and has now wakened, weak but well."

"Let him rise and attend me."

The Nubian disappeared.

"There is nothing stranger than sympathy," soliloquized the physician of the caliph, with a meditative air; "all resolves itself into this principle, and I confess this learned doctor treats it deeply and well. An erudite spirit truly, and an eloquent pen; yet he refines too much. 'Tis too scholastic. Observation will teach us more than dogma. Meditating upon my passionate youth, I gathered wisdom. I have seen so much that I have ceased to wonder. However we doubt, there is a mystery beyond our penetration. And yet 'tis near our grasp. I sometimes deem a step, a single step would launch us into light. Here comes my patient. The rose has left his cheek, and his deep brow is wan and melancholy. Yet 'tis a glorious visage—meditation's throne; and passion lingers in that languid eye. I know not why, a strong attraction draws me to this lone child.

"Gentle stranger, how fares it with thee?"

"Very well, my lord. I come to thank thee for all thy goodness. My only thanks are words, and those too weak ones; and yet the orphan's blessing is a treasure."

"You are an orphan, then?"

"I have no parent but my father's God."

"And that God is—"

"The God of Israel."

"So I deemed. He is a Deity we all must honour, if he be the great Creator, whom we all allow."

"He is what he is, and we are what we are—a fallen people, but faithful still."

"Fidelity is strength."

"Thy words are truth, and strength must triumph."

"A prophecy!"

"Many a prophet is little honoured, till the future proves his inspiration."

"You are young and sanguine."

"So was my ancestor within the vale of Elah. But I speak unto a Moslem, and this is foolishness."

"I have read something, and can take your drift. As for my faith, I believe in truth, and wish all men to do the same. By-the-by, might I inquire the name of him who is the inmate of my house?"

"They call me David."

"David, you have a ring, an emerald cut with curious characters, Hebrew, I believe."

"'Tis here."

"A fine stone, and this inscription means—"

"A simple legend—'Parted, but one,'—the kind memorial of a brother's love."

"Your brother?"

"I never had a brother."

"I have a silly fancy for this ring: you hesitate. Search my palace, and choose the treasure that you deem its match."

"Noble sir, the gem is little worth; but were it such might deck a caliph's brow, 'twere a poor recompense for all thy goodness. This ring is a trust rather than a possession, and strange to say, although I cannot offer it to thee who may command, as thou hast saved, the life of its unhappy wearer, some stranger may cross my path to-morrow, and almost claim it as his own."

"And that stranger is—"

"The brother of the donor."

"The brother of Jabaster?"

"Jabaster!"

"Even so. I am that parted brother."

"Great is the God of Israel! Take the ring. But what is this! the brother of Jabaster a turbaned chieftain!—a Moslem! Say, O! but say that thou hast not assumed their base belief,—say, O! but say, that thou hast not become a traitor to our covenant, and I will bless the fortunes of this hour."

"I am false to no God. Calm thyself, sweet youth. These are higher questions than thy faint strength can master now. Another time we'll talk of this, my boy. At present of my brother and thyself. He lives and prospers?"

"He lives in faith; the pious ever prosper."

"A glorious dreamer! Though our moods are different, I ever loved him. And thyself! Thou art not what thou seemest. Tell me all. Jabaster's friend can be no common mind. Thy form has heralded thy fame. Trust me."

"I am Alroy."

"What! the prince of our captivity?"

"Even so."

"The slayer of Alschiroch?"

"Ay!"

"My sympathy was prophetic. I loved thee from the first. And what dost thou here? A price is set upon thy head: thou knowest it?"

"For the first time; but I am neither astonished nor alarmed. I am upon the Lord's business."

"What wouldst thou?"

"Free his people."

"The pupil of Jabaster: I see it all. Another victim to his reveries. I'll save this boy. David, for thy name must not be sounded within this city, the sun is dying. Let us to the terrace and seek the solace of the twilight breeze."

IV.

"WHAT is the hour, David?"

"Near at midnight. I marvel if thy brother may read in the stars our happy meeting."

"Men read that which they wish. He is a learned cabalist."

"But what we wish comes from above."

"So they say. We make our fortunes, and we call them fate."

"Yet the Voice sounded—the Daughter of the Voice that summoned Samuel."

"You have told me strange things; I have heard stranger solved."

"My faith is a rock."

"On which you may split."

"Art thou a Sadducee?"

"I am a man who knows men."

"You are learned, but different from Jabaster."

"We are the same, though different. Day and night are both portions of time."

"And thy portion is—"

"Truth."

"That is, light."

"Yes; so dazzling that it sometimes seems dark."

"Like thy meaning."

"You are young."

"Is youth a defect?"

"No, the reverse. But we cannot eat the fruit while the tree is in blossom."

"What fruit?"

"Knowledge."

"I have studied."

"What?"

"All sacred things."

"How know you that they are sacred?"

"They come from God."

"So does every thing. Is every thing sacred?"

"They are the deep expression of his will."

"According to Jabaster. Ask the man who prays in yonder mosque, and he will tell you that Jabaster's wrong."

"After all, thou art a Moslem?"

"No."

"What then?"

"I have told you—a man."

"But what dost thou worship?"

"What is worship?"

"Adoration due from the creature to the Creator."

"Which is he?"

"Our God."

"The God of Israel?"

"Even so."

"A frail minority, then, burn him incense."

"We are the chosen people."

"Chosen for scoffs, and scorns, and contumelies. Commend me to such choice."

"We forgot him, before he chastened us."

"Why did we?"

"Thou knowest the records of our holy race."

"Yes, I know them: like all records, annals of blood."

"Annals of victory, that will dawn again."

"If redemption be but another name for carnage, I envy no Messiah."

"Art thou Jabaster's brother?"

"So our mother was wont to say: a meek and blessed woman."

"Lord Honain, thou art rich, and wise, and powerful. Thy fellow-men speak of thee only with praise or fear, and both are cheering. Thou hast quitted our antique ark; why—no matter. We'll not discuss it. 'Tis something, if a stranger, at least thou art not a renegade. The world goes well with thee, my lord Honain. But if instead of bows and blessings, thou, like thy brethren, wert greeted only with the cuff and curse; if thou didst rise each morning only to feel existence was dishonour, and to find thyself marked out among surrounding men as something foul and fatal: if it were thy lot, like theirs, at best to drag on a mean and dull career, hopeless and aimless, or with no other hope or aim but that which is degrading, and all this too with a keen sense of thy intrinsic worth, and deep conviction of superior race; why then perchance Honain might even discover 'twere worth a struggle to be free and honoured."

"I pray your pardon, sir, I thought you were Jabaster's pupil, a dreaming student. I see you have a deep ambition."

"I am a prince; and I fain would be a prince without my fetters."

"Listen to me, Alroy," said Honain in a low voice, and he placed his arm round his waist, "I am your friend. Our acquaintance is very brief: no matter, I love you. I rescued you in injury, I tended you in sickness, even now your life is in my power; I would protect it with my own. You cannot doubt me. Our affections are not under our own control; and mine are yours. The sympathy between us is entire. You see me, you see what I am: a Hebrew, though unknown, one of that despised, rejected, persecuted people, of whom you are the chief. I too would be free and honoured. Freedom and honour are mine, but I was my own Messiah. I quitted in good time our desperate cause, but I gave it a trial. Ask Jabaster how I fought. Youth could be my only excuse for such indiscretion. I left this country, I studied, and resided among the Greeks. I returned from Constantinople with all their learning, some of their craft. No one knew me. I assumed their turban, and I am the Lord Honain. Take my experience, child, and save yourself much sorrow. Turn your late adventure to good account. No one can recognise you here. I will introduce you among the highest as my child, by some fair Greek. The world is before you. You may fight, you may love, you may revel. War and women, and luxury, are all at your command. With your person and talents you may be grand vizier. Clear your head of nonsense. In the present disordered state of the empire, you may even carve yourself out a kingdom, infinitely more delightful than the barren land of milk and honey. I have seen it, child; a rocky wilderness, where I would not let my courser graze."

He bent down, and fixed his eyes upon his companion with a scrutinizing glance. The moonlight fell upon the resolved visage of the prince of the captivity.

"Honain," he replied, pressing his hand, "I thank thee. Thou knowest not me, but still I thank thee."

"You are resolved then on destruction."

"On glory, eternal glory."

"Is it possible to succeed?"

"Is it possible to fail?"

"You are mad!"

"I am a believer."

"Enough. Not another word. You have yet one chance. My brother has saddled your enterprise with a condition, and an impossible one. Gain the sceptre of Solomon, and I will agree to be your subject. You will waste a year in this frolic. You are young, and can afford it. I trust you will experience nothing worse than a loss of time, which is, however, very valuable. My duty will be, after all your sufferings, to send you forth on your adventures in good condition, and to provide you means for a less toilsome pilgrimage than has hitherto been your lot. Trust me, you will return to Bagdad to accept my offers. At present, the dews are descending, and we will return to our divan, and take some coffee."

V.

SOME few days after this conversation on the terrace, as Alroy was reclining in a bower, in the beautiful garden of his host, meditating on the future, some one touched him on the back. He looked up. It was Honain.

"Follow me," said the brother of Jabaster.

The prince rose, and followed him in silence. They entered the house, and passing through the saloon already described, they proceeded down a long gallery, which terminated in an arched flight of broad steps, leading to the river. A boat was fastened to the end of the stairs, floating on the blue line of the Tigris bright in the sun.

Honain now gave to Alroy a velvet bag, which he requested him to carry, and then they descended the steps and entered the covered boat; and, without any directions to the rower, they were soon skimming over the water. By the sound of passing vessels and occasional shouts of the boatmen, Alroy, although he could observe nothing, was conscious that for some time their course lay through a principal thoroughfare of the city; but by degrees the sounds became less frequent, and in time entirely died away, and all that caught his ear was the regular and monotonous stroke of their own oar.

At length, after the lapse of nearly an hour from their entrance, the boat stopped, and was moored against a quay. The curtains were withdrawn, and Honain and his companion disembarked.

A low but very extensive building, painted in white and gold arabesque, and irregular but picturesque in form, with many small domes, and tall thin towers, rose amid groves of eypress on the banks of the broad and silent river. The rapid stream had carried them far from the city, which was visible, but distant. Around was no habitation, no human being. The opposite bank was occupied by enclosed gardens. Not even a boat passed.

Honain, beckoning to Alroy to accompany him, but still silent, advanced to a small portal, and knocked. It was instantly opened by a single Nubian, who bowed reverently as the visitors passed him. They proceeded along a low and gloomy passage, covered with arches of fretwork, until they arrived at a door of tortoise-shell and mother-of-pearl.* Here Honain, who was in advance, turned round to Alroy, and said, "Whatever happen, and whoever may address you, as you value your life and mine, do not speak."

The door opened, and they found themselves in a vast and gorgeous hall. Pillars of many-coloured marbles rose from a red and blue pavement of the same material, and supported a vaulted, circular, and highly-embossed roof of purple, scarlet and gold.† Around a fountain, which rose fifty-feet in height from an immense basin of lapis-lazuli, and reclining on small yellow Barbary mats, was a group of Nubian eunuchs dressed in rich habits of scarlet and gold,‡ and armed with ivory battle-axes, the white handles worked in precious arabesque, finely contrasting with the blue and brilliant blades.

The commander of the eunuch-guard rose on seeing Honain, and pressing his hand to his head, mouth and heart, saluted him. The physician of the caliph motioning Alroy to remain, advanced some paces in front of him, and entered into a whispering conversation with the eunuch. After a few minutes, this officer resumed his seat, and Honain, beckoning to Alroy to rejoin him, crossed the hall.

Passing through an open arch, they entered a quadrangular court of roses,§ each bed of flowers surrounded by a stream of sparkling water, and floating like an enchanted islet upon a fairy ocean. The sound of the water and the sweetness of the flowers blended together, and produced a lulling sensation which nothing but his strong and strange curiosity might have enabled Alroy to resist. Proceeding along a cloister of light airy workmanship which connected the hall with the remainder of the buildings, they stood before a lofty and sumptuous portal.

It was a monolite gate, thirty feet in height, formed of one block of green and red jasper, and cut into the fanciful undulating arch of the Saracens. The consummate artist had seized the advantage afforded to him by the ruddy veins of the precious stone, and had formed them in bold relief into two vast and sinuous serpents, which shot forth from their crested heads and glittering eyes at Honain and his companion.

The physician of the caliph taking his dagger from his girdle, struck one of the heads of the serpents thrice. The massy portal opened with a whirl and a roar, and before them stood an Abyssinian giant,* holding in his leash a roaring lion.

"Hush! Haroun," said Honain to the animal, raising at the same time his arm, and the beast crouched in silence. "Worthy Morgargon, I bring you a remembrance." The Abyssinian showed his tusks, larger and whiter than the lion's, as he grinningly received the tribute of the courtly Honain; and he uttered a few uncouth sounds, but he could not speak, for he was a mute.

The jasper portal introduced the companions to a long and lofty and arched chamber, lighted by high windows of stained glass, hung with tapestry of silk and silver, covered with prodigious carpets, and surrounded by immense couches. And thus through similar chambers they proceeded, in some of which were signs of recent habitation, until they arrived at another quadrangle nearly filled by a most singular fountain which rose from a basin of gold encrusted with pearls, and which was surrounded by figures of every rare quadruped† in the most costly materials. Here a golden tiger with flaming eyes of ruby, and flowing stripes of opal, stole, after some bloody banquet, to the refreshing brink; a camelopard raised its slender neck of silver from the centre of a group of every inhabitant of the forest, and brilliant bands of monkeys glittering with precious stones, rested, in every variety of fantastic posture, on the margin of the basin.

The fountain itself was a tree of gold and silver,‡ spreading into innumerable branches, covered with every variety of curious birds, their plumage appropriately imitated by the corresponding tints of precious stones, and which warbled in beautiful melody as they poured forth from their bills the musical and refreshing element.

It was with difficulty that Aloy could refrain from an admiring exclamation, but Honain, ever quick, turned to him, with his finger pressed on his mouth, and quitting the quadrangle, they entered the gardens.

Lofty terraces, dark masses of cypress, winding walks of acacia, in the distance an interminable paradise, and here and there a glittering pavilion and bright kiosk! Its appearance on the river had not prepared Aloy for the extent of the palace itself. It seemed infinite, and it was evident that he had only viewed a very small portion of it.

* A giant is still a common appendage to an oriental court even at the present day. See a very amusing story in the picturesque "Persian Sketches" of that famous echee, Sir John Malcolm.

† "The hall of audience," says Gibbon, from Cardonne, speaking of the magnificence of the Saracen of Cordova, "was encrusted with gold and pearls, and a great basin in the centre was surrounded with the curious and costly figures of birds and quadrupeds."—Decline and Fall, vol. x. p. 39.

‡ Among the other spectacles of rare and stupendous luxury, was a tree of gold and silver, spreading into eighteen large branches, on which, and on the lesser boughs, sat a variety of birds made of the same precious metals, as well as the leaves of the tree. While the machinery effected spontaneous motions, the several birds warbled their natural harmony."—Gibbon, vol. x. p. 38, from Abulfeda describing the court of the caliphs of Bagdad in the decline of their power.

While they were moving on, there suddenly arose the sound of trumpets. The sound grew nearer and nearer, louder and louder: soon was heard the tramp of an approaching troop. Honain drew Aloy aside. A procession appeared advancing from a dark grove of cypress. Four hundred men led as many white bloodhounds with collars of gold and rubies.* Then came one hundred men, each with a hooded hawk. Then six horsemen in rich dresses. After them a single horseman, mounted on a steed, marked on its forehead with a star.† The rider was middle aged, handsome, and dignified. He was plainly dressed, but the staff of his hunting spear was entirely of diamonds, and the blade of gold. He was followed by a company of Nubian eunuchs, with their scarlet dresses and ivory battle-axes, and the procession closed.

"The caliph," whispered Honain, when they passed, placing at the same time his finger on his lip, to prevent any inquiry. This was the first intimation that had reached Aloy of what he had already suspected, that he was a visiter to the palace of the commander of the faithful.

The companions turned down a wild and winding walk, which, after some time, brought them to a small and gently sloping lawn, surrounded by cedar trees of great size. Upon the lawn was a kiosk, a long and many-windowed building, covered with blinds, and further screened by an overhanging roof. The kiosk was built of white and green marble, and ascended by a flight of steps the length of the building, alternately of white and green marble, and nearly covered with rose trees. Honain ascended these steps alone, and entered the kiosk. After a few minutes, he looked out from the blinds and beckoned to Aloy. David advanced, but Honain, fearful of some indiscretion, met him, and said to him in a low whisper between his teeth, "remember you are deaf, a mute, and a eunuch." Aloy could scarcely refrain from smiling, and the prince of the captivity and the physician of the caliph entered the kiosk together. Two women, veiled, and two eunuchs of the guard received them in an antechamber. And then they passed into a room which ran nearly the whole length of the kiosk, opening on one side to the gardens, and on the other supported by an ivory wall with niches painted in green fresco, and in each niche a rose tree. Each niche, also, was covered with an almost invisible golden grate, which confined a nightingale and made him constant to the rose he loved. At the foot of each niche was a fountain, but instead of water, each basin was replenished with the purest quicksilver.‡ The roof of the kiosk was of mother-of-pearl, inlaid with tortoise shell; the pavement, a mosaic of rare marbles and precious stones, representing the most delicious fruits, and the most beautiful flowers. Over this pavement a Georgian page flung at intervals refreshing perfumes. At the end of this elegant chamber was a divan of light green silk, embroidered with pearls, and covered with cushions of white satin and gold. Upon one of these cushions, in the middle of the divan, sat a lady, her eyes fixed in abstraction upon a volume of Persian poesy reclining on her knees, one hand playing with a rosary of pearls and emeralds,* and the other holding a long gold chain, which imprisoned a white gazelle.

The lady looked up as Honain and his companion entered. She was very young, as youthful as Alroy. Her long light brown hair, drawn off a high white forehead covered with blue veins, fell braided with pearls over each other. Her eyes were very large, and deeply blue. Her nose small, but high and aquiline. The fairness of her face was dazzling, and when she looked up and greeted Honain, her lustrous cheeks broke into dimples, which was more fascinating from their contrast with the general expression of her countenance, which was haughty and derisive. The lady was dressed in a robe of crimson silk, girded round her waist by a green shawl, from which peeped forth the diamond hilt of a very small poniard.† Her round white arms looked infinitely small, as they occasionally flashed forth from their large loose hanging sleeves. One was covered with jewels, and the right arm was quite bare.

Honain advanced, and bending, kissed the lady's proffered hand. Alroy fell into the background.

"They told me that the Rose of the World drooped this morning," said the physician, bending again as he smiled, "and her slave hastened at her command to tend her."

"It was a south wind. The wind has changed, and the Rose of the World is better," replied the lady, laughing.

Honain touched her pulse.

"Irregular," said the physician.

"Like myself," said the lady. "Is that a new slave?"

"A recent purchase, and a great bargain. He is good-looking, has the advantage of being deaf and dumb, and is harmless in every respect."

"'Tis a pity," replied the lady; "it seems that all good-looking people are born to be useless. I, for instance."

"Yet rumour whispers the reverse," remarked the physician.

"How so?" inquired the lady.

"The young King of Karasme."

"Poh! I have made up my mind to detest him. A barbarian!"

"A hero!"

"Did you ever see him?"

"I have."

"Handsome?"

"An archangel."

"And sumptuous?"

"Is he not a conqueror? All the plunder of the world will be yours."

"I am tired of magnificence. I built this kiosk to forget it."

"It is not in the least degree splendid," said Honain, looking round with a smile.

"No," answered the lady, with a self-satisfied air; "here at least one can forget one has the misfortune to be a princess."

"It is certainly a great misfortune," said the physician.

"And yet it must be the only tolerable lot," replied the lady.

"Assuredly," replied Honain.

"For our unhappy sex, at least."

"Very unhappy."

"If I were only a man!"

"What a hero you would be!"

"I should like to live in endless confusion."

"I have not the least doubt of it."

"Have you got me the books?" eagerly inquired the princess.

"My slave bears them," replied Honain.

"Let me see them directly."

Honain took the bag from Alroy, and unfolded its contents—the very volumes of Greek romances which Ali, the merchant, had obtained for him.

"I am tired of poetry," said the princess, glancing over the costly volumes and tossing them away. "I long to see the world."

"You would soon be tired of that," replied the physician.

"I suppose common people are never tired," said the princess.

"Except with labour," said the physician; "care keeps them alive."

"What is care?" asked the princess, with a smile.

"It is a god," replied the physician, "invisible, but omnipotent. It steals the bloom from the cheek and lightness from the pulse—it takes away the appetite, and turns the hair gray."

"It is no true divinity, then," replied the princess, "but an idol we make ourselves. I am a sincere Moslem, and will not worship it. Tell me some news, Honain."

"The young King of Karasme—"

"Again! the barbarian! You are in his pay. I'll none of him. To leave one prison, and to be shut up in another—why do you remind me of it? No, my dear hakim, if I marry at all, I will marry to be free."

"An impossibility," said Honain.

"My mother was free till she was a queen and a slave. I intend to end as she began. You know what she was."

Honain knew well, but he was too politic not to affect ignorance.

"The daughter of a bandit," continued the princess, "who fought by the side of her father. That is existence! I must be a robber. 'Tis in the blood. I want my fate foretold, Honain. You are an astrologer; do it."

"I have already cast your nativity. Your star is a comet."

"That augurs well; brilliant confusion and erratic splendour. I wish I were a star," added the princess in a deep rich voice, and with a pensive air; "a star in the clear blue sky, beautiful and free. Honain, Honain, the gazelle has broken her chain, and is eating my roses."

Alroy rushed forward and seized the graceful truant. Honain shot him an anxious look; the princess received the chain from the hand of Alroy, and cast at him a scrutinizing glance.

"What splendid eyes the poor beast has got!" exclaimed the princess.

"The gazelle?" inquired the physician.

"No, your slave," replied the princess. "Why, he blushes! Were he not deaf as well as dumb, I could almost believe he understood me."

"He is very modest," replied Honain, rather alarmed; "and is frightened at the liberty he has taken."

"I like modesty," said the princess; "it is so interesting. I am modest; don't you think so?"

"Certainly," said Honain.

"And interesting?"

"Very."

"I detest an interesting person. After all, there is nothing like plain dulness."

"Nothing," said Honain.

"The day flows on so serenely in such society."

"It does," said Honain.

"No confusion; no scenes."

"None."

"I make it a rule only to have ugly slaves."

"You are quite right."

"Honain, will you ever contradict me? You know very well I have the handsomest slaves in the world."

"Every one knows it."

"And do you know I have taken a very great fancy to your new purchase, who, according to your account, is eminently qualified for the post. Why, you don't agree with me!"

"Why, yes; I doubt not your highness would find him eminently qualified, and certainly few things would give me greater pleasure than offering him for your acceptance; but I got into such disgrace by that late affair of the Circassian, that—"

"O! leave it to me, leave it to me," said the princess.

"Certainly," said the physician, turning the conversation; "and when the young King of Karsame arrives at Bagdad, you can offer him to his majesty as a present."

"Delightful! and the king is really handsome and young as well as brave; but has he any taste?"

"You have enough for both."

"If he would but make war against the Greeks!"

"Why so violent against the poor Greeks?"

"You know they are Giaours. Besides, they might beat him, and then I should have the pleasure of being taken prisoner."

"Delightful!"

"Charming! to see Constantinople and marry the emperor!"

"Marry the emperor!"

"To be sure. Of course he would fall in love with me."

"Of course."

"And then—and then, I might conquer Paris!"

"Paris!"

"You have been at Paris?"*

"Yes."

"The men are shut up there," said the princess, with a smile, "are they not? and the women do what they like?"

"You will always do what you like," said Honain, rising.

"You are going?"

"My visits must not be too long."

"Farewell, dear Honain!" said the princess with a melancholy air. "You are the only person who has an idea in all Bagdad, and you leave me.

A miserable lot is mine, to feel every thing, and be nothing. These books and flowers, these sweet birds, and this fair gazelle—ah! poets may feign as they please, but how cheerfully would I resign all these elegant consolations of a captive life for one hour of freedom. I wrote some verses on myself yesterday; take them, and get them blazoned for me by the finest scribe in the city; letters of silver on a violet ground with a fine flowing border; I leave the design to you. Adieu! Come hither, mute." Alroy advanced to her beckon, and knelt. "There, take that rosary for thy master's sake, and those dark eyes of thine."

The companions withdrew and reached their boat in silence. It was sunset. The musical and sonorous voice of the muezzin resounded from the innumerable minarets of the splendid city. Honain drew back the curtains of the barque. Bagdad rose before them in the huge masses of sumptuous dwellings, seated amid groves and gardens. An infinite population, summoned by the invigorating twilight, poured forth in all directions. The glowing river was covered with sparkling caïques, the glittering terraces with showy groups. Splendour, and power, and luxury, and beauty, were arrayed before them in their most captivating forms, and the heart of Alroy responded to their magnificence.

"A glorious vision!" said the prince of the captivity.

"Very different to Hamadan," said the physician of the caliph.

"To-day I have seen wonders," said Alroy.

"The world is opening to you," said Honain.

Alroy did not reply; but, after some minutes, he said, in a hesitating voice, "Who was that lady?"

"The Princess Schirene," replied Honain, "the favourite daughter of the caliph. Her mother was a Georgian and a Giaour."

II.

THE moonlight fell upon the figure of Alroy lying on a couch; his countenance was hidden in his arm. He was motionless, but did not sleep.

He rose and paced the chamber with agitated steps; sometimes he stopped, and gazed on the pavement, fixed in abstraction. He advanced to the window, and cooled his feverish brow in the midnight air.

An hour passed away, and the young prince of the captivity remained fixed in the same position. Suddenly he turned, dashed to a tripod of porphyry, and seizing a rosary of jewels, pressed it to his lips.

"The spirit of my dreams, she comes at last, the form for which I have sighed and wept, the form which rose upon my radiant vision when I shut my eyes against the jarring shadows of this gloomy world.

"Schirene! Schirene! here in this solitude I pour to thee the passion long stored up—the passion of my life, no common life, a life full of deep feeling and creative thought. O! beautiful, O, more than beautiful, for thou to me art as a dream unbroken—why art thou not mine, why lose a moment in our glorious lives, and balk our destiny of half its bliss?

"Fool, fool, hast thou forgotten? The rapture of a prisoner in his cell, whose wild fancy for a moment belies his fetters! The daughter of the caliph and a—Jew!

* Paris was known to the orientals at this time as a city of considerable luxury and importance. The embassy from Haroun Attraschid to Charlemagne at an earlier date, is of course recollected.

"Give me my father's sceptre!

"A plague on talismans! O! I need no inspiration but her memory, no magic but her name. By heavens, I'll enter this glorious city a conqueror, or I'll die.

"Why, what is life, for meditation mingles ever with my passion—why, what is life! Throw accidents to the dogs, and tear off the painted mask of false society! Here am I a hero; with a mind that can divide all things, and a heart of superhuman daring, with youth, with vigour, with a glorious lineage, with a form that has made full many a lovely maiden of our tribe droop her fair head by Hamadan's sweet fount, and I am—nothing.

"Out on society; 'twas not made for me. I'll form my own, and be the deity I sometimes feel.

"We make our fortunes and we call them fate. Thou saidst well, Honain. Most subtle Sadducee! The saintly blood flowed in my father's veins, and they did nothing; but I have an arm formed to wield a sceptre, and I will win one.

"I cannot doubt my triumph. Triumph is a part of my existence. I am born for glory, as a tree is born to bear its fruit, or to expand its flowers. The deed is done. 'Tis thought of, and 'tis done. I'll confront the greatest of my diademed ancestors, and in his tomb. Mighty Solomon! he wedded Pharaoh's daughter. Hah! what a future dawns upon my hope. An omen, a choice omen!

"Heaven and earth are mingling to form my fortunes. My mournful youth I have so often cursed, I hail thee—thou wert a glorious preparation; and when, feeling no sympathy with the life around me, I deemed myself a fool, I find I was a most peculiar being. By heavens, I am joyful; for the first time in my life I am joyful. I could laugh, and fight, and drink. I am new-born; I am another being; I am mad!

"O! time, great time, the world belies thy fame. It calls thee swift. Methinks thou art coming slow. Fly on, great time, and on thy coming wings bear me my sceptre!

"All is to be. It is a lowering thought. My fancy, like a bright and wearied bird, will sometimes flag and fall, and then I am lost. The young King of Karasme, a youthful hero! Would he had been Alschiroch! My heart is sick even at the very name. Alas! my trials have not yet begun. Jabaster warned me; good, sincere Jabaster! His talisman presses on my frantic heart, and seems to warn me. I am in danger. Braggart to stand here, filling the careless air with idle words, while all is unaccomplished. I grow dull. The young King of Karasme! Why, what am I compared to this same prince! Nothing, but in my thoughts. In the full bazaar, they would not deem me worthy even to hold his stirrup or his slipper—O! this contest, this constant, bitter, never-ending contest between my fortune and my fancy! Why do I exist? or, if existing, why am I not recognised as I would be?

"Sweet voice, that in Jabaster's distant cave descended from thy holy home above, and whispered consolation, breathe again! Again breathe thy still summons to my lonely ear, and chase away the thoughts that hover round me. Thoughts dark and doubtful, like fell birds of prey hovering round an expected hero's fall, and gloating on their triumph o'er the brave. There is something fatal in these crowded cities. Faith flourishes in solitude."

He threw himself upon the couch, and, leaning down his head, seemed lost in meditation. He started up, and, seizing his tablets, wrote upon them these words:—

"Honain, I have been the whole night like David in the wilderness of Ziph; but, by the aid of the Lord, I have conquered. I fly from this dangerous city upon his business, which I have too much neglected. Attempt not to discover me, and accept my gratitude."

PART VI.

I.

A SCORCHING sun, a blue and burning sky, on every side lofty ranges of black and barren mountains, dark ravines, deep caverns, unfathomable gorges!

A solitary being moved in the distance. Faint and toiling, a pilgrim slowly clambered up the steep and stony track.

The sultry hours moved on, the pilgrim at length gained the summit of the mountain, a small and rugged table-land strewn with huge masses of loose and heated rock. All around was desolation: no spring, no herbage; the bird and the insect were alike mute. Yet still it was the summit; no loftier peaks frowned in the distance; the pilgrim stopped, and breathed with more facility, and a faint smile played over his worn and solemn countenance.

He rested a few minutes, he took from his wallet some locusts and wild honey, and a small skin of water. His meal was short as well as simple. An ardent desire to reach his place of destination before nightfall urged him to proceed. He soon passed over the table-land, and commenced the descent of the mountain. A straggling olive tree occasionally appeared, and then a group, and soon the groups swell into a grove. His way wound through the grateful and unaccustomed shade. He emerged from the grove, and found that he had proceeded down more than half the side of the mountain. It ended precipitously in a very dark and narrow ravine, formed on the side by an opposite mountain; the lofty steep of which was crested by a city gently rising on a very gradual slope.

Nothing could be conceived more barren, wild, and terrible, than the surrounding scenery, unilluminated by a single trace of culture. The city stood like the last gladiator in an amphitheatre of desolation.

It was surrounded by a lofty turreted wall, of an architecture to which the pilgrim was unaccustomed: gates with drawbridge and portcullis, square towers, and loopholes for the archer. Sentinels, clothed in steel and shining in the sunset, paced, at regular intervals, the cautious wall, and on a lofty tower a standard waved, a snowy standard, with a red, red cross!

The prince of the captivity at length beheld the lost capital of his fathers.*

* The finest view of Jerusalem is from the Mount of Olives. It is little altered since the period when David Atroy is supposed to have gazed upon it, but it is enriched by the splendid mosque of Omar, built by the Moslem conquerors on the supposed site of the temple, and which, with its gardens, and arcades, and courts, and fountains, may fairly

II.

A FEW months back and such a spectacle would have called forth all the latent passion of Aloy; but time and suffering, and sharp experience, had already somewhat curbed the fiery spirit of the Hebrew prince. He gazed upon Jerusalem; he beheld the city of David garrisoned by the puissant warriors of Christendom, and threatened by the innumerable armies of the crescent. The two great divisions of the world seemed contending for a prize, which he, a lonely wanderer, had crossed the desert to rescue. If his faith restrained him from doubting the possibility of his enterprise, he was at least deeply conscious that the world was a very different existence to what he had fancied amid the gardens of Hamadan and the rocks of Caucasus, and that if his purpose could be accomplished, it could only be effected by one means. Calm, perhaps somewhat depressed, but full of pious humiliation, and not deserted by holy hope, he descended into the valley of Jehoshaphat, and so, slacking his thirst at Siloa, and mounting the opposite height, David Aloy entered Jerusalem by the gate of Zion.*

He had been instructed that the quarter of his people was portioned near this entrance. He inquired the direction of the sentinel, who did not condescend to answer him. An old man in very shabby robes, who was passing, beckoned to him.

"What want you, friend?" inquired Aloy.

"You were asking for the quarter of our people. You must be a stranger indeed in Jerusalem, to suppose that a Frank would speak to a Jew. You were lucky to get neither kicked nor cursed."

"Kicked and cursed! Why, these dogs—"

"Hush! hush! for the love of God," said his new companion, very much alarmed. "Have you lent money to their captain, that you speak thus? In Jerusalem our people speak only in a whisper."

"No matter; the cure is not by words. Where is our quarter?"

"Was the like ever seen! Why, he speaks as if he were a Frank. I saved him from having his head broken by a gauntlet, and—"

"My friend, I am tired. Our quarter?"

"Whom may you want?"

"The chief rabbi."

"You bear letters to him?"

"What is that to you?"

"Hush! hush! You don't know what Jerusalem is, young man. You must not think of going on in this way. Where do you come from?"

"Bagdad."

"Bagdad! Jerusalem is not Bagdad. A Turk is a brute, but a Christian a demon."

"But our quarter, our quarter?"

"Hush! hush! You want the chief rabbi?"

"Ay! ay!"

"Rabbi Zimri?"

"It may be so. I neither know nor care."

"Neither knows nor cares! This will never do, you must not go on in this way at Jerusalem. You must not think of it."

"Fellow, I see thou art a miserable prattler. Show me to our quarter, and I will pay thee well—or be off."

"Be off! Art thou a Hebrew? to say 'be off' to any one. You come from Bagdad! I'll tell you what—go back to Bagdad. You will never do for Jerusalem."

"Your grizzled beard protects you. Old fool, I am a pilgrim just arrived, wearied beyond expression, and you keep me here listening to your flat talk!"

"Flat talk! Why! what would you?"

"Lead me to the Rabbi Zimri—if that be his name."

"If that be his name! Why, every one knows Rabbi Zimri, the chief rabbi of Jerusalem, the successor of Aaron. We have our temple yet, say what they like. A very learned doctor is Rabbi Zimri."

"Wretched driveller. I am ashamed to lose my patience with such a dotard."

"Driveller! dotard! Why, who are you?"

"One you cannot comprehend. Without another word, lead me to your chief."

"Chief! you have not far to go. I know no one of the nation who holds his head higher than I do here, and they call me Zimri."

"What, the chief rabbi—the very learned doctor!"

"No less; I thought you had heard of him."

"Let us forget the past, good Zimri. When great men play the incognito they must sometimes hear rough phrases. It is the caliph's lot as well as yours. I am glad to make the acquaintance of so great a doctor. Though young, and roughly habited, I have seen the world a little, and may offer next Sabbath in the synagogue more dirhems than you would perhaps suppose. Good and learned Zimri, I would be your guest."

"A very worshipful young man! And he speaks low and soft now! But it was lucky I was at hand. Good—what's your name?"

"David."

"A very honest name—good David. It was lucky I was at hand when you spoke to the sentinel though. A Jew speak to a Frank, and a sentinel too! Hah! hah! hah! that is very good. How Rabbi Maimon will laugh! Faith, it was very lucky, now, was it not?"

"Indeed, most fortunate."

"Well, that is candid! Here! this way. 'Tis not far. We number few, sir, of our brethren here, but a better time will come—a better time will come."

"I think so. This is your door?"

"An humble one. Jerusalem is not Bagdad, but you are welcome."

III.

"KING PIRGANDICUS* entered them," said Rabbi Maimon; "but no one since."

be described as the most imposing of Moslem fanes. I endeavoured to enter it at the hazard of my life. I was detected, and surrounded by a crowd of turbaned fanatics, and escaped with difficulty; but I saw enough to feel that minute inspection would not belie the general character I formed of it from the Mount of Olives. I caught a glorious glimpse of splendid courts, and light airy gates of Saracenic triumph, flights of noble steps, long arcades, and interior gardens, where silver fountains spouted their tall streams amid the taller cypress.

* The gate of Zion still remains, and from it you descend into the valley of Siloa

* According to a Talmudical story, however, of which I find a note, this monarch was not a Hebrew, but a Gentile, and a very wicked one. He once invited eleven famous doctors of the holy nation to supper. They were received in the most magnificent style, and were then invited, under pain of death, either to eat pork, to accept a pagan mistress,

"And when did he live?" inquired Alroy.

"His reign is recorded in the Talmud," answered Rabbi Zimri, "but in the Talmud there are no dates."

"A long while ago!" said Alroy.

"Since the captivity," answered Rabbi Maimon.

"I doubt that," said Rabbi Zimri, "or why should he be called king?"

"Was he of the house of David?" said Alroy.

"Without doubt," said Rabbi Maimon; "he was one of our greatest kings, and conquered Julius Cæsar.*"

"His kingdom was in the northernmost parts of Africa," said Rabbi Zimri, "and exists to this day, if we could but find it."

"Ay, truly," added Rabbi Maimon, "the sceptre has never departed out of Judah; and he rode always upon a white elephant."

"Covered with cloth of gold," added Rabbi Zimri.

"And he visited the tombs of the kings?†" inquired Alroy.

"Without doubt," said Rabbi Maimon.

"The whole account is in the Talmud."

"And no one can now find them?"

"No one," replied Rabbi Zimri: "but according to the learned Doctor Moses Hallevy, they are in a valley in the mountains of Lebanon, which was sealed up by the archangel Michael."

or to drink wine consecrated to idols. After long consultation, the doctors, in great tribulation, agreed to save their heads by accepting the last alternative, since the two first were forbidden by the law of Moses, and the last only by the rabbin. The king assented, the doctors drank the impure wine, and, as it was exceedingly good, drank freely. The wine, as will sometimes happen, created a terrible appetite; the table was covered with dishes, and the doctors, heated by the grape, were not sufficiently careful of what they partook. In short, the wicked king Pargandicus contrived that they should sup off pork, and being carried from the table quite tipsy, each of the eleven had the mortification of finding himself next morning in the arms of a pagan mistress.

In the course of the year all the eleven died sudden deaths; and this visitation occurred to them, not because they had violated the law of Moses, but because they had believed that the precepts of the rabbin could be outraged with more impunity than the word of God.

* This classic hero often figures in the erratic pages of the Talmud.

† The present pilgrim to Jerusalem will have less trouble than Alroy in discovering the tombs of the kings, though he probably would not as easily obtain the sceptre of Solomon. The tombs that bear this title are of the time of the Asmonean princes, and of a more ambitious character than any other of the remains. An open court about fifty feet in breadth, and extremely deep, is excavated out of the rock. One side is formed by a portico, the frieze of which is sculptured in a good Syro-Greek style. There is no grand portal; you crawl into the tombs by a small opening on one of the sides. There are a few small chambers with niches, recesses, and sarcophagi, some sculptured in the same flowing style as the frieze. This is the most important monument at Jerusalem: and Dr. Clarke, who has lavished wonder and admiration on the tombs of Zachariah and Absalom, has announced the tombs of the kings as one of the marvellous productions of antiquity. But the truth is, all that we see of art in Jerusalem is of the most mean and contemptible character, exhibiting not the slightest feeling for the beautiful or the grand, and not for a moment to be mentioned with the creation of a neighbouring country. It is of course out of the question to speak of the pyramids of Memphis, and the obelisk of Heliopolis, the temples of Karnak, and the palaces of Luxor, the gigantic cavern fanes of Ipsambul, the imaginative Benders, and the refined Philæ; but it is not too much to say, that there are in many Egyptian towns, to which the satiated traveller cannot spare a parting glance, more surprising monuments than in all Jerusalem together; ranges of painted sepulchres, infinitely more striking from their extent and beauty than the tombs of the kings; and relics of temples which must have cost more time and treasure than the whole valley of Jehoshaphat.

said Rabbi Maimon, "gives one hundred and twenty reasons in his commentary on the Gemara to prove that they sunk under the earth at the taking of the temple."

"No one reasons like Abarbanel of Babylon," said Rabbi Zimri.

"The great Rabbi Akiba, of Pundebita, has answered them all," said Rabbi Maimon, "and holds that they were taken up to heaven."

"And which is right?" inquired Rabbi Zimri.

"Neither," said Rabbi Maimon.

"One hundred and twenty reasons are strong proof," said Rabbi Zimri.

"The most learned and illustrious Doctor Aaron Mendola, of Granada," said Rabbi Maimon, "has shown that we must look for the tombs of the kings in the south of Spain."

"All that Mendola writes is worth attention," said Rabbi Zimri.

"Rabbi Hillel,* of Samaria, is worth two Mendolas any day," said Rabbi Maimon.

"'Tis a most learned doctor," said Rabbi Zimri; "and what thinks he?"

"Hillel proves that there are two tombs of the kings," said Rabbi Maimon, "and that neither of them are the right ones."

"What a learned doctor!" exclaimed Rabbi Zimri.

"And very satisfactory," remarked Alroy.

"These are high subjects," continued Alroy, his clear eyes twinkling with complacency. "Your guest, Rabbi Zimri, must read the treatise of the learned Shimci, of Damascus, on 'Elicting Impossibilities.'"

"That is a work!" exclaimed Zimri.

"I never slept for three nights after reading that work," said Rabbi Maimon. "It contains twelve thousand five hundred and thirty-seven quotations from the Pentateuch, and not a single original observation."

"There were giants in those days," said Zimri "we are children now."

"The first chapter makes equal sense, read backward or forward," continued Rabbi Maimon.

"Ichabod!" exclaimed Rabbi Zimri.

"And the initial letter of every section is a cabalistical type of a king of Judah!"

"The temple will yet be built," said Rabbi Zimri.

"Ay, ay! that is learning!" exclaimed Rabbi

* "Rabbi Hillel was one of the eminentest that ever was among the Jewish doctors, both for birth, learning, rule, and children. He was of the seed of David by his mother's side, being of the posterity of Shephathai, the son of Abitai, David's wife. He was brought up in Babel, from whence he came up to Jerusalem at forty years old, and there studied the law forty years more under Shemaiah and Abtalion, and after them he was president of the sanhedrim forty years more. The beginning of his presidency is generally concluded upon to have been just one hundred years before the temple was destroyed; by which account he began eight-and-twenty years before our Saviour was born, and died when he was about twelve years old. He is renowned for his fourscore scholars."—Lightfoot, vol. ii. p. 2003.

The great rival of Hillel was Shammai. Their controversies, and the fierceness of their partisans, are a principal feature of rabbinical history. They were the same as the Scotists and Thomists. At last the Bath Kol interfered, and decided for Hillel, but in a spirit of conciliatory dexterity. "The Bath Kol came forward and spake thus:—'The words both of the one party and the other are the words of the living God, but the certain decision of the matter is according to the decrees of the school of Hillel. And from henceforth, whoever shall transgress the decrees of the school of Hillel is guilty of death.'"

Maimon; "but what is the great treatise on Effecting Impossibilities to that profound, admirable, and——"

"Holy rabbi!" said a youthful reader of the synagogue, who now entered, "the hour is at hand."

"You don't say so! Learned Maimon, I must to the synagogue. I could sit here all day listening to you. Come, David, the people await us."

Zimri and Alroy quitted the house, and proceeded along the narrow hilly streets to the chief temple of the Hebrews.

"It grieves the venerable Maimon much that he cannot join us," said Rabbi Zimri. "You have doubtless heard of him at Bagdad; a most learned doctor."

Alroy bowed in silence.

"He bears his years well. You would hardly believe that he was my master."

"I perceive that you inherit much of his erudition."

"You are kind. If he have breathed one year, Rabbi Maimon will be a hundred and ten next Passover."

"I doubt it not."

"When he is gathered to his fathers, a great light will be extinguished in Israel. You wanted to know something about the tombs of the kings; I told you he was your man. How full he was! His mind, sir, is an egg."

"A somewhat ancient one. I fear his guidance will hardly bring me the enviable fortune of King Pircandicus."

"Between ourselves, good David, talking of King Pircandicus, I cannot help fancying that the learned Maimon made a slight mistake. I hold Pircandicus was only a prince. It was after the captivity, and I know no authority for any of our rulers since the destruction, assuming a higher title. Clearly a prince, eh? But, though I would whisper to no one but you, I think our worthy friend grows a little old. We should remember his years, sir. A hundred and ten, next Passover. 'Tis a great burden."

"Ay! with his learning added, a very fearful burden indeed!"

"You have been a week in Jerusalem, and have not yet visited our synagogue. It is not of cedar and ivory, but it is still a temple. This way. Is it only a week that you have been here? Why, you look another man! I shall never forget our first meeting: you did not know me. That was good, eh? And when I told you I was the chief Rabbi Zimri, how you changed! You have quite regained your appetite. Ah! 'tis pleasant to mix once more with our own people. To the left. So! we must descend a little. We hold our meetings in an ancient cemetery. You have a finer temple, I warrant me, in Bagdad. Jerusalem is not Bagdad, but this has its conveniences. 'Tis safe, and we are not very rich, nor wish to seem so."

IV.

A LONG passage brought them to a number of small square low chambers leading into each other.* They were lighted by brass lamps, placed at intervals in vacant niches, that once held corpses, and which were now soiled by the smoky flame. Between two and three hundred individuals were assembled in these chambers, at first scarcely distinguishable by those who descended from the broad daylight: but by degrees the eyesight became accustomed to the dim and vaporous atmosphere, and Alroy recognised in the final and more illumined chamber a high cedar cabinet, the type of the ark, and which held the sacred vessels, and the sanctified copy of the law.

* These excavated cemeteries which abound in Palestine and Egypt were often converted into places of worship by the Jews and early Christians. Sandys thus describes the synagogue at Jerusalem in his time.

Standing in lines, with their heads mystically covered,[†] the forlorn remnant of Israel, captives in their ancient city, avowed, in spite of all their suffering, their fidelity to their God, and notwithstanding all the bitterness of hope delayed, their faith in the fulfilment of his promises. Their simple service was completed, their prayers were read, their responses made, their law exhibited, and their charitable offerings announced by their high priest. After the service, the venerable Zimri, opening a volume of the Talmud, and fortified by the opinions of all these illustrious and learned doctors, the heroes of his erudite conversations with the aged Maimon, expounded the law to the congregation of the people.‡

"It is written," said the rabbi, "Thou shalt have none other God but me.' Now know ye, what our father Abraham said when Nimrod ordered him to worship fire? 'Why not water,' answered Abraham, 'which can put out fire? why not the clouds, which can pour forth water? why not the winds, which can produce clouds? why not God, which can create winds?'"

A murmur of approbation sounded throughout the congregation.

"Eli ezer," said Zimri, addressing himself to a young rabbi, "it is written, that He took a rib from Adam when he was asleep. Is God then a robber?"

The young rabbi looked puzzled, and cast his eyes on the ground. The congregation was very perplexed and a little alarmed.

"Is there no answer?" said Zimri.

"Rabbi," said a stranger, a tall, swarthy African pilgrim, standing in a corner, and enveloped in a red mantle, over which a lamp threw a flickering light. "Rabbi, some robbers broke into my house last night, and stole an earthen pipkin, but they left a golden vase in its stead."

"It is well said, it is well said," exclaimed the congregation. The applause was loud.

"Learned Zimri," continued the African, "it is written in the Gemara, that there was a youth in Jerusalem who fell in love with a beautiful damsel, and she scorned him. And the youth was so stricken with his passion that he could not speak; but when he beheld her, he looked at her imploringly, and she laughed. And one day the youth, not knowing what to do with himself, went out into the desert; and towards night he returned home, but the gates of the city were shut. And he went down into the valley of Jehoshaphat, and entered the tomb of Absalom and slept;§ and he dreamed a dream: and next morning he came into the city smiling. And the maiden met him, and she said, 'Is that thou; art thou a laugher?' And he answered, 'Behold, yesterday being disconsolate, I went out of the city into the desert, and I returned home, and the gates of the city were shut, and I went down into the valley of Jehoshaphat, and I entered the tomb of Absalom, and I slept, and I dreamed a dream, and ever since then I have laughed.' And the damsel said, 'Tell me thy dream.' And he answered and said, 'I may not tell my dream only to my wife, for it regards her honour.' And the maiden grew sad curious, and said, 'I am thy wife, tell me thy dream.' And straightforth they went and were married, and ever after they both laughed. Now, learned Zimri, what means this tale, an idle jest for a master of the law, yet it is written by the greatest doer of the captivity?"

"It passeth my comprehension," said the chief rabbi.

Rabbi Eliezer was silent; the congregation groaned.

"Now hear the interpretation," said the African. "The youth is our people, and the damsel is our lost Sion, and the tomb of Absalom proves that salvation can only come from the house of David. Dost thou hear this, young man?" said the African, coming forward, and laying his hand on Alroy, "I speak to thee, because I have observed a deep attention in thy conduct."

The prince of the captivity started, and shot a glance at the dark visage before him, but the glance read nothing. The upper part of the countenance of the African was half concealed by masses of dark matted hair, and the lower by his uncouth robes. A flashing eye was its only characteristic, which darted forth like lightning out of a black cloud.

"Is my attention the only reason that induces you to address me?" inquired Alroy.

"Who ever gave all his reasons?" replied the African with a laughing sneer.

"I seek not to learn them. Suffice it, stranger, that how much soever you may mean, as much I can understand."

"Tis well—learned Zimri, is this thy pupil? I congratulate thee, I will match him against the hopeful Eliezer." So saying, the lofty African stalked out of the chamber. The assembly also broke up. Alroy would willingly have immediately followed the African, and held some further and more private conversation with him; but some minutes elapsed, owing to the officious attentions of Zimri, before he could escape; and when he did, his search after the stranger was vain. He inquired among the congregation, but no one knew the African. He was no man's guest, and no man's debtor, and apparently had never before been seen.

He wandered among the mountains for some time, beholding Jerusalem from a hundred different points of view, and watching the single planets and clustering constellations that gradually burst into beauty or gathered into light. At length, somewhat exhausted, he descended into the vale. The scanty rill of Siloah* looked like a thread of silver winding in the moonlight. Some houseless wretches were slumbering under the arch of its fountain. Several isolated tombs of considerable size † rose at the base of Olivet, and into the largest of these Alroy entered. He entered through a narrow passage into a small square chamber. On each side was an empty sarcophagus of granite, one with its lid broken. Between these the prince of the captivity laid his robe, and, wearied by his ramble, soon soundly slept.

After some hours he awoke. He fancied that he had been awakened by the sound of voices. The chamber was not quite dark. A straggling moonbeam fought its way through an open fret-work pattern in the top of the tomb, and just revealed the dim interior. Suddenly a voice spoke—a strange and singular voice.

"Brother, brother, the sounds of the night begin."

Another voice answered,

"Brother, brother, I hear them, too."

"The woman in labour!"

"The thief at his craft!"

"The sentinel's challenge!"

"The murderer's step!"

"O! the merry sounds of the night!"

"Brother, brother, let us come forth and wander about the world."

"We have seen all things. I'll lie here and listen to the baying hound. 'Tis music for a tomb."

"Choice and rare. You are idle. I like to sport in the starry air. Our hours are few—they should be fair."

"What shall we see—heaven or earth?"

"Hell for me—'tis more amusing."

"As for me, I am sick of Hades."

"Let us visit Solomon!"

"In his unknown metropolis?"

"That will be rare."

"But, where, O! where?"

"Even a spirit cannot tell. But they say, but they say—I dare not whisper what they say."

"Who told you?"

"No one. I overheard an Afrite whispering to a female Ghoul he wanted to seduce."

"Hah! hah! hah! halt! choice pair! choice pair! We are more ethereal."

"She was a beauty in her way. Her eyes were luminous, though somewhat dank, and her cheek tinged with carnation caught from infant blood."

"O! gay, O! gay—what said they?"

"He was a deserter without leave from Solo-

The trumpet was sounding to close the gates, as Alroy passed the Sion entrance. The temptation was irresistible. He rushed out, and ran for more than one hundred yards without looking back, and when he did, he had the satisfaction of ascertaining that he was fairly shut out for the night. The sun had set, still the mount of Olives was flushed with the reflection of his dying beams, but Jehoshaphat at its feet was in deep shadow.

* The sublime Siloah is now a muddy rill; you descend by steps to the fountain which is its source, and which is covered with an arch. Here the blind man received his sight: and singular enough, to this very day the healing reputation of its waters prevails, and summons to its brink all those neighbouring Arabs who suffer from the ophthalmic affections not uncommon in this part of the world.

† There are no remains of ancient Jerusalem, or the ancient Jews. Some tombs there are which may be ascribed to the Assmolean princes; but all the monuments of David and Solomon, and their long posterity, have utterly disappeared.

mon's body-guard. The trull wriggled the secret out."

"Tell me, kind brother."

"I'll show, not tell."

"I pr'ythee tell me."

"Well, then, well. In Gentesma's gloomy cave there is a river none has reached, and you must sail, and you must sail——Brother!"

"Ay."

"Methinks I smell something too earthly."

"What's that?"

"The breath of man."

"Scent more fatal than the morning air! Away, away!"

VI.

IN the range of mountains that lead from Olivet to the river Jordan is the great cavern of Gentesma, a mighty excavation formed by the combined and immemorial work of nature and of art. For on the high basaltic columns are cut strange characters and unearthly forms,* and in many places the natural ornaments have been completed by the hands of the sculptor into symmetrical entablatures and fanciful capitals. The work, they say, of captive Dives and conquered Afrites, for the great king.

It was midnight; the cold full moon showered its brilliancy upon this narrow valley, shut in on all sides by black and barren mountains. A single being stood at the entrance of the cave.

It was Alroy. Desperate and determined, after listening to the two spirits in the tomb, he was resolved to penetrate the mysteries of Gentesma. He took from his girdle a flint and steel, with which he lighted a torch, and then he entered.

The cavern narrowed as he cautiously advanced, and soon he found himself at the head of an evidently artificial gallery. A crowd of bats rushed forward and extinguished his torch.† He leaned down to relight it, and in so doing observed that he trod upon an artificial pavement.

The gallery was of great extent, with a gradual declination.‡ Being in a straight line with the mouth of the cavern, the moonlit scene was long visible; but Alroy, on looking round, now perceived that the exterior was shut out by the eminence that he had left behind him. The sides of the gallery were covered with strange and sculptured forms.

The prince of the captivity proceeded along this gallery for nearly two hours. A distant murmur of falling water, which might have been distinguished nearly from the first, increased in sound as he advanced, and now, from the loud roar and dash at hand, he felt that he was on the brink of some cataract. It was very dark. His heart trembled. He felt his footing ere he ventured to advance. The spray suddenly leaped forward, and extinguished his torch. His imminent danger filled him with terror, and he receded some paces, but in vain endeavoured to reillumine his torch, which was soaked with the water.

His courage deserted him. Energy and exertion seemed hopeless. He was about to deliver himself up to despair, when an expanding lustre attracted his attention in the opposing gloom.

A small and bright red cloud seemed sailing towards him. It opened, discharged from its bosom a silvery star, and dissolved again into darkness. But the star remained, the silvery star, and threw a long line of tremulous light upon the vast and raging rapid, which now, fleet and foaming, revealed itself on all sides to the eye of Alroy.

The beautiful interposition in his favour reanimated the adventurous pilgrim. A dark shadow in the foreground, breaking the line of light shed by the star upon the waters, attracted his attention. He advanced, regained his former footing, and more nearly examined it. It was a boat, and in the boat, mute and immovable, sat one of those vast, singular, and hideous forms, which he had observed sculptured on the walls of the gallery.

David Alroy, committing his fortunes to the God of Israel, leaped into the boat.

VII.

AND at the same moment the Afrite,* for it was one of those dread beings, raised the oars, and the boat moved. The falling waters suddenly parted in the long line of the star's reflection, and the bark glided through their high and severed masses.

In this wise they proceeded for a few minutes, until they entered a beautiful and moonlit lake. In the distance was a mountainous country. Alroy examined his companion with a feeling of curiosity not unmixed with terror. It was remarkable that Alroy could never succeed in any way attracting his notice. The Afrite seemed totally unconscious of the presence of his passenger. At length the boat reached the opposite shore of the lake, and the prince of the captivity disembarked.

He disembarked at the head of an avenue of colossal lions of red granite,† which extended far as the eye could reach, and which ascended the side of the mountain, which was cut into a flight of magnificent steps. The easy ascent was in consequence soon accomplished, and Alroy, proceeding along the avenue of lions, soon gained the summit of the mountain.

To his infinite astonishment, he beheld Jerusalem. That strongly marked locality could not be mistaken: at his feet was Jehoshaphat, Kedron, Siloa: he stood upon Olivet; before him was Sion. But in all other respects, how different was the landscape to the one he had gazed upon a few days back, for the first time! The surrounding hills sparkled with vineyards, and glowed with summer palaces, and voluptuous pavilions, and glorious gardens of pleasure. The city, extending all over Mount Sion, was encompassed with a wall of white marble, with battlements of gold, a gorgeous mass of gates and pillars, and gardened terraces, lofty piles of rarest materials, cedar, and ivory, and precious stones, and costly columns of the richest workmanship, and the most fanciful orders, capitals of the lotus and the palm, and flowing friezes of the olive and the vine.

* Beings of a monstrous form, the most terrible of all the orders of the Dives.

† An avenue of sphinxes more than a mile in length connected the quarters of Luxor and Carnac in Egyptian Thebes. Its fragments remain. Many other avenues of sphinxes and lion-headed kings may be observed in various parts of Upper Egypt.

* As at Benihassan, and many other of the sculptured catacombs of Egypt.

† In entering the temple of Dendera, our torches were extinguished by a crowd of bats.

‡ So, in the great Egyptian tombs.

And in the front a mighty temple rose, with inspiration in its very form, a temple so vast, so sumptuous, there required no priest to tell us that no human hand planned that sublime magnificence!

"God of my fathers!" said Alroy, "I am a poor, weak thing, and my life has been a life of dreams and visions, and I have sometimes thought my brain lacked a sufficient master—where am I? Do I keep or live? Am I a slumberer or a ghost? This trial is too much." He sank down and hid his face in his hands: his over-exerted mind appeared to desert him; he wept hysterically.

Many minutes elapsed before Alroy grew composed. His wild bursts of weeping sank into sobs, and the sobs died off into sighs. And at length, calm from exhaustion, he again looked up, and lo! the glorious city was no more! Before him was a moonlit plain, over which the avenue of lions still advanced, and appeared to terminate only in the mountainous distance.

This limit, the prince of the captivity at length reached, and stood before a stupendous portal, cut out of the solid rock, four hundred feet in height, and supported by clusters of colossal caryatides.* Upon the portals were engraven some Hebrew characters, which, upon examination, proved to be the same as those upon the talisman of Jabaster. And so taking from his bosom that all-precious and long-cherished deposit, David Alroy, in obedience to his instructions, pressed the signet against the gigantic portal.

The portal opened with a crash of thunder louder than an earthquake. Pale, panting, and staggering, the prince of the captivity entered an illimitable hall, illumined by pendulous and stupendous balls of glowing metal. On each side of the hall, sitting on golden thrones, was ranged a line of kings, and as the pilgrim entered, the monarchs rose, and took of their diadems, and waved them thrice, and thrice repeated, in solemn chorus, "All hail, Alroy! Hail to thee, brother king. Thy crown awaits thee!"

The prince of the captivity stood trembling, with his eyes fixed upon the ground, and leaning breathless against a column. And when at length, he had a little recovered himself, and dared again to look up, he found the monarchs were reseated; and, from their still and vacant visages, apparently unconscious of his presence. And this emboldened him, and so staring alternately at each side of the hall, but with a firm, perhaps desperate step, Alroy advanced.

And he came to two thrones which were set apart from the others in the middle of the hall. On one was seated a noble figure, far above the common stature, with arms folded and downcast eyes. His feet rested upon a broken sword, and a shivered sceptre, which told he was a monarch, in spite of his disrowned head.

And on the opposite throne was a venerable personage, with a long flowing beard, and dressed in white raiment. His countenance was beautiful, although ancient. Age had stole on without its imperfections, and time had only invested it with a sweet dignity and solemn grace. The countenance of the king was upraised with a seraphic gaze, and as he thus looked up on high, with eyes full of love, and thanksgiving, and praise, his consecrated fingers seemed to touch the trembling wires of a golden harp.

And further on, and far above the rest, upon a throne that stretched across the hall, a most imperial presence straightway flashed upon the startled vision of Alroy. Fifty steps of ivory, and each step guarded by golden lions,* led to a throne of jasper. A dazzling light blazed forth from the glittering diadem and radiant countenance of him who sat upon the throne—one beautiful as a woman, but with the majesty of a god. And in one hand he held a seal, and in the other a sceptre.

And when Alroy had reached the foot of the throne, he stopped, and his heart misgave him. And he prayed for some minutes in silent devotion, and without daring to look up, he mounted the first step of the throne, and the second, and the third, and so on, with slow and faltering feet, until he reached the forty-ninth step.

The prince of the captivity raised his eyes. He stood before the monarch face to face. In vain Alroy attempted to attract his attention, or to fix his gaze. The large black eyes, full of supernatural lustre, appeared capable of piercing all things, and illuminating all things, but they flashed on without shedding a ray upon Alroy.

Pale as a spectre, the pilgrim, whose pilgrimage seemed now on the point of completion, stood cold and trembling before the object of all his desires, and all his labours. But he thought of his country, his people, and his God, and while his noiseless lips breathed the name of Jehovah, solemnly he put forth his arm, and with a gentle firmness grasped the unresisting sceptre of his great ancestor.

And as he seized it, the whole scene vanished from his sight.

VIII.

Hours or years might have passed away, as far as the sufferer was concerned, when Alroy again returned to self-consciousness. His eyes slowly opened, he cast round a vacant stare, he was lying in the cavern of Gentesma. The moon had set, but the morn had not broken. A single star glittered over the brow of the black mountains. He faintly moved his limbs, he would have raised his hand to his bewildered brain, but found that it grasped a sceptre. The memory of the past returned to him. He tried to rise, and found that he was reposing in the arms of a human being. He turned his head—he met the anxious gaze of Jabaster!

PART VII.

I.

"Your pace is troubled, uncle."

"So is my mind."

"All may go well."

"Miriam, we have seen the best. Prepare yourself for sorrow, gentle girl. I care not for myself, for I am old, and age makes heroes of us all. I have endured, and can endure more. As we approach our limit it would appear our minds grow callous. I have seen my wealth, raised with the labours of a thoughtful life, vanish in the morn; my people, a fragile remnant, nevertheless a people dispersed, or what is worse. I have wept for them, although no tear of selfish grief has tinged this withered cheek. And were I but alone—ay! there's the pang. The solace of my days is now my sorrow."

"Weep not for me, dear uncle. Rather let us pray our God will not desert us."

"We know not when we are well. Our hours stole tranquilly along, and then we murmured; prospering, we murmured, and now we are rightly stricken. The legend of the past is Israel's bane. The past is a dream; and in the waking present we should discard the enervating shadow. Why would we be free? We murmured against captivity. This is captivity: this damp, dim cell, where we are brought to die.

"O! youth, rash youth, thy being is destruction. But yesterday a child—it seems but yesterday I nursed him in these arms, a thoughtless child—and now our house has fallen by his deeds. I'll not think of it; 'twill make me mad."

"Uncle, dearest, dearest uncle, we have lived together, and we will die together, and both in love: but, but, I pray you,—speak no harsh word of David."

"Shall I praise him?"

"Say nothing. What he has done, if done in grief, has been done all in honour. Would you that he had spared Alschiroch?"

"Never! I would have struck him myself. Brave boy, he did his duty, and I—I, Miriam, thy uncle, at whom they wink behind his back and call him niggard, was I wanting in that hour of trial? Was my treasure spared to save my people? Did I shrink from all the toil and trouble of that time? A trying time, my Miriam, but compared with this, the building of the temple."

"You were then, what you have ever been, the best and wisest. And since our father's God did not desert us, even in that wilderness of wildest woe, I offer gratitude in present faith, and pay him for past mercies by my prayers for more."

"Well, well; life must end. The hour approaches when we must meet our rulers and mock trial; precious justice that begins in threats and ends in torture. You are silent, Miriam."

"I am speaking to my God."

"What is that noise? A figure moves behind the dusky grate. Our jailer. No, no, it is Caleb! Faithful child, I fear you have perilled much."

"I enter with authority, my lord, and bear good tidings."

"He smiles! Is't possible? Speak on, speak on!"

"Aloy has captured the harem of our governor, as they journeyed from Bagdad to this city, guarded by his choicest troops. And he has sent to offer that they shall be exchanged for you and for your household. And Hassan has answered that his women shall owe their freedom to nothing but his sword. But in the mean time it is agreed between him and the messenger of your nephew, that both companies of prisoners shall be treated with all becoming courtesy. You, therefore, are remanded to your palace, and the trumpet is now sounding before the great mosque to summon all the host against Aloy, whom Hassan has vowed to bring to Hamadan dead or alive."

"The harem of the governor, guarded too by his choicest troops. 'Tis a great deed. He did remember us. Faithful boy! The harem of the governor!—his choicest troops! 'Tis a very great deed. Methinks the Lord is with him. He has his great father's heart. Only think of David—a child! I nursed him—often. Caleb! Can this be David, our David, a child, a girl! Yet he struck Alschiroch! Miriam! where is she? Worthy Caleb, look to your mistress; she has fallen. Dead, quite dead. Fetch water. 'Tis not very pure—but we shall be in our palace soon. The harem of the governor! I can't believe it. Sprinkle, sprinkle. David take them prisoners! Why, when they pass, we are obliged to turn our heads, and dare not look. More water: I'll rub her hands. 'Tis warmer! Her eyes are open! Miriam, choicest news, my darling! The harem of the governor!—I'll not believe it!"

II.

"ONCE more within our walls, Caleb. Life is a miracle. I feel young again. This is home; and yet I am a prisoner. You said the host were assembling; he can have no chance. Think you, Caleb, he has any chance? I hope he will die. I would not have him taken. I fear their tortures. We will die too; we will all die. Now I am out of that dungeon, methinks I even could fight. Is it true that he has joined with robbers?"

"I saw the messenger, and learned that he first repaired to some bandits in the ruins in the desert. He had become acquainted with them in his pilgrimage. They say their leader is one of our people."

"I am glad of that. He can eat with him. I would not have him eat unclean things with the Ishmaelites."

"Lord, sir! our people gather to him from all quarters. 'Tis said Jabaster, the great cabalist, has joined him from the mountains with ten thousand men."

"The great Jabaster! then there is some chance. I know Jabaster well. He is too wise to join a desperate cause. Art sure about Jabaster? 'Tis a great name, a very potent spirit. I have heard such things of that Jabaster, sir, would make you stare like Saul before the spirit! Only think of our David, Caleb, making all this noise! I am full of hope. I feel not like a prisoner. He beat the harem guard, and now he has got Jabaster, he will beat them all."

"The messenger told me he captured the harem only to free his uncle and his sister."

"He ever loved me; I have done my duty to him. I think I have. Jabaster! why, man, the name is a spell! There are men at Bagdad who will get up in the night to join Jabaster. I hope David will follow his counsels in all things. I would I had seen his servant, I could have sent him a message."

"Lord, sir! the Prince Aloy has no great need of counsellors, I can tell you. 'Tis said he bears the sceptre of great Solomon, which he himself obtained in the unknown tombs of Palestine."

"The sceptre of Solomon!—could I but believe it! 'Tis an age of wonders! Where are we! Call for Miriam, I'll tell her this. Only think of David—a mere child—our David with the sceptre of Solomon! and Jabaster too! I have great faith. The Lord confound his enemies!"

III.

"GENTLE Rachel, I fear I trouble you; sweet Beruna. I thank you for your zeal. I am better now; the shock was great. These are strange tidings, maidens."

"Yes, dear lady! who would have thought of our brother turning out a captain?"

"I am sure I always thought he was the quietest person in the world," said Beruna, "though he did kill Alschiroch."

"One never could get a word out of him," said Rachel.

"He was always moping alone," said Beruna.

"And when one spoke to him he always turned away," said Leah.

"Or blushed," added Imra.

"Well, for my part," said the beautiful Bathsheba, "I always thought Prince David was a genius. He had such beautiful eyes!"

"I hope he will conquer Hassan," said Rachel.

"So do I," said Beruna.

"I wonder what he has done with the harem," said Leah.

"I don't think he will dare to speak to them," said Imra.

"You are very much mistaken," said Bathsheba.

"Hark!" said Miriam.

"'Tis Hassan," said Bathsheba; "may he never return!"

The wild drum of the Seljuks sounded, then a flourish of their fierce trumpets, and soon the tramp of horse. Behind the blinds of their chamber, Miriam and her maidens beheld the magnificent troop of turbaned horsemen, who, glittering with splendid armour and bright shawls, and proudly bounding on their fiery steeds, now went forth to crush and conquer the only hope of Israel. Upon an Arab, darker than night, rode the superb Hassan, and as he passed the dwelling of his late prisoners, whether from the exulting anticipation of coming triumph, or from a soft suspicion that, behind that lattice, bright eyes and brilliant faces were gazing on his state, the haughty but handsome Seljuk flourished his cimeter over his head, as he threw his managed steed into attitudes that developed the skill of its rider.

"He is handsomer than Alschiroch," said Rachel.

"What a shawl!" said Beruna.

"His cimeter was like lightning," said Leah.

"And his steed like thunder," said Imra.

"The evil eye fall on him!" said Bathsheba.

"Lord, remember David!" said Miriam, "and all his afflictions!"

IV.

THE deserted city of the wilderness presented a very different appearance to that which met the astonished gaze of Alroy when he first beheld its noble turrets, and wandered in its silent streets of palaces.

Without the gates was pitched a numerous camp of those low black tents common among the Kourds and Turkmans; the principal street was full of busy groups engaged in all the preparations of warfare, and all the bustling expedients of an irregular and adventurous life; steeds were stalled in ruined chambers, and tall camels raised their still visages among the clustering columns, or crouched in kneeling tranquillity amid fallen statues and prostrate obelisks.

Two months had scarcely elapsed since Alroy and Jabaster had sought Scherirah in his haunt, and announced to him their sacred mission. The callous heart of him, "whose mother was a Jewess," had yielded to their inspired annunciations. He embraced their cause with all the fervour of conversion, and his motley band were not long skeptical of a creed which, while it assuredly offered danger and adventure, held out the prospects of wealth and even empire. From the city of the wilderness the new Messiah sent forth his messengers to the neighbouring cities to announce his advent to his brethren in captivity. The Hebrews, a proud and stiff-necked race, ever prone to rebellion, received the announcement of their favourite prince with transport. The descendant of David, and the slayer of Alschiroch, had double claims upon their confidence and allegiance, and the flower of the Hebrew youth in the neighbouring cities of the caliphate repaired in crowds to pay their homage to the recovered sceptre of Solomon.

The affair was at first treated by the government with contempt, and the sultan of the Seljuks contented himself with setting a price upon the head of the murderer of his brother; but when several cities had been placed under contribution, and more than one Moslem caravan stopped and plundered in the name of the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, orders were despatched from Bagdad to the new Governor of Hamadan, Hassan Subah, to suppress the robbers, or the rebels, and to send David Alroy dead or alive to the capital.

The Hebrew malcontents were well apprized by their less adventurous, but still sympathizing brethren, of every thing that took place at the headquarters of the enemy. Spies arrived on the same day at the city of the wilderness, who informed Alroy that his uncle was thrown into a dungeon at Hamadan, and that a body of chosen troops were about to escort a royal harem of Bagdad into Persia.

Alroy attacked the escort in person, utterly discomfited them, and captured their charge. It proved to be the harem of the Governor of Hamadan, and if, for a moment, the too sanguine fancy of the captor experienced a passing pang of disappointment, the prize at least obtained, as we have seen, the freedom and security of his dear, though distant friends. This exploit precipitated the expedition which was preparing at Hamadan for his destruction. The enraged Hassan Subah started from his divan, seized his cimeter, and without waiting for the auxiliaries he had summoned from the neighbouring chieftains, called to horse, and at the head of two thousand of the splendid Seljukian cavalry, hurried to vindicate his love, and satiate his revenge.

Within the amphitheatre which he first entered as a prisoner, Alroy sat in council. On his right was Jabaster; Scherirah on his left. A youth, little his senior, but tall as a palm tree, and strong as a young lion, was the fourth captain. In the distance, some standing, some reclining, were about fifty men completely armed.

"Are the people numbered, Abner?" inquired Alroy of the youth.

"Even so; three hundred effective horsemen, and two thousand footmen; but the footmen lack arms."

"The Lord will send them in good time," said Jabaster, "meanwhile let them continue to make javelins."

"Trust in the Lord," murmured Scherirah, bending his head, with his eyes fixed on the ground.

A loud shout was heard throughout the city. Alroy started from his carpet. The messenger had returned. Pale and haggard, covered with sweat and sand, the faithful envoy was borne into the amphitheatre almost upon the shoulders of the people. In vain the guard endeavoured to stem the passage of the multitude. They clambered up the tiers of arches, they filled the void and crumbling seats of the antique circus, they supported themselves upon each other's shoulders, they clung to the capitals of the lofty columns. The whole multitude had assembled to hear the intelligence; the scene recalled the ancient purpose of the building, and Alroy and his fellow-warriors seemed like the gladiators of some old spectacle.

"Speak," said Alroy, "speak the worst. No news can be bitter to those whom the Lord will avenge."

"Ruler of Israel! thus saith Hassan Subah," answered the messenger; "My harem shall owe their freedom to nothing but my sword. I treat not with rebels, but I war not with age or woman; and between Bostenay and his household on one side, and the prisoners of thy master on the other, let there be peace. Go tell Alroy, I will seal it in his best blood. And lo! thy uncle and thy sister are again in their palace."

Alroy placed his hand for a moment to his eyes, and then instantly resuming his self-possession, he inquired as to the movements of the enemy.

"I have crossed the desert on a swift dromedary* lent to me by Shelomi of the Gate, whose heart is with our cause. I have not tarried, neither have I slept. Ere to-morrow's sunset, the Philistines will be here, led by Hassan Subah himself. The Lord of Hosts be with us! Since we conquered Canaan, Israel hath not struggled with such a power!"

A murmur ran through the assembly. Men exchanged inquiring glances, and involuntarily pressed each other's arms.

"The trial has come," said a middle-aged Hebrew, who had fought twenty years ago with Jabaster.

"Let me die for the ark!" said a young enthusiast of the band of Abner.

"I thought we should get into a scrape," whispered Kisloch, the Kourid, to Calidas, the Indian. "What could have ever induced us to give up robbing in a quiet manner?"

"And turn Jews!" said the Guebre, with a sneer.

"Look at Scherirah," said the Negro, grinning. "If he is not kissing the sceptre of Solomon!"

"I wish to heaven he had only hung Alroy the first time he met him," said Calidas.

"Sons of the Covenant!" exclaimed Alroy, "the Lord hath delivered them into our hands. To-morrow eve we march to Hamadan!"

A cheer followed this exclamation.

"It is written," said Jabaster, opening a volume, "Lo! I will defend this city, to save it, for mine own sake, and for my servant David's sake.

"And it came to pass that night, that the angel of the Lord went out and smote in the camp of the Assyrians, an hundred fourscore and five thousand. And when they arose early in the morning, behold! they were all dead corpses."

"Now, as I was gazing upon the stars this morn, reading that celestial alphabet* known to the true cabalist, behold! the star of the house of David and seven other stars moved and met together, and formed into a circle. And the world they formed was a mystery to me; but lo! I have opened the book, and each star is the initial letter of each line of the targum that I have now read to you. Therefore the fate of Sennacherib is the fate of Hassan Subah!

"Trust in him at all times, ye people; pour out your heart before him: God is a refuge for us. Selah!"

Suddenly a female form appeared upon the very top of the amphitheatre, upon the slight remains of the uppermost tier, of which a solitary arch alone was left. The chorus instantly died away, every tongue was silent, every eye fixed. Hushed, mute, and immovable, even Kisloch and his companions were appalled as they gazed upon Esther the prophetess.

Her eminent position, her imposing action, the flashing of her immense eyes, her beautiful but awful countenance, her black hair, that hung almost to her knees, and the white light of the moon, just rising over the opposite side of the amphitheatre, and which threw a silvery flash upon her form, and seemed to invest her with some miraculous emanation, while all beneath her were in deep gloom, all these circumstances combined, rendered her an object of universal interest and attention, while in a powerful, but very high voice, she thus addressed them.

"They come, they come! But will they go? Lo! hear ye this, O house of Jacob, which are called by the name of Israel, and are come forth out of the waters of Judah! I hear their drum in the desert, and the voice of their trumpets is like the wind of eve, but a decree hath gone forth, and it says, that a mortal shall be more precious than fine gold, yea, a man than the rich ore of Ophir.

"They come, they come! But will they go? I see the flash of their cimeters, I mark the prancing of their cruel steeds; but a decree hath gone forth, and it says, a gleaning shall be left among them, as in the shaking of the olive tree; two or three berries on the top of the uppermost bough; four or five on the straggling branches.

"They come, they come! But will they go? Lo! a decree hath gone forth, and it says, Hamadan shall be to thee for a spoil, and desolation shall fall upon Babylon. And there shall the wild beasts of the desert lodge, and howling monsters shall fill their houses, and there shall the daughters of the ostrich dwell, and there shall the screech-owl pitch her tent, and there shall the night-raven lay her eggs, and there shall the satyrs hold their revels, and wolves shall howl to one another in their palaces, and dragons in their voluptuous pavilions. Her time is near at hand, her days shall not be prolonged, the reed and the lotus shall wither in her rivers, and the meadows by her canals shall be as the sands of the desert. For is it a light thing that the Lord should send his servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and to restore the preserved of Israel! Sing, O heavens, and be joyful, O earth, and break forth into singing, O mountains, for the Lord hath comforted his people, and will have mercy upon his afflicted!"

She ceased, she descended the precipitous side of the amphitheatre, with rapid steps, vaulting from tier to tier, and bounding with wonderful agility from one mass of ruin to another. At length she reached the level; and then, foaming and panting, she rushed to Aloy, threw herself upon the ground, embraced his feet, and wiped off the dust from his sandals with her hair.

The assembly broke into long and loud acclamations of supernatural confidence, and sanguine enthusiasm. They beheld their Messiah wave his miraculous sceptre. They thought of Hassan Subah and his Seljuks only as of victims, and of tomorrow only as of a day which was to commence a new era of triumph, freedom and empire!

V.

HASSAN SUBAH, after five days of forced marches, pitched his sumptuous pavilion in that beautiful oasis, which had afforded such delightful refreshment to Aloy when a solitary pilgrim. Around, for nearly half a mile, were the tents of his warriors, and of the numerous caravans that had accompanied him, laden with water and provisions for his troops. Here, while he reposed, he also sought information as to the position of his enemy.

A party of observation, which he had immediately despatched, returned almost instantly with a small caravan that had been recently plundered by the robbers. The merchant, a venerable and pious Moslem, was ushered into the presence of the governor of Hamadan.

"From the robbers" haunt?" inquired Hassan.

"Unfortunately so," answered the merchant.

"Is it far?"

"A day's journey."

"And you quitted it?"

"Yesterday morn."

"What is their force?"

The merchant hesitated.

"Do they not make prisoners?" inquired the governor, casting a scrutinizing glance at his companion.

"Holy prophet! what a miserable wretch am I!" exclaimed the venerable merchant, bursting into tears. "A faithful subject of the caliph, I am obliged to serve rebels—a devout Moslem, I am forced to aid Jews! Order me to be hanged at once, my lord," continued the unfortunate merchant, wringing his hands. "Order me to be hanged at once. I have lived long enough."

"What is all this?" inquired Hassan; "speak, friend, without fear."

"I am a faithful subject of the caliph," answered the merchant; "I am a devout Moslem, but I have lost ten thousand dirhems."

"I am sorry for you, sir; I also have lost something, but my losses are nothing to you, nor yours to me."

"Accursed be the hour when these dogs tempted me! Tell me, is it a sin to break faith with a Jew?"

"On the contrary, I could find you many reverend mollahs, who will tell you that such a breach is the highest virtue. Come, come, I see how it is: you have received your freedom on condition of not betraying your merciful plunderers. Promises exacted by terror are the bugbears of fools. Speak, man, all you know. Where are they? What is their force? Are we supposed at hand?"

"I am a faithful subject of the caliph, and I am bound to serve him," replied the merchant; "I am a devout Moslem, and 'tis my duty to destroy all Giaours, but I am also a man, and I must look after my own interest. Noble governor, the long and the short is, these scoundrels have robbed me of ten thousand dirhems, as my slaves will tell you; at least, goods to that amount. No one can prove that they be worth less. It is true that I include in that calculation the fifty per cent. I was to make on my shawls at Hamadan, but still to me it is as good as ten thousand dirhems. Ask my slaves if such an assortment of shawls was ever yet beheld."

"To the point, to the point. The robbers?"

"I am at the point. The shawls is the point. For when I talked of the shawls and the heaviness of my loss, you must know that the captain of the robbers—"

"Aloy?"

"A very fierce young gentleman; I don't know how they call him. Says the captain to me, 'Merchant, you look gloomy.' 'Gloomy,' says I, 'you would look gloomy if you were a prisoner, and had lost ten thousand dirhems.' 'What, is this trash worth ten thousand dirhems?' says he. 'With the fifty per cent, I was to make at Hamadan,' says I. 'Fifty per cent,' says he, 'you are an old knave.' 'Knave,' said I, 'I should like to hear any one call me a knave at Bagdad.' 'Well, knave or not,' says he, 'you may get out of this scrape.' 'How?' says I. 'Why you are a very respectable looking man,' says he, 'and are a good Moslem in the bargain, I warrant.' 'That I am,' says I 'although you be a Jew: but how the faith is to serve me here I am sure I do not know, unless the angel Gabriel, as in the fifty-fifth verse of the twenty-seventh chapter of the Koran—'"

"Hush, hush, hush!" exclaimed Hassan; "to the point!—to the point!"

"I always am at the point, only you put me out. However, to make it as short as possible, the captain knows all about your coming, and is frightened out of his wits, although he did talk big; I could easily see that. And he let me go, you see, with some of my slaves, and gave me an order for five thousand dirhems on one Bostenay, of Hamadan, (perhaps you know him, I don't; is he a good man?) on condition that I would fall in with you, and, Mohammed forgive me, tell you a lie!"

"A lie!"

"Yes! a lie; but these Jewish dogs don't understand what a truly religious man is, and when I began to tell the lie, I was soon put out. Now, noble Hassan, if a promise to a Jew be not binding on a true believer, and you will see me straight with the five thousand dirhems, I will betray every thing at once.

"Be easy about the five thousand dirhems, good man, and tell me all."

"You will see me paid?"

"My honour upon it."

"'Tis well! Know then, the infamous dogs are very weak, and terrified at the news of your progress: one, whom I think they call Jabaster, has departed with the great majority of the people into the interior of the desert, about seven hundred strong. I heard so; but mind, I don't know it. The young man, whom you call Alroy, being wounded in a recent conflict, could not depart with them, but remains among the ruins with some female prisoners, some treasure, and about a hundred companions hidden in sepulchres. He gave me my freedom on condition I fell in with you, and assured you that the dogs, full five thousand strong, had given you the go by in the night, and marched towards Hamadan. They wanted me to frighten you; it was a lie, and I could not tell it. And now you know the plain truth; and if it be a sin to break faith with an infidel, you are responsible for it, as well as for the five thousand dirhems, which, by-the-by, ought to have been ten."

"Where is your order?"

"'Tis here," said the merchant, drawing it from his vest, "a very business-like document, drawn upon one Bostenay, whom they described as very rich, and who is here enjoined to pay me five thousand dirhems, if, in consequence of my information, Hassan Subah, that is, yourself, return forthwith to Hamadan without attacking them."

"Old Bostenay's head shall answer for this."

"I'm glad of it. But were I you, I would make him pay me first."

"Merchant," said Hassan, "have you any objection to pay another visit to your friend Alroy?"

"Allah forbid!"

"In my company?"

"That makes a difference."

"Be our guide. The dirhems shall be doubled."

"That will make up for the fifty per cent. I hardly like it; but in your company, that makes a difference. Lose no time. If you push on, Alroy must be captured. Now or never! The Jewish dogs, to rifle a true believer!"

"Oglu," said Hassan to one of his officers. "To horse! You need not strike the tents. Can we reach the city by sunset, merchant?"

"An hour before, if you be off' at once."

"Sound the drums. To horse, to horse!"

VI.

The Seljuks halted before the walls of the deserted city. Their commander ordered a detachment to enter and reconnoitre. They returned and reported its apparent desolation. Hassan Subah, then directing that a guard should surround the walls to prevent any of the enemy from escaping, passed with his warriors through the vast portal into the silent street.

The still magnificence of the strange and splendid scene influenced the temper even of this ferocious cavalry. They gazed around them with awe and admiration. The fierceness of their visages was softened, the ardour of their impulse stilled. A supernatural feeling of repose stole over their senses. No one brandished his cimeter, the fiery courser seemed as subdued as his lord, and no sound was heard but the melancholy, mechanical tramp of the disciplined march, unrelieved by martial music, inviolate by oath or jest, and unbroken even by the ostentatious caraoeling of any showy steed.

It was sunset: the star of eve glittered over the white Ionian fane that rose serene and delicate in the flashing and purple sky.

"This way, my lord," said the merchant guide, turning round to Hassan Subah, who, surrounded by his officers, led the van. The whole of the great way of the city was filled with the Seljukian warriors. Their ebon steeds, their snowy turbans, adorned with plumes of the black eagle and the red heron, their dazzling shawls, the blaze of their armour in the sunset, and the long undulating perspective of beautiful forms and brilliant colours,—this regiment of heroes in a street of palaces,—war had seldom afforded a more imposing, or a more picturesque spectacle.

"This way, my lord," said the merchant, pointing to the narrow turning that, at the foot of the temple, led, through ruined streets, to the amphitheatre.

"Halt!" exclaimed a wild, shrill voice.

Each warrior suddenly arrested his horse.

"Who spoke?" exclaimed Hassan Subah.

"I!" answered a voice. A female form stood in the portico of the temple, with uplifted arms.

"And who art thou?" inquired Hassan Subah, not a little disconcerted.

"Thy evil genius, Seljuk!"

Hassan Subah, pale as his ivory battle-axe, did not answer; every man within hearing shuddered; still the dread woman remained immovable within the porch of the temple.

"Woman, witch, or goddess," at length exclaimed Hassan Subah, "what wouldst thou here?"

"Seljuk! behold this star. 'Tis a single drop of light, yet who even of thy wild band can look upon it without awe. And yet thou, worse than Sisera, thou comest to combat against those, for whom even 'the stars in courses fought.'"

"A Jewish witch!" exclaimed the Seljuk.

"A Jewish witch! Be it so; behold then my spell falls upon thee, and that spell is Destruction.

"Awake, awake, Deborah: awake, awake, utter a song; arise, Bōrak, and lead thy captivity captive, thou son of Abinoam!"

Immediately the sky appeared to darken, a cloud of arrows and javelins broke from all sides upon the devoted Seljuks: immense masses of stone and marble were hurled from all directions, horses were stabbed by spears impelled by invisible hands, and riders fell to the ground without a struggle, and were trampled upon by their disordered and affrighted brethren.

"We are betrayed," exclaimed Hassan Subah, hurling a javelin at the merchant, but the merchant was gone. The Seljuks raised their famous war-ery.

"Oglu, regain the desert," ordered the chieftain.

But no sooner had the guard without the walls heard the war-ery of their companions, than, alarmed for their safety, they rushed to their assistance. The retreating forces of Subah, each instant diminishing as they retreated, were baffled in their project by the very eagerness of their auxiliaries. The unwilling contention of the two parties increased the confusion; and when the Seljuks, recently arrived, having at length formed into some order, had regained the gate, they found to their dismay that the portal was barricaded and garrisoned by the enemy. Uninspired by the presence of their commander, who was in the rear, the puzzled soldiers were seized with a panic, and, spurring their horses, dispersed in all directions of the city. In vain Hassan Subah endeavoured to recall order. The moment was past. Dashing with about thirty men to an open ground, which his quick eye had observed in his progress down the street, and dealing destruction with every blow the dreaded Governor of Hamadan, like a true soldier, awaited an inevitable fate, not wholly desperate that some chance might yet turn up to extricate him from his forlorn situation.

And now, as it were by enchantment, wild armed men seemed to arise from every part of the city. From every mass of ruin, from every crumbling temple and mouldering mansion, from every catacomb and cellar, from behind every column and every obelisk, upstarted some desperate warrior with a bloody weapon. The massacre of the Seljuks was universal. The horsemen dashed wildly about the ruined streets, pursued by crowds of footmen; sometimes formed in small companies, the Seljuks frequently charged and fought desperately; but however stout might be their resistance to the open foe, it was impossible to withstand their secret enemies. They had no place of refuge, no power of gaining even a moment's breathing time. If they retreated to a wall, it instantly bristled with spears; if they endeavoured to form in a court, they sank under the falling masses which were showered upon them from all directions. Strange shouts of denunciation blended with the harsh crying of horns, and the clang and clash of cymbals and tambours sounded in every quarter of the city.

"If we could only mount the walls, Ibrahim, and leap into the desert," exclaimed Hassan Subah to one of his few remaining comrades. "'Tis our only chance. We die here like dogs! Could I but meet Alroy!"

Three of the Seljuks dashed swiftly across the open ground in front, followed by several Hebrew horsemen.

"Smite all, Abner. Spare none, remember Amalek!" exclaimed their youthful leader, waving his bloody cimier.

"They are down,—one, two,—there goes the third. My javelin has done for him."

"Your horse bleeds freely. Where's Jabaster?"

"At the gates: my arm aches with slaughter. The Lord hath delivered them into our hands. Could I but meet their chieftain!"

"Turn, bloodhound, he is here," exclaimed Hassan Subah.

"Away, Abner, this affair is mine."

"Prince, you have already slain your thousands."

"And Abner his tens of thousands. Is it so? This business is for me only. Come on, Turk."

"Art thou Alroy?"

"The same."

"The slayer of Alschiroch?"

"Even so."

"A rebel and a murderer."

"What you please. Look to yourself."

The Hebrew prince flung a javelin at the Seljuk. It glanced from the breast-plate; but Hassan Subah staggered in his seat. Recovering, he charged Alroy with great force. Their cimeters crossed, and the blade of Hassan shivered.

"He who sold me that blade, told me it was charmed, and could be broken only by a caliph," said Hassan Subah. "He was a liar!"

"As it may be," said Alroy, and he cut the Seljuk to the ground. Abner had dispersed his comrades. Alroy leaped from his fainting steed, and mounting the ebony courser of his late enemy, dashed again into the thickest of the fight.

The shades of night descended, the clamour gradually decreased, the struggle died away. A few unhappy Moslem, who had quitted their saddles and sought concealment among the ruins, were occasionally hunted out, and brought forward and massacred. Long ere midnight the last of the Seljuks had expired.*

The moon shed a broad light upon the street of palaces crowded with the accumulated slain and the living victors. Fires were lit, torches illumined, the conquerors prepared the eager meal as they sang hymns of praise and thanksgiving.

A procession approached. Esther, the prophetess, clashing her cymbals, danced before the Messiah of Israel, who leaned upon his victorious cimier, surrounded by Jabaster, Abner, Scherirah and his chosen chieftains. Who could now doubt the validity of his mission? The wide and silent desert rang with the acclamations of his enthusiastic votaries.

VII.

HEAVILY the anxious hours crept on in the Jewish quarter of Hamadan. Again and again the venerable Bostenay discussed the chances of success with the sympathizing but desponding elders. Miriam was buried in constant prayer. Their most sanguine hopes did not extend beyond the escape of their prince.

A fortnight had elapsed, and no news had been received of the progress of the expedition, when suddenly towards sunset, a sentinel on a watch-tower announced the appearance of an armed force in the distance. The walls were instantly lined with the anxious inhabitants, the streets and squares filled with curious crowds. Exultation sat on the triumphant brow of the Moslem: a cold tremor stole over the fluttering heart of the Hebrew.

"There is but one God," said the captain of the gate.

"And Mohammed is his prophet," responded a sentinel.

"To-morrow we will cut off the noses of all these Jewish dogs."

"The sceptre has departed," exclaimed the despairing Bostenay.

"Lord, remember David!" whispered Miriam, as she threw herself upon the court of the palace, and buried her face in ashes.

The mollahs in solemn procession advanced to the ramparts to shed their benediction on the victorious Hassan Subah. The muzzin ascended the minarets to watch the setting sun, and proclaim the power of Allah with renewed enthusiasm.

"I wonder if Alroy be dead or alive," said the captain of the gate.

"If he be alive, he will be impaled," responded a sentinel.

"If dead, the carcass will be given to the dogs," rejoined the captain; "that is the practice."

"Bostenay will be hung," said the sentinel.

"And his niece, too," answered the captain.

"Hem!" said the sentinel. "Hassan Subah loves a black eye."

"I hope a true Moslem will not touch a Jewess," exclaimed an indignant black eunuch.

* The orientals are famous for their massacres: that of the Mamlook by the present Pasha of Egypt, and of the Janissaries by the sultan, are notorious. But one of the most terrible, and effected under the most difficult and dangerous circumstances, was the massacre of the Albanian boys by the present grand vizier in the autumn of 1830. I was in Albania at the time.

"They approach. What a dust!" said the captain of the gate.

"I see Hassan Subah!" said the sentinel.

"So do I," said the eunuch, "I know his black horse."

"I wonder how many dirhems old Bostenay is worth," said the captain.

"Immense!" said the sentinel.

"No plunder, I suppose?" said the eunuch.

"We shall see," said the captain; "at any rate, I owe a thousand to old Shelomi. We need not pay now, you know."

"Certainly not," said the black eunuch. "The rebels!"

A body of horsemen dashed forward. Their leader in advance reined in his fiery charger beneath the walls.

"In the name of the prophet, who is that?" exclaimed the captain of the gate, a little confused.

"I never saw him before," said the sentinel, "although he is in the Seljuk dress. 'Tis some one from Bagdad, I guess."

A trumpet sounded.

"Who keeps the gate?" called out the warrior.

"I am the captain of the gate," answered our friend.

"Open it then to the King of Israel."

"To whom?" inquired the astonished captain.

"To King David. The Lord hath delivered Hassan Subah and his host into our hands, and of all thy proud Seljuks none remaineth. Open thy gates, I say, and lose no time. I am Jabaster, a lieutenant of the Lord; this cimeter is my commission. Open thy gates, and thou and thy people shall have that mercy which they have never shown; but if thou delayest one instant, thus saith the king, our master—I will burst open your portal, and smite, and utterly destroy all that you have, and spare them not; but slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass."

"Call forth the venerable Lord Bostenay," said the captain of the gate, with chattering teeth. "He will intercede for us."

"And the gentle Lady Miriam," said the sentinel. "She is ever charitable."

"I will head the procession," said the black eunuch; "I am accustomed to women."

The procession of mollahs shuffled back to their college with most profane precipitation; the sun set, and the astounded muzzin stood with their mouths open, and quite forgot to announce the power of their deity, and the validity of their prophet. The people all called out for the venerable Lord Bostenay and the gentle Lady Miriam, and ran in crowds to see who could first kiss the hem of their garments.

The principal gate of Hamadan opened into the square of the great mosque. Here the whole population of the city appeared assembled. The gates were thrown open; Jabaster and his companions mounted guard. The short twilight died away, the shades of night descended. The minarets were illumined,* the houses hung with garlands, the ramparts covered with tapestry and carpets.

A clang of drums, trumpets, and cymbals announced the arrival of the Hebrew army. The people shouted, the troops without responded with a long cheer of triumph. Amid the blaze of torches a youth, waving his cimeter, upon a coal-black steed, bounded into the city, at the head of his guards. The people fell upon their knees, and shouted, "Long live Alroy!"

A venerable man, leading a beautiful maiden, with downcast eyes, advanced. They headed a deputation of the chief inhabitants of the city. They came to solicit mercy and protection. At their sight the youthful warrior leaped from his horse, flung away his cimeter, and clasping the maiden in his arms, exclaimed, "Miriam, my sister, this, this indeed is triumph!"

VIII.

"DRINK," said Kisloch the Kourid, to Calidas the Indian; "you forget, comrade, we are no longer Moslem."

"Wine, methinks, has a peculiarly pleasant flavour in a golden cup," said the Guebre. "I got this little trifle to-day in the bazaar," he added, holding up a magnificent vase studded with gems.

"I thought plunder was forbidden," grinned the negro.

"So it is," replied the Guebre: "but we may purchase what we please—upon credit."

"Well, for my part, I am a moderate man," exclaimed Calidas the Indian, "and would not injure even those accursed dogs of Turks. I have not cut my host's throat, but only turned him into my porter, and content myself with his harem, his baths, his fine horses, and other little trifles."

"What quarters we are in! there is nothing like a true Messiah!" exclaimed Kisloch, very devoutly.

"Nothing," said Calidas; "though, to speak truth, I did not much believe in the efficacy of Solomon's sceptre, till his majesty clove the head of the valiant Seljuk with it."

"But now there's no doubt of it!" said the Guebre.

"We should indeed be infidels if we doubted now," replied the Indian.

"How lucky," grinned the negro, "as I had no religion before, that I have now fixed upon the right one!"

"Most fortunate!" said the Guebre. "What shall we do to amuse ourselves to-night?"

"Let's go to the coffee-house and make the Turks drink wine," said Calidas the Indian.

"What say you to burning down a mosque?" said Kisloch the Kourid.

"I had great fun with some dervishes this morning," said the Guebre.

"I met one asking alms with a wire run through his check,* so I caught another, bored his nose, and tied them both together!"

"Hah! hah! hah!" burst the negro.

IX.

ASIA resounded with the insurrection of the Jews, and the massacre of the Seljuks. Crowds of Hebrews, from the rich cities of Persia, and the populous settlements on the Tigris and the Euphrates, hourly poured into Hamadan.

The irritated Moslem persecuted the brethren of the successful rebel, and this impolicy precipitated

* So, I remember, at Constantinople, at the commencement of 1831, at the departure of the Mecca caravan, and also at the annual feast of Ramadan.

* Not uncommon. These dervishes frequent the bazaars their flight. The wealth of Bagdad flowed into the Hebrew capital. Seated on the divan of Hassan Subah, and wielding the sceptre of Solomon, the King of Israel received the homage of his devoted subjects, and despatched his envoys to Syria and to Egypt. The well-stored magazines and arsenals of Hamadan soon converted the pilgrims into warriors. The city was unable to accommodate the increased and increasing population. An extensive camp, under the command of Abner, was formed without the walls, where the troops were daily disciplined, and where they were prepared for greater exploits than a skirmish in the desert.

Within a month after the surrender of Hamadan, the congregation of the people assembled in the square of the great mosque, now converted into a synagogue. The multitude was disposed in ordered ranks, and the terrace of every house was crowded. In the centre of the square was an immense altar of cedar and brass, and on each side stood a company of priests, guarding the victims, one young bullock and two rams without blemish.

Amid the flourish of trumpets, the gates of the synagogue opened, and displayed to the wondering eyes of the Hebrews a vast and variegated pavilion, planted in the court. The holy remnant, no longer forlorn, beheld that tabernacle, of which they had so long dreamed, once more shining in the sun, with its purple and scarlet hangings, its curtains of rare skins, and its furniture of silver and of gold.

A procession of priests advanced, bearing, with staves of cedar, run through rings of gold, a gorgeous ark, the work of the most cunning artificers of Persia. Night and day had they laboured, under the direction of Jabaster, to produce this wondrous spectacle. Once more the children of Israel beheld the cherubim. They burst into a triumphant hymn of thanksgiving, and many drew their swords, and cried aloud to be led against the Canaanites.

From the mysterious curtains of the tabernacle, Alroy came forward, leading Jabaster. They approached the altar. And Alroy took robes from the surrounding priests, and put them upon Jabaster, and a girdle, and a breast-plate of jewels. And Alroy took a mitre, and placed it upon the head of Jabaster, and upon the mitre he placed a crown; and, pouring oil upon his head, the pupil anointed the master, high priest of Israel.

The victims were slain, the sin-offerings burnt. Amid clouds of incense, bursts of music, and the shouts of a devoted people; amid odour, and melody, and enthusiasm, Alroy mounted his charger, and at the head of twenty thousand men, departed to conquer Media.

X.

THE extensive and important province of Aderbajan, of which Hamadan was the capital, was formed of the ancient Media. Its fate was decided by one battle. On the plain of Nehauend, Alroy met the hastily-raised levies of the Atabek of Kermanshah, and entirely routed them. In the course of a month, every city of the province had acknowledged the supremacy of the new Hebrew monarch, and, leaving Abner to complete the conquest of Louristan, Alroy entered Persia.

The incredible and irresistible progress of Alroy roused Togrul, the Turkish Sultan of Persia, from the luxurious indolence of the palaces of Nishapur. He summoned his emirs to meet him at the imperial city of Rhey, and crush, by one overwhelming effort, the insolent rebel.

Religion, valour, and genius alike inspired the arms of Alroy, but he was, doubtless, not a little assisted by the strong national sympathy of his singular and scattered people, which ever insured him prompt information on all the movements of his enemy. Without any preparation, he found agents in every court, and camp, and cabinet, and by their assistance he anticipated the designs of his adversaries, and turned even their ingenuity to their confusion. The imperial city of Rhey was surprised in the night, sacked and burnt to the ground. The sacred and baffled emirs who escaped, fled to the Sultan Togrul, tearing their beards, and prophesying the approaching termination of the world.

The palaces of Nishapur resounded with the imprecations of their master, who, cursing the Jewish dogs, and vowing a pilgrimage to Mecca, placed himself at the head of a motley multitude of warriors, and rushed upon the plains of Irak, to exterminate Alroy.

The Persian force exceeded the Hebrew at least five times in number. Besides a large division of Seljuks, the Caucasus had poured forth its strange inhabitants to swell the ranks of the faithful. The wild tribes of the Bactiari were even enlisted with their fatal bows, and the savage Turkmans, tempted by the sultan's gold, for a moment yielded their liberty, and shook their tall lances in his ranks.

But what is a wild Bactiari, and what is a savage Turkman, and what even a disciplined and imperious Seljuk, to the warriors of the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob? At the first onset, Alroy succeeded in dividing the extended centre of Togrul, and separating the greater part of the Turks from their less disciplined comrades. At the head of his Median cavalry the Messiah charged and utterly routed the warriors of the Caucasus. The wild tribes of the Bactiari shot their arrows and fled, and the savage Turkmans plundered the baggage of their own commander.

The Turks themselves fought desperately; but, deserted by their allies, and surrounded by an inspired foe, their efforts were unavailing, and their slaughter terrible. Togrul was slain while heading a desperate and fruitless charge, and after his fall, the battle resembled a massacre rather than a combat.

The plain was clotted with Seljukian gore. No quarter was given or asked. Twenty thousand chosen troops fell on the side of the Turks; the rest dispersed and gained the mountains. Leaving Scherirah to restore order, Alroy the next morning pushed on to Nishapur at the head of three thousand horsemen, and summoned the city ere the inhabitants were apprized of the defeat and death of the sultan.

The capital of Persia escaped the fate of Rhey by an inglorious treaty, and a lavish tribute. The treasures of the Chosroes and the Gasnevides were despatched to Hamadan, on which city day dawned, only to bring intelligence of a victory or a conquest.

While Alroy dictated peace on his own terms in the palaces of Nishapur, Abner, having reduced Louristan, crossed the mountains, and entered Persia with the reinforcements he had received from Jabaster. Leaving the government and garrisoning of his new conquests to this valiant captain, Alroy, at the head of the conquerors of Persia, in consequence of intelligence received from Hamadan, returned by forced marches to that city.

XI.

LEAVING the army within a day's march of the capital, Alroy, accompanied only by his staff, entered Hamadan in the evening, and immediately repairing to the citadel, summoned Jabaster to council. The night was passed by the king and the high priest in deep consultation. The next morning a decree apprized the inhabitants of the return of their monarch, of the creation of the new "kingdom of the Medes and Persians," of which Hamadan was appointed the capital, and Abner the viceroy, and of the intended and immediate invasion of Syria, and reconquest of the land of promise.

The plan of this expedition had been long matured, and the preparations to effect it were considerably advanced. Jabaster had not been idle during the absence of his pupil. One hundred thousand warriors were now assembled* at the capital of the "kingdom of the Medes and Persians;" of these the greater part were Hebrews, but many Arabs, wearied of the Turkish yoke, and many gallant adventurers from the Caspian, easily converted from a vague idolatry to a religion of conquest, swelled the ranks of the army of the "Lord of Hosts."

The plain of Hamadan was covered with tents, the streets were filled with passing troops, the bazaars loaded with military stores; long caravans of camels laden with supplies every day arrived from the neighbouring towns; each instant some high-capped Tartar with his despatches rushed into the city and galloped his steed up the steep of the citadel.† The clang of arms, the prance of horses, the flourish of warlike music, resounded from all quarters. The business and the treasures of the world seemed, as it were in an instant, to have become concentrated in Hamadan. Every man had some great object; gold glittered in every hand. All great impulses were stirring; all the causes of human energy were in lively action. Every eye sparkled, every foot stood firm and fast. Each man acted as if the universal fate depended on his exertions; as if the universal will sympathized with his particular desire. A vast population influenced by a high degree of excitement is the most sublime of spectacles.

The commander of the faithful raised the standard of the prophet on the banks of the Tigris. It was the secret intelligence of this intended event that had recalled Alroy so suddenly from Persia. The latent enthusiasm of the Moslem in was excited by the rare and mystic ceremony, and its effects were anticipated by previous and judicious preparations. The Seljuks of Bagdad alone amounted to fifty thousand men: the Sultan of Syria contributed the warriors who had conquered the Arabian princes of Damascus and Aleppo, while the ancient provinces of Asia Minor, which formed the rich and powerful kingdom of Seljukian Roum, poured forth a myriad of that matchless cavalry which had so often baffled the armies of the Cæsars. Never had so imposing a force been collected on the banks of the Tigris since the reign of Haroun Alraschid. Each day some warlike Atabek* at the head of his armed train poured into the capital of the caliphs, or pitched his pavilion on the banks of the river; each day the proud emir of some remote principality astonished or affrighted the luxurious Babylonians by the strange or uncouth warriors that had gathered round his standard in the deserts of Arabia, or on the shores of the Euxine. For the space of twenty miles, the banks of the river were, on either side, far as the eye could reach, covered with the variegated pavilions, the glittering standards, the flowing streamers and twinkling pennons of the mighty host, of which Malek, the Grand Sultan of the Seljuks, and governor of the caliph's palace, was chief commander.

Such was the power assembled on the plains of Asia to arrest the progress of the Hebrew prince, and to prevent the conquest of the memorable land promised to the faith of his fathers, and forfeited by their infidelity. Before the walls of Hamadan, Alroy reviewed the army of Israel—sixty thousand heavy armed footmen, thirty thousand archers and light troops, and twenty thousand cavalry. Besides these, a body of ten thousand picked horsemen had been formed, all of whom had served in the Persian campaign, styled "the sacred guard." In their centre, shrouded in a case of wrought gold, studded with carbuncles, and carried on a lusty lance of cedar, a giant—for the height of Elnebar exceeded that of common men by three feet—bore the sceptre of Solomon. The sacred guard was commanded by Asriel, the brother of Abner.

The army was formed into three divisions. All marched in solemn order before the throne of Alroy, raised upon the ramparts, and drooped their standards and lances as they passed their heroic leader. Bostenay, and Miriam, and the whole population of the city, witnessed the inspiring spectacle from the walls. That same eve, Scherirah, at the head of forty thousand men, pushed on towards Bagdad, by Kermanshah; and Jabaster, who commanded in his holy robes, and who had vowed not to give up his sword until the rebuilding of the temple, conducted his division over the victorious plain of Nehauend. They were to concentrate at the pass of Kerrund, which conducted into the province of Bagdad, and await the arrival of the king.

At dawn of day, the royal division and the sacred guard, the whole under the command of Asriel, quitted the capital. Alroy still lingered, and for some hours the warriors of his staff might have been observed lounging about the citadel, or practising their skill in throwing the jerrreed as they exercised their impatient chargers before the gates. The king was with the Lady Miriam.

The king was with the Lady Miriam, walking in the garden of their uncle. His arm was wound round her delicate waist, and with the other he clasped her soft and graceful hand. The heavy tears burst from her downcast eyes, and stole along her pale and pensive cheek. They walked in silence, the brother and the sister, before the purity of whose surpassing love even ambition vanished. He opened the lattice gate. They entered into the valley small and green; before them was the marble fountain with its columns and cupola, and, in the distance, the charger of Alroy and his single attendant.

† I have availed myself of a familiar character in oriental life, but the use of a Tartar as a courier in the time of Alroy is, I fear, an anachronism.

* I was at Yanina, the capital of Albania, when the grand vizier summoned the chieftains of the country, and was struck by their magnificent arrays each day pouring into the city.

They stopped, and Alroy gathered flowers, and placed them in the hair of Miriam. He would have softened, the bitterness of parting with a smile. Gently he relaxed his embracing arm—almost insensibly he dropped her quivering hand.

"Sister of my soul," he whispered, "when we last parted here, I was a fugitive, and now I quit you a conqueror."

She turned, she threw herself upon his neck, and buried her face in his breast.

"My beautiful, restrain yourself—we shall meet at Bagdad."

He beckoned to her distant maidens—they advanced—he delivered Miriam into their arms. He seized her hand and pressed it to his mouth, and rushing to his horse, mounted and disappeared.

XII.

A BOY of irregular cavalry feebly defended the pass of Kerrund. It was carried with slight loss by the vanguard of Scherirah, and the fugitives prepared the host of the caliph for the approach of the Hebrew army.

Upon the plain of the Tigris, the enemy formed into battle array. The centre was commanded by Malek, the Grand Sultan of the Seljuks himself; the right wing, headed by the Sultan of Syria, was protected by the river; and the left, under the Sultan of Roum, was posted upon the advantageous position of some irregular and rising ground. Thus, proud in the number, valour, discipline, and disposition of his forces, Malek awaited the conqueror of Persia.

The glittering columns of the Hebrews might even now be perceived defiling from the mountains, and forming at the extremity of the plain. Before nightfall the camp of the invaders was pitched within hearing of that of Malek. The moving lights in the respective tents might plainly be distinguished; and ever and anon the flourish of hostile music fell with an ominous sound upon the ears of the opposed foemen. A few miles only separated those mighty hosts. Upon to-morrow deputed, perhaps, the fortunes of ages. How awful is the eve of battle!

Alroy, attended by a few chieftains, personally visited the tents of the soldiery, promising them on the morrow a triumph, before which the victories of Nehanend and Nishabur would sink into insignificance. Their fiery and excited visages proved at once their courage and their faith. The sceptre of Solomon was paraded throughout the camp in solemn procession. On the summit of a huge tumulus, perhaps the sepulchre of some classic hero, Esther the prophetess, surrounded by the chief zealots of the host, poured forth her inspiring inspiration. It was a grand picture, that beautiful wild girl, the groups of stern devoted warriors, the red flame of the watch-fires mixing with the silver shadows of the moon as they illumined the variegated turbans and gleaming armour of her votaries.

In the pavilion of Alroy, Jabaster consulted with his pupil on the conduct of the morrow.

"This is a different scene from the cavern of the Caucasus," said Alroy, as the high priest rose to retire.

"It has one great resemblance, sire; the God of our fathers is with us."

"Ay! the Lord of Hosts. Moses was a great man. There is no career except conquest."

"You muse!"

"Of the past. The present is prepared. Too much thought will mar it."

"The past is for wisdom, the present for action, but for joy the future. The feeling that the building of the temple is at hand that the Lord's anointed will once again live in the house of David, absorbs my spirit; and when I muse over our coming glory, in my fond ecstasy I almost lose the gravity that doth besem my sacred office."

"Jerusalem—I have seen it. How many hours to dawn?"

"Some three."

"'Tis strange—I could sleep. I remember, on the eve of battle I was ever anxious. How is this, Jabaster?"

"Your faith, sire, is profound."

"Yes, I have no fear. My destiny is not complete. Good night, Jabaster. See Asriel, valiant priest. Pharez!"

"My lord."

"Rouse me at the second watch. Good night, boy."

"Good night, my lord."

"Pharez!"

"Be sure you rouse me at my second watch. Think you it wants three hours to dawn?"

"About three hours, my lord."

"Well! at the second watch, remember—good night."

XIII.

"It is the second watch, my lord."

"So soon! Have I slept! I feel fresh as an eagle. Call Scherirah, boy."

"'Tis strange, I never dream now. Before my flight, my sleep was ever troubled. Say what they like, man is made for action. My life is now harmonious, and sleep has now become what nature willed it, a solace, not a contest. Before, it was a struggle of dark passions and bright dreams, in whose creative fancy and fair vision my soul sought refuge from the dreary bale of daily reality.

"I will withdraw the curtains of my tent. O! most majestic vision! And have I raised this host! O'er the wide plain, far as my eye can range, the snowy tents studding the purple landscape, embattled legions gather round their flags, to struggle for my fate. It is the agony of Asia.

"A year ago, upon this very spot, I laid me down to die, an unknown thing, and known and recognised only to be despised; and now the sultans of the world come forth to meet me. I have no fear. My destiny is not complete. And whither tends it? Let that power decide that hitherto has fashioned all my course.

"Jerusalem, Jerusalem—ever harping on Jerusalem. With all his lore, he is a narrow-minded zealot, whose dreaming memory would fondly make a future like the past. O! Bagdad, Bagdad, within thy glittering halls there is a charm worth all his cabala!

"Hah! Scherirah! The dawn is near at hand—the stars still shining. The air is very pleasant,

To-morrow will be a great day, Scherirah, for Israel and for you. You lead the attack. A moment in my tent, my brave Scherirah!"

XIV.

THE dawn broke—a strong column of Hebrews, commanded by Scherirah, poured down upon the centre of the army of the caliph. Another column, commanded by Jabaster, attacked the left wing, headed by the Sultan of Roum. No sooner had Alroy perceived that the onset of Scherirah had succeeded in penetrating the centre of the Turks, than he placed himself at the head of the sacred guard, and by an irresistible charge completed their disorder and confusion. The division of the Sultan of Syria, and a great part of the centre were entirely routed and driven into the river, and the remainder of the division of Malek was effectually separated from his left wing.

But while to Alroy the victory seemed already decided, a far different fate awaited the division of Jabaster. The Sultan of Roum, posted in an extremely advantageous position, and commanding troops accustomed to the discipline of the Romans of Constantinople, received the onset of Jabaster without yielding, and not only repelled his attack, but finally made a charge which completely disordered and dispersed the column of the Hebrews. In vain Jabaster endeavoured to rally his troops, in vain he performed prodigies of valour, in vain he himself struck down the standard-bearer of the sultan, and once even penetrated to the pavilion of the monarch. His division was fairly routed. The eagerness of the Sultan of Roum to effect the annihilation of his antagonists prevented him from observing the forlorn condition of the Turkish centre. Had he, after routing the division of Jabaster, only attacked Alroy in the rear, the fortune of the day might have been widely different. As it was, the eagle eye of Alroy soon detected his inadvertence, and profited by his indiscretion. Leaving Ithamar to keep the centre in check, he charged the Sultan of Roum with the sacred guard, and afforded Jabaster an opportunity of rallying some part of his forces. The Sultan of Roum, perceiving that the day was lost by the ill-conduct of his colleagues, withdrew his troops, retreated in haste, but in good order, to Bagdad, carried off the caliph, his harem, and some of his treasure, and effected his escape into Syria. In the mean time the discomfiture of the remaining Turkish army was complete. The Tigris was dyed with their blood, and the towns through which the river flowed were apprized of the triumph of Alroy by the floating corpses of his enemies. Thirty thousand Turks were slain in battle: among them the Sultans of Bagdad and Syria, and a vast number of atabeks, emirs, and chieftains. A whole division finding themselves surrounded, surrendered on terms, and delivered up their arms. The camps and the treasure of the three sultans were alike captured, and the troops that escaped so completely dispersed, that they did not attempt to rally, but, disbanded and desperate, prowled over and plundered the adjoining provinces. The loss of the division of Jabaster was also severe, but the rest of the army suffered little. Alroy himself was slightly wounded. The battle lasted barely three hours. Its results were immense. David Alroy was now master of the East.

XV.

THE plain was covered with the corpses of men and horses, arms and standards, and prostrate tents. Returning from the pursuit of the Sultan of Roum, Alroy ordered the trumpets to sound to arms, and covered with gore and dust dismounted from his charger, and stood before the pavilion of Malek, leaning upon his bloody cimier, and surrounded by his victorious generals.

"Ah, Jabaster!" said the conqueror, giving his hand to the pontif, "'twas well your troops had such a leader. No one but you could have rallied them. You must drill your lads a little before they meet again the Cappadocian cavalry. Brave Scherirah, we shall not forget our charge. Asriel, tell the guard, for me, that the victory of the Tigris was owing to their cimiers. Ithamar, what are our freshest troops?"

"The legion of Aderbijan, sire."

"How strong can they muster?"

"It counts twelve thousand men: we might collect two-thirds."

"Valiant Ithamar, take the Aderbijans, and a division of the guard, push on towards Bagdad, and summon the city. If his sultanship of Roum offer battle, take up a position, and he shall quickly have his desire. For the present, after these hasty marches and sharp fighting, the troops must rest. I guess he will not tarry. Summon the city, and say that if any resistance be offered, I will make it as desolate as old Babylon. Treat with no armed force. Where is the soldier that saved me a cracked scull—his name Benaiah!"

"I wait your bidding, sire."

"You're a captain. Join the division of Ithamar, and win fresh laurels ere we meet again. Gentle Asriel, let your brother know our fortune."

"Sire, several Tartars have already been despatched to Hamadan."

"'Tis well. Send another with these tablets to the Lady Miriam. Despatch the pavilion of Malek as a trophy for the town. Elnebar, Goliath of the Hebrews, you bore our sacred standard like a hero! How fares the prophetess? I saw her charging in our ranks, waving a sabre with her snowy arm, her long dark hair streaming like a storm, from whence her eyes flashed lightning."

"The king bleeds," said Jabaster.

"Slightly. It will do me service. I am somewhat feverish. A kingdom for a draught of water! And now for our wounded friends. Asriel, do you marshal the camp. It is Sabbath eve.* Time presses."

* "They began their Sabbath from sunset, and the same time of day they ended it."—Talm. Hierosolym in Sheveith. fol. 33. col. 1.

"The eve of the Sabbath, or the day before, was called the day of preparation for the Sabbath."—Luke xxxiii. 54.

"And from the time of the evening sacrifice and forward, they began to fit themselves for the Sabbath, and to cease from their works, so as not to go to the barber, not to sit in judgment, &c.; nay, thenceforward they would not set things on working which being set a-work, would complete their business of themselves, unless it would be completed before the Sabbath came—as wool was not put to dye, unless it could take colour while it was yet day," &c.—Talm. in Sab. par. 1; Lightfoot, vol. i. p. 218.

"Towards sun-setting, when the Sabbath was now approaching, they lighted up the Sabbath lamp. Men and women were bound to have a lamp lighted up in their houses on the Sabbath though they were never so poor—nay, though they were forced to go a begging for oil for this purpose: and the lighting up of this lamp was a part of making the Sabbath a delight: and women were especially commanded to look to this business."—Maimonides in Sab. par. 36.

XVI.

THE dead were plundered, and thrown into the river, the encampment of the Hebrews completed. Alroy, with his principal officers, visited the wounded, and praised the valiant. The bustle which always succeeds a victory, was increased in the present instance by the anxiety of the army to observe with grateful strictness the impending Sabbath.

When the sun set, the Sabbath was to commence. The undulating horizon rendered it difficult to ascertain the precise moment of his fall. The crimson orb sunk behind the purple mountains, the sky was flushed with a rich and rosy glow. Then might be perceived the zealots, proud in their Talmudical lore, holding a skein of white silk in their hands, and announcing the approach of the Sabbath by their observation of its shifting tints. While the skein was yet golden, the forge of the armourer still sounded, the fire of the cook still blazed, still the cavalry led their steeds to the river, and still the busy footmen braced up their tents, and hammered at their pallisades. The skein of silk became rosy, the armourer worked with renewed energy, the cook puffed with increased zeal, the horsemen scampered from the river, the footmen cast an anxious glance at the fading twilight.

The skein of silk became blue; a dim, dull, sepulchral, leaden tinge fell over its purity. The hum of gnats arose, the bat flew in circling whirls over the tents, horns sounded from all quarters, the sun had set, the Sabbath had commenced. The forge was mute, the fire extinguished, the pranees of horses and the bustle of men in a moment ceased. A deep, a sudden, and all-pervading stillness dropped over that mighty host. It was night; the sacred lamp of the Sabbath sparkled in every tent of the camp, which vied in silence and in brilliancy with the mute and glowing heavens.

Morn came; the warriors assembled around the altar and the sacrifice. The high priest and his attendant Levites proclaimed the unity of the omnipotence of the God of Israel, and the sympathetic responses of his conquering and chosen people re-echoed over the plain. They retired again to their tents, to listen to the expounding of the law; even the distance of a Sabbath walk was not to exceed that space that lies between Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives. This was the distance between the temple and the tabernacle; it had been nicely measured, and every Hebrew who ventured forth from the camp this day might be observed counting the steps of a Sabbath-day's journey. At length the sun again set, and on a sudden fires blazed, voices sounded, men stirred, in the same enchanted and instantaneous manner that had characterized the stillness of the preceding eve. Shouts of laughter, bursts of music, announced the festivity of the coming night; supplies poured in from all the neighbouring villages, and soon the pious conquerors commemorated their late triumph in a round of banqueting.

On the morrow, a Tartar arrived from Idhamar, informing Alroy that the Sultan of Roum had retreated into Syria, that Bagdad was undefended, but that he had acceded to the request of the inhabitants that a deputation should wait upon Alroy before the troops entered the city, and had accorded a safe conduct for their passage.

XVII.

ON the morrow messengers announced the approach of the deputation. All the troops were under arms. Alroy directed that the suppliants should be conducted through the whole camp before they arrived at the royal pavilion, on each side of which the sacred guard was mustered in array. The curtains of his tent withdrawn displayed the conqueror himself seated on a sumptuous divan. On his right hand stood Jabaster in his priestly robes, on his left Scherirah. Behind him, the giant Elnebar supported the sacred sceptre. A crowd of chieftains was ranged on each side of the pavilion.

Cymbals sounded, muffled kettle-drums, and the faint flourish of trumpets; the commencement of the procession might be detected in the long perspective of the tented avenue. First came a company of beauteous youths, walking two by two, and strewing flowers, then a band of musicians in flowing robes of cloth of gold, plaintively sounding their silver trumpets. After these followed slaves of all climes, bearing a tribute of the most rare and costly production of their countries: negroes with tusks and teeth of the elephant, plumes of ostrich feathers, and caskets of gold dust; Syrians with rich armour; Persians with vases of atar-gul, and Indians with panniers of pearls of Ormuz, and soft shawls of Cashmere. Encircled by his children, each of whom held alternately a white or fawn-coloured gazelle, an Arab, clothed in his blue bonnuz, led by a thick cord of crimson silk a tall and tawny giraffe. Fifty stout men succeeded two by two, carrying in company a silver shield laden with golden coin, or chased goblets studded with gems.

The clash of cymbals announced the presence of the robes of honour,* culled from the wardrobe of the commander of the faithful; the silk of Aleppo and the brocades of Damascus, lined with the furs of the sable and the ermine, down from the breast of the swan, and the skins of white foxes.

After these followed two gray dromedaries with furniture of silver, and many caparisoned horses, each led by a groom in rich attire. The last of these was a snow-white steed, upon whose front was the likeness of a ruby star, a courser of the sacred stud of Solomon, and crossed only by the descendants of the prophet.

The muffled kettle-drums heralded the company of black eunuchs, with their scarlet vests and ivory battle-axes. They surrounded, and shrouded from the vulgar gaze, fourteen beautiful Circassian girls, whose brilliant visages and perfect forms were otherwise concealed by their long veils and ample drapery.

The gorgeous procession, as they approached the conqueror, bowed humbly to Alroy, and formed in order on each side of the broad avenue. The deputation appeared: twelve of the principal citizens of Bagdad, with folded arms, and downcast eyes, and disordered raiment. Meekly and mutely each touched the earth with his hand, and kissed it in token of submission, and then moving aside, made way for the chief envoy and orator of the company—Hoinan!

* These are ever carried in procession, and their number denotes the rank and quality of the chief, or of the individual to whom they are offered.

XVIII.

HUMBLY, but gracefully, the physician of the caliph bowed before the conqueror of the East. His appearance and demeanour afforded a contrast to the aspect of his brother envoys; not less calm or contented his countenance; not less sumptuous or studied his attire, than when he first rescued Alroy in the bazaar of Bagdad from the gripe of the false Abdallah.

He spoke, and every sound was hushed before the music of his voice.

"Conqueror of the world, that destiny with which it is in vain to struggle, has placed our lives and fortunes in your power. Your slaves offer for your approbation specimens of their riches; not as tribute, for all is yours: but to show you the products of security and peace, and to induce you to believe that mercy may be a policy as profitable to the conqueror as to the conquered; that it may be better to preserve than to destroy; and wiser to enjoy than to extirpate.

"Fate ordained that we should be born the slaves of the caliph; that same fate has delivered his sceptre into your hands. We offer you the same devotion we yielded to him, and we entreat the same protection he accorded to us.

"Whatever may be your decision we must bow to your decree with the humility that recognises superior force. Yet we are not without hope. We cannot forget that it is our good fortune not to be addressing a barbarous chieftain unable to sympathize with the claims of civilization, the creation of art, and the finer impulses of humanity. We acknowledge your irresistible power, but we dare to hope every thing from a prince whose genius all acknowledge and admire, who has spared some portion of his youth from the cares of government and the pursuits of arms, for the ennobling claims of learning, whose morality has been moulded by a pure and sublime faith, and who draws his lineage from a sacred and celebrated race, whose unrivalled antiquity even the prophet acknowledges."

He ceased; a buzz of approbation sounded throughout the pavilion which was hushed instantly as the lips of the conqueror moved.

"Noble emir," replied Alroy, "return to Bagdad, and tell your fellow-subjects that the King of Israel grants protection to their persons, and security to their property."

"And for their faith?" inquired the envoy in a lower voice.

"Toleration," replied Alroy, turning to Jabaster.

"Until further regulations," added the high priest.

"Emir," said Alroy, "the person of the caliph will be respected."

"May it please your highness," replied Honain, "the Sultan of Roum has retired with our late ruler."

"And his harem?"

"And his harem?"

"It was needless. We war not with women."

"Men, as well as women, must acknowledge the gracious mercy of your highness."

"Benomi," said Alroy, addressing himself to a young officer of the guard, "command the guard of honour that will attend this noble emir on his return. We soldiers deal only in iron, sir, and cannot vie with the magnificence of Bagdad, yet wear this dagger for the donor's sake;" and Alroy held out to Honain a poniard flaming with gems.

The envoy of Bagdad advanced, took the dagger, kissed it, and placed it in his vest.*

"Scherirah," continued Alroy, "this noble emir is your charge. See that a choice pavilion of the host be for his use, and that his train complain not of the rough customs of our camp."

"May it please your highness," replied Honain, "I have done my duty, and with your gracious permission would at once return. I have business only less urgent than the present, because it concerns myself."

"As you will, noble emir. Benomi, to your post. Farewell, sir."

The deputation advanced, bowed, and retired. Alroy turned to Jabaster.

"No common person that, Jabaster."

"A very gracious Turk, sire."

"Think you he is a Turk?"

"By his dress."

"It may be so. Asriel, break up the camp. We'll march at once to Bagdad."

XIX.

THE chiefs dispersed to make the necessary arrangements for the march. The news that the army was immediately to advance to Bagdad soon circulated throughout the camp, and excited the most lively enthusiasm. Every hand was at work, striking the tents, preparing the arms and horses. Alroy retired to his pavilion. The curtains were drawn. He was alone, and plunged in profound meditation.

"Alroy!" a voice sounded.

He started and looked up. Before him stood Esther the prophetess.

"Esther! is it thou?"

"Alroy! enter not into Babylon."

"Indeed."

"As I live, the Lord hath spoken it. Enter not into Babylon."

"Not enjoy my fairest conquest, maiden?"

"Enter not into Babylon."

"What affrights thee?"

"Enter not into Babylon."

"I shall not surely change the fortunes of my life without a cause!"

"The Lord hath spoken. Is not that a cause?"

"I am the Lord's anointed. His warning has not reached me."

"Now it reaches thee. Doth the king despise the prophetess of the Lord? It is the sin of Ahab."

"Despise thee! despise the mouth that is the herald of my victories! 'Twere rank blasphemy. Prophecy triumph, Esther, and Alroy will never doubt thy inspiration."

"He doubts it now. I see he doubts it now. O! my king, I say again, enter not into Babylon."

"Beauteous maiden, those eyes flash lightning. Who can behold their wild and liquid glance, and doubt that Esther is inspired! Be calm, sweet girl, some dream disturbs thy fancy."

"Alroy, Alroy, enter not into Babylon!"

* The elegant mode in which the orientals receive presents.

"I have no fear—I bear a charmed life."

"Ah me! he will not listen. All is lost!"

"All is gained, my beautiful."

"I would we were upon the holy mount, and gazing on the stars of sacred Sion."

"Esther," said Alroy, advancing, and gently taking her hand, "the capital of the East will soon unfold its marvels to thy sight. Prepare thyself for wonders. Girl, we are no longer in the desert. Forget thy fitful fancies. Come, choose a husband from my generals, child, and I will give thee a kingdom for thy dower; I would gladly see a crown upon that tall imperial brow. It well deserves one."

The prophetess turned her dark eyes full upon Alroy. What passed in her mind was neither evident nor expressed. She gazed intently upon the calm and inscrutable countenance of the conqueror, she flung away his hand, and rushed out of the pavilion.

PART VIII.

I.

THE waving of banners, the flourish of trumpets, the neighing of steeds, and the glitter of spears! On the distant horizon, they gleam like the morning, when the gloom of the night shivers bright into the day.

Hark! the tramp of the foemen, like the tide of the ocean, flows onward and onward, and conquers the shore. From the brow of the mountain, like the rush of a river, the column defiling melts into the plain.

Warriors of Judah! holy men that battle for the Lord! The land wherein your fathers wept, and touched their plaintive psalter; the haughty city where your sires bewailed their cold and distant hearth: your steeds are prancing on its plain, and you shall fill its palaces. Warriors of Judah! holy men that battle for the Lord!

March, onward march, ye valiant tribes, the hour has come, the hour has come! All the promises of ages, all the signs of sacred sages, meet in this ravishing hour. Where is now the oppressor's chariot, where your tyrant's purple robe? The horse and the rider are both overthrown, the horse and the rider are both overthrown!

Rise, Rachel, from the wilderness arise, and weep no more. No more thy lonely palm tree's shade meet shroud thy sacred sorrowing. The Lord hath heard the widow's sigh, the Lord hath stilled the widow's tear. Be comforted, be comforted, thy children live again!

Yes! yes! upon the bounding plain fleet Asriel glances like a star, and stout Scherirah shakes his spear by stern Jabaster's cineter. And he is there, the chosen one, hymned by prophetic harps, whose life is like the morning dew on Sion's holy hill: the chosen one, the chosen one, that leads his race to victory, warriors of Judah! holy men that battle for the Lord!

They come, they come, they come!

The ramparts of the city were crowded with the inhabitants, the river sparkled with ten thousand boats, the bazaars were shut, the streets lined with the populace, and the terrace of every house covered with spectators. In the morning, Ithamar had entered with his division and garrisoned the city. And now the vanguard of the Hebrew army, alie, having been long distinguished in the distance, approached the walls. A large body of cavalry at full speed dashed forward from the main force. Upon a milk-white charger, and followed by a glittering train of warriors, amid the shouts of the vast multitude, Alroy galloped up to the gates.

He was received by Ithamar and the members of the deputation, but Honain was not there. Accompanied by his staff and a strong detachment of the sacred guard, Alroy was conducted through the principal thoroughfares of the city, until he arrived at the chief entrance of the scrail, or palace of the caliph. The vast portal conducted him into a large quadrangular court, where he dismounted, and where he was welcomed by the captain of the eunuch guard. Accompanied by his principal generals and his immediate attendants, Alroy was then ushered through a suite of apartments, which reminded him of his visit with Honain, until he arrived at the grand council chamber of the caliphs.

The conqueror threw himself upon the gorgeous divan of the commander of the faithful.

"An easy seat after a long march," said Alroy, as he touched the coffee with his lips, which the chief of the eunuchs presented to him in a cup of transparent pink porcelain, studded with pearls.* "Ithamar, now for your report. What is the temper of the city? where is his sultanship of Roum?"

"The city, sire, is calm, and, I believe, content. The sultan and the caliph are still hovering on the borders of the province."

"So I supposed. Scherirah will settle that. Let the troops be encamped without the walls, the garrison, ten thousand strong, must be changed monthly. Ithamar, you are governor of the city: Asriel commands the forces. Worthy Jabaster, draw up a report of the civil affairs of the capital. Your quarters are the college of the dervishes. Bravo Scherirah, I cannot afford you a long rest. In three days time you must have crossed the river with your division. It will be quick work. I foresee they will not fight. Meet me all here in council by to-morrow's noon. Farewell.

The chieftains retired, the high priest lingered.

"Were it not an intrusion, sire, I would fain entertain a moment's audience."

"My own Jabaster, you have but to speak."

"Sire, I would speak of Abidan, as valiant a warrior as any in the host. It grieves me much, by some fatality, his services seem ever overcast."

"Abidan! I know him well,—a valiant man, but a dreamer, a dreamer."

"A dreamer, sire! Believe me, a true son of Israel, and one whose faith is deep."

"Good Jabaster, we are all true sons of Israel. Yet let me have men about me who see no visions in the mid-day sun. We must beware of dreamers."

"Dreams are the oracles of God."

"When God sends them. Very true, Jabaster. But this Abidan, and the company with whom he consorts, are filled with high-flown notions, caught from old traditions, which if acted on, would render government impracticable—in a word, they are dangerous men."

"The very flower of Israel! Some one has poisoned your sacred ear against them."

* Thus, a great Turk, who afforded me hospitality, was accustomed to drink his coffee.

"No one, worthy Jabaster. I have no counsellor except yourself. They may be the flower of Israel, but they are not the fruit. Good warriors,—bad subjects: excellent means, by which we may accomplish greater ends. I'll have no dreamers in authority. I must have practical men about me—practical men. See how Abner, Asriel, Ithamar, Medad,—see how these conform to what surrounds them, yet invincible captains, invincible captains. But then they are practical men, Jabaster; they have eyes and use them. They know the difference of times and seasons. But this Abidan, he has no other thought but the rebuilding of the temple: a narrow-souled bigot, who would sacrifice the essence to the form. The rising temple soon would fall again with such constructors. Why, sir, what think you, —this very same Abidan preached in the camp against my entry into what the quaint fanatic chooses to call 'Babylon,' and bored me with some vision!"

"There was a time your majesty thought not so ill of visions."

"Am I Abidan, sir? Are other men to mould their conduct or their thoughts by me? In this world I stand alone, a being of another order to yourselves, incomprehensible even to you. Let this matter cease. I'll hear no more, and have heard too much. To-morrow at council, to-morrow at council."

The high priest withdrew in silence.

"He is gone—at length I am alone. I cannot bear the presence of these men, except in action. Their words, even their looks, disturb the still creation of my brooding thought. I am once more alone; and loneliness hath been the cradle of my empire. Now I do feel inspired. There needs no mummy now to work a marvel.

"The sceptre of Solomon! It may be so. What then? Here's now the sceptre of Alroy. What's that without his mind? The legend said that none should free our people, but he who bore the sceptre of great Solomon. The legend knew that none could gain that sceptre, but with a mind, to whose supreme volition the fortunes of the world would bow like fate. I gained it; I confronted the spectre monarchs in their sepulchre; and the same hand that grasped their shadowy rule, hath seized the diadem of the mighty caliphs by the broad rushing of their imperial river.

"The world is mine: and shall I yield the prize, the universal and heroic prize, to realize the dull tradition of some dreaming priest, and consecrate a legend? He conquered Asia, and he built the temple. Are these my annals? Shall this quick blaze of empire sink to a glimmering and a twilight sway over some petty province, the decent patriarch of a pastoral horde? Is the Lord of Hosts so slight a God that we must place a barrier to his sovereignty, and fix the boundaries of Omnipotence between the Jordan and the Lebanon? It is not thus written: and were it so, I'll pit my inspiration against the presence of my ancestors. I also am a prophet, and Bagdad shall be my Sion. The Daughter of the Voice! Well, I am clearly summoned. I am the Lord's servant, not Jabaster's. Let me make his worship universal as his power; and where's the priest shall dare impugn my faith because his altars smoke on other hills than those of Judah?

"I must see Honain. That man has a great mind. He alone can comprehend my purpose.

Universal empire must not be founded on sectarian prejudices and exclusive rights. Jabaster would massacre the Moslem like Amalek; the Moslem, the vast majority, and most valuable portion of my subjects. He would depopulate my empire, that it might not be said that Ishmael shared the heritage of Israel. Fanatic! I'll send him to conquer Judah. We must conciliate. Something must be done to bind the conquered to our conquering fortunes. That bold Sultan of Roum,—I wish Abner had opposed him. To run off with the harem! I have half a mind to place myself at the head of the pursuing force, and—passion and policy alike combine—and yet—Honain is the man—I might send him on a mission. Could we make terms? I detest treaties. My fancy flies from all other topics. I must see him. Could I but tell him all I think! This door—where leads it? Hah! methinks I do remember you glittering gallery! No one in attendance. The discipline of our palace is somewhat lax. My warriors are no courtiers. What an admirable marshal of the palace Honain would make! Silence everywhere. So! 'tis well. These saloons I have clearly passed through before. Could I but reach the private portal by the river side, unseen or undetected! 'Tis not impossible. Here are many dresses. I will disguise myself. Trusty cimeter, thou hast done thy duty, rest a while. 'Tis lucky I am beardless. I shall make a capital eunuch. So! a very handsome robe. One dagger for a pinch, slippers powdered with pearls,* a caftan of cloth of gold, a Cashmere girdle, and a pelisse of sables. One glance at the mirror. Good! I begin to look like the conqueror of the world!"

II.

It was twilight: a small and solitary boat, with a single rower, glided along the Tigris, and stopped at the archway of a house that descended into the river. It stopped, the boatman withdrew the curtains, and his single passenger disembarked, and descended the stairs of the archway.

The stranger reached the landing-place, and, unfastening a golden grate, proceeded along a gallery, and entered a beautiful saloon of white and green marble, opening into gardens. No one was in the apartment; the stranger threw himself upon a silver couch, placed at the side of the fountain that rose from the centre of the chamber, and fell into a porphyry basin. A soft whisper roused the stranger from his reverie, a soft whisper, that faintly uttered the word "Honain." The stranger looked up, a figure, enveloped in a veil, that touched the ground, advanced from the gardens.

"Honain!" said the advancing figure, throwing off the veil, "Honain! Ah! the beautiful mute returned!"

A woman more lovely than the rosy morn, beheld an unexpected guest. They stood, the lady and the stranger gazing on each other in silence. A man, with a light, entered the extremity of the hall. Carefully he closed the portal, slowly he advanced, with a subdued step; he approached the lady and the stranger.

"Alroy!" said the astonished Honain, the light fell from his hand.

* The slippers in the East form a very fanciful portion of the costume. It is not uncommon to see them thus adorned, and beautifully embroidered. In precious embroidery and enamelling, the Turkish artists are unrivalled.

"Alroy!" exclaimed the lady, with a bewildered air: she turned pale, and leaned against a column.

"Daughter of the caliph!" said the leader of Israel; and he advanced, and fell upon his knee, and stole her passive hand, "I am indeed that Alroy to whom destiny has delivered the empire of thy sire; but the Princess Schirene can have nothing to fear from one who values, above all his victories, this memorial of her good-will;" and he took from his breast a rosary of pearls and emeralds, and rising slowly, left it in her trembling hand.

The princess turned and hid her face in her arm, which reclined against the column.

"My kind Honain," said Alroy, "you thought me forgetful of the past,—you thought me ungrateful. My presence here proves that I am not so. I come to inquire all your wishes. I come, if in my power to gratify and to fulfil them."

"Sire," replied Honain, who had recovered from the emotion in which he rarely indulged, and from the surprise which seldom entrapped him, "Sire, my wishes are slight. You see before you the daughter of my master. An interview, for which I fear I shall not easily gain that lady's pardon, has made you somewhat acquainted with her situation and sentiments. The Princess Schirene seized the opportunity of the late convulsions to escape from a mode of life long repugnant to all her feelings, and from a destiny at which she trembled. I was her only counsellor, and she may feel assured, a faithful, although perhaps an indiscreet one. The irresistible solicitations of the inhabitants, that I should become their deputy to their conqueror, prevented us from escaping as we had intended. Since then, from the movement of the troops, I have deemed it more prudent that we should remain at present here, although I have circulated the intelligence of my departure. In the kiosk of my garden, the princess is now a willing prisoner. At twilight she steals forth for the poor relaxation of my society, to listen to the intelligence which I acquire during the day in disguise. The history, sire, is short and simple. We are in your power; but instead of deprecating your interference, I now solicit your protection."

"Dear Honain, 'tis needless. The Princess Schirene has only to express a wish that it may be fulfilled. I came to speak with you on weighty matters, Honain, but I retire, for I am an intruder now. To-morrow, if it please you, at this hour, and in this disguise, I will again repair here. In the mean time, this lady may perchance express to you her wishes, and you will bear them to me. If an escort to any country, if any palace or province for her rule and residence—but I will not offer to one who should command. Lady! farewell. Pardon the past! To-morrow, good Honain! pr'ythee let us meet. Good even!"

III.

"THE royal brow was clouded," said Ithamar to Asriel, as departing from the council they entered their magnificent bark.

"With thought; he has so much upon his mind, 'tis wondrous how he bears himself."

"I have seen him gay on the eve of battle, and lively though calm, with weightier matters than now oppress him. His brow was clouded, but not, methinks, with thought; one might rather say with temper. Mark you, how he rated Jabaster?"

"Roundly! The stern priest writhed under it, and as he signed the ordinance, shivered his reed in rage. I never saw a man more pale."

"Or more silent. He looked like an imbodied storm. I tell you what, Asriel, that stern priest 'loves not us."

"Have you just discovered that secret, Ithamar? We are not of his school. Nor, in good faith, is our ruler. I am glad to see the king is so stanch about Abidan. Were he in council, he would support Jabaster."

"O! his mere tool. What think you of Scherirah?"

"I would not trust him. As long as there is fighting, he will meddle with nothing else; but, mark my words, Ithamar: in quiet times he will support the priest."

"Medad will have a place in council. He is with us."

"Heart and soul. I would your brother were here, Asriel: he alone could balance Jabaster. Alroy loves your brother like himself. Is it true he marries the Lady Miriam?"

"So the king wishes. 'Twill be a fine match for Abner."

"The world is all before us. I wonder who will be viceroy of Syria."

"When we conquer it. Not Scherirah. Mark my words, Ithamar: he never will have a government. You or I, perchance. For my own part, I would sooner remain as I am."

"Yours is a good post; the best."

"With the command of the city. It should go with the guard."

"Well, then, help me in getting Syria, and you can ask for my command."

"Agreed. Jabaster will have that in a Hebrew monarchy, the chief priest is in fact the grand vizier."

"Alroy will be his own minister."

"I am not so sure of that. He may choose to command the Syrian expedition in person; he must leave some head at Bagdad. Jabaster is no general."

"O! none at all. Alroy will be glad to leave him at home. The Sultan of Roum may not be always so merciful."

"Hah! hah! that was an escape!"

"By heavens! I thought it was all over. You made a fine charge."

"I shall never forget it. I nearly ran over Jabaster."

"Would that you had!"

IV.

It is the tender twilight hour, when maidens in their lonely bower, sigh softer than the eve! The languid rose her head upraises, and listens to the nightingale, while his wild and thrilling praises, from his trembling bosom gush: the languid rose her head upraises and listens with a blush.

In the clear and rosy air, sparkling with a single star, the sharp and spiry cypress tree, rises like a gloomy thought, amid the flow of revelry. A singing bird, a single star, a solemn tree, an odorous flower, are dangerous in the tender hour, when maidens in their twilight bower, sigh softer than the eve!

The daughter of the caliph comes forth to breathe the air: her lute her only company. She sits her Down by a fountain's side, and gazes on the waterfall. Her cheek reclines upon her arm, like fruit upon a graceful bough. Very pensive is the face of that bright and beauteous lady. She starts; a warm voluptuous lip presses her soft and idle hand. It is her own gazelle. With his large and lustrous eyes, more eloquent than many a tongue, the fond attendant mutely asks the cause of all her thoughtfulness.

"Ah! bright gazelle! ah! bright gazelle!" the princess cried, the princess cried; "thy lips are softer than the swan, thy lips are softer than the swan; but his breathed passion, when they pressed, my bright gazelle! my bright gazelle!"

"Ah! bright gazelle! ah! bright gazelle!" the princess cried, the princess cried; "thine eyes are like the stars of night; thine eyes are like the stars of night; but his glanced passion when they gazed, my bright gazelle! my bright gazelle!"

She seized her lute, she wildly threw her fingers o'er its thrilling chords, and gazing on the rosy sky, to borrow all its poetry, thus, thus she sang; thus, thus she sang.

1.
He rose in beauty, like the morn,
That brightens in our Syrian skies;
Dark passion glittered in his eye,
And empire sparkled in his form!

2.
My soul! thou art the dusky earth,
On which his sunlight fell;
The dusky earth that, dim no longer,
Now breathes with light, now beams with love!

3.
He rose in beauty, like the morn,
That brightens on the Syrian skies;
Dark passion glittered in his eye,
And empire sparkled in his form!

"Once more, once more! Ah! sing that strain once more!"

The princess started and looked around. Before her stood Alroy. She rose, she would have retired; but, advancing, the conqueror stole her hand.

"Fair princess," said Alroy, "let it not be said my presence at once banished beauty and music."

"Sire, I doubt not, Honain awaits you. Let me summon him."

"Lady, it is not with Honain that I would speak."

He seated himself by her side. His countenance was pale, his heart trembled.

"This garden," at length he observed in a low voice; "this garden—a brief, brief space has glided away since first I wandered within its beauteous limits, and yet those days seem like the distant memory of another life."

"It is another life," said the princess. "Ourselves, the world, all forms and usages, all feelings and all habits, verily, they have changed as if we had breathed within another sphere."

"Tis a great change."

"Since first you visited my bright kiosk. Pretty bauble! I pray it may be spared."

"It is sacred like yourself."

"You are a courteous conqueror?"

"I am no conqueror, fair Schirene, but a slave more lowly than when I first bowed humbly in your presence."

"And bore away a token not forgotten. Your rosary is here."

"Let me claim it. It has been my consolation in much peril, beauteous lady. On the eve of battle I wound it round my heart."

She held forth the rosary, and turned away her head. Her hand remained in his: he pressed it to his lips. His right arm retained her hand, he wound the other round her waist, as he fell upon his knee.

"O! beautiful, O! more than beautiful! for thou to me art like a dream unbroken," exclaimed the young leader of Israel, "let me, let me breathe my adoration. I offer thee not empire; I offer thee not wealth; I offer thee not all the boundless gratification of magnificent fancy—these may be thine, but all these thou hast proved; but if the passionate affections of a spirit, which ne'er has yielded to the power of woman, or the might of man—if the deep devotion of the soul of Alroy be deemed an offering meet for the shrine of thy surpassing loveliness, I worship thee, Schirene, I worship thee, I worship thee!"

"Since I first gazed upon thee, since thy beauty first rose upon my presence like a star bright with my destiny, in the still sanctuary of my secret love, thy idol has ever rested. Then, then I was a thing whose very touch thy creed might count a contumely. I have avenged the insults of long centuries in the best blood of Asia; I have returned, in glory and in pride, to claim my ancient sceptre, but sweeter far than vengeance, sweeter far than the quick gathering of my sacred tribes, the rush of triumph and the blaze of empire, is this brief moment of adoring love, wherein I pour the passion of my life!"

"O! my soul, my life, my very being! thou art silent, but thy silence is sweeter than others' speech. Yield, yield thee, dear Schirene, yield to thy suppliant! Thy faith, thy father's faith, thy native customs, these, these shall be respected, beauteous lady! Pharaoh's daughter yielded her dusky beauty to my great ancestor. Thy face is like the bright inspiring day! Let it not be said the daughter of the Nile shared Israel's crown—the daughter of the Tigris spurned our sceptre. I am not Solomon, but I am one that, were Schirene the partner of my throne, would make his glowing annals read like a wearisome and misty tale to our surpassing lustre!"

He ceased, the princess turned her hitherto hidden countenance, and bowed it on his heart. "O! Alroy," she exclaimed, "I have no creed, no country, no life, but thee!"

V.

"The king is late to-day."

"Is it true, Asriel, there is an express from Hamadan?"

"Of no moment, Ithamar. I had private letters from Abner. All is quiet."

"Tis much past the hour. When do you depart, Scherirah?"

"The troops are ready. I wait orders. This morning's council will perchance decide."

"This morning's council is devoted to the settlement of the civil affairs of the capital," remarked Jabaster.

"Indeed!" said Asriel. "Is your report prepared, Jabaster?"

"Tis here," replied the high priest. "The Hebrew legislator requires but little musing to shape his order. He has a model which time cannot destroy, nor thought improve."

Ithamar and Asriel exchanged significant glances.

Scherirah looked solemn. There was a pause, which was broken by Asriel.

"'Tis a noble city, this Bagdad. I have not yet visited your quarters, Jabaster. You are well placed."

"As it may be. I hope we shall not tarry here long. The great point is still not achieved."

"How far is it to the holy city?" inquired Scherirah.

"A month's march," replied Jabaster.

"And when you get there?" inquired Ithamar.

"You may fight with the Franks," replied Asriel.

"Jabaster, how large is Jerusalem?" inquired Ithamar. "Is it true, as I have sometimes heard, that it is not bigger than the serail here, gardens and all?"

"Its glory hath departed," replied the high priest; "the bricks have fallen, but we will rebuild with marble; and Sion, that is now without the Christian walls, shall yet sparkle, as in the olden time, with palaces and pavilions."

A flourish of trumpets, the portals flew open, and Alroy entered, leaning on the arm of the envoy of Bagdad.

"Valiant leaders," said Alroy to the astonished chieftains, "in this noble stranger you see one like yourselves, intrusted with my unbounded confidence. Jabaster, behold thy brother!"

"Honain! Art thou Honain?" exclaimed the pontiff, starting from his seat. "I have a thousand messengers after thee." With a countenance alternately pallid with surprise and burning with affection, Jabaster embraced his brother, and, overpowered with emotion, hid his face on his shoulder.

"Sire," at length exclaimed the high priest in a low and tremulous voice, "I must pray your pardon that for an instant in this character I have indulged in any other thoughts but those that may concern your welfare. 'Tis past; and you, who know all, will forgive me."

"All that respects Jabaster must concern my welfare. He is the pillar of my empire;" and holding forth his hand Alroy placed the high priest on his right. "Scherirah, you depart this eve."

The rough captain bowed in silence.

"What is this?" continued Alroy, as Jabaster offered him a scroll. "Ah! your report. 'Order of the Tribes'—'Service of the Levites'—'Princes of the People'—'Elders of Israel!' The day may come when this may be effected. At present, Jabaster, we must be moderate, and content ourselves with arrangements that may insure that order may be maintained, property respected, and justice administered. Is it true a gang has rifled a mosque?"

"Sire! of that I would speak. They are no plunderers, but men, perhaps too zealous, who have read and who have remembered that 'ye shall utterly destroy all the places, wherein the nations which ye shall possess, served their gods upon the high mountains, and upon the hill, and under every green tree. And ye shall overthrow their altars, and'—"

"Jabaster, is this a synagogue? Come I to a council of valiant statesmen, or dreaming rabbis? For a thousand centuries we have been quoting the laws we dare not practise! Is it with such aid we captured Nishabar, and crossed the Tigris? Valiant, wise Jabaster, thou art worthy of better things, and capable of all. I entreat thee urge such matters for the last time. Are these fellows in custody?"

"They were in custody. I have freed them."

"Freed them! Hang them! Hang them on the most public grove. Is this the way to make the Moslem a dutiful subject? Jabaster, Israel honours thee; and I, its chief, know that one more true, more valiant, or more learned, crowds not around our standard; but I see, the caverns of Caucasus are not a school for empire."

"Sire, I had humbly deemed the school for empire was the law of Moses."

"Ay! adapted for these times."

"Can aught divine be changed?"

"Am I as tall as Adam? If man, the crown, the rose of all this fair creation, the most divine of all divine inventions, if time have altered even this choicest of all godlike works, why shall it spare a law made but to rule his conduct? Good Jabaster, we must establish the throne of Israel—that is my mission, and for the means, no matter how—or where. Asriel, what news of Medad?"

"All is quiet between the Tigris and Euphrates. It would be better to recall his division, which has been harassed. I thought of relieving him by Abidan."

"I think so, too. We may as well keep Abidan out of the city. If the truth were known, I'll wager some of his company plundered the mosque. We must issue a proclamation on that subject. My good Jabaster, we'll talk over these matters alone. At present I will leave you with your brother, Scherirah, sup with me to-night, before you quit us. Asriel, come with me to my cabinet."

VI.

"I must see the king!"

"Holy priest, his highness has retired. It is impossible."

"I must see the king. Worthy Pharez, I take all peril on myself."

"Indeed his highness's orders are imperative. You cannot see him."

"Knowest thou who I am?"

"One whom all pious Hebrews reverence."

"I say I must see the king."

"Indeed, indeed, holy Jabaster, it cannot be."

"Shall Israel perish for a menial's place? Go to; I'll see him."

"Nay! if you will. I'll struggle for my duty."

"Touch not the Lord's anointed. Dog, you shall suffer for this!"

So saying, Jabaster threw aside Pharez, and, with the attendant clinging to his robes, rushed into the royal chamber.

"What is all this?" exclaimed Alroy, starting from the divan. "Jabaster! Pharez, withdraw! How now, is Bagdad in insurrection?"

"Worse, much worse, Israel soon will be."

"Ay!"

"My fatal brother has told me all, nor would I sleep until I lifted up my voice to save thee."

"Am I in danger?"

"In the wilderness, when the broad desert quivered beneath thy trembling feet, and the dark heavens poured down their burning torrents, thou wert less so. In that hour of death, one guarded thee, who ne'er forgets his fond and faithful offspring, and now, when he has brought thee out of the house of bondage; now, when thy fortunes, like a noble cedar, swell in the air, and shadow all the land thou the very leader of his people, his chosen one, for whom he hath worked such marvels—thy heart is turned from thy father's God, and bankers after strange abominations."

Through the broad arch that led into the gardens of the serail, the moonlight fell upon the tall figure and the upraised arm of the priest; Alroy stood with folded arms at some distance, watching Jabaster as he spoke, with a calm but searching glance. Suddenly he advanced with a quick step, and, placing his hand upon Jabaster's arm, said in a low, inquiring tone, "You are speaking of this marriage?"

"Of that which ruined Solomon."

"Listen to me, Jabaster," said Alroy, interrupting him, in a calm, but peremptory tone. "I cannot forget that I am speaking to my master, as well as to my friend. The Lord, who knoweth all things, hath deemed me worthy of his mission. My fitness for this high and holy office was not admitted without proof. A lineage, which none else could offer, mystic studies, shared by few, a mind that dared encounter all things, and a frame that could endure most,—these were my claims;—but no more of this. I have passed the great ordeal, the Lord of Hosts hath found me not unworthy of his charge; I have established his people, his altars blaze with sacrifices, his priests are honoured—bear witness thou, Jabaster—his omnipotent unity is declared. What wouldst thou more?"

"All!"

"Then Moses knew ye well. It is a stiff-necked people."

"Sire, bear with me. If I speak in heat, I speak in zeal. You ask me what I wish: my answer is, a national existence, which we have not. You ask me what I wish: my answer is, the Land of Promise. You ask me what I wish: my answer is, Jerusalem. You ask me what I wish: my answer is, the temple—all we have forfeited, all we have yearned after, all for which we have fought—our beauteous country, our holy creed, our simple manners, and our ancient customs."

"Manners change with time and circumstances; customs may be observed everywhere. The ephod on thy breast proves our faith; and for a country, is the Tigris less than Siloah, or the Euphrates inferior to the Jordan?"

"Alas! alas! there was a glorious prime when Israel stood aloof from other nations, a fair and holy thing that God had hallowed. We were then a chosen family, a most peculiar people, set apart for God's entire enjoyment. All about us was solemn, deep, and holy. We shunned the stranger as an unclean thing that must defile our solitary sanctity, and keeping to ourselves, and to our God, our lives flowed on in one great solemn tide of deep religion, making the meanest of our multitude feel greater than the kings of other lands. It was a glorious time; I thought it had returned—but I awake from this, as other dreams."

"We must leave off dreaming, good Jabaster,—we must act. Were I, by any chance, to fall into one of those reveries, with which I have often lost the golden hours at Hamadan, or in our old cave, I should hear, some fine morning, his sultanship of Roum rattling at my gates." Alroy smiled as he spoke: he would willingly have introduced a lighter tone into the dialogue, but the solemn countenance of the priest was not sympathetic with his levity.

"My heart is full, and yet I cannot speak; the memory of the past o'erpowers my thought. I had vainly deemed my voice, inspired by the soul of truth, might yet preserve him; and now I stand here in his presence, silent and trembling, like a guilty thing. O, my prince! my pupil!" said the priest, advancing, falling on his knee, and seizing the robe of Alroy, "by thy sacred lineage, by the sweet memory of thy ardent youth, and our united studies—by all thy zealous thoughts, and solemn musings, and glorious aspirations after fame—by all thy sufferings, and by all thy triumph, and chiefly by the name of that great God, who hath elected thee his favoured child—by all the marvels of thy mighty mission,—I do adjure thee! Arise, Alroy, arise and rouse thyself. The lure that snared thy fathers may trap thee—this Delilah may shear thy mystic lock. Spirits like thee act not by halves. Once fall out from the straight course before thee, and though thou deemest 'tis but to saunter 'mid the summer trees, soon thou wilt find thyself in the dark depths of some infernal forest, where none may rescue thee!"

"What if I do inherit the eager blood of my great ancestor, at least I hold his sceptre. Shall aught of earthly power prevail against the supernatural sway of heaven and hades?"

"Sire, sire, the legend that came from Sinai is full of high instruction. But shape thy conduct by its oracles, and all were well. It says our people can only be established by him who rules them with the verge of Solomon. Sire, when the Lord offered his pleasure to that mighty king, thou knowest his deep discretion. Riches, and length of days, empire and vengeance—these were not the choice of one to whom all accidents were proffered. The legend bears an inward spirit, as well as outward meaning. The capture of the prize was a wise test of thy imperial fitness. Thou hast his sceptre, but without his wisdom—'tis but a staff of cedar."

"Hah! Art thou there? I am glad to see Jabaster politic. Hear me, my friend. What my feelings be unto this royal lady, but little matters. Let them pass, and let us view this question by the light wherein you have placed it, the flame of policy and not of passion. I am no traitor to the God of Israel, in whose name I have conquered, and in whose name I shall rule; but thou art a learned doctor, thou canst inform us. I have heard no mandate to yield my glorious empire for my meanest province. I am lord of Asia, so would I have my long posterity. Our people are but a remnant, a feeble fraction of the teeming millions that own my sway. What I hold I can defend; but my children may not inherit the spirit of their sire. The Moslem will recognise their rule with readier hearts, when they remember a daughter of their caliphs gave them life. You see I too am politic, my good Jabaster!"

"The policy of the son of Kareah*—'twas fatal. He preferred Egypt to Judah, and he suffered. Sire, the Lord hath blessed Judah: it is his land. He would have it filled by his peculiar people, so that his worship might ever flourish. For this he has, by many curious rites and customs, marked us out from all other nations, so that we cannot, at the same time, mingle with them, and yet be true to him. We must exist alone. To preserve that loneliness, is the great end and essence of our law. What have we to do with Bagdad, or its people, where every instant we must witness some violation of our statutes? Can we pray with them? Can we eat with them? In the highest duties, and the lowest occupations of existence, alike we cannot mingle. From the altar of our God, to our own domestic boards, we are alike separated from them. Sire, you may be King of Bagdad, but you cannot, at the same time, be a Jew."

"I am what I am. I worship the Lord of Hosts. Perhaps, in his mercy, he will accept the days of Nishabur and the Tigris, as a compensation for some slight relaxation in the ritual of the baker and the bath."

"And mark my words: it was by the ritual of the baker and the bath, that Alroy rose, and without it he will fall. The genius of the people raised him, which he shared, and that genius has been formed by the law of Moses. Based on that law, he might indeed have handed down an empire to his long posterity; and now, though the tree of his fortunes seems springing up by the waterside, fed by a thousand springs, and its branches covered with dew, there is a gangrene in the sap, and to-morrow he may sink like a shrivelled gourd. Alas! alas! for Israel! We have long fed on mallows; but to lose the vintage in the very day of fruition, 'tis very bitter. Ah! when I raised thy exhausted form in the cavern of Gethsema, and the star of David beamed brightly in the glowing heavens upon thy high fulfilment, who could have dreamed of a night like this? Farewell, sire."

"Stop, Jabaster! earliest, dearest friend, pr'ythee, pr'ythee stop!"

The priest slowly turned, the prince hesitated.

"Part not in anger, good Jabaster."

"In sorrow, sire, only in sorrow; but deep and terrible."

"Israel is lord of Asia, my Jabaster. Why should we fear?"

"Solomon built Tadmor in the wilderness, and his fleet brought gold from Ophir; and yet Alroy was born a slave."

"But did not die one. The sultans of the world have fallen before me. I have no fear. Nay, do not go. At least you'll place some credence in the stars, my learned cabalist. See, my planet shines as brightly as my fortunes." Alroy withdrew the curtain, himself and Jabaster stepped on to the terrace. A beautiful star glittered on high. As they gazed, its colour changed, and a blood-red meteor burst from its circle, and fell into space. The conqueror and the priest looked at each other at the same time. Their countenances were pale, inquiring and agitated.

"Sire," said Jabaster, "march to Judah."

"It portends war," replied Alroy, endeavouring to recover himself. "Perchance some troubles in Persia."

"Troubles at home, no other. The danger is nigh. Look to thyself."

A wild scream was heard in the gardens. It sounded thrice.

"What is all this?" exclaimed Alroy, really agitated. "Rouse the guard, Jabaster, search the gardens."

"'Tis useless, and may do harm. It was a spirit that shrieked."

"What said it?"

"MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UPHARSIN!"

VII.

"THE old story, the priest against the king," said Honain to Alroy, when, at his morrow's interview, he had listened to the events of the preceding night. "My pious brother wishes to lead you back to the theocracy, and is fearful that if he pray at Bagdad, instead of Sion, he may chance to become only the head of an inferior sect, instead of revelling in the universal tithes of a whole nation. As for the meteor, Seherirah must have crossed the river about the same time, and the Sultan of Roum may explain the bloody portent. For the shriek, as I really have no acquaintance with spirits, I must leave the miraculous communication to the favoured ears and initiated intelligences of your highness and my brother. It seems, it differed from 'the Daughter of the Voice' in more respects than one, since it was not only extremely noisy, but, as it would appear, quite unintelligible, except to the individual who had an interest in the interpretation—an ingenious one, I confess. When I enter upon my functions as your highness's chamberlain, I will at least guaranty that your slumbers shall not be disturbed either by spirits or more unwelcome visitors."

"Enter upon them at once, good Honain. How fares my Persian rose to-day, my sweet Schirene?"

"Feeding on your image in your absence. She spares no word to me, I do assure your highness."

"Nay, nay, we know you are a general favourite with the sex, Honain. I' faith I'm jealous."

"I would your highness had cause," said Honain, very demurely.

VIII.

THE approaching marriage between the King of the Hebrews and the Princess of Bagdad was published throughout Asia. Preparations were made on the plain of the Tigris for the great rejoicing. Whole forests were felled to provide materials for the building and fuel for the banqueting. All the governors of provinces and cities, all the chief officers and nobility of both nations, were specially invited, and daily arrived in state at Bagdad. Among them the viceroy of the Medes and Persians, and his recent bride, the Princess Miriam, were conspicuous, followed by a train of nearly ten thousand persons.

A throne, ascended by one hundred steps, covered with crimson cloth, and crowned by a golden canopy, was raised in the middle of the plain: on each side two thrones less elevated, but equally gorgeous. In the front of these thrones an immense circus was described, formed by one hundred chartaks or amphitheatres, ample room for the admittance of the multitude being left between the buildings. These chartaks were covered with bright brocades and showy carpets—on each was hoisted a bright and brilliant banner. In some of them were bands of choice musicians, in others companies of jugglers, bullboons, and storiars. Five chartaks on each side of the thrones were allotted for the convenience of the court, the rest were filled by the different trades of the city. In one, the fruiterers had formed a beautiful garden, glowing with pomegranates, and gourds, and watermelons, oranges, almonds, and pistachio nuts; in another, the butchers exhibited their meats carved in the most fanciful shapes, and the skins of animals dressed up in very ludicrous figures. Here assembled the furriners, all dressed in masquerade, like leopards, lions, tigers, and foxes; and in another booth mustered the upholsterers, proud of a camel made of wood, and reeds, and cord, and painted linen, a camel which walked about as if alive, though ever and anon the interior man drawing aside a curtain, discovered to the marvelling multitude the workman in his own piece. Further on might be perceived the cotton manufacturers, whose chartak was full of birds of all shapes and plumage, yet nevertheless formed of their curious plant; and of the same material, with the help of reeds, although every one imagined it to be built with bricks and mortar, rose in the centre a lofty minaret. It was covered with embroidered work, and on the top was placed a stork so cunningly devised, that the children pelted it with pistachio nuts. The saddlers showed their skill in two litters, open at top, each carried on a dromedary, and in each a beautiful woman, who diverted the spectators with light balls of gilt leather, throwing them up both with their hands and feet. Nor were the mat-makers backward in the proof of their dexterity, since, instead of a common banner, they exhibited a large standard of reeds worked with two lines of writing in Kufic, proclaiming the happy names of Alroy and Schirene. But, indeed, in every chartak might be witnessed some wondrous specimens of the wealth of Bagdad, and of the ingenuity of its unrivalled artisans.

Around this mighty circus, on every side, for the space of many miles, the plain was studded with innumerable pavilions. At measured intervals were tables furnished with every species of provision, and attended by appointed servants, flagons of wine and jars of sherbets mingled with infinite baskets of delicious fruits and trays of refreshing confectionary. Although open to all comers, so great and rapid was the supply, that these banqueting tables seemed ever laden; and that the joys of the people might be complete, they were allowed to pursue whatever pleasures they thought fit without any restraint, by proclamation, in these terms.

"This is the time of feasting, pleasure, and rejoicing. Let no person reprimand or complain of another: let not the rich insult the poor, or the strong the weak; let no one ask another, 'Why have you done this?'"

Millions of people were collected in this paradise. They rejoiced, they feasted, they frolicked, they danced, they sang. They listened to the tales of the Arabian storian, at once enchanted and enchanting, or melted to the strain of the Persian poet, as he painted the moonlit forehead of his heroine, and the wasting and shadowy form of his lovesick hero: they beheld with amazement the feats of the juggler of the Ganges, or giggled at the practised wit and the practical buffoonery of the Syrian mime. And the most delighted could still spare a fascinated glance to the inviting gestures and the voluptuous grace of the dancing girls of Egypt.* Everywhere were melody and merriment, rarity and beauty. For once mankind forgot their cares, and delivered themselves up to infinite enjoyment.

"I grow courteous," said Kisloch the Kourid, assisting a party into one of the shows.

"And I humane," said Calidas the Indian. "Fellow, how dare you violate the proclamation, by thrashing that child?" He turned to one of the stewards of the tables, who was belabouring the unfortunate driver of a camel which had stumbled, and, in its fall, had shivered its burden, two pan-niers of porcelain.

"Mind your own business, fellow," replied the steward, "and be thankful that for once in your life you can dine."

"Is this the way to speak to an officer?" said Calidas the Indian; "I have half a mind to cut your tongue out."

"Never mind, little fellow," said the Guebre, "here is a dirhem for you. Run away and be merry."

"A miracle," grinned the Negro, "he giveth alms."

"And you are witty," rejoined the Guebre. "'Tis a wondrous day."

"What shall we do?" said Kisloch.

"Let us dine," proposed the Negro.

"Ay! under this plane tree," said Calidas. "'Tis pleasant to be alone. I hate everybody but ourselves."

"Here, stop, you rascal," said the Guebre. "What's your name?"

"I am a hadgee," said our old friend Abdallah, the servant of the charitable merchant Ali, and who was this day one of the officiating stewards.

"Are you a Jew, you scoundrel?" said the Guebre: "that is the only thing worth being. Bring some wine, you accursed Giaour!"

"Instantly," said Kisloch, "and a pilau."

"And a gazelle stuffed with almonds," said Calidas.

"And some sugarplums," said the Negro.

"Quick, you infernal Gentile, or I'll send this javelin in your back," hallooed the Guebre.

The servile Abdallah hastened away, and soon bustled back, carrying two flagons of wine, and followed by four servants, each with a tray covered with dainties.

"Where are you going? you accursed scoundrels," grumbled Kisloch: "wait upon the true believers."

"We shall be more free alone," whispered Calidas.

"Away, then, dogs," growled Kisloch.

Abdallah and his attendants hurried off, but were soon summoned back.

"Why did not you bring Schiras wine?" asked Calidas, with an eye of fire.

"The pilau is overdone," thundered Kisloch.

"You have brought a lamb stuffed with pistachio nuts, instead of a gazelle with almonds," said the Guebre.

"Not half sugarplums enough," said the Negro.

"Every thing is wrong," said Kisloch. "Go, and get us a kabob!"

In time, however, even this unmanageable crew were satisfied, and seated under their planetree, and stuffing themselves with all the dainties of the East, they became more amiable as their appetites decreased.

"A bumper, Calidas, and a song," said Kisloch.

* A most capital thing. Square lumps of meat run upon a skewer, and between each piece of meat, a most delicate slice of onion, and quickly broiled. A very favourite dish with the Turks. A kabob shop is like an English chop-house.

* A sculptor might find studies in the Egyptian Alwyn.

"'Tis rare stuff," said the Guebre: "Come, Cally, it should inspire you."

Here goes, then—mind the chorus."

THE SONG OF CALIDAS.

Drink, drink, deeply drink,
Never feel, and never think.
What's love? what's fame? a sigh, a smile,
Friendship but a hollow wile.
If you've any thought or wo,
Drown them in the goblet's flow.
Yes! dash them in this brimming cup,
Dash them in, and drink them up.
Drink, drink, deeply drink,
Never feel, and never think.

"Hark, the trumpets! The king and queen! The procession is coming. Let's away."

"Again! they must be near. Hurry, hurry, for good places."

"Break all the cups and dishes. Come along!"

The multitude from all quarters hurried to the great circus amid the clash of ten thousand cymbals, and the blast of innumerable trumpets. In the distance, issuing from the gates of Bagdad, might be detected a brilliant crowd, the advance company of the bridal procession.

There came five hundred maidens crowned with flowers, and beauteous as the buds that girt their hair. Their flowing robes were whiter than the swan, and each within her hand a palm branch held.

Followed these a band of bright musicians, clothed in golden robes, and sounding silver trumpets.

Then five hundred youths, brilliant as stars, clad in jackets of white fox-skin, and alternately bearing baskets of fruit or flowers.

Followed these a band of bright musicians, clothed in silver robes, and sounding golden trumpets.

Six choice steeds, sumptuously caparisoned, each led by an Arab groom.*

The household of Medad, in robes of crimson, lined with sable.

The standard of Medad.

Medad, on a coal-black Arab, followed by three hundred officers of his division, all mounted on steeds of a pure race.

Slaves, bearing the bridal present of Medad, six Damascus sabres of unrivalled temper.†

Twelve choice steeds, sumptuously caparisoned, each led by an Anatolian groom.

The household of Ithamar, in robes of violet, lined with ermine.

The standard of Ithamar.

Ithamar, on a snow-white Anatolian charger,‡ followed by six hundred officers of his division, all mounted on steeds of a pure race.

Slaves bearing the marriage present of Ithamar. A golden vase of rubies, borne on a violet throne.

One hundred negroes, their noses bored, and hung with rings of brilliants, playing upon wind instruments and kettle-drums.

The standard of the city of Bagdad.

The deputation from the citizens of Bagdad.

Two hundred mules with caparisons of satin, embroidered with gold, and adorned with small golden bells. These bore the sumptuous wardrobe, presented by the city to their princess. Each mule was attended by a girl, dressed like a peri, with starry wings, and a man, masked as a hideous Dive.

The standard of Egypt.

The deputation from the Hebrews of Egypt, mounted on dromedaries, with silver furniture.

Fifty slaves, bearing their present to the princess, with golden cords, a mighty bath of jasper, beautifully carved, the sarcophagus of some ancient temple, and purchased for an immense sum.

The standard of Syria.

The deputation from the Hebrews of the Holy Land, headed by Rabbi Zimri himself, each carrying in his hand his offering to the nuptial pair, a precious vase, containing earth from the mount of Zion.

The standard of Hamadan.

The deputation from the citizens of Hamadan, headed by the venerable Bostenay himself, whose sumptuous charger was led by Caleb.

The present of the city of Hamadan to David Alroy, offered at his own suggestion—the cup in which the prince of the captivity carried his tribute now borne full of sand.

Fifty choice steeds, sumptuously caparisoned, each led by a Median or Persian groom.

The household of Abner and Miriam, in number twelve hundred, clad in chain armour of ivory and gold.

The standard of the Medes and Persians.

Two white elephants, with golden litters, bearing the viceroys and his princess.

The offering of Abner to Alroy. Twelve elephants of state, with furniture embroidered with jewels, each tended by an Indian clad in chain armour of ivory and gold.

The offering of Miriam to Schirene. Fifty plants of roses from Rocnabad,* a white shawl of Cashmere, fifty feet in length, which folded into the handle of a fan; fifty screens, each made of a feather of the roc;† and fifty vases of crystal, full of exquisite perfumes, and each sealed with a talisman of precious stones.

After these followed the eunuch guard.

Then came the band of the Serail, consisting of three hundred dwarfs, hideous indeed to behold, but the most complete musicians in the world.

The steeds of Solomon, in number one hundred, each with a natural star upon its front, uncaparisoned, and led only by a bridle of diamonds.

The household of Alroy and Schirene. Foremost, the Lord Honain riding upon a chestnut charger shod with silver; the dress of the rider pink with silver stars. From his rosy turban depended a tremulous aigrette of brilliants,‡ blazing with a thousand shifting tints.

Two hundred pages followed him; and then

* Led horses always precede the advent of a great man. I think there were usually twelve before the sultan when he went to mosque, which he did in public every Friday.

† But sabres are not to be found at Damascus, any more than cheese at Stilton, or oranges at Malta. The art of watering the blade is, however, practised, I believe, in Persia. A fine Damascus blade will fetch a long figure, fifty, or even one hundred guineas English.

‡ The finest horses in the world are the Anatolian or Asiatic Turkish, from which all our best breeds have sprung, and not from the Arabian, which I believe to be little worth. It is against reason that the race should be so pre-eminent in a land without pasture. See an excellent letter on this subject signed "STEP," in a recent number of that capital periodical, the Sporting Magazine.

* A river in Persia famous for its bowery banks of roses. † The screens and fans in the East, made of the plumage of rare birds, with jewelled handles, are very gorgeous. ‡ Worn only by personages of the highest rank. The sultan presented Lord Nelson after the battle of the Nile with an aigrette of diamonds.

servants of both sexes gorgeously habited, amounting to nearly two thousand, carrying rich vases, magnificent caskets, and costly robes. The treasurer, and two hundred of his underlings, came after, showering golden dirhems on all sides.

The sceptre of Solomon, born by Asriel himself.

A magnificent and lofty car, formed of blue enamel, with golden wheels, and axletrees of turquoises and brilliants, and drawn by twelve snow-white and sacred horses, four abreast—in the car, Aloy and Schirene.

Five thousand of the sacred guard closed the procession.

Amid the exclamations of the people, this gorgeous procession crossed the plain, and moved around the mighty circus. The conqueror and his bride ascended their throne—its steps were covered by the youths and maidens. On the throne, upon their right, sat the venerable Bostenay; on the left, the gallant viceroy and his princess. The chartaks on each side were crowded with the court.

The deputations made their offerings, the chiefs and captains paid their homage, the trades of the city moved before the throne in order, and exhibited their various ingenuity. Thrice was the proclamation made, amid the sound of trumpets, and then began the games.

A thousand horsemen dashed into the arena and threw the jerred. They galloped at full speed, they arrested their fiery chargers in mid course, and flung their long javelins at the minute but sparkling target, the imitative form of a rare and brilliant bird. The conquerors received their prizes from the hand of the princess herself—bright shawls, and jewelled daggers, and rosaries of gems. Sometimes the trumpets announced a prize from the vice-queen, sometimes from the venerable Bostenay, sometimes from the victorious generals, or the loyal deputations, sometimes from the united trades, sometimes from the city of Bagdad, sometimes from the city of Hamadan. The hours flew away in gorgeous and ceaseless variety.

"I would we were all alone, my own Schirene," said Aloy to his bride.

"I would so, too; and yet I love to see all Asia prostrate at the feet of Aloy."

"Will the sun ne'er set? Give me thy hand to play with."

"Hush! See, Miriam smiles."

"Lovest thou my sister, my own Schirene?"

"None dearer but thyself."

"Talk not of my sister, but our selves. Thinkest thou the sun is nearer setting, love?"

"I cannot see—thine eyes, they dazzle me—they are so brilliant, sweet!"

"O! my soul, I could pour out my passion on thy breast."

"Thou art very serious."

"Love is ever so."

"Nay, sweet! It makes me wild and fanciful. Now I could do such things—but what I know not. I would we had wings, and then we would fly away."

"See, I must salute this victor in the games. Must I unloose thy hand? Dear hand, farewell! Think of me while I speak, my precious life. 'Tis done. Give back thy hand, or else methinks I'll die. What's this?"

A horseman, in no holiday dress, but covered with dust, rushed into the circus, bearing in his hand a tall lance, on which was fixed a scroll. The marshals of the games endeavoured to prevent his advance, but he would not be stayed. His message was to the king alone. A rumour of news from the army circulated throughout the crowd. And news from the army it was. Another victory! Scherirah had defeated the Sultan of Roum, who was now a suppliant for peace and alliance. Sooth to say, the intelligence had arrived at dawn of day; but the courtly Honain had contrived that it should be communicated at a later and a more effective moment.

There scarcely needed this additional excitement to this glorious day. But the people cheered, the golden dirhems were scattered with renewed profusion, and the intelligence was received by all parties as a solemn ratification by Jehovah, or by Allah, of the morning ceremony.

The sun set, the court arose, and returned in the same pomp to the scrail. The twilight died away, a beacon fired on a distant eminence announced the entrance of Aloy and Schirene into the nuptial chamber; and suddenly, as by magic, the mighty city, every mosque, and minaret, and tower, and terrace, and the universal plain, and the numberless pavilions, and the immense circus, and the vast and winding river, blazed with light. From every spot a lamp, a torch, a lantern, tinted with every hue, burst forth; enormous cressets of silver radiancy beamed on the top of each chartak; and huge bonfires of ruddy flame started up along the whole horizon.

For seven days and seven nights, this unparalleled scene of rejoicing, though ever various, never ceased. Long, long was remembered the bridal feast of the Hebrew prince and the caliph's daughter; long, long did the peasantry on the plains of Tigris sit down by the side of that starry river, and tell the wondrous tale to their marvelling posterity.

Now what a glorious man was David Aloy, lord of the mightiest empire in the world, and wedded to the most beautiful princess, surrounded by a prosperous and obedient people, guarded by invincible armies, one on whom earth showered all its fortune, and heaven all its favour—and all by the power of his own genius!

PART IX.

I.

"T'WAS midnight, and the storm still raged: 'mid the roar of the thunder and the shrieks of the wind, the floods of forky lightning each instant revealed the broad and billowy breast of the troubled Tigris.

Jabaster stood gazing upon the wild scene from the gallery of his palace. His countenance was solemn, but disquieted.

"I would that he were here!" exclaimed the high priest. "Yet why should I desire his presence, who heralds only gloom? Yet, in his absence am I gay? I am nothing. This Bagdad weighs upon me like a cloak of lead—my spirit is dull and broken.

"They say Aloy gives a grand banquet in the scrail to-night, and toasts his harlot 'mid the thunderbolts. Is there no hand to write upon the wall? He is found wanting—he is weighed, and is indeed found wanting. The parting of his kingdom soon will come, and then—I could weep, O! I could weep, and down these stern and seldom yielding cheeks, pour the wild anguish of my desperate woe. So young, so great, so favoured! But one more step, a god—and now, a 'ul Belshazzar!"

"Was it for this his gentle youth was past in musing solitude and mystic studies? Was it for this the holy messenger summoned his most religious spirit? Was it for this he crossed the fiery desert and communed with his fathers in their tombs? Is this the end of all his victories, and all his vast achievement? To banquet with a wanton!"

"A year ago this very night, it was the eve of battle, I stood within his tent to wait his final word. He mused awhile, and then he said, 'Good night, Jabaster!' I believed myself the nearest to his heart, as he has ever been nearest to mine, but that's all over. He never says, 'Good night, Jabaster,' now. Why, what's all this? Methinks I am a child.

"The Lord's anointed is a prisoner now in the light grating of a bright kiosk, and never gazes on the world he conquered. Egypt and Syria, even farthest Ind, send forth their messengers to greet Alroy, the great, the proud, the invincible. And where is he? In a soft paradise of girls and eunuchs crowned with flowers, listening to melting lays, and the wild thrilling of the amorous lute. He spares no hours to council, all is left to his prime favourites, of whom the leader is that juggling fiend I sometime called my brother.

"Why rest I here? Where should I fly? Methinks my presence is still a link to decency. Should I tear off the ephod, I scarcely fancy 'twould blaze upon another's breast. He goes not to the sacrifice; they say he keeps no fast, observes no ritual, and that their festive fantasies will not be balked, even by the Sabbath. I have not seen him thrice since the marriage. Honain has told her I did oppose it, and she bears to me a hatred that only women feel. Our strong passions break into a thousand purposes: women have one. Their love is dangerous, but their hate is fatal.

"See! a boat bounding on the waters. On such a night,—but one would dare to venture."

Now visible, now in darkness, a single lantern at the prow, Jabaster watched with some anxiety the slight bark buffeting the waves. A tremendous flash of lightning illuminated the whole river, and tipped with a spectral light even the distant piles of building. The boat, and the toiling figure of the single rower, were distinctly perceptible. Now all again was darkness, the wind suddenly subsided, in a few minutes the splash of the oars was audible, and the boat apparently stopped beneath the palace.

There was a knocking at the private portal.

"Who knocks?" inquired Jabaster.

"A friend to Israel."

"Abidan, by his voice. Art thou alone?"

"The prophetess is with me; only she."

"A moment. I'll open the gate. Draw the boat within the arch."

Jabaster descended from the gallery, and in a few moments returned with two visitors: the youthful prophetess Esther, and her companion, a man short in stature, but with a very powerful and well-knit frame. His countenance was very melancholy, and with much harshness in the lower part, not without a degree of pensive beauty in the broad clear brow, and sunken eyes, unusual in oriental visages.

"A rough night," said Jabaster.

"To those who fear it," replied Abidan. "The sun has brought so little joy to me, I care not for the storm."

"What news?"

"Wo! wo! wo!"

"Thy usual note, my sister. Will the day ne'er come when we may change it?"

"Wo! wo! wo! unutterable wo!"

"Abidan, how fares it?"

"Very well."

"Indeed!"

"As it may turn out."

"You are brief."

"Bitter."

"Have you been to court, that you have learned to be so wary in your words, my friend?"

"I know not what may happen. In time we may become all courtiers, though I fear, Jabaster, we have done too much to be rewarded. I gave him my blood, and you something more, and now we are at Bagdad. 'Tis a fine city. I wish to heaven the shower of Sodom would rain upon its terraces."

"I know thou hast something terrible to tell. I know it by that gloomy brow of thine, that lowers like the tempest. Speak out, man. I can bear the worst, for which I am prepared."

"Take it, then. Alroy has proclaimed himself caliph. Abner is made Sultan of Persia. Asriel, Ithamar, Medad, and the chief captains, viziers; Honain, their chief. Four Moslem nobles are sworn into the council. The princess goes to mosque in state next Friday; 'tis said thy pupil doth accompany her."

"I'll not believe it! By the God of Sinai, I'll not believe it! Were my own eye the accursed witness of the deed, I'd not believe it. Go to mosque! They play with thee, my good Abidan, they play with thee."

"As it may be. 'Tis a rumour, but rumours herald deeds. The rest of my intelligence is true. I had it from my kinsman, stout Zalmunna. He left the banquet."

"Shall I go to him? Methinks one single word—to mosque! only a rumour and a false ore. I'll never believe it; no, no, no, never, never! Is he not the Lord's anointed? The ineffable curse upon this daughter of the Moabite! No marvel that it thunders! By heavens, I'll go and beard him in his orgies!"

"You know your power better than Abidan. You bearded him before his marriage, yet——"

"He married. 'Tis true. Honain, their chief. And I kept his ring! Honain is my brother. Have I ne'er a dagger to cut the bond of brotherhood?"

"We have all daggers, Jabaster, if we know but how to use them."

"'Tis strange—we met after twenty years of severance. You were not in the chamber, Abidan. 'Twas at council. We met after twenty years of severance. He is my brother. 'Tis strange, I say; I felt that man shrink from my embrace."

"Honain is a philosopher, and believes in sympathy. 'Twould appear there was none between you. His system, then, absolves you from all ties."

"You are sure the rest of the intelligence is true? I'll not believe the mosque—the rest is bad enough."

"Subah's brother! 'Tis all over, then. Is he of the council?"

"Ay, and others."

"Where now is Israel?"

"She should be in her tents."

"Wo! wo! wo! unutterable wo!" exclaimed the prophetess, who, standing motionless in the back of the chamber, seemed inattentive to their conversation.

Jabaster paced the gallery with agitated steps. Suddenly he stopped, and, walking up to Abidan, seized his arm, and looked him sternly in the face. "I know thy thought, Abidan," exclaimed the priest; "but it cannot be. I have dismissed,—henceforth and forever I have dismissed all feeling from my mind; now I have no brother, no friend, no pupil, and, I fear, no saviour. Israel is all and all to me. I have no other life—'tis not compunction, then, that stays my arm. My heart's as hard as thine."

"Why stays it, then?"

"Because with him we fall. He is the last of all his sacred line. There is no other hand to grasp our sceptre."

"Our sceptre!—what sceptre?"

"The sceptre of our kings."

"Kings!"

"Ay, why dost thou look so dark?"

"How looked the prophet when the stiffnecked populace forsooth must have a king? Did he smile? Did he shout, and clap his hands, and cry, God save his majesty! O, Jabaster! honoured, rare Jabaster! thou second Samuel of our light-headed people! there was a time when Israel had no king except their God. Were we viler then? Did kings conquer Canaan? Who was Moses, who was Aaron, who was mighty Joshua? Was the sword of Gideon a kingly sword? Did the locks of Samson shade royal temples? Would a king have kept his awful covenant like solemn Jephtha? Royal words are light as air, when, to maintain them, you injure any other than a subject!

"Kings! why what's a king? Why should one man break the equal sanctity of our chosen race? Is their blood purer than our own? We are all the seed of Abraham. Who was Saul, and who was David? I never heard they were a different breed unto our fathers. Grant them devout, which they were not; and brave and wise, which other men were; have their posterity a patent for all virtues? No, Jabaster! thou ne'er didst err, but when thou placed a crown upon this haughty stripling. What he did a thousand might have done. 'Twas thy mind inspired the deed. And now he is a king; and now, Jabaster, the very soul of Israel, who should be our judge and leader—Jabaster trembles in disgrace, while our unhallowed sanhedrim is filled with Ammonites!"

"O, Abidan! thou hast touched me to the quick: thou hast stirred up thoughts that ever and anon, like strong and fatal vapours, have risen from the dark abyss of thought, and I have quelled them."

"Let them rise, I say—let them down the beams of that all-scorching sun we suffer under, that drinks all vegetation up, and makes us languish with a dull exhaustion."

"Joy! joy! unutterable joy!"

"Hark! the prophetess has changed her note; and ~~not~~ she hears us not. The spirit of the Lord is truly with her. Come, Jabaster, see thy heart is opening to thy people's sufferings: thy people, my Jabaster, for art not thou our judge! at least, thou shalt be."

"Can we call back the theocracy?—Is't possible?"

"But say the word, and it is done, Jabaster. Nay, stare not. Dost thou think there are no true ears in Israel? Dost thou suppose thy children have beheld, without a thought, the foul insults poured on thee—thee, their priest, their adored high priest, one who recalls the best days of the past—the days of their great judges. But one word, one single movement of that mitred head, and—But I speak unto a mind that feels more than I can express. Be silent, tongue, thou art a babbling counsellor. Jabaster's patriot soul needs not the idle schooling of a child. If he be silent, 'tis that his wisdom deems the hour's not ripe; but when her leader speaks, Israel will not be slack."

"The Moslem in council! We know what must come next. Our national existence is in its last agony. Methinks the time is very ripe, Abidan."

"Why, so we think, great sir; and say the word, and twenty thousand spears will guard the ark. I'll answer for my men. Stout Scherirah looks grimly on the Moabites. A word from thee, and the whole Syrian army will join our banner—the lion of Judah, that shall be our flag. The tyrant and his satraps, let them die, and then the rest must join us. We'll proclaim the covenant, and leaving Babylon to a bloody fate, march on to Zion!"

"Sion, his youthful dream, Sion!"

"You muse!"

"King or no king, he is the Lord's anointed. Shall this hand, that poured the oil on his hallowed head, wash out the balmy signet with his blood? Must I slay him? Shall this kid be scathed even in its mother's milk?"

"His voice is low, and yet his face is troubled. How now, sir?"

"What art thou? Ah! Abidan, trusty, stanch Abidan! You see, Abidan, I was thinking, my good Abidan, all this may be the frenzy of a revel. To-morrow's dawn may summon cooler councils. The tattle of the table, it is sacred. Let us forget it; let us pass it over. The Lord may turn his heart. Who knows, who knows, Abidan?"

"Noble sir, a moment since your mind was like your faith, firm and resolved, and now—"

"School me not, school me not, good Abidan. There is that within my mind you cannot fathom; some secret sorrows which are all my own. Leave me, good friend, leave me a while. When Israel calls me I shall not be wanting. Be sure of that, Abidan, be sure of that. Nay, do not go; the night is very rough, and the fair prophetess should let stem again the swelling river. I'll to my closet, and will soon return."

Jabaster quitted the gallery, and entered a small apartment. Several large volumes, unclasped and open, were lying on various parts of the divan. Before them stood his brazen cabalistic table. He closed the chamber with a cautious air. He advanced into the centre of the apartment. He lifted up his hands to heaven, and clasped them with an expression almost of agony,

"Is it come to this?" he muttered in a tone of deep oppression. "Is it come to this? What is I have heard? what done? Down, tempting devil down. O! life, O! glory, O! my country, my chosen people, and my sacred creed!—why do we live, why act, why have we feeling for aught that's famous, or for aught that's holy? Let me die, let—let me die. The torture of existence is too great."

He flung himself upon the couch, he buried his awful countenance in his robes. His mighty heart was convulsed with passion. There did he lie, that great and solemn man, prostrate and wo-begone.

II.

"THE noisy banquet lingers in my ear; I love to be alone."

"With me?"

"Thou art myself; I have no other life.

"Sweet bird! It is now a caliph."

"I am what thou willest, soul of my sweet existence! Pomp and dominion, fame and victory, seem now but flawed and dimly-shaded gems compared with thy bright smile!"

"My plaintive nightingale, shall we hunt to-day?"

"Alas! my rose, I'd sooner lie upon this lazy couch, and gaze upon thy beauty!"

"Or sail upon the cool and azure lake, in some bright bark, like to a sea-nymph's shell, and followed by the swans?"

"There is no lake so blue as thy deep eye; there is no swan so white as thy round arm!"

"Or shall we lance our falcons in the air, and bring the golden pheasant to our feet?"

"I am the golden pheasant at thy feet, why wouldst thou richer prey?"

"Rememberest thou thy earliest visit to this dear kiosk, my gentle mute? There thou stoodest with folded arms, and looks demure as day, and ever anon, with those dark eyes, stealing a glance which made my cheek quite pale. Methinks I see thee even yet, shy bird. Dost know, I was so foolish when it quitted me, dost know I cried?"

"Ah, no! thou didst not cry?"

"Indeed, I think I did."

"Tell me again, my own Schirene, indeed didst cry?"

"Indeed I did, my soul!"

"I would those tears were in some crystal vase, I'd give a province for the costly urn."

She threw her arms around his neck, and covered his face with kisses.

Sunset sounded from the minarets. They arose and wandered together in the surrounding paradise. The sky was tinted with a pale violet flush, a single star floating by the side of the white moon, that beamed with a dim lustre, soft and shapely as a pearl.

"Beautiful!" exclaimed the pensive Schirene, as she gazed upon the star. "O! my Alroy, why cannot we ever live alone, and ever in a paradise?"

"I am wearied of empire," replied Alroy with a smile, "let us fly!"

"Is there no island with all that can make life charming, and yet impervious to man? How little do we require! Ah! if these gardens, instead of being surrounded by hateful Bagdad, were only encompassed by some beautiful ocean!"

"My heart, we live in a paradise, and are seldom disturbed, thanks to Honain!"

"But the very consciousness that there are any other persons existing but ourselves is to me painful. Every one who even thinks of you seems to rob me of a part of your being. Besides, I am weary of pomp and palaces. I should like to live in a sparry grot, and sleep upon a couch of sweet leaves!"

This interesting discussion was disturbed by a dwarf, who, in addition to being very small, and very ugly, was dumb. He bowed before the princess, and then had recourse to a great deal of pantomimic action, by which she at length discovered that it was dinner time. No other person could have ventured to disturb the royal pair, but this little being was a privileged favourite.

So Alroy and Schirene entered the serail. An immense cresset-lamp, fed with perfumed oil, threw a soft light round the sumptuous chamber. At the end stood a row of eunuchs in scarlet dresses, and each holding a tall silver staff. The caliph and the sultana threw themselves upon a couch covered with a hundred cushions; on one side stood a group consisting of the captain of the guard and other officers of the household, on the other, of beautiful female slaves magnificently attired.

The line of domestics at the end of the apartment opened, and a body of slaves advanced, carrying trays of ivory, and gold, and ebony, and silver, covered with the choicest dainties, most curiously prepared. These were in turn offered to the caliph and the sultana by their surrounding attendants. The princess accepted a spoon made of a single pearl, the long, thin golden handle of which was studded with rubies, and condescended to partake of some saffron soup, of which she was very fond. Afterwards she regaled herself with the breast of a eygnet stuffed with almonds, and stewed with violets and cream. Having now a little satisfied her appetite, and wishing to show a mark of her favour to a particular individual, she ordered the captain of the guard instantly to send him the whole of the next course* with her compliments. Her attention was then engaged with a dish of those delicate ortolans that feed upon the vine-leaves of Schiraz, and with which the governor of Nishabur took especial care that she should be well provided. Tearing their delicate forms to pieces with her still more delicate fingers, she insisted upon feeding Alroy, who of course yielded to her solicitations. In the mean time they refreshed themselves with their favourite sherbet of pomegranates, and the golden wine of mount Lebanon.† The caliph, who could eat no more ortolans, although fed by such delicate fingers, was at length obliged to call for "rice," which was synonymous to commanding the banquet to disappear. The attendants now brought to each, basins of gold, and ewers of rock crystal filled with rose-water, with towels of that rare Egyptian linen, which can only be made of the cotton that grows upon the banks of the Nile. While they amused themselves with eating sugarplums, and drinking coffee flavoured with cinnamon, the female slaves

* These compliments from the tables of the great are not uncommon in the East. When at the head-quarters of the grand vizier at Yanina, his highness sent to myself and my travelling companions, a course from his table, singers and dancing girls.

† A most delicious wine, from its colour, brilliancy, and rare flavour, justly meriting this title, is made on Lebanon; but it will not, unfortunately, bear exportation, and even materially suffers in the voyage from the coast to Alexandria.

danced before them in the most graceful attitudes to the melody of invisible musicians.

"My enchanting Schirene," said the caliph, "I have dined, thanks to your attention, very well. These slaves of yours dance admirably, and are exceedingly beautiful. Your music, too, is beyond all praise; but, for my own part, I would sooner be quite alone, and listening to one of your songs."

"I have written a new one to-day. You shall hear it." So saying, she clapped her little white hands, and the whole of the retinue immediately withdrew.

III.

"THE stars are stealing forth, and so will I. Sorry sight! to view Jabaster, with a stealthy step, skulk like a thing dishonoured! O! may the purpose consecrate the deed—the die is cast."

So saying, the high priest, muffled up in his robe, emerged from his palace into the busy streets. It is at night that the vitality of oriental life is most impressive. The narrow winding streets, crowded with population breathing the now sufferable air, the illuminated coffee-houses, the groups of gay, yet sober revellers, the music and the dancing, and the animated recitals of the poet and the storer, all combine to invest the starry hours with a beguiling, and even fascinating, character of enjoyment and adventure.

It was the night after the visit of Abidan and the prophetess. Jabaster had agreed to meet Abidan in the square of the great mosque two hours after sunset, and thither he now repaired.

"I am somewhat before my time," he said, as he entered the great square, over which the rising moon threw a full flood of light. A few dark shadows of human beings alone moved in the distance. The world was in the streets and coffee-houses. "I am somewhat before my time," said Jabaster. "Conspirators are watchful. I am anxious for the meeting, and yet I dread it. Since he broke this business I have never slept. My mind is a chaos. I'll not think. If 'tis to be done, let it be done at once. I am more tempted to sheathe this dagger in Jabaster's breast than in Aloy's. If life or empire were the paltry stake, I'd end a life that now can bring no joy, and yield authority that hath no charm; but Israel, Israel, thou for whom I have endured so much—let me forget Jabaster had a mother.

"But for this thought that links me with my God, and leads my temper to a higher state, how vain and sad, how wearisome and void, were this said world they think of! But for this thought I could sit down and die. Yea! my great heart could crack, worn out, worn out: my mighty passions, with their fierce but flickering flame, sink down and die, and the strong brain that e'er hath urged my course, and pricked me onward with perpetual thought, desert the rudder it so long hath held, like some baffled pilot in blank discomiture, in the far centre of an unknown sea.

"Study and toil, anxiety and sorrow, mighty action, perchance time and disappointment, which is worse than all, have done their work, and not in vain. I am no longer the same Jabaster that gazed upon the stars of Caucasus. Methinks even they look dimmer than of yore. The glory of my life is fading. My leaves are sear, tinged, but not tainted. I am still the same in one respect—I have not left my God, in deed or thought. Ah! who art thou?"

"A friend to Israel."

"I am glad that Israel hath a friend. Noble Abidan, I have well considered all that hath passed between us. Sooth to say, you touched upon a string I've played before, but kept it for my loneliness; a jarring tune, indeed a jarring tune, but so it is, and being so, let me at once unto your friends, Abidan."

"Noble Jabaster, thou art what I deemed thee."

"Abidan, they say the consciousness of doing justly is the best basis of a happy mind."

"Even so."

"And thou believest it?"

"Without doubt."

"We are doing very justly?"

"'Tis a weak word for such a holy purpose."

"I am most wretched!"

IV.

THE high priest and his companion entered the house of Abidan. Jabaster addressed the already assembled guests.

"Brave Scheriah, it joys me to find thee here. In Israel's cause when was Scheriah wanting? Stout Zalmunna, we have not seen enough of each other; the blame is mine. Gentle prophetess, thy blessing!

"Good friends, why we meet here is known to all. Little did we dream of such a meeting when we crossed the Tigris. But that is nothing. We come to act and not to argue. Our great minds, they are resolved; our solemn purpose requires no demonstration. If there be one among us who would have Israel a slave to Ishmael, who would lose all we have prayed for, all we have fought for, all which we have won, and all for which we are prepared to die—if there be one among us who would have the ark polluted, and Jehovah's altar stained with a Gentile sacrifice—if there be one among us who does not sigh for Sion, who would not yield his breath to build the temple and gain the heritage his fathers lost, why, let him go! There is none such among us; then stay and free your country!"

"We are prepared, great Jabaster; we are prepared, all, all!"

"I know it; you are like myself. Necessity hath taught decision. Now for our plans. Speak, Zalmunna."

"Noble Jabaster, I see much difficulty. Aloy no longer quits his palace. Our entrance unwatched is, you well know, impossible. What say you, Scheriah?"

"I doubt not of my men, but war against Aloy is, to say naught of danger, a doubtful issue."

"I am prepared to die, but not to fail," said Abidan. "We must be certain. Open war I fear. The mass of the army will side with their leaders, and they are with the tyrant. Let us do the deed, and they must join us."

"Is it impossible to gain his presence to some sacrifice in honour of some bygone victory—what think ye?"

"I doubt much, Jabaster. At this moment he little wishes to sanction our national ceremonies with his royal person. The woman assuredly will stay him. And even if he come, success is difficult, and therefore doubtful."

"Noble warriors, list to a woman's voice," exclaimed the prophetess, coming forward. "'Tis weak, but with such instruments, even the aspirations of a child, the Lord will commune with his chosen people: There is a secret way by which I can gain the gardens of the palace. To-morrow night, just as the moon is in her midnight bower, behold the accursed pile shall blaze. Let Abidan's troop be all prepared, and at the moment the flames first mount, march to the seraglio gate as if with aid. The affrighted guard will offer no opposition. While the troops secure the portals, you yourselves, Zalmunna, Abidan, and Jabaster, rush to the royal chamber and do the deed. In the mean time, let brave Scherirah, with his whole division, surround the palace, as if unconscious of the mighty work. Then come you forward, show, if it need, with tears, the fated body to the soldiery, and announce the theocracy."

"It is the Lord who speaks," said Abidan, who was doubtless prepared for the proposition; "he has delivered them into our hands."

"A bold plan," said Jabaster, musing, "and yet I like it. 'Tis quick, and that is something. I think 'tis sure."

"It cannot fail," exclaimed Zalmunna, "for if the flame ascend not, still we are but where we were."

"I am for it," said Scherirah.

"Well, then," said Jabaster, "so let it be. To-morrow's eve will see us here again, prepared. Good night."

"Good night, holy priest. How seem the stars, Jabaster?"

"Very troubled; so have they been some days. What they portend I know not."

"Health to Israel."

"Let us hope so. Good night, sweet friends."

"Good night, holy Jabaster. Thou art our corner-stone."

"Israel hath no other hope but in Jabaster."

"My lord," said Abidan, "remain, I pray, one moment."

"What is't? I fain would go."

"Alroy must die, my lord, but dost thou think a single death will seal the covenant?"

"The woman?"

"Ay! the woman! I was not thinking of the woman. Asriel, Ithamar, Medad?"

"Valiant soldiers! doubt not we shall find them useful instruments. I do not fear such loose companions. They follow their leaders, like other beings born to obey. Having no head themselves, they must follow us who have."

"I think so too. There is no other man who might be dangerous?"

Zalmunna and Scherirah cast their eyes upon the ground. There was a dead silence, broken by the prophetess,

"A judgment hath gone forth against Honain!"

"Nay! he is Lord Jabaster's brother," said Abidan. "It is enough to save a more inveterate foe to Israel, if such there be."

"I have no brother, sir. The man you speak of I will not slay, since there are others who may do that deed. And so again, good night."

V.

It was the dead of night, a single lamp burned in the chamber, which opened into an arched gallery, that descended by a flight of steps into the gardens of the serail.

A female figure ascended the flight with slow and cautious steps. She paused on the gallery, she looked around, one foot was in the chamber.

She entered. She entered a chamber of small dimensions, but richly adorned. In the farthest corner was a couch of ivory, hung with a gauzy curtain of silver tissue, which, without impeding respiration, protected the slumberer from the fell insects of an oriental night. Leaning against an ottoman was a large brazen shield of ancient fashion, and near it some helmets and curious weapons.

"An irresistible impulse hath carried me into this chamber!" exclaimed the prophetess. "The light haunted me like a spectre; and wheresoe'er I moved, it seemed to summon me.

"A couch and a slumberer!"

She approached the object, she softly withdrew the curtain. Pale and panting she rushed back, yet with a light step. She beheld Alroy!

For a moment she leaned against the wall, overpowered by her emotions. Again she advanced, and gazed on her unconscious victim.

"Can the guilty sleep like the innocent? Who would deem this gentle slumberer had betrayed the highest trust that ever heaven vouchsafed to favoured man? He looks not like a tyrant and a traitor; calm his brow, and mild his placid breath! His long dark hair, dark as the raven's wing, hath broken from its fillet, and courses, like a wild and stormy night, over his pale and moonlit brow. His cheek is delicate, and yet repose hath brought a flush; and on his lip there seems some word of love, that will not quit it. It is the same Alroy that blessed our vision, when, like the fresh and glittering star of morn, he rose up in the desert, and, bringing joy to others, brought to me only—

"O! hush, my heart, and let thy secret lie hid in the charnel-house of crushed affections. Hard is the lot of woman; to love and to conceal is our sharp doom! O, bitter life! O, most unnatural lot! Man made society, and made us slaves. And so we droop and die, or else take refuge in idle fantasies, to which we bring the fervour that is meant for nobler ends.

"Beauteous hero! whether I bear thee most hatred or most love, I cannot tell. Die you must; yet I feel I should die with thee. O! that to-night could lead at the same time unto our marriage bed and funeral pyre. Must that white bosom bleed? and must those delicate limbs be hacked and handled by these bloody butchers? Is that justice? They lie, the traitors, when they call thee false to our God. Thou art thyself a god, and I could worship thee! See those beauteous lips—they move. Hark to the music!"

"Schirene, Schirene!"

"There wanted but that word to summon back my senses. O! fool, fool! where is thy fancy wandering? I'll not wait for tardy justice. I'll do the deed myself. Shall I not kill my Sisera?" She seized a dagger from the ottoman, a rare and highly-tempered blade. Up she raised it in the air, and dashed it to his heart, with superhuman force. It struck against the talisman which Jabaster had given Alroy, and which, from a lingering superstition, he still wore; it struck, and shivered into a thousand pieces. The caliph sprang from his couch, his eyes met the prophetess, standing over him in blank despair, with the hilt of the dagger in her hand.

"What is all this? Schirene! Who art thou? Esther!" He jumped from the couch, called to Pharez, and seized her by both hands. "Speak!" he continued. "Art thou Esther? What dost thou here?"

She broke into a wild laugh; she wrestled with his grasp, and pulled him towards the gallery. He beheld the chief tower of the serail in flames. Joining her hands together, grasping them both in one of his, and dragging her towards the ottoman, he seized a helmet, and flung it upon the mighty shield. It sounded like a gong. Pharez started from his slumbers, and rushed into the chamber.

"Pharez! Treason! treason! Send instant orders that the palace gates are open on no pretence whatever. Go, fly! See the captain himself. Summon the household. Order all to arms. Speed for our lives!"

The whole palace was now roused. Alroy delivered Esther, exhausted and apparently senseless, to a guard of eunuchs. Slaves and attendants poured in from all directions. Soon arrived Schirene, with dishevelled hair and hurried robes, attended by a hundred maidens, each bearing a torch.

"My soul, what ails thee?"

Nothing, sweetest; all will soon be well," replied Alroy, picking up, and examining the fragments of the shivered dagger, which he had just discovered.

"My life has been attempted; the palace is in flames; I suspect the city is in insurrection. Look to your mistress, maidens!" Schirene fell into their arms. "I'll soon be back." So saying, he rushed to the grand court.

Several thousand persons, for the population of the serail and its liberties was very considerable, were assembled in the grand court; eunuchs, women, pages, slaves and servants, and a few soldiers. All in confusion and alarm, fire raging within, and mysterious and terrible outcries without. A cry of "the caliph! the caliph!" announced the arrival of Alroy, and produced a degree of comparative silence.

"Where's the captain of the guard?" he exclaimed. "That's well. Open the gates to none. Who will leap the wall, and bear a message to Asriel? You? That's well too. To-morrow you shall yourself command. Where's Mesrou? Take the eunuch guard and the company of gardeners,* and suppress the flames at all cost. Pull down the intervening buildings. Abidan's troop arrived with succour, eh? I doubt it not. I expected them. Open to none. They force an entrance—eh? I thought so. So that javelin has killed a traitor. Feed me with arms. I'll keep the gate. Send again to Asriel. Where's Pharez?"

"By your side, my lord."

"Run to the queen, my faithful Pharez, and tell her that all's well. I wish it were! Didst ever hear a din so awful? Methinks all the tambours and the cymbals of the city are in full chorus. Foul play, I guess. O! for Asriel! Has Pharez returned?"

"I am by your side, my lord."

"How's the queen?"

"She would gladly join your side."

"No, no! Keep the gates there. Who says they are making fires before them? 'Tis true.

We must sally, if the worst come to the worst, and die at least like soldiers. O Asriel! Asriel!"

"May it please your highness, the troops are pouring in from all quarters."

"'Tis Asriel."

"No! your highness, 'tis not the guard. Methinks they are Scherirah's men."

"Hum! What it all is, I know not; but very foul play, I do not doubt. Where's Honain?"

"With the queen, sire."

"'Tis well. What is that shout?"

"Here's the messenger from Asriel. Make way! way!"

"Well! how is't, sir?"

"Please your highness, I could not reach the guard."

"Could not reach the guard! God of my fathers! who should let thee?"

"Sire, I was taken prisoner."

"Prisoner! By the thunder of Sinai, are we at war? Who made thee prisoner?"

"Sire, they have proclaimed thy death."

"Who?"

"The council of the elders. So I heard. Abidan, Zalmunna—"

"Rebels and dogs! Who else?"

"The high priest!"

"Hah! Is it there? Pharez, fetch me some drink. Is it true Scherirah has joined them?"

"His force surrounds the serail. No aid can reach us without cutting through his ranks."

"O! that I were there with my good guard! Are we to die here like rats, fairly murdered! Cowardly knaves! Hold out, hold out, my men! 'Tis sharp work, but some of us will smile at this hereafter. Who stands by Alroy to-night bravely and truly, shall have his heart's content to-morrow. Fear not, fear not: I was not born to die in a civic broil. I bear a charmed life. So to it."

VI.

"Go to the caliph, good Honain, I pray thee go. I can support myself, he needs thy counsel. Bid him not expose his precious life. The wicked men! Asriel must soon be here. What sayest thou?"

"There is no fear. Their plans are ill-devised. I have long expected this stormy night, and feel even now more anxious than alarmed."

"'Tis I they aim at—it is I they hate. The high priest, too! Ay, ay! Thy proud brother, good Honain, I have ever felt he would not rest until he drove me from this throne, my right; or washed my hated name from out our annals in my life's blood. Wicked, wicked Jabaster! He frowned upon me from the first, Honain. Is he indeed thy brother?"

"I care not to remember. He aims at something further than thy life; but time will teach us more than all our thoughts."

II.

THE fortifications of the serail resisted all the efforts of the rebels. Scherirah remained in his quarters with his troops under arms, and recalled the small force that he had originally sent out as much to watch the course of events as to assist Abidan. Asriel and Ithamar poured down their columns in the rear of that chieftain, and by dawn a division of the guard had crossed the river, the care of which had been intrusted to Sche-riah, and had thrown themselves into the palace. Alroy sallied forth at the head of these fresh troops. His presence decided a result which was perhaps never doubtful. The division of Abidan fought with the desperation that became their fortunes. The carnage was dreadful, but their discomfiture complete. They no longer acted in masses, or with any general system. They thought only of self-preservation, or of selling their lives at the dearest cost. Some dispersed, some escaped. Others entrenched themselves in houses, others fortified the bazaar. All the horrors of war in the streets were now experienced. The houses were in flames, the thoroughfares flowed with blood.

At the head of a band of faithful followers Abidan proved himself by his courage and resources worthy of success. At length, he was alone, or only surrounded by his enemies. With his back against a building in a narrow street, where the number of his opponents only embarrassed them, the three foremost of his foes fell before his irresistible cimeter. The barricaded door yielded to the pressure of the multitude. Abidan rushed up the narrow stairs, and gaining a landing-place, turned suddenly round, and cleaved the skull of his nearest pursuer. He hurled the mighty body at his followers, and retarding their advance, himself dashed onward, and gained the terrace of the mansion. Three soldiers of the guard followed him as he bounded from terrace to terrace. One armed with a dart, hurled the javelin at the chieftain. The weapon slightly wounded Abidan, who, drawing it from his arm, sent it back to the heart of its owner. The two other soldiers, armed only with swords, gained upon him. He arrived at the last terrace in the cluster of buildings. He stood at bay on the brink of the precipice. He regained his breath. They approached him. He dodged them in their course. Suddenly, with admirable skill, he flung his cimeter edgewise at the legs of the farthest foe, who stopped short, roaring with pain. The chieftain sprang at the foremost, and hurled him down into the street below, where he was dashed into atoms. A trap-door offered itself to the despairing eye of the rebel. He descended and found himself in a room filled with women. They screamed, he rushed through them, and descending a staircase, entered a chamber tenanted by a bed-ridden old man. The ancient invalid inquired the cause of the uproar, and died of fright before he could receive an answer, at the sight of the awful being before him, covered with streaming blood. Abidan secured the door, washed his blood-stained face, and disguising himself in the dusty robes of the deceased Armenian, sallied forth to watch the fray. The obscure street was silent. The chieftain proceeded unmolested. At the corner he found a soldier holding a charger for his captain. Abidan, unarmed, seized a poniard from the soldier's belt, and stabbed him to the heart, and vaulting on the steed galloped towards the river. No boat was to be found; he breasted the stream upon the stout courser. He reached the opposite bank. A company of camels were reposing by the side of a fountain. Alarm had dispersed their drivers. He mounted the fleetest in appearance; he dashed to the nearest gate of the city. The guard at the gate refused him a passage. He concealed his agitation. A marriage procession arrived returning from the country. He rushed into their centre, and overset the bride in her gilded wagon. In the midst of the confusion, the shrieks, the oaths, and the scuffle, he forced his way through the gate, scoured over the country, and never stopped until he gained the desert.

VIII.

THE uproar died away. The shouts of warriors, the shrieks of women, the wild clang of warfare, all were silent. The flames were extinguished, the carnage ceased. The insurrection was suppressed, and order restored. The city, all the houses of which were closed, was patrolled by the conquering troops, and by sunset the conqueror himself, in his hall of state, received the reports and the congratulations of his chieftains. The escape of Abidan seemed counterbalanced by the capture of Jabaster. After performing prodigies of valour, the high priest had been overpowered, and was now a prisoner in the serail. The conduct of Scherirah was not too curiously criticised; a commission was appointed to inquire into the mysterious affair, and Alroy retired to the bath* to refresh himself after the fatigues of the first victory which he could not consider a triumph.

As he reposed upon his couch, melancholy and exhausted, Schirene was announced. The princess threw herself upon his neck, and covered him with embraces. His heart yielded to her fondness, his spirit became lighter, his depression melted away.

"My ruby!" said Schirene, and she spoke in a low smothered voice, her face hidden and nestled in his breast. "My ruby! dost thou love me?"

He smiled in fondness as he pressed her to his heart.

"My ruby, thy pearl is so frightened, it dare not look upon thee. Wicked men! 'tis I they hate, 'tis I they would destroy!"

"There is no danger, sweet. 'Tis over now. Speak not—nay, do not think of it."

"Ah! wicked men! There is no joy on earth while such things live. Slay, Alroy, their mighty master, who, from vile slaves, hath made them princes! Ungrateful churls! I am so alarmed—I ne'er shall sleep again. What! slay my innocent bird, my pretty bird, my very heart! I'll not believe it. It is I they hate. I am sure they'll kill me. You shall never leave me, no, no, no, no! You shall not leave me, love; never, never! Didst hear a noise? Methinks they are ever here, ready to plunge their daggers in our hearts—our soft, soft hearts! I think you love me, child: indeed, I think you do!"

"Take courage, heart! There is no fear, my soul; I cannot love thee more, or else I would."

"All joy is gone! I ne'er shall sleep again. O my soul! art thou indeed alive? Do I indeed embrace my own Alroy, or is it all a wild and troubled dream, and are not my arms clasped round a shadowy ghost, myself a spectre in a sepulchre! Wicked, wicked men! Can it indeed be true? What, slay Alroy! my joy, my only life! Ah! wo is me; our bright felicity hath fled forever!"

"Not so, sweet child; we are but as we were. A few quick hours, and all will be as bright, as if no storm had crossed our sunny days."

"Hast seen Asriel? He says such fearful things!"

* The bath is a principal scene of oriental life. Here the Asiatics pass a great portion of their day. The bath consists of a long suite of chambers of various temperatures, in which the various processes of the elaborate ceremony are performed.

"How now?"

"Ah me! I am desolate. I have no friend."

"Schirene!"

"They'll have my blood; I know they'll have my blood."

"Indeed, an idle fancy."

"Idle! ask Asriel, question Ithamar. Idle! 'tis written in their tablets, their bloody scroll of rapine and of murder. Thy death led only to mine, and had they hoped my bird would but have yielded his gentle mate, they would have spared him. Ay! ay! 'tis I they hate, 'tis I they would destroy. This form, I fear it has lost its lustre, but still 'tis thine, and once thou saidst thou lovedst it; this form was to have been hacked and mangled, this ivory bosom was to have been ripped up and tortured, and this warm blood, that flows alone for thee, that fell Jabaster was to pour its tide upon the altar of his ancient vengeance. He ever hated me!"

"Jabaster! Schirene! Where are we, and what are we? Life, life, they lie, that call thee nature! Nature never sent these gusts of agony. O! my heart will break. I drove him from my thought, and now she calls him up, and now must I remember he is my—prisoner! God of heaven, God of my fathers, is it come to this? Why did he not escape? Why must Abidan, a common cut-throat, save his graceless life, and this great soul, this stern and mighty being—ah me! I have lived long enough. Would they had not failed, would—"

"Stop, stop, Aloy! I pray thee, love, be calm. I came to soothe thee, not to raise thy passions. I did not say Jabaster willed thy death, though Asriel says so; 'tis I he wars against: and if indeed Jabaster be a man so near thy heart—if he indeed be one so necessary to thy prosperity, and cannot live in decent order with thy slave that's here, I know my duty, sir. I would not have thy fortunes marred to save my single heart, although I think 'twill break. I'll go, I'll die, and deem the hardest accident of life but sheer prosperity if it profit thee."

"O, Schirene! what wouldst thou? This—this is torture."

"To see thee safe and happy; nothing more."

"I am both if thou art."

"Care not for me, I am nothing."

"Thou art all—to me."

"Calm thyself, my soul. It grieves me much that when I came to soothe I only galled thee. All's well, all's well. Say that Jabaster lives. What then? He lives, and may he prove more dutious than before: that's all."

"He lives, he is my prisoner, he awaits his doom. It must be given."

"Yes, yes!"

"Shall we pardon?"

"My lord will do that which it pleases him."

"Nay, nay, Schirene. I pray thee be more kind. I am most wretched. Speak, what wouldst thou?"

"If I must speak, I say at once—his life."

"Ah me!"

"If our past loves have any charm, if the hope of future joy, not less supreme, be that which binds thee to this shadowy world, as it does me, and does alone, I say his life, his very carnal life. He stands between us and our loves, Aloy, and ever has. There is no happiness if Jabaster breathe; nor can I be the same Schirene to thee as I have been, if this proud rebel live to spy my conduct."

"Banish him, banish him!"

"To herd with rebels. Is this thy policy?"

"O, Schirene! I love not this man, although methinks I should; yet didst thou know but all!"

"I know too much, Aloy. From the first he has been to me a hateful thought. Come, come, sweet bird, a boon, a boon unto thy own Schirene, who was so frightened by these wicked men! I fear it has done more mischief than thou deemest. Ay! robbed us of our hopes. It may be so. A boon, a boon! it is not much I ask—a traitor's head. Come, give me thy signet ring. It will not; nay, then, I'll take it. What, resist! I know a kiss, thou hast often told me, sir, could vanquish all denial. There it is. Is't sweet? Shalt have another, and another too. I've got the ring! Farewell, my lovely bird, I'll soon return to pillow in thy nest."

IX.

"SHE has got the ring! What's this? what's this? Schirene! art gone? Nay, surely not. She jests. Jabaster! A traitor's head? What ho! there. Pharez, Pharez!"

"My lord."

"Passed the queen that way?"

"She did, my lord."

"In tears?"

"Nay, very joyful."

"Call Honain—quick as my thought. Honain! Honain! He waits without. I have seen the best of life, that's very sure. My heart is cracking. She surely jests. Hah! Honain. Pardon these distracted looks. Fly to the armoury! fly! fly!"

"For what, my lord?"

"Ay! for what—for what! My brain it wanders. Thy brother—thy great brother—the queen—the queen has stolen my signet ring, that is, I gave it her. Fly, fly! or, in a word, Jabaster is no more. He is gone. Pharez, your arm—I swoon!"

X.

"His highness is sorely indisposed to-day."

"They say he swooned this morn."

"Ay, in the bath."

"No, not in the bath. 'Twas when he heard Jabaster's death."

"How died he, sir?"

"Self-strangled. His mighty heart could not endure disgrace, and thus he ended all his glorious deeds."

"A great man!"

"We shall not soon see his match. The queen had gained his pardon, and herself flew to the armoury to bear the news—alas! too late."

"These are strange times. Jabaster dead!"

"A very great event."

"Who will be high priest?"

"I doubt the appointment will be filled up."

"Sup you with the Lord Ithamar to-night?"

"I do."

"I also. We'll go together. The queen had gained his pardon. Hum! 'tis strange."

"Passing so. They say Abidan has escaped."

"I hear it. Shall we meet Medad to-night?"

"'Tis likely."

PART X.

I.

"SHE comes not yet! her cheerful form, not yet it sparkles in our mournful sky. She comes not yet! the shadowy stars seem sad and lustreless without their queen. She comes not yet!"

"We are the watchers of the moon, and live in loneliness to herald light."

"She comes not yet! her sacred form, not yet it summons to our holy feast. She comes not yet! our brethren far wait mute and motionless the saintly beam. She comes not yet!"

"We are the watchers of the moon, and live in loneliness to herald light."

"She comes, she comes! her beauteous form sails with soft splendour in the glittering air. She comes, she comes! The beacons fire, and tell the nation that the month begins? She comes, she comes!"

"We are the watchers of the moon, to tell the nation that the month begins."*

Instantly the holy watchers fired the beacons on the mountain top, and anon a thousand flames blaze round the land. From Caucasus to Lebanon, on every peak a crown of light!

II.

"SIRE! a Tatar has arrived from Hamadan, who will see none but thyself. I have told him your highness was engaged, and sent him to the Lord Honain; but all denial is lost upon him. And, as I thought perhaps the Lady Miriam—"

"From Hamadan? You did well, Pharez. Admit him."

The Tatar entered.

"Well, sir, good news, I hope!"

"Sire, pardon me, the worst. I come from the Lord Abner, with orders to see the caliph, and none else."

* The Feast of the New Moon is one of the most important festivals of the Hebrews. "Our year," says the learned author of the "Rites and Ceremonies," "is divided into twelve lunar months, some of which consist of twenty-nine, others of thirty days, which difference is occasioned by the various appearance of the new moon, in point of time; for if it appeared on the 30th day, the 29th was the last day of the precedent month; but if it did not appear till the 31st, the 30th was the last day, and the 31st the first of the subsequent month; and that was an intercalary moon, of all which take the following account.

"Our nation heretofore, not only observing the rules of some fixed calculation, also celebrated the Feast of the New Moon, according to the phasis, or first appearance of the moon, which was done in compliance with God's command, as our received traditions inform us.

"Hence it came to pass that the first appearance was not to be determined only by rules of art, but also by the testimony of such persons as deposed before the sanhedrim, or great senate, that they had seen the new moon. So a committee of three were appointed from among the said sanhedrim to receive the deposition of the parties aforesaid, who, after having calculated what time the moon might possibly appear, despatched some persons into high and mountainous places, to observe and give their evidence accordingly, concerning the first appearance of the moon.

"As soon as the new moon was either consecrated, or appointed to be observed, notice was given by the sanhedrim to the rest of the nation, what day had been fixed for the new moon, or first day of the month, because that was to be the rule and measure according to which they were obliged to keep their feasts and fasts in every month respectively.

"This notice was given to them in time of peace, by firing of beacons, set up for that purpose, (which was looked upon as the readiest way of communication,) but in time of war, when all places were full of enemies, who made use of beacons to amuse our nation with, it was thought fit to discontinue it."

"Well, sir, you see the caliph. Your mission? What of the viceroy?"

"Sire, he bid me tell thee, that the moment the beacon that announced the feast of the new moon was fired on Caucasus, the dreaded monarch of Karasme, the great Alp Arslan, entered thy kingdom, and now o'erruns all Persia."

"Hah! and Abner?"

"Is in the field and prays for aid."

"He shall have it. This indeed is great news! When left you Hamadan?"

"Night and day I have journeyed upon the swiftest dromedary. The third morn sees me at Bagdad."

"You have done your duty. See this faithful courier be well tended, Pharez. Summon the Lord Honain."

"Alp Arslan! Hah! a very famous warrior. The moment the beacon was fired. No sudden impulse then, but long matured. I like it not."

"Sire," said Pharez, re-entering, "a Tatar has arrived from the frontiers of the province, who will see none but thyself. I have told him your highness is deeply busied, and as methinks he brings but the same news, I—"

"Tis very likely; yet never think, good Pharez, I'll see the man."

The Tatar entered.

"Well, sir, how now!—from whom?"

"From Mozul. The governor bid me see the caliph and none else, and tell your highness, that the moment the beacon that announced the feast of the new moon was fired on the mountains, the fell rebel Abidan raised the standard of Judah in the province, and proclaimed war against your majesty."

"In any force?"

"The royal power keeps within their walls."

"Sufficient answer. Part of the same movement. We shall have some trouble. Hast summoned Honain?"

"I have, sir."

"Go, see this messenger be duly served, and, Pharez—come hither; let none converse with them. You understand?"

"Your highness may assure yourself."

"Abidan come to life! He shall not escape so well this time. I must see Scherirah. I much suspect—what's this? More news?"

A third Tatar entered.

"May it please your highness, this Tatar has arrived from the Syrian frontier."

"Mischief in the wind, I doubt not. Speak out, knave."

"Sire! pardon me, I bear but sad intelligence."

"Out with the worst!"

"I come from the Lord Medad."

"Well! has he rebelled? It seems a catching fever."

"Ah! no, dread sire, Lord Medad has no thought but for thy glory. Alas! alas! he has now to guard it 'gainst fearful odds. Lord Medad bid me see the caliph and none else, and tell your highness, that the moment the beacon that announced the feast of the new moon was fired on Lebanon, the Sultan of Roum and the old Arabian caliph unfurled the standard of their prophet in great array, and are now marching towards Bagdad."

"A clear conspiracy! Has Honain arrived? Summon a council of the viziers instantly. The world is up against me. Well! I'm sick of peace. 'They shall not find me napping!'

III.

"You see, my lords," said Alroy, ere the council broke up, "we must attack them singly. There can be no doubt of that. If they join, we must combat at great odds. 'Tis in detail that we must rout them. I will myself to Persia. Ithamar must throw himself between the sultan and Abidan; Medad fall back on Ithamar. Scherirah must guard the capital. Honain, you are regent. And so, farewell. I shall set off to-night. Courage, brave companions. 'Tis a storm, but many a cedar survives the thunderbolt."

The council broke up.

"My own Scherirah!" said the caliph, as they retired, "stay a while. I would speak with you alone. Honain," continued Alroy, following the grand vizier out of the chamber, and leaving Scherirah alone: "Honain, I have not interchanged a word with you in private. What think you of all this?"

"Sire, I am prepared for the worst, but hope for the best."

"'Tis wise. If Abner could only keep that Karassiman in check! I am about to speak with Scherirah alone. I do suspect him much."

"I'll answer for—his treason."

"Hah! I do suspect him. Therefore I give him no command. I would not have him too near his old companion, eh?—We'll garrison the city with his rebels."

"Sire, these are not moments to be nice. Scherirah is a valiant captain, a very valiant captain, but—lend me thy signet ring, I pray thee, sire."

Alroy turned pale. "No, sir, it has left me once, and never shall again. You have touched upon a string that makes me sad. There is a burden on my conscience—why, or what, I know not. I am innocent, you know I am innocent, Honain!"

"I'll answer for your highness. He who has enough of the milk of human kindness to spare a thing like Scherirah when he stands in his way, may well be credited for the nobler mercy that spared his better."

"Ah me! there's madness in the thought. Why is he not here! Had I but followed—tush! tush! Go see the queen and tell her all that has happened. I'll to Scherirah."

The caliph returned.

"Thy pardon, brave Scherirah; in these moments my friends will pardon courtesy."

"Your highness is too considerate."

"You see, Scherirah, how the wind blows, brave heart. There's much to do, no doubt. I am in sad want of some right trusty friend, on whose devoted bosom I can pillow all my necessities. I was thinking of sending you against this Arslan, but perhaps 'tis better that I should go myself. These are moments one should not seem to shrink, and yet we know not how affairs may run—no, we know not. The capital, the surrounding province—one disaster, and these false Moslemis may rise against us. I should stay here, but if I leave Scherirah I leave myself. I feel that deeply—'tis a consolation. It may be that I must fall back upon the city. Be prepared, Scherirah. Let me fall back upon supporting friends. You have a great trust. O! use it wisely! worthily I am sure you must do."

"Your highness may rest I have no other thought but it for your weal and glory. Doubt not my devotion, sire. I am not one of those mealy-mouthed youths, full of their own deeds and lip-worship, sire, but I have a life devoted to your service, and ready at all times to peril all things."

"I know that, Scherirah, I know it, I feel it deeply. What think you of these movements?"

"They are not ill combined, and yet I doubt not your majesty will prove your fortunes most triumphant."

"Think you the soldiery are in good cue?"

"I'll answer for my own. They are rough fellows, like myself, a little too blunt, perhaps, your highness. We are not holiday guards, but we know our duty, and we will do it."

"That's well, that's all I want. I shall review the troops before I go. Let a donative be distributed among them; and, by-the-by, I have always forgotten it, your legion should be called the legion of Syria. We owe our first province to their arms."

"I shall convey to them your highness's wish. Were it possible, 'twould add to their devotion."

"I do not wish it. They are my very children. Sup at the serail to-night, Scherirah. We shall be very private. Yet let us drink together ere we part. We are old friends, you know. Hast not forgotten our ruined city!"

IV.

ALROY entered the apartment of Schirene. "My soul! thou knowest all?"

She sprang forward and threw her arms around his neck.

"Fear not, my life, we'll not disgrace our queen. 'Twill be quick work. Two-thirds of them have been beaten before, and for the new champion, our laurels must not fade, and his blood shall nourish fresh ones."

"Dearest, dearest Alroy, go not thyself, I pray thee. May not Asriel conquer?"

"I hope so—in my company. For a time we part, a short one. 'Tis our first parting: may it be our last!"

"O! no, no, no: O! say not we must part."

"The troops are under arms; to-morrow's dawn will hear my trumpet."

"I will not quit thee, no! I will not quit thee. What business has Schirene without Alroy? Hast thou not often told me I am thy inspiration? In the hour of danger shall I be wanting? Never! I will not quit thee; no, I will not quit thee."

"Thou art ever present in my thoughts, my soul. In the battle I shall think of her for whom alone I conquer."

"Nay, nay, I'll go, indeed I must, Alroy. I'll be no hinderance, trust me, sweet boy. I will not. I'll have no train, no, not a single maid. Credit me, I know how a true soldier's wife should bear herself. I'll watch thee sleeping, and I'll tend thee wounded, and when thou goest forth to combat, I'll gird thy sabre round thy martial side, and whisper triumph with victorious kisses."

"My own Schirene, there's victory in thine eyes. We'll beat them, girl."

"Abidan, doubly false Abidan! would he were doubly hanged! Ere she died the fatal prophetic foretold this time, and gloated on his future treachery."

"Think not of him."

"And the Karasman—think you he is very strong?"

"Enough, love, for our glory. He is a potent warrior: I trust that Abuer will not rob us of our intended victory."

"So you triumph, I care not by whose sword. Dost go indeed to-morrow?"

"At the break of dawn. I pray thee stay, my sweet!"

"Never! I will not quit thee. I am quite prepared. At the break of dawn? 'Tis near on midnight now. I'll lay me down upon this couch a while, and travel in my litter. Art sure Alp Arslan is himself in the field?"

"Quite sure, my sweet."

"Confusion on his crown! We'll conquer. Goes Asriel with us?"

"Ay!"

"That's well; at break of dawn. I'm somewhat drowsy. Methinks I'll sleep a while."

"Do, my best heart; I'll to my cabinet, and at break of dawn I'll wake thee with a kiss."

V.

THE caliph repaired to his cabinet, where his secretaries were occupied in writing. As he paced the chamber, he dictated to them the necessary instructions.

"Who is the officer on guard?"

"Benaiah, sire."

"I remember him. He saved me a broken skull upon the Tigris. This is for him. The queen accompanies us. She is his charge. These papers for the vizier. Let the troops be under arms by day break. 'This order of the day for the Lord Asriel. Send this instantly to Hamadan. Is the Tatar despatched to Medad? 'Tis well. You have done your duty. Now to rest. Pharez!"

"My lord!"

"I shall not sleep to-night. Give me my drink. Go rest, good boy. I have no wants. Good night."

"Good night, my gracious lord!"

"Let me ponder! I am alone. I am calm, and yet my spirit is not quick. I am not what I was. Four-and-twenty hours ago who would have dreamed of this! All at stake again! Once more in the field, and struggling at once for empire and existence! I do lack the mighty spirit of my former days. I am not what I was. I have little faith. All about me seems changed and dull and grown mechanical. Where are those flashing eyes and conquering visages that clustered round me on the battle eve, round me, the Lord's anointed! I see none such. They are changed, as I am. Why! this Abidan was a host, and now he fights against me. She spoke of the prophetess; I remember that woman was the stirring trumpet of our ranks, and now where is she? The victim of my justice! And where is he, the mightier far, the friend, the counsellor, the constant guide, the master of my boyhood; the firm, the fond, the faithful guardian of all my bright career, whose days and nights were one unbroken study to make me glorious! Alas! I feel more like a doomed and desperate renegade than a young hero on the eve of battle, flushed with the memory of unbroken triumphs!"

"Hah! what awful form art thou that rises from the dusky earth before me? Thou shouldst be one I dare not name, yet will—the likeness of Jabaster.

Away! why frownest thou upon me? I did not slay thee. Do I live, or dream, or what. I see him, ay! I see thee. I fear thee not. I fear nothing. I am Alroy.

"Speak! O! speak! I do conjure thee, mighty spectre, speak. By all the memory of the past, although 'tis madness, I do conjure thee, let me hear again the accents of my boyhood."

"Alroy, Alroy, Alroy!"

"I listen, as to the last trump."

"Meet me on the plain of Nehauend."

"'Tis gone! As it spoke, it vanished. It was Jabaster! God of my fathers, it was Jabaster! Life is growing too wild. My courage is broken! I could lie down and die. It was Jabaster! The voice sounds in my ear like distant thunder! 'Meet me on the plain of Nehauend.' I'll not fail thee, noble ghost, although I meet my doom. Jabaster! Have I seen Jabaster! Indeed, indeed! Methinks I'm mad. Hah! what's that?"

An awful clap of thunder broke over the palace, followed by a strange clashing sound that seemed to come from one of the chambers. The walls of the serail rocked.

"An earthquake!" exclaimed Alroy. "Would the earth would open and swallow all. Hah! Pharez, has it roused thee too! Pharez! Pharez! we live in strange times."

"Your highness is very pale."

"And so art thou, lad! Wouldst have me merry? Pale! we may well be pale, didst thou know all. Hah! that awful sound again! I cannot bear it, Pharez, I cannot bear it. I have borne many things, but this I cannot."

"My lord, 'tis in the armoury."

"Run, sec. No, I'll not be alone, I'll not be alone. Where's Benaiah! Let him go. Stay with me, Pharez, stay with me. I pray thee stay, my child."

Pharez led the caliph to a couch, on which Alroy lay pale and trembling. In a few minutes he enquired whether Benaiah had returned.

"Even now he comes, sire."

"Well, how is it?"

"Sire! a most awful incident. As the thunder broke over the palace, the sacred standard fell from its resting-place, and has shivered into a thousand pieces. Strange to say, the sceptre of Solomon can neither be found nor traced."

"Say nothing of the past as ye love me, lads. Let none enter the armoury. Leave me, Benaiah, leave me, Pharez."

They retired. Alroy watched their departure with a glance of inexpressible anguish. The moment that they had disappeared, he flew to the couch, and throwing himself upon his knees, and covering his face with his hands, burst into passionate tears, and exclaimed:—"O, my God, I have deserted thee, and now thou hast deserted me!"

VI.

EXHAUSTED and desperate, sleep crept over the senses of the caliph. He threw himself upon the divan, and was soon buried in profound repose. He might have slept an hour; he awoke suddenly. From the cabinet in which he slept, you entered through a lofty and spacious arch, generally covered with drapery, which was now withdrawn, into an immense hall. To the astonishment of Alroy, this presence-chamber apparently at this moment blazed with light. He rose suddenly from his couch, he advanced—he perceived, with feelings of curiosity and fear, that the hall was filled with beings, terrible indeed to behold, but to his sight more terrible than strange. In the colossal and mysterious forms that lined the walls of the mighty chamber, and each of which held in its extended arm a streaming torch, he recognised the awful Afrites. At the end of the hall, upon a sumptuous throne, surrounded by priests and courtiers, there was seated a monarch, on whom Aloy had before gazed, Solomon the great! Aloy beheld him in state and splendour, the same Solomon whose sceptre the prince of the captivity had seized in the royal tombs of Judah.

The strange assembly seemed perfectly unconscious of the presence of the child of earth, who, with a desperate courage, leaned against a column of the arch, and watched, with wonder, their mute and motionless society. Nothing was said, nothing done. No one moved, no one, even by gesture, seemed sensible of the presence of any other apparition save himself.

Suddenly there advanced from the bottom of the hall, near unto Aloy, a procession. Pages and dancing girls, with eyes of fire, and voluptuous gestures, warriors with mighty arms, and venerable forms, with ample robes and flowing beards. And as they passed, even with all the activity of their gestures, they made no sound; neither did the musicians, whereof there was a great band playing upon harps and psalteries, and timbrels and cornets, break, in the slightest degree, the almighty silence.

This great crowd poured on in beautiful order, the procession never terminating, yet passing thrice round the hall, bowing to him that was upon the throne, and ranging themselves in ranks before the Afrites.

And there came in twelve forms, bearing a great seal. The stone green, and the engraven characters of living flame, and the characters were those on the talisman of Jabaster, which Aloy still wore next to his heart. And the twelve forms placed the great seal before Solomon, and humbled themselves, and the king bowed. At the same moment, Aloy was sensible of a pang next to his heart. He instantly put his hand to the suffering spot, and lo! the talisman crumbled into dust.

The procession ceased, a single form advanced. Recent experience alone prevented Aloy from sinking before the spectre of Jabaster. Such was the single form. It advanced, bearing the sceptre. It advanced, it knelt before the throne, it offered the sceptre to the crowned and solemn vision. And the form of Solomon extended its arm, and took the sceptre, and instantly the mighty assembly vanished!

Aloy advanced immediately into the chamber, but all was dark and silent. A trumpet sounded. He recognised the note of his own soldiery. He groped his way to a curtain, and pulling it aside, beheld the first streak of dawn.

VII.

ONCE more upon his charger, once more surrounded by his legions, once more his senses dazzled and inflamed by the waving banners and the inspiring trumpets, once more conscious of the power still at his command, and the mighty stake for which he was about to play, Aloy in a great degree recovered his usual spirit and self-possession. His energy returned with his excited pulse, and the vastness of the impending danger seemed only to stimulate the fertility of his genius.

He pushed on with forced marches towards Media, at the head of fifty thousand men. At the end of the second day's march, fresh couriers arrived from Abner, informing him that, unable to resist the valiant and almost innumerable host of the King of Karasme he had entirely evacuated Persia, and had concentrated his forces in Louristan. Aloy, in consequence of this information, despatched orders to Scherirah, to join him with his division instantly, and leave the capital to its fate.

They passed again the mountains of Kerrund, and joined Abner and the army of Media thirty thousand strong, on the river Abzah. Here Aloy rested one night, to refresh his men, and on the ensuing morn pushed on to the Persian frontier, unexpectedly attacked the advanced posts of Alp Arslan, and beat them back, with great loss, into the province. But the force of the King of Karasme was so considerable, that the caliph did not venture on a general engagement, and therefore he fell back, and formed in battle array upon the neighbouring plain of Nehauend, the theatre of one of his earliest and most brilliant victories, where he awaited the hourly expected arrival of Scherirah.

The King of Karasme, who was desirous of bringing affairs to an issue, and felt confident in his superior force, instantly advanced. In two or three days at farthest, it was evident that a battle must be fought that would decide the fate of the East.

On the morn ensuing their arrival at Nehauend, while the caliph was out hunting, attended only by a few officers, he was suddenly attacked by an ambushed band of Karasmians. Aloy and his companions defended themselves with such desperation that they at length succeeded in beating off their assailants, although triple their amount in number. The leader of the Karasmians, as he retreated, hurled a dart at the caliph, which must have been fatal, had not a young officer of the guard interposed his own breast, and received the deadly wound. The party, in confusion, returned with all speed to the camp, Aloy himself bearing the expiring victim of desperate loyalty and military enthusiasm.

The bleeding officer was borne to the royal pavilion, and placed upon the imperial couch. The most skilful leech was summoned; but he examined the wound, and shook his head. The dying warrior was himself sensible of his desperate condition. His agony could only be alleviated by withdrawing the javelin, which would occasion his immediate decease. He desired to be left alone with his sovereign.

"Sire!" said the officer, "I must die; and I die without a pang. To die in your service, I have ever considered the most glorious end. Destiny has awarded it to me; and if I have not met my fate upon the field of battle, it is some consolation that my death has preserved the most valuable of lives. Sire! I have a sister."

"Waste not thy strength, dear friend, in naming her. Rest assured I shall ever deem thy relatives my own."

"I doubt it not. Would I had a thousand lives for such a master! I have a burden on my conscience, sire, nor can I die in peace unless I name it."

"Speak, speak freely. If thou hast injured any one, and the power or wealth of Alroy can redeem thy oppressed spirit, he'll not spare—he'll not spare, be assured of that."

"Noble, noble master, I must be brief; for although while this javelin rests within my body, I yet may live, the agony is great. Sire, the deed of which I speak doth concern thee."

"Ay?"

"I was on guard the day Jabaster died."

"Powers of heaven! I am all ears. Speak on, speak on!"

"He died self-strangled, so they say!"

"So they ever told me."

"Thou art innocent, thou art innocent, I thank my God, my king is innocent."

"Rest assured of that, as there is hope in Israel. I pray thee, tell me all."

"The queen came with the signet ring. To such authority I yielded way. She entered, and after her, the Lord Honain. I heard high words, I heard Jabaster's voice. He struggled, yes! he struggled; but his mighty form, wounded and fettered, could not long resist. Foul play, foul play, sire! What could I do against such adversaries? They left the chamber with a stealthy step. Her eyes met mine. I never could forget that fell and glittering visage."

"Thou ne'er hast spoken of this awful end?"

"To none but thee. And why I speak it now I cannot tell, save that it seems some inspiration urges me; and methinks they, who did this, may do even feller works, if such there be."

"Thou hast robbed me of all peace and hope of peace—and yet I thank thee. Now I know the worth of life. I have never loved to think of that sad day, and yet, though I have sometimes dreamed of villanous work, the worst were innocence to thy dread tale."

"'Tis told; and now I pray thee secure thy secret, by drawing from my agonized frame this javelin."

"Trusty heart, 'tis a sad office."

"I shall die with joy if thou performest it!"

"'Tis done."

"God save Alroy!"

VIII.

WHILE Alroy, plunged in thought, stood over the body of the officer, there arose a flourish of triumphant music, and a eunuch, entering the pavilion, announced the arrival of Schirene from Kerrund. Almost immediately afterwards the princess, descending from her litter, entered the tent; Alroy tore off his robe, and threw it over the corpse.

"My own," exclaimed the princess, as she ran up to the caliph, "I have heard all. Be not alarmed for me. I dare look upon a corpse. You know I am a soldier's bride. I am used to blood."

"Alas! alas!"

"Why art thou so pale? Thou dost not kiss me! Has this unhinged thee so? 'Tis a sad deed; and yet to-morrow's dawn may light up thousands to as grim a fate. Why! thou tremblest! Alas! kind soul! The single death of this fond, faithful heart hath quite upset my love. Yet art thou used to battle. Why! this is foolishness. Art not glad to see me? What, not one smile? And I have come to fight for thee! I will be kissed!"

She flung herself upon his neck. Alroy faintly returned her embrace, and bore her to a couch. He clapped his hands, and two soldiers entered and bore away the corpse.

"The pavilion, Schirene, is now fitter for thy presence. Rest thyself; I shall soon return." Thus speaking, he quitted her.

He quitted her, but her humbled look of sorrowful mortification pierced to his heart. He thought of all her love, and all her loveliness; he called to mind all the marvellous story of their united fortunes. He felt that for her, and her alone, he cared to live; that without her quick sympathy, even success seemed unendurable. His judgment fluctuated in an eddy of passion and reason. Passion conquered. He dismissed from his intelligence all cognizance of good and evil; he determined, under all circumstances, to cling ever to her; he tore from his mind all memory of the late disclosure. He returned to the pavilion with a countenance beaming with affection; he found her weeping, he folded her in his arms, he kissed her with a thousand kisses, and whispered between each kiss his ardent love.

IX.

'Twas midnight. Schirene reposed in the arms of Alroy. The caliph, who was restless and anxious for the arrival of Scherirah, was scarcely slumbering, when the sound of a voice perfectly aroused him. He looked around; he beheld the spectre of Jabaster. His hair stood on end, his limbs seemed to loosen, a cold dew crept over his frame as he gazed upon the awful form within a yard of his couch. Unconsciously he disembarrassed his arms of their fair burden, and rising on the couch, leaned forward.

"Alroy, Alroy, Alroy!"

"I am here."

"To-morrow Israel is avenged!"

"Who is that?" exclaimed the princess, wakening.

In a frenzy of fear, Alroy, quite forgetting the spectre, turned and pressed his hand to her sight. When he again looked round, the apparition was invisible.

"What wouldst thou, Alroy?"

"Nothing, sweet! A soldier's wife must bear strange sights, yet I would save you some. One of my men, forgetting you were here, burst into my tent in such a guise as scarce would suit a female eye. I must away, my child. I'll call thy slaves. One kiss! Farewell! but for a time."

X.

"To-morrow Israel will be avenged. What, in Karasman blood? I have no faith. No matter. All is now beyond my influence. A rushing destiny carries me onward. I cannot stem the course, nor guide the vessel. How now! Who is the officer on guard?"

"Benomi, sire, thy servant."

"Send to the viceroy. Bid him meet me here, Who is this?"

"A courier from the Lord Scherirah, sire, but just arrived. He passed last night the Kerrund mountains, sire, and will be with you by the break of day."

"Good news, good news. Go fetch Abner. Haste! He'll find me here anon. I'll visit the camp a while. Well, my brave fellows, you have hither come to conquer again with Alroy. You ha e fought before, I warrant, on the plain of Nehauend. 'Tis a rich soil, and shall be richer with Karasmian gore."

"God save your majesty! Our lives are thine."

"Please you, my little ruler," said a single soldier, addressing Aloy; "pardon my bluntness, but I knew you before you were a caliph."

"Stout heart, I like thy freedom. Pr'ythee say on."

"I was saying, I hope you'll lead us in the charge to-morrow. Some say you will not."

"They say falsely."

"I thought so. I'll ever answer for my little ruler—but then the queen!"

"Is a true soldier's wife, and lives in the camp."

"That's brave! There, I told you so, comrades; you would not believe me, but I knew our little ruler before you did. I lived near the gate at Hamadan, please your highness—old Shelomi's son."

"Give me thy hand—a real friend. What is't ye eat here, boys? Let me taste your mess. I' faith I would my cook could dress me such a pilau! 'Tis admirable!"

The soldiers gathered round their chieftain with eyes beaming with adoration. 'Twas a fine picture—the hero in the centre, the various groups around, some conversing with him, some cooking, some making coffee, all offering him by word or deed some testimonial of their devotion, and blending with that devotion the most perfect frankness.

"We shall beat them, lads!"

"There is no fear with you, you always beat."

"I do my best, and so do you. A good general without good troops, is little worth."

"I' faith that's true. One must have good troops. What think you of Alp Arslan?"

"I think he may give us as much trouble as all our other enemies together, and that's not much."

"Brave, brave! God save Aloy!"

Benomi approached, and announced that the viceroys were in attendance.

"I must quit you, my children," said Aloy. "We'll sup once more together when we have conquered."

"God save you, sire; and we will confound your enemies."

"Good night, my lads. Ere the dawn break we may have hot work."

"We are ready, we are ready. God save Aloy!"

"They are in good cue, and yet 'twas a different spirit that inspired our early days. That I strongly feel. These are men true to a leader, who has never failed them, and confident in a cause that leads to—plunder. They are but splendid mercenaries. No more. O! where are now the fighting men of Judah! Where are the men who, when they drew their cimeters, joined in a conquering psalm of holy triumph! Last eve of battle you would have thought the field a mighty synagogue. Priests and altars, flaming sacrifices, and smoking censers, groups of fiery zealots hanging with frenzy on prophetic lips, and sealing with their blood and holiest vows, a solemn covenant to conquer Canaan. All is changed, as I am. How now, Abner? You are well muffled!"

"Is it true Scherirah is at hand?"

"I doubt not all is right. Would that the dawn would break!"

"The enemy is advancing. Some of their columns are in sight. My scouts have dodged them. They intend doubtless to form upon the plain."

"They are in sight, eh! Then we will attack them at once, ere they are formed. Rare, rare! We'll beat them yet. Courage, dear brother. Scherirah will be here at dawn in good time, very good time—very, very good time."

"I like the thought."

"The men are in good heart. At break of dawn charge with thirty thousand cavalry upon their forming ranks. I'll take the right, Asriel the left. It shall be a family affair, dear Abner. How is Miriam?"

"I heard this morn, quite well. She sends you her love and prayers. The queen is here!"

"She came this eve. Quite well."

"She must excuse all courtesy."

"Say nothing. She is a soldier's wife. She loves thee well, dear Abner."

"I know that; I hope my sword may guard her children's throne."

"Well, give thy orders. Instant battle, eh?"

"Indeed, I think so."

"I'll send couriers to hurry Scherirah. All looks well. Reserve the guard."

"Ay, ay! Farewell, dear sire. When we meet again, I trust your enemies may be your slaves!"

XI.

At the first streak of dawn the Hebrew cavalry, with the exception of the guard, charged the advancing columns of the Karasimians with irresistible force, and cut them to pieces. Alp Arslan rallied his troops, and at length succeeded in forming his main body in good order. Aloy and Asriel led on their divisions, and the battle now became general. It raged for several hours, and was on both sides well maintained. The slaughter of the Karasimians was great, but their stern characters and superior numbers counterbalanced for a time all the impetuosity of the Hebrews, and all the energy of their leaders. This day Aloy threw into a shade all his former exploits. Twelve times he charged at the head of the sacred guard, and more than once penetrated to the pavilion of Alp Arslan.

In vain he endeavoured singly, and hand to hand, to meet that famous chieftain. Both monarchs fought in their ranks, and yet fate decided that their cimeters should never cross. Four hours before noon it was evident to Aloy, that unless Scherirah arrived, he could not prevail against the vast superiority of numbers. He was obliged early to call his reserve into the field, and although the number of the slain on the side of Arslan exceeded any in the former victories of the Hebrews, still the Karasimians maintained an immense front, which was constantly supplied by fresh troops. Confident in his numbers, and aware of the weakness of his antagonists, Arslan contented himself with acting on the defensive, and wearying his assailants by resisting their terrible and repeated charge.

For a moment, Aloy at the head of the sacred guard had withdrawn from the combat. Abner and Asriel still maintained the fight, and the caliph was at the same time preparing for new efforts, and watching with anxiety the arrival of Scherirah. In the fifth hour, from an eminence he marked with exultation the advancing banners of his expected succours. Confident now that the day was won, he announced the exhilarating intelligence to his soldiers; and while they were excited by the animating intelligence, led them once more to the charge. It was irresistible; Scherirah seemed to have arrived only for the pursuit, only in time to complete the victory. What then was the horror, the consternation of Alroy, when Benaiah, dashing up to him, informed him that the long-expected succours consisted of the united forces of Scherirah and Abidan, and had attacked him in the rear. Human genius could afford no resource. The exhausted Hebrews, whose energies had been racked to the utmost, were surrounded. The Karasians made a general and simultaneous advance. In a few minutes the Hebrew army was disorganized. The stoutest warriors threw away their swords in despair. Every one thought only of self-preservation. Even Abner fled towards Hamadan. Asriel was slain. Alroy, finding that it was all over, rushed to his pavilion at the head of about three hundred of the guards, seized the fainting Schirene, and threw her before him on his saddle, and cutting his way through all obstacles, dashed into the desert.

For eight-and-forty hours they never stopped. Their band was soon reduced one-third. On the morning of the third day they dismounted and refreshed themselves at a well. Half only regained their saddles. Schirene never spoke. On they rushed again, each hour losing some exhausted comate. At length, on the fifth day, about eighty strong, they arrived at a grove of palm trees. Here they dismounted. And Alroy took Schirene in his arms, and the shade seemed to revive her. She opened her eyes, and pressed his hand and smiled. He gathered her some dates, and she drank some water.

"Our toils will soon be over, sweetest," he whispered to her; "I have lost every thing but thee."

Again they mounted, and proceeded at a less rapid pace, they arrived towards evening at the ruined city, whither Alroy all this time had been directing his course. Dashing down the great street, they at length entered the old amphitheatre. They dismounted. Alroy made a couch with their united cloaks for Schirene. Some collected fuel, great stores of which was found, and lit large fires.

Others, while it was yet light, chased the gazelles, and were sufficiently fortunate to provide their banquet, or fetched water from the well known to their leader. In an hour's time, clustering round their fires in groups, and sharing their rude fare, you might have deemed them, instead of the discomfited and luxurious guards of a mighty monarch, the accustomed tenants of this wild abode.

"Come, my lads," said Alroy, as he rubbed his hands over the ascending flame, "at any rate this is better than the desert!"

XII.

AFTER all his exertions, Alroy fell into a profound and dreamless sleep. When he awoke, the sun had been long up—Schirene was still slumbering. He kissed her, and she opened her eyes and smiled.

"You are now a bandit's bride," he said, with a smile. "How like you our new life!"

"Well! with thee."

"Rest here, my sweetest; I must rouse our men, and see how fortune speeds." So saying, and tripping lightly over many a sleeping form, he touched Benaiah.

"So! my brave captain of the guard, still napping? Come! stir, stir."

Benaiah jumped up with a cheerful face. "I am ever ready, sire."

"I know it; but remember I am no more a king, only a comate. Away with me, and let us form some order."

The companions quitted the amphitheatre, and reconnoitred the adjoining buildings. They found many stores, the remains of old days—mats, tents, and fuel, drinking bowls, and other homely furniture. They fixed upon a building for their stable, and others for the accommodation of their band. They summoned their companions to the open place, the scene of Hassan Subah's fate, where Alroy addressed them, and developed to them his plans. They were divided into companies—each man had his allotted duty. Some were placed on guard at different parts; some were sent out to the chase, or to collect dates from the oasis; others led the horses to the contiguous pasture, or remained to complete their interior arrangements. The amphitheatre was cleared out. A rude but convenient pavilion was formed for Schirene. They covered its ground with mats, and each emulated the other in his endeavours to study her accommodation. Her kind words and inspiring smiles animated at the same time their zeal and their invention.

They soon became accustomed to their rough but adventurous life. Its novelty pleased them, and the perpetual excitement of urgent necessity left them no time to mourn over their terrible vicissitudes. While Alroy lived, hope indeed never deserted their sanguine bosoms. And such was the influence of his genius, that the most desponding felt that to be discomfited with him was preferable to conquest with another. They were a faithful and devoted band, and merry faces were not wanting when at night they assembled in the amphitheatre for their common meal.

No sooner had Alroy completed his arrangements, than he sent forth spies in all directions, to procure intelligence, and especially to communicate, if possible, with Ithamar and Medad, provided they still survived and maintained themselves in any force.

A fortnight passed away without the approach of any stranger; at the end of which there arrived four personages at their haunt, not very welcome to their chief, who, however, concealed his chagrin at their appearance. These were Kisloch the Kourd, and Calidas the Indian, and their inseparable companions, the Guebre and the Negro.

XIII.

"Noble captain," said Kisloch, "we trust that you will permit us to enlist in the band. This is not the first time we have served under your orders in this spot. Old comates, if faith, who have seen the best and the worst. We suspected where you might be found, although, thanks to the ever felicitous invention of man, it is generally received that you died in battle. I hope your majesty is well," added Kisloch, bowing to Schirene.

"You are very welcome, friends," replied Alroy—"I know your worth. You have seen, as you say, the best and the worst, and will, I trust, see better. Died in battle, eh! that's good."

"'Tis so receive!," said Calidas.
 "And what news of our friends?"
 "Not over good, but strange."
 "How?"
 "Hamadan is taken."
 "I am prepared—tell me all."
 "Old Bostenay and the Lady Miriam are borne prisoners to Bagdad."
 "Prisoners!"
 "But so—all will be well with them, I trow. The Lord Honain is in high favour with the conqueror, and will doubtless protect them."
 "Honain in favour?"
 "Even so. He made terms for the city, and right good ones."
 "Hah! he was ever dexterous. Well! if he save my sister, I care not for his favour."
 "There is no doubt. All may yet be well, sir."
 "Let us act and hope. Where's Abner?"
 "Dead."
 "How?"
 "In battle."
 "Art sure?"
 "I saw him fall, and fought beside him."
 "A soldier's death is all our fortune now. I am glad he was not captured. Where's Medad, Ithamar?"
 "Fled into Egypt."
 "We have no force whatever, then?"
 "None but your guards here."
 "They are strong enough to plunder a caravan. Honain, you say, in favour?"
 "Very high. He'll make good terms for us."
 "This is strange news."
 "Very, but true."
 "Well! you are welcome. Share our fare. 'Tis rough, and somewhat scanty; but we have feasted, and may feast again. Fled into Egypt, eh?"
 "Ay! sir."
 "Schirene, shouldst like to see the Nile?"
 "I have heard of crocodiles."

XIV.

If the presence of Kisloch and his companions were not very pleasing to Alroy, with the rest of the band they soon became great favourites. Their local knowledge, and their experience of desert life, made them valuable allies, and their boisterous jocularly, and unceasing merriment, were not unwelcome in the present monotonous existence of the fugitives. As for Alroy himself, he meditated an escape to Egypt. He determined to seize the first opportunity of procuring some camels, and then dispersing his band, with the exception of Benaiah and a few faithful retainers, he trusted that, disguised as merchants, they might succeed in crossing Syria, and entering Africa by Palestine. With these plans and prospects, he became each day more cheerful, and more sanguine as to the future. He had in his possession some very valuable jewels, which he anticipated parting with at Cairo for a sum sufficient for all his purposes; and having exhausted all the passions of life while yet a youth, he looked forward to the tranquil termination of his existence in some poetic solitude with his beautiful companion.

One evening, as they returned from the oasis, Alroy guiding the camel that bore Schirene, and ever and anon looking up in her inspiring face, her sanguine spirit would have indulged in a delightful future.

"Thus shall we pass the desert, sweet," said Schirene. "Can this be toil?"

"There is no toil with love," replied Alroy.

"And we were made for love, and not for empire," rejoined Schirene.

"The past is a dream," said Alroy. "So sages teach us; but until we act their wisdom is but wind. I feel it now. Have we ever lived in aught but deserts, and fed on aught but dates? Methinks 'tis very natural. But that I am tempted by the security of distant lands, I could remain here a free and happy outlaw. Time, custom, and necessity, form our natures. When I first met Scherirah in these ruins, I shrank with horror from degraded man; and now I sigh to be his heir. We must not think!"

"No, love, we'll only hope," replied Schirene—and they passed through the gates.

The night was beautiful, the air was still warm and sweet. Schirene gazed upon the luminous heavens. "We thought not of these skies when we were at Bagdad," she exclaimed; "and yet, my life, what was the brightness of our palaces compared to these? All is left to us that man should covet—freedom, beauty, and youth. I do believe, ere long, Alroy, we shall look back upon the wondrous past, as another and a lower world. Would this were Egypt! 'Tis my only wish."

"And it shall soon be gratified. All will soon be arranged. A few brief days, and then Schirene will mount her camel for a longer ride than just to gather dates. You'll make a sorry traveller, I fear!"

"Not I—I'll tire ye all."

They reached the circus and seated themselves round the blazing fire. Seldom had Alroy, since his fall, appeared more cheerful. Schirene sang an Arab air to the band, who joined in joyous chorus. It was late ere they sought repose; and they retired to their rest sanguine and contented.

A few hours after, at the break of dawn, Alroy was roused from his slumbers by a rude pressure on his breast. He started—a ferocious soldier was kneeling over him. He would have spurned him—he found his hands manacled. He would have risen—his feet were bound. He looked round for Schirene, and called her name—he was answered only by a shriek. The amphitheatre was filled with Karasmian troops. His own men were surprised and overpowered. Kisloch and the Guebre had been on guard. He was raised from the ground, and flung upon a camel, which was instantly trotted out of the circus. On every side he beheld a wild scene of disorder and dismay. He was speechless from passion and despair. The camel was dragged into the desert. A body of cavalry instantly surrounded it, and they set off at a rapid pace. The whole seemed the work of an instant.

How many days had passed Alroy knew not. He had taken no count of time. Night and day were to him the same. He was in a stupor. But the sweetness of the air, and the greenness of the earth, at length partially roused his attention. He was just conscious that they had quitted the desert. Before him was a noble river—he beheld the Euphrates from the very spot he had first viewed it in his pilgrimage. The strong association of ideas called back his memory. A tear stole down his check—the bitter drop stole to his parched lips—he asked the nearest horseman for water. The guard gave him a wetted sponge, with which with difficulty he contrived to wipe his lips, and then he let it fall to the ground. The Karasmian struck him.

They arrived at the river. The prisoner was taken from the camel and placed in a covered boat. After some hours, they stopped and disembarked at a small village. Alroy was placed upon a donkey with his back to its head. His clothes were soiled and tattered. The children pelted him with mud. An old woman, with a fanatic curse, placed a crown of paper on his brow. With difficulty his brutal guards prevented their victim from being torn to pieces. And in such fashion, towards noon of the fourteenth day, David Alroy again entered Bagdad.

XV.

THE intelligence of the capture of Alroy spread through the agitated city. The moolahs bustled about as if they had received a fresh demonstration of the authenticity of the prophetic mission. All the dervishes began begging. The men discussed affairs in the coffee-houses, and the women chatted at the fountains.*

"They may say what they like, but I wish him well," said a fair Arab, as she arranged her veil. "He may be an impostor, but he was a very handsome one."

"All the women are for him, that's the truth," responded a companion; "but then we can do him no good."

"We can tear their eyes out," said a third.

"And what do you think of Alp Arslan, truly?" inquired a fourth.

"I wish he were a pitcher, and then I could break his neck," said a fifth.

"Only think of the princess," said a sixth.

"Well! she has had a glorious time of it," said a seventh.

"Nothing was too good for her," said an eighth.

"I like true love," said a ninth.

"Well! I hope he will be too much for them all yet," said a tenth.

"I should not wonder," said an eleventh.

"He can't," said a twelfth, "he has lost his sceptre."

"You don't say so," said a thirteenth.

"It is too true," said a fourteenth.

"Do you think he was a wizard?" said a fifteenth, "I vow if there be not a fellow looking at us behind those trees."

"Impudent scoundrel!" said a sixteenth. "I wish it were Alroy. Let us all scream, and put down our veils."

And the group ran away.

Two stout soldiers were playing chess† in a coffee-house

* The bath and the fountain are the favourite scenes of feminine conversation.

† On the walls of the palace of Amenoph the Second, called Medeenet Auh, at Egyptian Thebes, the king is represented playing chess with the queen. This monarch reigned long before the Trojan war.

"May I slay my mother," said one, "but I can not make a move. I fought under him at Nehaund; and though I took the amnesty, I have half a mind now to seize my sword and stab the first Turk that enters."

"'Twere but sheer justice," said his companion "By my father's blessing, he was the man for a charge. They may say what they like, but compared with him, Alp Arslan is a white-livered Giaour."

"Here is confusion to him and to thy last move. There's the dirhem, I can play no more. May I slay my mother, though, but I did not think he would have let himself be taken."

"By the blessing of my father, nor I; but then he was asleep."

"That makes a difference. He was betrayed."

"All brave men are. They say Kisloeh and his set pocket their fifty thousand by the job."

"May each dirhem prove a plague spot!"

"Amen! Dost remember Abner?"

"May I slay my mother if I ever forget him."

"He spoke to his men like so many lambs. What's become of the Lady Miriam?"

"She is here."

"That will cut Alroy."

"He was ever fond of her. Dost remember she gained Adoram's life?"

"O! she could do any thing—next to the queen."

"Before her, I say before her. He has refused the queen, he never refused the Lady Miriam."

"Because she asked less."

"Dost know it seemed to me that things never went on so well after Jabaster's death?"

"So say I. There was a something, eh?"

"A sort of a peculiar, as it were, kind of something, eh?"

"You have well described it. Every man felt the same. I have often mentioned it to my comrades. Say what you like, said I, but slay my mother, if ever since the old gentlemen strangled himself things don't seem, as it were, in their natural propinquity. 'Twas the phrase I used."

"A very choice one. Unless there's a natural propinquity, the best arranged matters will fall out. However, the ass sees farther than his rider, and so it was with Alroy, the best commander I ever served under, all the same."

"Let's go forth and see how affairs run."

"Ay, do. If we hear any one abuse Alroy, we'll leave his skull."

"That will we. There are a good many of our stout fellows about; we might do something yet."

"Who knows?"

XVII.

A SUBTERRANEAN dungeon of the citadel of Bagdad held in its gloomy limits the late lord of Asia. The captive did not sigh, or weep, or wail. He did not speak. He did not even think. For several days he remained in a state of stupor. On the morning of the fourth day, he almost unconsciously partook of the wretched provision which his jailers brought him. Their torches, round which the bats whirled and flapped their wings, and twinkled their small eyes, threw a ghastly glare over the nearer walls of the dungeon, the extremity of which defied the vision of the prisoner; and when the jailers retired, Aloy was in complete darkness.

The image of the past came back to him. He tried in vain to penetrate the surrounding gloom. His hands were manacled, his legs also were loaded with chains. The notion that his life might perhaps have been cruelly spared in order that it might linger on in this horrible state of conscious annihilation, filled him with frenzy. He would have dashed his fetters against his brow, but the chain restrained him. He flung himself upon the damp and rigid ground. His fall disturbed a thousand obscene things. He heard the quick glide of a serpent, the creeping retreat of the clustering scorpions, and the swift escape of the dashing rats. His mighty calamities seemed slight, when compared with these petty miseries. His great soul could not support him under these noisome and degrading incidents. He sprang, in disgust, upon his feet, and stood fearful of moving lest every step should introduce him to some new abomination. At length, exhausted nature was unable any longer to sustain him. He groped his way to the rude seat, cut in the rocky wall, which was his only accommodation. He put forth his hand. It touched the slimy fur of some wild animal, that instantly sprang away, its fiery eyes sparkling in the dark. Aloy recoiled with a sensation of wo-begone dismay. His shaken nerves could not sustain him under this base danger, and these foul and novel trials. He could not refrain from an exclamation of despair; and when he remembered that he was far beyond the reach of all human solace and sympathy, even all human aid, for a moment his mind seemed to desert him; and he wrung his hands in forlorn and almost idiotic wo.

An awful thing it is—the failing energies of a master-mind. He who placed implicit confidence in his genius, will find himself some day utterly defeated and deserted. 'Tis bitter! Every paltry hind seems but to breathe to mock you. Slow, indeed, is such a mind to credit that the never-failing resource can at last be wanting. But so it is. Like a dried-up fountain, the perennial flow and bright fertility have ceased, and ceased forever. Then comes the madness of retrospection.

Draw a curtain! draw a curtain! and fling it over this agonizing anatomy—I can no more.

The days of childhood, his sweet sister's voice and smiling love, their innocent pastimes, and the kind solicitude of faithful servants, all the soft detail of mild domestic life,—these were the sights and memories that fitted in wild play before the burning vision of Aloy, and rose upon his tortured mind. Empire and glory, his sacred nation, his imperial bride,—these, these were nothing. Their worth had vanished with the creative soul that called them into action. The pure sympathies of nature alone remained, and all his thought and grief, all his intelligence, all his emotion, were centred in his sister.

It was the seventh morning. A guard entered at an accustomed hour, and, sticking a torch into a niche in the wall, announced that a person was without who had permission to speak to the prisoner. They were the first human accents that had met the ear of Aloy during his captivity, which seemed to him an age, a long dark period, that cancelled all things. He shuddered at the harsh tones. He tried to answer, but his unaccustomed lips refused their office. He raised his heavy arms, and endeavoured to signify his consciousness of what had been uttered. Yet, indeed, he had not listened to the message without emotion. He looked forward to the grate with strange curiosity; and as he looked, he trembled. The visitor entered, muffled in a dark caftan. The guard disappeared; and the caftan falling to the ground, revealed Honain.

"My beloved Aloy," said the brother of Jabaster; and he advanced, and pressed him to his bosom. Had it been Miriam, Aloy might have at once expired; but the presence of this worldly man called back his worldliness. The revulsion of his feelings was wonderful. Pride, perhaps even hope, came to his aid; all the associations seemed to counsel exertion; for a moment he seemed the same Aloy.

"I rejoice to find at least thee safe, Honain."

"I also, if my security may lead to thine."

"Still whispering hope!"

"Despair is the conclusion of fools."

"O, Honain! 'tis a great trial. I can play my part, and yet methinks 'twere better we had not again met. How is Schirene!"

"Thinking of thee."

"'Tis something that she can think. My mind has gone. Where's Miriam?"

"Frec."

"That's something. Thou hast done that. Good, good Honain, be kind to that sweet child, if only for my sake. Thou art all she has left."

"She hath thee."

"Her desolation."

"Live, and be her refuge."

"How's that? These walls—escape! No, no; it is impossible."

"I do not deem it so."

"Indeed! I'll do any thing. Speak! speak! Can we bribe? can we cleave their skulls? can we—"

"Calm thyself, my friend. There is no need of bribes, no need of bloodshed. We must make terms."

"Terms! We might have made those upon the plains of Nehauend. Terms! Terms with a captive victim!"

"Why victim?"

"Is Arslan then so generous?"

"He is a beast, more savage than the boar that grinds its tusks within his country's forests."

"Why speakest thou then of hope?"

"I spoke of certainty. I did not mention hope."

"Dear Honain, my brain is weak; but I can bear strange things, or else I'd not be here. I feel thy thoughtful friendship; but indeed there needs no winding words to tell my fate. Pr'ythee, speak out."

"In a word, thy life is safe."

"What, spared!"

"If it please thee."

"Please me! Life is sweet. I feel its sweetness. I want but little. Freedom and solitude are all I ask. My life spared! I'll not believe it. Thou hast done this deed, thou mighty man, that masterest all souls. Thou hast not forgotten me, thou hast not forgotten the days gone by, thou hast not forgotten thine own Aloy! Who calls thee worldly is a slanderer. O, Honain! thou art too faithful!"

"I have no thought but for thy service, prince."

"Call me not prince, call me thine own Alroy. My life spared! 'Tis wonderful! When may I go? Let no one see me. Manage that, Honain. Thou canst manage all things. I'm for Egypt. Thou hast been to Egypt, hast thou not, Honain?"

"A very wondrous land, 'twill please thee much."

"When may I go? Tell me when may I go. When may I quit this dark and noisome cell?" 'Tis worse than all their tortures, dear Honain. Air and light, and I really think my spirit never would break, but this horrible dungeon—I scarce can look upon thy face, sweet friend. 'Tis serious."

"Wouldst thou have me gay?"

"Yes! if we are free."

"Alroy, thou art a great spirit, the greatest that e'er I knew, or ever I have read of. I never knew thy like, and never shall."

"Tush, tush, sweet friend, I am a broken reed, but still I am free. This is no time for courtly phrases. Let's go, and go at once."

"A moment, dear Alroy. I am no flatterer. What I said came from my heart, and doth concern us much and instantly. I was saying thou hast no common mind, Alroy—indeed thou hast a mind unlike all others. Listen, my prince. Thou hast read mankind deeply and truly. Few have seen more than thyself, and none have so rare a spring of that intuitive knowledge of thy race, which is a gem to which experience is but a jeweller, and without which no action can befriend us."

"Well, well!"

"A moment's calmness. Thou hast entered Bagdad in triumph, and thou hast entered the same city with every contumely the base spirit of our race could cast upon its victim. 'Twas a great lesson."

"I feel it so."

"And teaches us how vile and valueless is the opinion of our fellow-men."

"Alas! 'tis true."

"I am glad to see thee in this wholesome temper. 'Tis full of wisdom."

"The miserable are often wise."

"But to believe is nothing unless we act. Speculation should only sharpen practice. The time has come to prove thy lusty faith in this philosophy. I told thee we could make terms. I have made them. To-morrow it was doomed Alroy should die, and what a death! A death of infinite torture! Hast ever seen a man impaled?"*

"Hah!"

"To view it is alone a doom."

"God of heaven!"

"It is so horrible, that 'tis ever marked, that when this direful ceremony occurs, the average deaths in cities greatly increase. 'Tis from the turning of the blood in the spectators, who yet from some ungovernable madness can ne'er refrain from hurrying to the scene. I speak with some authority—I speak as a physician."

"Speak no more. I cannot endure it."

"To-morrow this doom awaited thee. As for Schirene—"

"Not for her, O! surely not for her!"

"No, they were merciful. She is a caliph's daughter. 'Tis not forgotten. The axe would close her life. Her fair neck would give slight trouble to the headsmen's art. But for thy sister, but for Miriam—she is a witch, a Jewish witch! They would have burnt her alive."

"I'll not believe it, no, no, I'll not believe it: damnable, bloody demons! When I had power I spared all—all but—ah me! ah me! why did I live!"

"Thou dost forget thyself; I speak of that which was to have been, not of that which is to be. I have stepped in and communed with the conqueror. I have made terms."

"What are they—what can they be?"

"Easy. To a philosopher like Alroy an idle ceremony."

"Be brief, be brief."

"Thou seest thy career is a great scandal to the Moslem. I marked their weakness, and I have worked upon it. Thy mere defeat or death will not blot out the stain upon their standard and their faith. The public mind is wild with fantasies since Alroy rose. Men's opinions flit to and fro with that fearful change that bodes no stable settlement of states. None know what to cling to, or where to place their trust. Creeds are doubted—authority disputed. They would gladly account for thy success by other than human means, yet must deny thy mission. There also is the fame of a fair and mighty princess, a daughter of their caliphs, which they would gladly clear. I mark all this, observe, and work upon it. So, could we devise some means by which thy lingering followers could be forever silenced, this great scandal fairly erased, and the public frame brought to a sounder and more tranquil pulse, why, they would concede much, much, very much."

"Thy meaning, not thy means, are evident."

"They are in thy power."

"In mine? 'Tis a deep riddle. Pr'ythee solve it."

"Thou wilt be summoned at to-morrow's noon before this Arslan. There, in the presence of the assembled people, who are now with him as much as they were with thee, thou wilt be accused of magic, and of high intercourse with the infernal powers. Plead guilty."

"Well! is there more?"

"Some trifle. They will then examine thee about the princess. It is not difficult to confess that Alroy won the caliph's daughter by an irresistible spell—and now 'tis broken."

"So, so. Is that all?"

"The chief. Thou canst then address some phrases to the Hebrew prisoners, denying thy divine mission, and so forth—to settle the public mind, observe, upon this point forever."

"Ay, ay, and then—?"

"No more, except for form, (upon the completion of the conditions, mind, you will be conveyed to what land you please, with such amount of treasure as you choose,) there is no more, except, I say, for form, I would, if I were you, ('twill be expected,) I would just publicly affect to renounce our faith, and bow before their prophet."

"Hah! Art thou there? Is this thy freedom? Get thee behind me, tempter!"

"Never, never, never! not a jot, not a jot: I'll not yield a jot. Were my doom one everlasting torture, I'd spurn thy terms! Is this thy high contempt of our poor kind—to outrage my God!

* A friend of mine witnessed this horrible punishment in Upper Egypt. The victim was a man who had secretly murdered nine persons. He held an official post, and invited travellers and pilgrims to his house, whom he regularly disposed of and plundered. I regret that I have not stated his MS. account of the ceremony.

to prove myself the vilest of the vile, and baser than the basest! Rare philosophy! O, Honain! would we had never met!"

"Or never parted. True. Had my word been taken, Alroy would ne'er have been betrayed."

"No more, no more; I pray thee, sir, no more. Leave me."

"Were this a palace, I would. Harsh words are softened by a friendly ear, when spoken in affliction."

"Say what they will, I am the Lord's anointed. As such I should have lived, as such at least I'll die."

"And Miriam?"

"The Lord will not desert her: she ne'er deserted him."

"Schirene?"

"Schirene! why! for her sake alone I'll die a hero! Shall it be said she loved a craven slave, a base impostor, a vile renegade, a villainous dealer in drugs and charms? O! no, no, no! if only for her sake, her sweet, sweet sake, my end shall be like my great life. As the sun I rose, like him I set. Still the world is warm with my bright fame, and my last hour shall not disgrace my noon, stormy indeed but glorious!"

Honain took the torch from the niche, and advanced to the grate. It was not fastened: he drew it gently open, and led forward a veiled and female figure. The veiled and female figure threw herself at the feet of Alroy, who seemed lost to what was passing. A soft lip pressed his hand. He started, his chains clanked.

"Alroy!" softly murmured the kneeling female.

"What voice is that?" wildly exclaimed the prince of the captivity. "It falls upon my ear like long forgotten music. I'll not believe it. No! I'll not believe it. Art thou Schirene?"

"I am that wretched thing they called thy bride."

"O! this indeed is torture! What impalement can equal this sharp moment? Look not on me, let not our eyes meet! They have met before, like to the confluence of two shining rivers blending in one great stream of rushing light. Bear off that torch, sir. Let impenetrable darkness cover our darker fortunes."

"Alroy!"

"She speaks again. Is she mad, as I am, that thus she plays with agony?"

"Sir," said Honain, advancing, and laying his hand gently on the arm of the captive, "I pray thee moderate this passion. Thou hast some faithful friends here, who would fain commune in calmness for thy lasting welfare."

"Welfare! He mocks me."

"I beseech thee, sire, be calm. If, indeed, I speak unto that great Alroy that all men feared, and still may fear, I pray remember, 'tis not in palaces, or in the battle field alone, the heroic soul can conquer and command. Scenes like these are the great proof of a superior soul. While we live, our body is a temple where our genius pours forth its godlike inspiration, and while the altar is not overthrown, the deity may still work marvels. Then rouse thyself, great sire; bethink thee, a caliph or a captive, there is no man within this breathing world like to Alroy. Shall such a being fall without a struggle, like some poor felon, who has naught to trust to but the dull shuffling accidents of chance? I too am a prophet, and I feel thou still wilt conquer."

"Give me my sceptre then, give me the sceptre! I speak to the wrong brother. It was not thou—it was not thou that gave it me."

"Gain it once more. The Lord deserted David for a time, yet still he pardoned him, and still he died a king."

"A woman worked his fall."

"But thee a woman raises. This great princess, has she not suffered too? Yet her spirit is still unbroken. List to her counsel: it is deep and fond."

"So was our love."

"And is, my Alroy!" exclaimed the princess.

"Be calm, be calm, I pray thee! For my sake, I am calm for thine. Thou hast listened to all Honain has told thee; that wise man, my Alroy, that never erred. 'Tis but a word he counsels, an empty word, a most unmeaning form. But speak it, and thou art free, and Alroy and Schirene may blend again their glorious careers, and lives of sweet fruition. Dost thou not remember when walking in the garden of our joy, and palled with empire, how often hast thou sighed for some sweet isle unknown to man, where thou mightest pass the days with no companion but my faithful self, and no adventures but our constant loves? O! my beloved, that life may still be thine! And dost thou falter? Dost call thyself forlorn with such fidelity, and deem thyself a wretch, when paradise with all its beauteous gates but woo thy entrance? O! no, no, no! thou hast forgot Schirene: I fear me much, thy over-fond Schirene, who dotes upon thy image in thy chains more than she did when those sweet hands of thine were bound with gems, and played with her bright locks!"

"She speaks of another world. I do remember something. Who has sent this music to a dungeon? My spirit softens with her melting words. My eyes are moist. I weep! 'Tis pleasant. Sorrow is joy compared with my despair. I never thought to shed a tear again. My brain methinks is cooler."

"Weep, weep, I pray thee weep; but let me kiss away thy tears, my soul! Didst think thy Schirene had deserted thee? Ah! that was it that made my bird so sad. It shall be free, and fly in a sweet sky, and feed on flowers with its faithful mate. Ah me! I am once more happy with my boy. There was no misery but thy absence, sweet! Methinks this dungeon is our bright kiosk! Is that the sunbeam, or thy smile, my love, that makes the walls so joyful!"

"Did I smile?—I'll not believe it."

"Indeed you did. Ah! see, he smiles again. Why, this is freedom! There is no such thing as sorrow. 'Tis a lie to frighten fools!"

"Why, Honain, what's this? 'Twould seem I am really joyful. There's inspiration in her very breath. I am another being. Nay! waste not kisses on those ugly fetters."

"Methinks they are gold."

They were silent. Schirene drew Alroy to his rough seat, and gently placing herself on his knees, threw her arms round his neck, and buried her face in his breast. After a few minutes she raised her head, and whispered in his ear in irresistible accents of sweet exultation, "We shall be free to-morrow!"

"To-morrow! is the trial so near?" exclaimed the captive with an agitated voice and changing countenance. "To-morrow!" He threw Schirene aside somewhat hastily, and sprang from his seat.

"To-morrow! would it were over! To-morrow! Methinks there is within that single word the fate of ages! Shall it be said to-morrow Alroy—"

"Hah! what art thou that risest now before me? Dread, mighty spirit, thou hast come in time to save my last perdition. Take me to thy bosom, 'tis not stabbed. They did not stab thee. Thou seest me here communing with thy murderers. What then? I am innocent. Ask them, dread ghost, and call upon their fiendish souls to say I am pure. They would make me dark as themselves, but shall not."

"Honain, Honain!" exclaimed the princess in a terrible whisper, as she flew to the physician. "He is wild again, he is wild. Calm him, calm him. Mark! how he stands with his extended arms, and fixed and vacant eyes, muttering most awful words! My spirit fails me. It is too fearful."

The physician advanced and stood by the side of Alroy, but in vain attempted to catch his attention. He ventured to touch his arm. The prince started, turned round, and recognising him, exclaimed in a shrieking voice, "Oft, fratricide!"

Honain recoiled, pale and quivering. Schirene sprang to his arm. "What said he, Honain? Thou dost not speak. I never saw thee pale before. Art thou, too, mad?"

"Would I were!"

"All men are growing wild. I am sure he said something. I pray thee tell me. What was it?"

"Ask him."

"I dare not. Tell me—tell me, Honain!"

"That I dare not."

"Was it a word?"

"Ay! a word to wake the dead. Let us begone."

"Without our end? Coward! I'll speak to him. My own Alroy," sweetly whispered the princess, as she advanced before him.

"What, has the fox left the tigress! Is't so, eh, eh? Are there no judgments? Are the innocent only haunted? I am innocent; I did not strangle thee! He said rightly, Beware, beware! they who did this, may do even fouler deeds. And here they are quick at their damned work. Thy body suffered, great Jabaster, but me they would strangle body and soul!"

The princess shrieked, and fell into the arms of the advancing Honain, who bore her out of the dungeon.

XVIII.

AFTER the fall of Hamadan, Bostenay and Miriam had been carried prisoners to Bagdad. Through the interference of Honain, their imprisonment had been exempted from the usual hardships; but they were still confined to their chambers in the citadel. Hitherto all the endeavours of Miriam to visit her brother had been fruitless. Honain was the only person to whom she could apply for assistance, and he, in answer to her importunities, only regretted his want of power to aid her. In vain had she attempted, by the offer of some remaining jewels, to secure the co-operation of her guards, with whom her loveliness and the softness of her manners had already ingratiated her. She had not succeeded even in communicating with Alroy. But after the unsuccessful mission of Honain to the dungeon, the late vizier visited the sister of the captive, and breaking to her with delicate skill, the intelligence of the impending catastrophe, he announced that he had at length succeeded in obtaining for her the desired permission to visit her brother, and while she shuddered at the proximity of an event for which she had long attempted to prepare herself, Honain, with some modifications, whispered the means by which he flattered himself it might yet be averted. Miriam listened to him in silence, nor could he with all his consummate art succeed in extracting from her the slightest indication of her own opinion as to their expediency. They parted, Honain as sanguine as the wicked ever are.

As Miriam dreaded, both for herself and for Alroy, the shock of an unexpected meeting, she availed herself of the influence of Honain to send Caleb to her brother, to prepare him for her presence, and to consult him as to the desirable moment. Caleb found his late master lying exhausted on the floor of his dungeon. At first he would not speak, or even raise his head, nor did he for a long time apparently recognise the faithful retainer of his uncle. But at length he grew milder, and when he fully comprehended who the messenger was, and the object of the mission, he at first seemed altogether disinclined to see his sister, but in the end, postponed their meeting for the present, and, pleading great exhaustion, fixed for that sad union, the first hour of dawn.

The venerable Bostenay had scarcely ever spoken since the fall of his nephew: indeed it was but too evident that his faculties, even if they had not entirely deserted him, were at least greatly impaired. He never quitted his couch, he took no notice of what occurred. He evinced no curiosity, scarcely any feeling. If indeed he occasionally did mutter an observation, it was generally of an irritable character, nor truly did he appear satisfied if any one approached him, save Miriam, from whom alone he would accept the scanty victuals which he ever appeared disinclined to touch. But his devoted niece, amid all her harrowing affliction, could ever spare to the protector of her youth a placid countenance, a watchful eye, a gentle voice, and a ready hand. Her religion and her virtue, the strength of her faith, and the inspiration of her innocence, supported this pure and hapless lady amid all her undeserved and unparalleled sorrows.

It was long past midnight, the young widow of Abner reposed upon a couch in a soft slumber. The amiable Beruna, and the beautiful Bathsheba, the blinds withdrawn, watched the progress of the night. "Shall I wake her?" said the beautiful Bathsheba. "Methinks the stars are paler! She bid me rouse her long before the dawn."

"Her sleep is too beautiful! Let us not wake her," replied the amiable Beruna. "We rouse her only to sorrow."

"May her dreams at least be happy," rejoined the beautiful Bathsheba. "She sleeps tranquilly as a flower."

"The veil has fallen from her head," said the amiable Beruna. "I will replace it lightly on her brow. Is that well, my Bathsheba?"

"It is well, sweet Beruna. Her face shrouded by the shawl is like a pearl in its shell. See! she moves!"

"Bathsheba?"

"I am here, sweet lady."

"Is it near dawn?"

"Not yet, sweet lady; it is yet night. It is long past the noon of night, sweet lady : methinks I scent the rising breath of morn ; but still 'tis night, and the young moon shines like a sickle in the heavenly field, amid the starry harvest."

"Beruna, gentle girl, give me thy arm. I'll rise."

The maidens advanced, and gently raising their mistress, supported her to the window.

"Since our calamities," said Miriam, "I have never proved such tranquil slumber. My dreams were slight but soothing, I saw him, but he smiled. Have I slept long, sweet girls ? Give me a kiss. Ye are very watchful."

"Dear lady, let me bring thy shawl. The air is fresh—"

"But sweet : I thank thee, no. My brow is not so cool it needs a covering. 'Tis a fair night !"

Miriam gazed upon the wide prospect of the moonlit capital. The eminent position of the citadel afforded an extensive view of the mighty groups of buildings, each in itself a city, broken only by some vast and hooded cupola, the tall, thin, white minarets of the mosques, or the black and spiral form of some lonely cypress, and through which the rushing Tigris, flooded with light, sent forth its broad and brilliant torrent. All was silent ; not a single boat floated on the fleet river, not a solitary voice broke the stillness of slumbering millions. She gazed, and she gazed, she could not refrain from contrasting the present scene, which seemed the sepulchre of all the passions of our race, with the unrivalled excitement of that stirring spectacle which Bagdad afforded on the celebration of the marriage of Alroy. How different then, too, was her position to her present, and how happy ! The only sister of a devoted brother, the lord and conqueror of Asia, the bride of his most victorious captain, one worthy of all her virtues, and whose youthful valour had encircled her brow with a diadem. For Miriam, exalted station had brought neither cares nor crimes. It had, as it were, only rendered her charity universal, and her benevolence omnipotent. She could not accuse herself—this blessed woman—she could not accuse herself, even in this searching hour of self-knowledge—she could not accuse herself, with all her meekness, and modesty, and humility, of having for a moment forgotten her dependence on her God, or her duty to her neighbour.

But when her thoughts recurred to that being, from whom they were indeed scarcely ever absent ; and when she remembered him, and all his life and all the thousand incidents of his youth, mysteries to the world, and known only to her, but which were indeed the prescience of his fame, and thought of all his surpassing qualities, and all his sweet affection, his unrivalled glory, and his impending fate, the tears, in silent agony, forced their way down her pale and pensive cheek. She bowed her head upon Bathsheba's shoulder, and sweet Beruna pressed her quivering hand.

The moon set, the stars grew white and ghastly, and, one by one, vanished away. Over the distant plain of the Tigris, the scene of the marriage pomp, the dark purple horizon, shivered into a rich streak of white and orange. The solemn strain of the muzzin sounded from the minarets. Some one knocked at the door. It was Caleb.

"I am ready," said Miriam ; and for a moment she covered her face with her right hand. "Think of me, sweet maidens ; pray for me !"

XIX.

LEANING ON Caleb, and lighted by a jailer bearing torches, Miriam descended the damp and broken stairs that led to the dungeon. She faltered as she arrived at the gate. She stopped, and leaned against the cold and gloomy wall. The jailer and Caleb preceded her. She heard the voice of Alroy. It was firm and sweet. Its accents reassured her. Cabel came forth with a torch, and held it to her feet ; and as he bent down, he said, "My lord bids me beg you to be of good heart, for he is."

The jailer having stuck his torch in the niche, withdrew. Miriam desired Caleb to stay without. Then, summoning up all her energies, she entered the dreadful abode. Alroy was standing to receive her. The light fell upon his countenance. It smiled. Miriam could no longer restrain herself. She ran forward, and pressed him to her heart.

"O, my best, my long beloved," whispered Alroy : "such a meeting indeed leads captivity captive !"

But the sister could not speak. She leaned her head upon his shoulder, and closed her eyes, that she might not weep.

"Courage, dear heart : courage, courage !" whispered the captive. "Indeed I am very happy !"

"My brother, my brother !"

"Had we met yesterday, you would have found me perhaps a little vexed. But to-day I am myself again. Since I crossed the Tigris, I know not that I have felt such self-content. I have had sweet dreams, dear Miriam, full of solace, and more than dreams. The Lord hath pardoned me, I truly think."

"O, my brother ! your words are full of comfort ; for, indeed, I too have dreamed, and dreamed of consolation. My spirit since our fall has never been more tranquil."

"Indeed I am very happy."

"Say so again, my David ; let me hear again these words of solace !"

"Indeed, 'tis very true, my faithful friend. It is not spoken in kind mockery to make you joyous. For know, last eve, whether the Lord repented of his wrath, or whether some dreadful trials, of which we will not speak, and wish not to remember, had made atonement for my manifold sins—but so it was, that about the time my angel Miriam sent her soothing message, a feeling of repose came over me, such as I long have coveted. Anon, I fell into a slumber, deep and sweet, and, for those wild and whirling images that of late have darted from my brain when it should rest,—glimpses of empire and conspiracy, snatches of fierce wars and mocking loves,—I stood beside our native fountain's brink and gathered flowers with my earliest friend. As I placed the fragrant captives in your flowing locks and kissed you when you smiled, there came Jabaster, that great, injured man, no longer stern and awful, but with benignant looks, and full of love. And he said, 'David, the Lord hath marked thy faithfulness, despite the darkness of thy dungeon.' So he vanished. He spoke, my sister, of some strange temptations by heavenly aid withstood. No more of that. I awoke. And lo ! I heard my name still called. Full of my morning dream, I thought it was you, and I answered, 'Dear sister art thou here ?' But no one answered ; and then reflecting, my memory recognised those thrilling tones that summoned Alroy in Jabaster's cave."

"The Daughter of the Voice?"

"Even that sacred messenger. I am full of faith. The Lord hath pardoned me. Be sure of that."

"I cannot doubt it, David. You have done great things for Israel; no one in these latter days has risen like you. It you have fallen, you were young, and strangely tempted."

"Yet Israel, Israel! Did I not feel a worthier leader awaits my country yet, my heart would crack. I have betrayed my country!"

"O no, no, no! You have shown what we can do, and shall. Your memory alone is inspiration. A great career, although balked of its end, is still a landmark of human energy. Failure, when sublime, is not without its purpose. Great deeds are great legacies, and work with wondrous usury. By what man has done, we learn what man can do; and gauge the power and prospects of our race."

"Alas! there is no one to guard my name. 'Twill be reviled; or worse, 'twill be forgotten!"

"Never, never! the memory of great actions never dies. The sun of glory, though a while obscured, will shine at last. And so, sweet brother, perchance some poet, in some distant age, within whose veins our sacred blood may flow, his fancy fired with the national theme, may strike his harp to Alroy's wild career, and consecrate a name too long forgotten!"

"May love make thee a prophetess!" exclaimed Alroy, as he bent down his head and embraced her. "Sweetest," he whispered, "do not tarry. 'Tis better we should part in this firm mood."

She sprang from him, she clasped her hands.

"We will not part," she exclaimed, with energy: "I will die with thee."

"Blessed girl, be calm, be calm! Do not unman me."

"I am calm. See! I do not weep. Not a tear, not a tear. They are all in my heart."

"Go, go, my Miriam, angel of light and loveliness! Tarry no longer; I pray thee go. I would not think of the past. Let all my mind be centred in the present. Thy presence calls back our by-gone days and softens me too much. My duty to my uncle. Go, dearest, go!"

"And leave thee, leave thee to—O! my David, thou hast seen, thou hast heard—Honain!"

"No more, no more; let not that accursed name profane those holy lips. Raise not the demon in me."

"I am silent, I am silent. Yet, yet 'tis madness, 'tis madness! O! my brother, thou hast a fearful trial."

"The God of Israel is my refuge. He saved our fathers in the fiery furnace. He will save me."

"I am full of faith. I pray thee let me stay."

"I would be silent, I would be alone. I cannot speak, Miriam. I ask one favour, the last and dearest from her who has never had a thought but for my wishes—blessed being, leave me."

"I go. O! Alroy, farewell! Let me kiss you. Again, once more! Let me kneel and bless you. Brother, beloved brother, great and glorious brother, I am worthy of you: I will not weep. I am prouder this dread moment of your love, than all your foes can be of their hard triumph!"

XX.

BERUNA and Bathsheba received their mistress when she returned to the chamber. They marked her desolate air. She was silent, pale, and cold. They bore her to her couch, whereon she sat with a most listless and unmeaning look, her quivering lips parted, her eyes fixed upon the ground in vacant abstraction, and her arms languidly folded before her. Beruna stole behind her, and supported her back with pillows, and Bathsheba, unnoticed, wiped the slight foam from her mouth. Thus Miriam remained for several hours, her faithful maidens in vain watching for any indication of her self-consciousness.

Suddenly a trumpet sounded.

"What is that?" exclaimed Miriam, in a shrill voice, and looking up with a distracted glance.

Neither of them answered, since they were aware it betokened the going forth of Alroy to his trial.

Miriam remained in the same posture, and with the same expression of wild inquiry. Another trumpet sounded, and after that a shout of the people. Then she raised up her arms to heaven, and bowed her head—and died.

XXI.

"HAS the second trumpet sounded?"

"To be sure; run, run for a good place. Where is Abdallah?"

"Selling sherbet in the square. We shall find him. Has Alroy come forth?"

"Yes! he goes the other way. We shall be too late. Only think of Abdallah selling sherbet!"

"Father, let me go!"

"You will be in the way; you are too young; you will see nothing. Little boys should stay at home."

"No, they should not. I will go. You can put me on your shoulders."

"Where is Ibrahim? Where is Ali? We must all keep together. We shall have to fight for it. I wish Abdallah were here. Only think of his selling sherbet!"

"Keep straight forward. That is right. It is no use going that way. The bazaar is shut. There is Fakreddin, there is Osman Effendi. He has got a new page."

"So he has, I declare; and a very pretty boy too."

"Father, will they impale Alroy alive?"

"I am sure I do not know. Never ask questions, my dear. Little boys never should."

"Yes, they should. O my! I hope they will impale him alive. I shall be so disappointed if they do not."

"Keep to the left. Dash through the butcher's bazaar: that is open. All right, all right. Did you push me, sir?"

"Suppose I did push you—what then, sir?"

"Come along, don't quarrel. That is a Karasman. They think they are to do what they like. We are five to one to be sure, but still there is nothing like peace and quiet. I wish Abdallah were here with his stout shoulders. Only think of his selling sherbet!"

XXII.

THE square of the great mosque, the same spot where Jabaster met Abidan by appointment, was the intended scene of the pretended trial of Alroy. Thither by break of day the sight-loving thousands of the capital had repaired. In the centre of the square a large circle was described by a crimson cord, and guarded by Karasman soldiers; around this the swelling multitude pressed like the gathering waves of ocean, but whenever the tide set in with too great an impulse, the savage Karasmians appeared the ungovernable element by raising their brutal battle-axes, and breaking the crowns and belabouring the shoulders of their nearest victims. As the morning advanced, the terraces of the surrounding houses, covered with awnings, were crowded with spectators. All Bagdad was about. Since the marriage of Alroy, there had never been such a merry morn as the day of his impalement.

At one end of the circle was erected a magnificent throne. Halfway between the throne and the other end of the circle, but farther back, stood a company of Negro eunuchs, hideous to behold, who, clothed in white and armed with various instruments of torture, surrounded the enormous stakes, tall, thin, and sharp, that were prepared for the final ceremony.

The flourish of trumpets, the clash of cymbals, and the wild eac of the tambour, announced the arrival of Alp Arslan from the serail. An avenue to the circle had been preserved through the multitude. The royal procession might be traced as it wound through the populace by the sparkling and undulating line of plumes of honour, and the dazzling forms of the waving streamers, on which were inscribed the names of Allah and the prophet. Suddenly, amidst the bursts of music and the shouts of the spectators, many of whom on the terraces humbled themselves on their knees, Alp Arslan mounted the throne, around which ranged themselves his chief captains, and a deputation of the moolahs, and imams, and cadis, and other principal personages of the city.

The King of Karasme was very tall in stature, and somewhat meager in form. He was fair, or rather sandy-coloured, with a red beard, and blue eyes and a flat nose. The moment he was seated a trumpet was heard in the distance from the opposite quarter, and it was soon understood throughout the assembly that the great captive was about to appear.

A band of Karasman guards first entered the circle and ranged themselves round the cord with their backs to the spectators. After them came fifty of the principal Hebrew prisoners, with their hands bound behind them, but evidently more for form than security. To these succeeded a small covered wagon drawn by mules, and surrounded by guards, from which was led forth, his legs relieved from their manacles, but his hands still in heavy chains, David Alroy!

A universal buzz of blended sympathy, and wonder, and fear, and triumph, arose throughout the whole assembly. Each man involuntarily stirred. The vast populace moved to and fro in agitation. His garments soiled and tattered, his head bare, and his long locks drawn off his forehead, pale, and very thin, but still unsubdued, the late conqueror and Caliph of Bagdad threw around a calm and imperial glance upon those who were but recently his slaves.

The trumpets again sounded, order was called, and a crier announced that his highness Alp Arslan, the mighty sovereign of Karasme, their lord, protector and king, and avenger of Allah and the prophet, against all rebellious and evil-minded Jews and Giauours, was about to speak. There was a deep and universal silence, and then sounded a voice high as the eagle's in a storm.

"David Alroy!" said his conqueror. "You are brought here this day neither for trial nor for judgment. Captured in arms against your rightful sovereign, you are of course prepared, like other rebels, for your doom. Such a crime alone deserves the most avenging punishments. What then do you merit, who are loaded with a thousand infamies, who have blasphemed Allah and the prophet, and by the practice of magic arts, and the aid of the infernal powers, have broken the peace of kingdoms, occasioned infinite bloodshed, outraged all law, religion, and decency, misled the minds of your deluded votaries, and especially, by a direct compact with Eblis, by the most horrible spells and infamous incantations, captivated the senses of an illustrious princess, heretofore famous for the practice of every virtue, and a descendant of the prophet himself.

"Behold those stakes of palm wood sharper than a lance! The most terrible retribution that human ingenuity has devised for the guilty arts you. But your crimes baffle all human vengeance. Look forward for your satisfactory reward to those infernal powers by whose dark co-operation you have occasioned such disasters. Your punishment is public, that all men may know that the guilty never escape, and that, if your heart be visited by the slightest degree of compunction for your numerous victims, you may this day, by the frank confession of the irresistible means by which you seduced them, exonerate your victims from the painful and ignominious end with which, through your influence, they are now threatened. Mark, O assembled people, the infinite mercy of the vicegerent of Allah! He allows the wretched man to confess his infamy, and to save, by his confession, his unfortunate victims. I have said it. Glory to Allah!"

And the people shouted, "He has said it! He has said it! Glory to Allah! He is great, he is great! and Mohammed is his prophet!"

"Am I to speak?" inquired Alroy, when the tumult had subsided. The melody of his powerful voice commanded universal attention.

Alp Arslan nodded his head in approbation.

"King of Karasme! I stand here accused of many crimes. Now hear my answers. 'Tis said I am a rebel. My answer is, I am a prince, as thou art, of a sacred race, and far more ancient. I owe fealty to no one but to my God, and if I have broken that, I am yet to learn Alp Arslan is the avenger of his power. As for thy God and prophet, I know not them, though they acknowledge mine. 'Tis well understood in every polity, my people stand apart from other nations, and ever will, despite of suffering. So much for blasphemy; I am true to a deep faith of ancient days, which even the sacred writings of thy race still reverence. For the arts magical I practised, and the communion with infernal powers 'tis said I held, know, king, I raised the standard of my faith, by the direct commandment of my God, the great Creator of the universe. What need of magic, then? what need paltering with petty fiends, when backed by his omnipotence?"

My magic was his inspiration. Need I prove why, with such aid, my people crowded around me? The time will come from out our ancient seed, a worthier chief shall rise, not to be quelled, even by thee, sir.

"For that unhappy princess of whom something was said, with no great mercy as it seemed to me, that lady is my wife, my willing wife, the daughter of a caliph—still my wife, although your stakes may make her soon a widow. I stand not here to account for female fancies. Believe me, sire, she gave her beauty to my raptured arms with no persuasions but such as became a soldier and a king. It may seem strange to thee upon thy throne, the flower of Asia should be plucked by one so vile as I am, sir. Remember, the accidents of fortune are most strange. I was not always what I am. We have met before. There was a day, and that too not long since, when, but for the treachery of some knaves I mark there, fortune seemed half inclined to reverse our fates. Had I conquered, I trust I should have shown more mercy."

The King of Karasme was the most passionate of men. He had made a speech according to the advice and instructions of his counsellors, who had assured him, that the tone he adopted would induce Alroy to confess all that he required, and especially to vindicate the reputation of the Princess Schirene, who had already contrived to persuade Alp Arslan that she was the most injured of her sex. The King of Karasme stamped thrice on the platform of his throne, and exclaimed, with great fire, "By my beard ye have deceived me; the dog has confessed nothing!"

All the counsellors, and chief captains, and the moolabs, and the inams, and the cadis, and the principal personages of the city, were in great consternation. They immediately consulted together, and after much disputation, agreed that before they proceeded to extremities it was expedient to prove what the prisoner would not confess. A most venerable sheikh, clothed in flowing robes of green, with a long white beard, and a turban like the tower of Babel, then rose. His sacred reputation procured silence while he himself delivered a long prayer, supplicating Allah and the prophet to confound all blaspheming Jews and Giaours, and to pour forth words of truth from the mouths of religious men. And then the venerable sheikh summoned all witnesses against David Alroy. Immediately advanced Kisloch the Kourd, who being placed in an eminent position, the Cadi of Bagdad drew forth a scroll from his velvet bag, and read to him a deposition wherein the worthy Kisloch stated, that he first became acquainted with the prisoner, David Alroy, in some ruins in the desert; the haunt of banditti, of whom Alroy was the chief; that he, Kisloch, was a reputable merchant, and that his caravan had been plundered by these robbers, and he himself captured: that on the second night of his imprisonment, Alroy appeared to him in the likeness of a lion, and on the third, of a bull with fiery eyes: that he was in the habit of constantly transforming himself; that he frequently raised spirits; that at length, on one terrible night, Eblis himself came in great procession, and presented Alroy with the sceptre of Solomon Ben Daoud; and that the next day Alroy raised his standard, and soon after massacred Hassan Subah and his Seljuks, by the visible aid of many terrible demons. Calidas the Indian, the Guebre, and the Negro, and a few congenial spirits, were not eclipsed in the satisfactory character of their evidence by the luminous testimony of Kisloch the Kourd. The irresistible career of the Hebrew conqueror was undeniably accounted for, and the honour of the Moslem arms, and the purity of the Moslem faith, were established in their pristine glory, and all their unsullied reputation. David Alroy was proved to be a child of Eblis, a sorcerer, and a dealer in charms and magical poisons. The people listened with horror and with indignation. They would have burst through the guards and have torn him to pieces, had not they been afraid of the Karasman battle-axes. So they consoled themselves with the prospect of his approaching tortures.

The Cadi of Bagdad bowed himself before the King of Karasme, and whispered at a respectful distance in the royal ear. The trumpets sounded, the criers enjoined silence, and the royal lips again moved.

"Hear, O ye people! and be wise. The chief cadi is about to read the deposition of the royal Princess Schirene, chief victim of the sorcerer."

And the deposition was read which stated that David Alroy possessed, and wore next to his heart, a talisman, given him by Eblis, of which the virtue was so great, that if once it were pressed to the heart of any woman, she was no longer mistress of her will. Such had been the unhappy fate of the daughter of the commander of the faithful.

"Is it so written?" inquired the captive.

"It is so written," replied the cadi, "and bears the imperial signature of the princess."

"It is a forgery."

The King of Karasme started from his throne, and in his rage nearly descended its steps. His face was like scarlet, his beard like a flame. A favourite minister ventured gently to restrain the royal robe.

"Kill the dog on the spot," muttered the King of Karasme.

"The princess is herself here," said the cadi, "to bear witness to the spells of which she was a victim, but from which, by the power of Allah and the prophet, she is now released."

Alroy started!

"Advance, royal princess," said the cadi, "and if the deposition thou hast heard be indeed true, condescend to hold up the imperial hand that adorned it with thy signature."

A band of eunuchs near the throne gave way, a female figure veiled to her feet appeared. She held up her hand amid the breathless agitation of the whole assembly; the ranks of the eunuchs again closed; a loud shriek was heard, and the veiled figure disappeared.

"I am ready for thy tortures, king," said Alroy, in a tone of deep depression. His firmness appeared to have deserted him. His eyes were cast upon the ground. Apparently he was buried in profound thought, or had delivered himself up to despair.

"Prepare the stakes," said Alp Arslan.

An involuntary, but universal shudder might be distinguished through the whole assembly.

A slave advanced, and offered Alroy a scroll. He recognised the Nubian who belonged to Honain. His former minister informed him that he was at hand, that the terms he offered in the dungeon might even yet be granted, that if Alroy would, as he doubted not, as he entreated him, accept them, he was to place the scroll in his bosom, but that if he were still inexorable, still madly determined on a horrible and ignominious end, he was to tear the scroll, and throw it into the arena. Instantly Alroy took the scroll, and with great energy tore it into a thousand pieces. A puff of wind carried the fragments far and wide. The mob fought for these last memorials of David Alroy; and this little incident created a great confusion.

In the mean time the negroes prepared the instruments of torture and of death.

"The obstinacy of this Jewish dog makes me mad," said the King of Karasme to his courtiers. "I will hold some parley with him before he dies." The favourite minister entreated his sovereign to be content; but the royal beard grew so red, and the royal eyes flashed forth such terrible sparks of fire, that even the favourite minister at length gave way.

The trumpets sounded, the criers called silence, and the voice of Alp Arslan was again heard.

"Thou dog, dost see what is preparing for thee? Dost know what awaits thee in the halls of thy master Eblis? Can a Jew be influenced even by false pride? Is not life sweet? Is it not better to be my slipper-bearer than to be impaled?"

"Magnanimous Alp Arslan," replied Alroy, in a tone of undisguised contempt; "thinkest thou that any torture can be equal to the recollection that I have been conquered by thee?"

"By my beard, he mocks me," exclaimed the Karasman monarch, "he defies me. Touch not my robe. I will parley with him. Ye see no farther than a hooded hawk, ye sons of a blind mother. This is a sorcerer; he hath yet some master-spell; he will yet save himself. He will fly into the air, or sink into the earth. He laughs at our tortures." The King of Karasme precipitately descended the steps of his throne, followed by his favourite minister, and his counsellors, and chief captains, and the cadis, and the moolahs, and the imams, and the principal personages of the city.

"Sorcerer!" exclaimed Alp Arslan, "insolent sorcerer! base son of a base mother! dog of dogs! dost thou defy us? Does thy master Eblis whisper hope? Dost thou laugh at our punishments? Wilt thou fly into the air? wilt thou sink into the earth? eh, eh? Is it so, is it so?" The breathless monarch ceased, from the exhaustion of passion. He tore his beard up by the roots, he stamped with uncontrollable rage.

"Thou art wiser than thy counsellors, royal Arslan; I do defy thee. My master, although not Eblis, has not deserted me. I laugh at thy punishments. Thy tortures I despise. I shall both sink into the earth, and mount into the air. Art thou answered?"

"By my beard," exclaimed the enraged Arslan, "I am answered. Let Eblis save thee if he can." and the King of Karasme, the most famous master of the sabre in Asia, drew his blade like lightning from its sheath, and carried off the head of Alroy at a stroke. It fell, and as it fell, a smile of triumphant derision seemed to play upon the dying features of the hero, and to ask of his enemies, "Where now are all their tortures?"*

* In the German Davidis of Ganz translated into Latin by Vorstius, Lug. 1654, is an extract from a Hebrew MS. containing an account of Alroy. I subjoin a passage respecting his death for the learned reader. "Scribit R. Maimonides, Sultatum interrogasse illum, nun esset Messias, et dixisse, Sum, et quavisse ab illo regem, quodnam signum habes? Et respondisse, ut præcideret caput, ut se in vitam reversurum. Tunc regem jussisse et caput ejus amputarent, et obisise; sed hoc illi dixisse, ne gravibus tormentis ipsum enecaret."

"Septem annis ante decretum hoc, de quo supra locuti sumus, habuerunt Israelitæ vehementes angustias propter virum Belial, qui seipsum fecit Messiam; et rex atque principes valde accensi sunt exandescencia contra Judæos, ut dicerent, eos querere interitum regni sui Messia petitione. Maledicti hujus nomen vocatum fuit David El-David aut Alroy ex urbe Omadia; et erat ibi cæcus magnus, circiter mille familias devotes, refertas, honestas et felices continens. Atque Ecclesie hæc erat principum cætuump habitantium circa fluvium Sabathion, atque erant plus quam centum Ecclesie. Erat hic initium regionis Medie, atque lingua eorum erat idiom Thargum, inde autem usque ad regionem Golan est iter 50 dierum, et sunt sub imperio Regis Persiæ, cui dant quotannis tributum a 15 annis et ultra aureum unum. Vir autem hic David El-David studuit coram principe captivitate Chasdai et coram eccellente Scholarcha in urbe Bagdad, qui eximus erant sapiens in Thalmude et omnibus scientiis Exoticis, atque in omnibus libris divinatorum, magorum et Chaldeorum. Hic vero David El-David ex audacia et arrogantia cordis sui elevavit manum contra regem, et collegit Judæos habitantes in monte Choptan, et seduxit eos, ut exirent in prælium cum omnibus gentibus. Ostendit illi signa; sed ignorabant quam virtute; erant enim homines, qui asserbant istud per modum magiæ et præstigationis fieri, alii dicebant, potentiam ejus magnam esse propter manum Dei. Qui consortium ejus veniebant, vocabant eum Messiam, eumque laudabant et extollabant.

"In regno Persiæ alio quodam tempore surrexit vir quidam Judæus, et seipsum fecit Messiam, atque valde prospere egit; et numerus ex Israele ad illum confuxit populus. Cum vero audiret rex omnem ejus potentiam, atque propositum ejus esse descendere in prælium cum ipso, misit ad Judæos congregatos in regione sua, fisque dixit: Nisi egerent cum hocce viro, ut e medio tolleir, certo sciant, se eos omnes gladio interempturum et uno die infantes ac feminas deleburum. Tunc congregatus est totus populus Israelis simul, atque contendit ad virum illum, ceciditque coram; illo in terram; vehementer supplicatus est, clamavit atque ploravit, ut reveteretur a visa sua; et cur seipsum et omnes afflictos conjiceret in periculum; jam enim regem jurasse se immisurum eis gladium, et quomodo posset intueri afflictionem omnium cætuump Persiæ. Respondit, Veni servatum vos, et non vultis. Quem meluistis? Quisnam coram me consistet? Et quid ager rex Persiæ. ut non reformidet me et gladium meum? Interrogarunt eum, quodnam signum haberet quod esset Messias. Respondit, QUIA FELICITER REM GERERET, NEQUE MESSIAM OPUS HABERE ALIO SIGNO. Responderunt multos similiter egisse, neque prospera usus fuisse fortuna: tunc rejecit eos a facie sua cum superba indignatione."

THE RISE OF ISKANDER.

I.

THE sun had set behind the mountains, and the rich plain of Athens was suffused with the violet glow of a Grecian eve. A light breeze rose; the olive groves awoke from their noonday trance, and rustled with returning animation, and the pennons of the Turkish squadron, that lay at anchor in the harbour of Piræus, twinkled in the lively air. From one gate of the city the women came forth in procession to the fountain; from another, a band of sumptuous horsemen sallied out, and threw their wanton javelins in the invigorating sky, as they galloped over the plain. The voice of birds, the buzz of beauteous insects, the breath of beauteous flowers, the quivering note of the nightingale, the pittering call of the grasshopper, and the perfume of the violet, shrinking from the embrace of the twilight breeze, filled the purple air with music and odour.

A solitary being stood upon the towering crag of the Acropolis, amid the ruins of the temple of Minerva, and gazed upon the inspiring scene. Around him rose the matchless memorials of antique art; immortal columns whose symmetry baffles modern proportion, serene caryatides, bearing with greater grace a graceful burden, carvings of delicate precision, and friezes breathing with heroic life. Apparently the stranger, though habited as a Moslem, was not insensible to the genius of the locality, nor indeed would his form and countenance have misbecome a contemporary of Pericles and Phidias. In the prime of life, and far above the common stature, but with a frame, the muscular power of which was even exceeded by its almost ideal symmetry, his high white forehead, his straight profile, his oval countenance, and his curling lip, exhibited the same visage that had inspired the sculptor of the surrounding demi-gods.

The dress of the stranger, although gorgeous, was, however, certainly not classic. A crimson shawl was wound round his head, and glittered with a trembling aigrette of diamonds. His vest, which sat tight to his form, was of green velvet, richly embroidered with gold and pearls. Over this he wore a very light jacket of crimson velvet, equally embroidered, and lined with sable. He wore also the full white camese common among the Albanians; and while his feet were protected by sandals, the lower part of his legs was guarded by greaves of embroidered green velvet. From a broad belt of scarlet leather peeped forth the jewelled hilts of a variety of daggers, and by his side was an enormous cimeter, in a scabbard of chased silver.

The stranger gazed upon the wide prospect before him with an air of pensive abstraction. "Beautiful Greece," he exclaimed, "thou art still my country. A mournful lot is mine, a strange and mournful lot, yet not uncheered by hope. I am at least a warrior; and this arm, though trained to war against thee, will not well forget, in the quick hour of battle, the blood that flows within it. Themistocles saved Greece and died a satrap; I am bred one—let me reverse our lots, and die at least a patriot."

At this moment the evening hymn to the Virgin arose from a neighbouring convent. The stranger started as the sacred melody floated towards him, and taking a small golden cross from his heart, he kissed it with devotion, and then descending the steep of the citadel, entered the city.

He proceeded along the narrow winding streets of Athens until he at length arrived in front of a marble palace, in the construction of which the architect had certainly not consulted the surrounding models which time had spared to him, but which, however it might have offended a classic taste, presented altogether a magnificent appearance. Half a dozen guards, whose shields and helmets somewhat oddly contrasted with two pieces of cannon, one of which was ostentatiously placed on each side of the portal, and which had been presented to the Prince of Athens by the republic of Venice, lounging before the entrance, and paid their military homage to the stranger as he passed them. He passed them and entered a large quadrangular garden, surrounded by arcades, supported by a considerable number of thin, low pillars, of barbarous workmanship and various-coloured marbles. In the midst of the garden rose a fountain, whence the bubbling waters flowed in artificial channels through vistas of orange and lemon trees. By the side of the fountain, on a luxurious couch, his eyes fixed upon a richly-illuminated volume, reposed Nicæus, the youthful Prince of Athens.

"Ah! is it you?" said the prince, looking up with a smile, as the stranger advanced. "You have arrived just in time to remind me that we must do something more than read the Persæ—we must act it."

"My dear Nicæus," replied the stranger, "I have arrived only to bid you farewell."

"Farewell!" exclaimed the prince in a tone of surprise and sorrow, and he rose from the couch. "Why! what is this?"

"It is too true," said the stranger, and he led the way down one of the walks. "Events have occurred which entirely baffle all our plans and prospects, and placed me in a position as difficult as it is harrowing. Hunniades has suddenly crossed the Danube in great force, and carried every thing before him. I am ordered to proceed to Albania instantly, and to repair to the camp at the head of the Epirots."

"Indeed!" said Nicæus, with a thoughtful air. "My letters did not prepare me for this. 'Tis sudden! Is Amurath himself in the field?"

"No; Karam Bey commands. I have accounted for my delay to the sultan by pretended difficulties in our treaty, and have held out the prospect of a large tribute."

"When we are plotting that that tribute should be paid no longer!" added Nicæus with a smile.

"Alas! my dear friend," replied the Turkish commander, "my situation has now become critical. Hitherto my services for the Moslem in have been confined to acting against nations of their own faith. I am now suddenly summoned to combat against my secret creed, and the best allies of what I must yet call my secret country. The movement, it appears to me, must be made now or never, and I cannot conceal from myself, that it never could have been prosecuted under less auspicious circumstances."

"What, you desponding!" exclaimed Nicæus, "then I must despair. Your sanguine temper has alone supported me throughout all our dangerous hopes."

"And Æschylus?" said the stranger smiling.

"And Æschylus, certainly," replied Nicæus; "but I have lived to find even Æschylus insipid. I pant for action."

"It may be nearer than we can foresee," replied the stranger. "There is a God who fashions all things. He will not desert a righteous cause. He knoweth that my thoughts are as pure as my situation is difficult. I have some dim ideas still brooding in my mind, but we will not discuss them now. I must away, dear prince. The breeze serves fairly. Have you ever seen Hunniades?"

"I was educated at the court of Transylvania," replied Nicæus, looking down with a somewhat embarrassed air. "He is a famous knight, Christendom's chief bulwark."

The Turkish commander sighed. "When we meet again," he said, "may we meet with brighter hopes and more buoyant spirits. At present, I must, indeed, say farewell."

The prince turned with a dejected countenance, and pressed his companion to his heart. "'Tis a sad end," said he, "to all our happy hours and lofty plans."

"You are as yet too young to quarrel with fortune," replied the stranger, "and, for myself, I have not yet settled my accounts with her. However, for the present, farewell, dear Nicæus!"

"Farewell," replied the Prince of Athens, "Farewell, dear Iskander!"

II.

ISKANDER was the youngest son of the Prince of Epirus, who, with the other Grecian princes, had, at the commencement of the reign of Amurath the Second, in vain resisted the progress of the Turkish arms in Europe. The Prince of Epirus had obtained peace by yielding his four sons as hostages to the Turkish sovereign, who engaged that they should be educated in all the accomplishments of their rank, and with a due deference to their faith. On the death of the Prince of Epirus, however, Amurath could not resist the opportunity that then offered itself of adding to his empire the rich principality he had long coveted. A Turkish force instantly marched into Epirus, and seized upon Croia, the capital city, and the children of its late ruler were doomed to death. The beauty, talents, and valour of the youngest son, saved him, however from the fate of his poisoned brothers. Iskander was educated at Adrianople, in the Moslem faith, and as he, at a very early age, excelled in feats of arms all the Moslem warriors, he became a prime favourite of the sultan, and speedily rose in his service to the highest rank.

At this period the irresistible progress of the Turkish arms was the subject of alarm throughout all Christendom.

Constantinople, then the capital of the Greek empire, had already been more than once besieged by the predecessors of Amurath, and had only been preserved by fortunate accidents and humiliating terms. The despots of Bosnia, Servia, and Bulgaria, and the Grecian princes of Ætolia, Macedon, Epirus, Athens, Phocis, Bœotia, and indeed of all the regions to the straits of Corinth, were tributaries to Amurath, and the rest of Europe was only preserved from his grasp by the valour of the Hungarians and the Poles, whom a fortunate alliance had now united under the sovereignty of Uladislans, who, incited by the pious eloquence of the Cardinal of St. Angelo, the legate of the pope, and, yielding to the tears and supplications of the despot of Servia, had, at the time our story opens, quitted Buda, at the head of an immense army, crossed the Danube, and joining his valiant viceroy, the famous John Hunniades, vaivode of Transylvania, defeated the Turks with great slaughter, relieved all Bulgaria, and pushed on to the base of Mount Hæmus, known in modern times as the celebrated Balkan. Here the Turkish general, Karam Bey, awaited the Christians, and hither to his assistance was Iskander commanded to repair at the head of a body of janissaries, who had accompanied him to Greece, and the tributary Epirots.

Had Iskander been influenced by vulgar ambition, his loftiest desires might have been fully gratified by the career which Amurath projected for him. The Turkish sultan destined for the Grecian prince the hand of one of his daughters, and the principal command of his armies. He lavished upon him the highest dignities and boundless wealth; and, whether it arose from a feeling of remorse, or of affection for a warrior, whose unexampled valour and unrivalled skill had already added some of the finest provinces of Asia to his rule, it is certain that Iskander might have exercised over Amurath a far greater degree of influence than was enjoyed by any other of his courtiers. But the heart of Iskander responded with no sympathy to these flattering favours. His Turkish education could never eradicate from his memory the consciousness that he was a Greek; and although he was brought up in the Moslem faith, he had, at an early period of his career, secretly recurred to the creed of his Christian fathers. He beheld in Amurath the murderer of his dearest kinsmen, and the oppressor of his country; and although a certain calmness of temper, and coolness of judgment, which very early developed themselves in his character, prevented him from ever giving any indication of his secret feelings, Iskander had long meditated on the exalted duty of freeing his country.

Despatched to Greece, to arrange the tributes and the treaties of the Grecian princes, Iskander became acquainted with the young Nicæus; and their acquaintance soon matured into friendship. Nicæus was inexperienced: but nature had not intended him for action. The young Prince of Athens would loiter by the side of a fountain, and dream of the wonders of old days. Surrounded by his eunuchs, his priests, and his courtiers, he envied Leonidas, and would have emulated Themistocles. He was passionately devoted to the ancient literature of his country, and had the good taste, rare at that time, to prefer Demosthenes and Lysias to Chrysostom and Gregory, and the choruses of the Grecian theatre to the hymns of the Greek church. The sustained energy and noble simplicity of the character of Iskander, seemed to recall to the young prince the classic heroes, over whom he was so often musing, while the enthusiasm and fancy of Nicæus, and all that apparent weakness of will, and those quick vicissitudes of emotion, to which men of a fine susceptibility are subject, equally engaged the sympathy of the more vigorous, and constant, and experienced mind of his companion.

To Nicæus, Iskander had, for the first time in his life, confided much of his secret heart; and the young prince fired at the inspiring tale. Often they consulted over the fortunes of their country, and, excited by their mutual invention, at length even dared to hope that they might effect its deliverance, when Iskander was summoned to the army. It was a mournful parting. Both of them felt that the last few months of their lives had owed many charms to their companionship. The parting of friends, united by sympathetic tastes, is always painful; and friends, unless their sympathy subsist, had much better never meet. Iskander stepped into the ship, sorrowful, but serene; Nicæus returned to his palace moody and fretful; lost his temper with his courtiers, and, when he was alone, even shed tears.

III.

THREE weeks had elapsed since the parting of Iskander and Nicæus, when the former, at the head of ten thousand men, entered, by a circuitous route, the defiles of Mount Hæmus, and approached the Turkish camp, which had been pitched upon a vast and elevated table-ground, commanded on all sides by superior heights, which, however, were fortified and well garrisoned by janissaries. The Epirots halted, and immediately prepared to raise their tents, while their commander, attended by a few of his officers, instantly proceeded to the pavilion of Karam Bey.

The arrival of Iskander diffused great joy among the soldiery; and as he passed through the encampment, the exclamations of the Turkish warriors announced how ready they were to be led to the charge by a chieftain who had been ever successful. A guard of honour, by the orders of Karam Bey, advanced, to conduct Iskander to his presence; and soon, entering the pavilion, the Grecian prince exchanged courtesies with the Turkish general. After the formal compliments had passed, Karam Bey waved his hand, and the pavilion was cleared, with the exception of Mousa, the chief secretary, and favourite of Karam. "You have arrived in good time, Iskander, to assist in the destruction of the Christian dogs," said the bey. "Flushed with their accursed success, they have advanced too far. Twice they have endeavoured to penetrate the mountains; and each time they have been forced to retire with great loss. The passages are well barricaded with timber and huge fragments of rock. The dogs have lost all heart, and are sinking under the joint sufferings of hunger and cold. Our scouts tell me they exhibit symptoms of retreat. We must rush down from the mountains, and annihilate them."

"Is Hunniades here in person?" inquired Iskander.

"He is here," replied Karam, "in person—the dog of dogs! Come, Iskander, his head would be a fine Ramadan present to Amurath. 'Tis a head worth three tails, I guess?"

Mousa, the chief secretary, indulged in some suppressed laughter at this joke. Iskander smiled.

"If they retreat we must assuredly attack them," observed Iskander, musingly. "I have a persuasion that Hunniades and myself will soon meet."

"If there be truth in the prophet!" exclaimed Karam, "I have no doubt of it. Hunniades is reserved for you, bey. We shall hold up our heads at court yet, Iskander. You have had letters lately?"

"Some slight words."

"No mention of us, of course?"

"Nothing, except some passing praise of your valour and discretion."

"We do our best, we do our best. Will Isa Bey have Ætolia, think you?"

"I have no thoughts. Our royal father will not forget his children, and Isa Bey is a most valiant chieftain."

"You heard not that he was coming here?" inquired Karam.

"Have you?" responded the cautious Iskander.

"A rumour, a rumour," replied Karam. "He is at Adrianople, think you?"

"It may be so: I am, you know, from Athens."

"True, true. We shall beat them, Iskander, we shall beat them."

"For myself, I feel sanguine," replied the prince, and he arose to retire. "I must at present to my men. We must ascertain more accurately the movements of the Christians before we decide on our own. I am inclined myself to reconnoitre them. How far may it be?"

"There is not room to form our array between them and the mountains," replied Karam.

"'Tis well. Success attend the true believers! By to-morrow's dawn we shall know more."

IV.

ISKANDER returned to his men. Night was coming on. Fires and lights blazed and sparkled in every direction. The air was clear but very cold. He entered his tent, and muffling himself up in his pelisse of sables, he mounted his horse, and declining any attendance, rode for some little distance, until he had escaped from the precincts of the camp. Then he turned his horse towards one of the wildest passes of the mountain, and galloping at great speed, never stopped until he had gained a considerable ascent. The track became steep and rugged. The masses of loose stone rendered his progress slow; but his Anatolian charger still bore him at intervals bravely, and in three hours' time he had gained the summit of Mount Hæmus. A brilliant moon flooded the broad plains of Bulgaria with shadowy light. At the base of the mountainous range, the red watch-fires denoted the situation of the Christian camp.

Iskander proceeded down the descent with an audacious rapidity; but his charger was thoroughbred, and his moments were golden. Ere midnight, he had reached the outposts of the enemy, and was challenged by a sentinel.

"Who goes there?"

"A friend to Christendom."

"The word?"

"I have it not—nay, calmly. I am alone, but I am not unarmed. I do not know the word. I come from a far country, and bear important tidings to the great Hunniades; conduct me to that chief."

"May I be crucified if I will," responded the sentinel, "before I know who and what you are. Come, keep off, unless you wish to try the effect of a Polish lance," continued the sentinel; " 'tis something, I assure you, not less awkward than your Greek fire, if Greek indeed you be."

"My friend, you are a fool," said Iskander, "but time is too precious to argue any longer." So saying, the Turkish commander dismounted, and taking up the brawny sentinel in his arms with the greatest ease, threw him over his shoulder, and, threatening the astounded soldier with instant death if he struggled, covered him with his pelisse, and entered the camp.

They approached a watch-fire, around which several soldiers were warming themselves.

"Who goes there?" inquired a second sentinel.

"A friend to Christendom," answered Iskander.

"The word?"

Iskander hesitated.

"The word, or I'll let fly," said the sentinel, elevating his cross-bow.

"The Bridge of Buda," instantly replied the terrified prisoner beneath the pelisse of Iskander.

"Why did not you answer before, then?" said one of the guards.

"And why do you mock us by changing your voice?" said another. "Come, get on with you, and no more jokes."

Iskander proceeded through a street of tents, in some of which were lights, but all of which were silent. At length he met the esquire of a Polish knight returning from a convivial meeting, not a little elevated.

"Who are you?" inquired Iskander.

"I am an esquire," replied the gentleman.

"A shrewd man, I doubt not, who would make his fortune," replied Iskander. "You must know great things have happened. Being on guard, I have taken a prisoner, who has deep secrets to divulge to the Lord Hunniades. Thither, to his pavilion, I am now bearing him. But he is a stout barbarian, and almost too much for me. Assist me in carrying him to the pavilion of Hunniades, and you shall have all the reward and half the fame."

"You are a very civil spoken young gentleman," said the esquire. "I think I know your voice. Your name, if I mistake not, is Leckinski?"

"A relative. We had a common ancestor."

"I thought so. I know the Leckinskies ever by their voice. I am free to help you on the terms you mention—all the reward and half the fame. 'Tis a strong barbarian, is it. We cannot cut its throat, or it will not divulge. All the reward and half the fame! I will be a knight to-morrow. It seems a sort of fish, and has a smell."

The esquire seized the shoulders of the prisoner, who would have spoken had he not been terrified by the threats of Iskander, who carrying the legs of the sentinel, allowed the Polish gentleman to lead the way to the pavilion of Hunniades. Thither they soon arrived; and Iskander, dropping his burden, and leaving the prisoner without to the charge of his assistant, entered the pavilion of the general of the Hungarians.

He was stopped in a small outer apartment by an officer, who inquired his purpose, and to whom he repeated his desire to see the Hungarian leader, without loss of time, on important business. The officer hesitated; but, summoning several guards, left Iskander in their custody, and stepping behind a curtain, disappeared. Iskander heard voices, but could distinguish no words. Soon the officer returned, and, ordering the guards to disarm and search Iskander, directed the Grecian prince to follow him. Drawing aside the curtain, Iskander and his attendant entered a low apartment of considerable size. It was hung with skins. A variety of armour and dresses were piled on couches. A middle-aged man, of majestic appearance, muffled up in a pelisse of furs, with long chestnut hair, and a cap of crimson velvet and ermine, was walking up and down the apartment, and dictating some instructions to a person who was kneeling on the ground, and writing by the bright flame of a brazen lamp. The bright flame of the brazen lamp fell full upon the face of the secretary. Iskander beheld a most beautiful woman.

She looked up as Iskander entered. Her large dark eyes glanced through his soul. Her raven hair descended to her shoulders in many curls on each side of her face, and was braided with strings of immense pearls. A broad cap of white fox-skin crowned her whiter forehead. Her features were very small, but sharply moulded, and a delicate tint gave animation to her clear fair cheek. She looked up as Iskander entered, with an air rather of curiosity than embarrassment.

Hunniades stopped, and examined his visiter with a searching inquisition. "Whence come you?" inquired the Hungarian chieftain.

"From the Turkish camp," was the answer.

"An envoy or a deserter?"

"Neither."

"What then?"

"A convert."

"Your name?"

"Lord Hunniades," said Iskander, "that is for your private ear. I am unarmed, and were I otherwise, the first knight of Christendom can scarcely fear. I am one in birth and rank your equal; if not in fame, at least, I trust, in honour. My time is all-precious: I can scarcely stay here while my horse breathes. Dismiss your attendant."

Hunniades darted a glance at his visiter which would have baffled a weaker brain, but Iskander stood the scrutiny calm and undisturbed. "Go, Stanislaus," said the vaivode to the officer. "This lady, sir," continued the chieftain, "is my daughter, and one from whom I have no secrets."

Iskander bowed lowly as the officer disappeared.

"And now," said Hunniades, "to business. Your purpose?"

"I am a Grecian prince, and a compulsory ally of the Moslem. In a word, my purpose here is to arrange a plan by which we may effect at the same time your triumph and my freedom."

"To whom, then, have I the honour of speaking?" inquired Hunniades.

"My name, great Hunniades, is perhaps not altogether unknown to you: they call me Iskander."

"What, the right arm of Amurath, the conqueror of Caramania, the flower of Turkish chivalry? Do I indeed behold that matchless warrior?" exclaimed Hunniades, and he held forth his hand to his guest, and ungirding his own sword, offered it to the prince. "Iduna," continued Hunniades, to his daughter, "you at length behold Iskander."

"My joy is great, sir," replied Iduna, "if I indeed rightly understand that we may count the Prince Iskander a champion of the cross."

Iskander took from his heart his golden crucifix, and kissed it before her. "This has been my companion and consolation for long years, lady," said Iskander; "you, perhaps, know my mournful history, Hunniades. Hitherto, my pretended sovereign has not required me to bare my cimeter against my Christian brethren. That hour, however, has at length arrived, and it has decided me to adopt a line of conduct long meditated. Karam Bey, who is aware of your necessities, the moment you commence your retreat, will attack you. I shall command his left wing. In spite of his superior power and position, draw up in array, and meet him with confidence. I propose, at a convenient moment in the day, to withdraw my troops, and, with the Epirots, hasten to my native country, and at once raise the standard of independence. It is a bold measure, but success is the child of audacity. We must assist each other with mutual diversions. Single-handed it is in vain for me to commence a struggle, which, with all adventitious advantages, will require the utmost exertion of energy, skill, and patience. But if yourself and the King Uladislaus occupy the armies of Amurath in Bulgaria, I am not without hope of ultimate success, since I have to inspire me all the most urgent interests of humanity, and combat, at the same time, for my God, my country, and my lawful crown."

"Brave prince, I pledge you my troth," said Hunniades, coming forward, and seizing his hand; "and while Iskander and Hunniades live, they will never cease until they have achieved their great and holy end."

"It is a solemn compact," said Iskander, "more sacred than if registered by the scribes of Christendom. Lady Iduna, your prayers!"

"They are ever with the champions of the cross," replied the daughter of Hunniades. She rose, the large cloak in which she was enveloped, fell from her exquisite form. "Noble Iskander, this rosary is from the holy sepulchre," continued Iduna; "wear it for the sake and memory of that blessed Saviour, who died for our sins."

Iskander held forth his arm and touched her delicate hand as he received the rosary, which, pressing to his lips, he placed round his neck.

"Great Hunniades," said the Grecian prince, "I must cross the mountains before dawn. Let me venture to entreat that we should hear to-morrow that the Christian camp is in retreat."

"Let it be even so," said the Hungarian, after some thought, "and may to-morrow's sun bring brighter days to Christendom." And with these words terminated the brief and extraordinary visit of Iskander to the Christian general.

V.

THE intelligence of the breaking up of the Christian camp, and the retreat of the Christian army, soon reached the divan of Karam Bey, who immediately summoned Iskander to consult on the necessary operations. The chieftains agreed that instant pursuit was indispensable, and soon the savage Hæmus poured forth from its green bosom, swarms of that light cavalry which was perhaps even a more fatal arm of the Turkish power than the famous janissaries themselves. They hovered on the rear of the retreating Christians, charged the wavering, captured the unwary. It was impossible to resist their sudden and impetuous movements, which rendered their escape as secure as their onset was overwhelming. Wearied at length by the repeated assaults, Hunniades, who, attended by some chosen knights, had himself repaired to the rear, gave orders for the army to halt and offer battle.

Their pursuers instantly withdrew to a distance, and gradually forming into two divisions, awaited the arrival of the advancing army of the Turks. The Moslem came forward in fierce array, and with the sanguine courage inspired by expected triumph. Very conspicuous was Iskander bounding in his crimson vest upon his ebony steed, and waving his gleaming cimeter.

The janissaries charged calling upon Allah! with an awful shout. The Christian knights, invoking the Christian saints, received the Turks at the point of their lances. But many a noble lance was shivered that morn, and many a bold rider and worthy steed bit the dust of that field, borne down by the irresistible numbers of their fierce adversaries. Everywhere the balls and the arrows whistled through the air, and sometimes an isolated shriek, heard amid the general clang, announced another victim to the fell and mysterious agency of the Greek fire.

Hunniades, while he performed all the feats of an approved warrior, watched with anxiety the disposition of the Turkish troops. Hitherto, from the nature of their position, but a portion of both armies had interfered in the contest, and as yet, Iskander had kept aloof. But now, as the battle each instant raged with more fury, and it was evident that ere long the main force of both armies must be brought into collision, Hunniades, with a terrible suspense, watched whether the Grecian prince was or even capable of executing this fulfilment, the concealment from himself against the cross.

He deems that a battle is not to be won by loitering under a shadowy tree. Now I differ with him, and I even mean to win this day by such a piece of truancy. However, it may certainly now be time for more active work. You smile encouragement, good Mousa. Giorgio, Demetrius, to your duty!"

At these words, two stout Epirots advanced to the unfortunate secretary, seized and bound him, and placed him on horseback before one of their comrades.

"Now all who love their country follow me!" exclaimed Iskander. So saying, and at the head of five thousand horsemen, Iskander quitted the field at a rapid pace.

VI.

WITH incredible celerity Iskander and his cavalry dashed over the plains of Roumelia, and never halted except for short and hurried intervals of rest and repose, until they had entered the mountainous borders of Epirus, and were within fifty miles of its capital, Croia. On the eve of entering the kingdom of his fathers, Iskander ordered his guards to produce the chief secretary of Karam Bey. Exhausted with fatigue, vexation, and terror, the disconsolate Mousa was led forward.

"Cheer up, worthy Mousa!" said Iskander, lying his length on the green turf. "We have had a sharp ride; but I doubt not we shall soon find ourselves, by the blessing of God, in good quarters. There is a city at hand which they call Croia, in which once, as the rumour runs, the son of my father should not have had to go seek for an entrance. No matter. Methinks, worthy Mousa, thou art the only man in our society that can sign thy name. Come, now, write me an order signed Karam Bey to the governor of this said city, for its delivery up to the valiant champion of the crescent, Iskander, and thou shalt ride in future at a pace more suitable to a secretary."

The worthy Mousa humbled himself to the ground, and then taking his writing materials from his girdle, inscribed the desired order, and delivered it to Iskander, who, glancing at the inscription, rushed it into his vest.

"I shall proceed at once to Croia, with a few men," said Iskander; "do you, my bold comrade, this eve in various parties, and at the second night, depart for his now remote period to his mountains, de-strangers, or their own seed." So saying, he spurred his horse, and with panting hearts and smiling faces, Iskander and his company had soon arrived in the vicinity of the city.

The city was surrounded by a beautiful region of corn-fields and fruit trees. The road was arched with the overhanging boughs. The birds chirped on every spray. It was a blithe and merry morn. Iskander plucked a bunch of olives as he cantered along. "Dear friends," he said, looking round with an inspiring smile, "let us gather our first harvest!" And, thereupon, each putting forth his rapid hand, seized, as he rushed by, the emblem of possession, and following the example of his leader, placed it in his cap.

They arrived at the gates of the city, which was strongly garrisoned; and Iskander, followed by his train, galloped up the height of the citadel. Alighting from his horse, he was ushered into the divan of the governor, an ancient pasha, who received the conqueror of Caramania with all the respect that became so illustrious a companion of the crescent. After the usual forms of ceremonious hospitality, Iskander, with a courteous air, presented him the order for delivering up the citadel; and the old pasha, resigning himself to the loss of his post with oriental submission, instantly delivered the keys of the citadel and town to Iskander, and requested permission immediately to quit the late scene of his command.

Quitting the citadel, Iskander now proceeded through the whole town, and in the afternoon reviewed the Turkish garrison in the great square. As the late governor was very anxious to quit Croia that very day, Iskander insisted on a considerable portion of the garrison accompanying him as a guard of honour, and returning the next morning. The rest he divided in several quarters, and placed the gates in charge of his own companions.

At midnight the Epirots, faithful to their orders, arrived and united beneath the walls of the city, and after interchanging the signals agreed upon, the gates were opened. A large body instantly marched and secured the citadel. The rest, conducted by appointed leaders, surrounded the Turks in their quarters. And suddenly, in the noon of night, in that great city, arose a clang so dreadful that people leaped up from their sleep and stared with stupor. Instantly the terrace of every house blazed with torches, and it became as light as day. Troops of armed men were charging down the streets brandishing their cimeters and yataghans, and exclaiming, "The Cross, the Cross!"—"Liberty!"—"Greece!"—"Iskander and Epirus!" The townsmen recognised their countrymen by their language and their dress. The name of Iskander acted as a spell. They stopped not to inquire. A magic sympathy at once persuaded them that this great man had, by the grace of heaven, recurred to the creed and country of his fathers. And so every townsman, seizing the nearest weapon, with a spirit of patriotic frenzy, rushed into the streets, crying out, "The Cross, the Cross! Liberty! Greece! Iskander and Epirus!" Ay! even the women lost all womanly fears, and stimulated instead of soothing the impulse of their masters. They fetched them arms, they held the torches, they sent them forth with vows, and prayers, and imprecations, their children clinging to their robes, and repeating with enthusiasm, phrases which they could not comprehend

As the Turks fought with the desperation of men who feel that they are betrayed, and must be victims. The small and isolated bodies were soon massacred, and with cold steel, for at this time, although some of the terrible inventions of modern warfare were introduced, their use was not general. The citadel, indeed, was fortified with cannon; but the greater part of the soldiery trusted to their crooked swords, and their unerring javelins. The main force of the Turkish garrison had been quartered in an old palace of the archbishop, situated in the middle of the city on a slightly rising and open ground, a massy building of rustic stone. Here the Turks, although surrounded, defended themselves desperately, using their cross-bows with terrible effect; and hither, the rest of the city being now secured, Iskander himself prepared to achieve its complete deliverance.

The Greeks had endeavoured to carry the principal entrance of the palace by main force, but the strength of the portal had resisted their utmost exertions, and the arrows of the besieged had at length forced them to retire to a distance. Iskander directed that two pieces of cannon should be dragged down from the citadel, and then played against the entrance. In the mean time, he ordered immense piles of damp fagots to be lit before the building, the smoke of which prevented the besieged from taking any aim. The ardour of the people was so great, that the cannon were soon served against the palace, and their effects were speedily remarked. The massy portal shook; a few blows of the battering ram, and it fell. The Turks sallied forth, were received with a shower of Greek fire, and driven in with agonizing yells. Some endeavoured to escape from the windows, and were speared or cut down; some appeared wringing their hands in despair upon the terraced roof. Suddenly the palace was announced to be on fire. A tall white bluish flame darted up from a cloud of smoke, and soon, as if by magic, the whole back of the building was encompassed with rising tongues of red and raging light. Amid a Babel of shrieks, and shouts, and cheers, and prayers, and curses, the roof of the palace fell in with a crash, which produced amid the besiegers an awful and momentary silence, but in an instant they started from their strange inactivity, and rushing forward, leaped into the smoking ruins, and at the same time completed the massacre and achieved their freedom.

VII.

At break of dawn Iskander sent couriers throughout all Epirus, announcing the fall of Croia, and that he had raised the standard of independence in his ancient country. He also despatched a trusty messenger to Prince Nicæus, at Athens, and to the great Hunniades. The people were so excited throughout all Epirus, at this great and unthought of intelligence, that they simultaneously rose in all the open country, and massacred the Turks, and the towns were only restrained in a forced submission to Amurath, by the strong garrisons of the sultan.

Now Iskander was very anxious to effect the removal of these garrisons without loss of time, in order that if Amurath sent a great power against him, as he expected, the invading army might have nothing to rely upon but its own force, and that his attention might not in any way be diverted from effecting their overthrow. Therefore, as soon as his troops had rested, and he had formed his new recruits into some order, which, with their willing spirits, did not demand many days, Iskander set out from Croia, at the head of twelve thousand men, and marched against the strong city of Petrella, meeting in his way the remainder of the garrison of Croia on their return, who surrendered themselves to him at discretion. Petrella was only one day's march from Croia, and when Iskander arrived there he requested a conference with the governor, and told his tale so well, representing the late overthrow of the Turks by Hunniades, and the incapacity of Amurath at present to relieve him, that the Turkish commander agreed to deliver up the place, and leave the country with his troops, particularly as the alternative of Iskander to these easy terms was ever conquest without quarter. And thus, by a happy mixture of audacity and adroitness, the march of Iskander throughout Epirus, was rather like a triumph than a campaign, the Turkish garrisons imitating, without any exception, the conduct of their comrades at Petrella, and dreading the fate of their comrades at the capital. In less than a month, Iskander returned to Epirus, having delivered the whole country from the Moslemian yoke.

Hitherto Iskander had heard nothing either of Hunniades or Nicæus. He learned therefore with great interest as he passed through the gates of the city that the Prince of Athens had arrived at Croia on the preceding eve, and also that the messenger had returned from the Hungarian camp. Amid the acclamations of an enthusiastic people, Iskander once more ascended the citadel of Croia. Nicæus received him at the gate. Iskander sprang from his horse, and embraced his friend. Hand in hand, and followed by their respective trains, they entered the fortress palace.

"My dear friend," said Iskander, when they were once more alone, "you see we were right not to despair. Two months have scarcely elapsed since we parted without a prospect, or with the most gloomy one, and now we are in a fair way of achieving all that we can desire. Epirus is free!"

"I came to claim my share in its emancipation," said Nicæus with a smile, "but Iskander is another Cæsar!"

"You will have many opportunities yet, believe me, Nicæus, of proving your courage and your patriotism," replied Iskander; "Amurath will never allow this affair to pass over in this quiet manner. I did not commence this struggle without a conviction that it would demand all the energy and patience of a long life. I shall be rewarded if I leave freedom as a heritage to my countrymen; but for the rest, I feel that I bid farewell to every joy of life, except the ennobling consciousness of performing a noble duty. In the mean time, I understand a messenger awaits me here from the great Hunniades. Unless that shield of Christendom maintain himself in his present position, our chance of ultimate security is feeble. With his constant diversion in Bulgaria, we may contrive here to struggle into success. You sometimes laugh at my sanguine temper, Nicæus. To say the truth, I am more serene than sanguine, and was never more conscious of the strength of my opponent than now, when it appears that I have beaten him. Hark! the people cheer. I love the people. Nicæus, who are ever influenced by genuine and generous feelings. They cheer as if they had once more gained a country. Alas! they little know what they must endure even at the best. Nay! look not gloomy; we have done great things, and will do more. Who waits without there? Demetrius! Call the messenger from Lord Hunniades."

An Epirot bearing a silken packet was now introduced, which he delivered to Iskander. Reverently touching the hand of his chieftain, the messenger then kissed his own and withdrew. Iskander broke the seal, and drew forth a letter from the silken cover.

"So! this is well!" exclaimed the prince with great animation, as he threw his quick eye over the letter. "As I hoped and deemed, a most complete victory. Karam Bey himself a prisoner, baggage, standards, great guns, treasure. Brave soldier of the cross! (may I prove so!) Your perfectly devised movement, (poh, poh!) Hah! what is this?" exclaimed Iskander, turning pale; his lip quivered, his eye looked dim. He walked to an arched window. His companion, who supposed that he was reading, did not disturb him.

"Poor, poor Hunniades!" at length exclaimed Iskander, shaking his head.

"What of him?" inquired Nicæus quickly.

"The sharpest accident of war!" replied Iskander. "It quite clouds my spirit. We must forget these things, we must forget. Epirus! he is not a patriot who can spare a thought from thee. And yet, so young, so beautiful, so gifted, so worthy of a hero!—when I saw her by her great father's side, sharing the toils, aiding his councils, supplying his necessities, methought I gazed upon a ministering angel!—upon—"

"Stop, stop in mercy's name, Iskander!" exclaimed Nicæus in a very agitated tone. "What is all this? Surely no,—surely not—surely Iduna—!"

"'Tis she!"

"Dead?" exclaimed Nicæus, rushing up to his companion, and seizing his arm.

"Worse, much worse!"

"God of heaven!" exclaimed the young prince, with almost a frantic air. "Tell me all, tell me all! This suspense fires my brain. Iskander, you know not what this woman is to me—the sole object of my being, the bane, the blessing of my life! Speak, dear friend, speak! I beseech you! where is Iduna?"

"A prisoner to the Turk."

"Iduna a prisoner to the Turk! I'll not believe it! Why do we wear swords? Where's chivalry? Iduna a prisoner to the Turk! 'Tis false. It cannot be. Iskander, you are a coward! I am a coward! All are cowards! A prisoner to the Turk! Iduna! What, the rose of Christendom! has it been plucked by such a turbaned dog as Amurath? Farewell, Epirus! Farewell, classic Athens! Farewell, bright fields of Greece, and dreams that made them brighter! The sun of all my joy and hope is set, and set forever!"

So saying, Nicæus, tearing his hair and garments, flung himself upon the floor, and hid his face in his robes.

Iskander paced the room with a troubled step and thoughtful brow. After some minutes he leaned down by the Prince of Athens, and endeavoured to console him.

"It is in vain, Iskander, it is in vain," said Nicæus. "I wish to die."

'Were I a favoured lover, in such a situation," replied Iskander, "I should scarcely consider death my duty, unless the sacrifice of myself preserved my mistress."

"Hah!" exclaimed Nicæus, starting from the ground. "Do you conceive, then, the possibility of rescuing her."

"If she live, she is a prisoner in the seraglio at Adrianople. You are as good a judge as myself of the prospect that awaits your exertions. It is, without doubt, a difficult adventure, but such, methinks, as a Christian knight should scarcely shun."

"To horse," exclaimed Nicæus, "to horse—and yet what can I do? Were she in any other place but the capital I might rescue her by force, but in the heart of their empire—it is impossible. Is there no ransom that can tempt the Turk? My principality would rise in the balance beside this jewel."

"That were scarcely wise, and certainly not just," replied Iskander; "but ransom will be of no avail. Hunniades has already offered to restore Karam Bey, and all the prisoners of rank, and the chief trophies, and Amurath has refused to listen to any terms. The truth is, Iduna has found favour in the eyes of his son, the young Mahomed."

"Holy Virgin! hast thou no pity on this Christian maid?" exclaimed Nicæus. "The young Mahomed! Shall this licentious infidel—ah! Iskander, dear, dear Iskander, you who have so much wisdom, and so much courage; you who can devise all things, and dare all things; help me, help me; on my knees I do beseech you, take up this crying cause of foul oppression, and for the sake of all you love and reverence—your creed, your country, and perchance your friend, let your great genius, like some solemn angel, haste to the rescue of the sweet Iduna, and save her, save her!"

"Some thoughts like these were rising in my mind when first I spoke," replied Iskander. "This is a better cue, far more befitting princes than boyish tears, and all the outward misery of wo, a tattered garment and dishevelled locks. Come, Nicæus, we have to struggle with a mighty fortune. Let us be firm as fate itself."

VIII.

IMMEDIATELY after his interview with Nicæus, Iskander summoned some of the chief citizens of Croia to the citadel, and submitting to them his arrangements for the administration of Epirus, announced the necessity of his instant departure for a short interval; and the same evening, ere the moon had risen, himself and the Prince of Athens quitted the city, and proceeded in the direction of Adrianople. They travelled with great rapidity until they reached a small town upon the frontiers, where they halted for one day. Here, in the bazaar, Iskander purchased for himself the dress of an Armenian physician. In his long dark robes, and large round cap of black wool, his face and hands stained, and his beard and mustachios shaven, it seemed impossible that he could be recognised. Nicæus was habited as his page, in a dress of coarse red cloth, setting tight to his form, with a red cap, with a long blue tassel. He carried a large bag containing drugs, some surgical instruments, and a few books. In this guise, as soon as the gates were open on the morrow, Iskander mounted on a very small mule, and Nicæus on a very large donkey, the two princes commenced the pass of the mountainous range, an arm of the Balkan, which divided Epirus from Roumelia.

"I broke the wind of the finest charger in all Asia when I last ascended these mountains," said Iskander; "I hope this day's journey may be accepted as a sort of atonement."

"Faith! there is little doubt I am the best mounted of the two," said Nicæus. "However, I hope we shall return at a sharper pace."

"How came it, my Nicæus," said Iskander, "that you never mentioned to me the name of Iduna when we were at Athens? I little supposed when I made my sudden visit to Hunniades, that I was about to appear to so fair a host. She is a rarely gifted lady."

"I knew of her being at the camp as little as yourself," replied the Prince of Athens, "and for the rest, the truth is, Iskander, there are some slight crosses in our loves, which time, I hope, will fashion rightly." So saying, Nicæus pricked on his donkey, and flung his stick at a bird which was perched on the branch of a tree. Iskander did not resume a topic to which his companion seemed disinclined. Their journey was tedious. Towards nightfall they reached the summit of the usual track; and as the descent was difficult, they were obliged to rest until daybreak.

On the morrow they had a magnificent view of the rich plains of Roumelia, and in the extreme distance, the great city of Adrianople, its cupolas and minarets blazing and sparkling in the sun. This glorious prospect at once revived all their energies. It seemed that the moment of peril and of fate had arrived. They pricked on their sorry steeds; and on the morning of the next day, presented themselves at the gates of the city. The thorough knowledge which Iskander possessed of the Turkish character, obtained them an entrance, which was at one time almost doubtful, from the irritability and impatience of Nicæus. They repaired to a caravansera of good repute in the neighbourhood of the seraglio; and having engaged their rooms, the Armenian physician, attended by his page, visited several of the neighbouring coffee-houses, announcing, at the same time, his arrival, his profession, and his skill.

As Iskander felt pulses, examined tongues, and distributed drugs and charms, he listened with interest and amusement to the conversation of which he himself was often the hero. He found that the Turks had not yet recovered from their consternation at his audacity and success. They were still wondering, and if possible more astounded than indignant. The politicians of the coffee-houses, chiefly consisting of janissaries, were loud in their murmurs. The popularity of Amurath had vanished before the triumph of Hunniades, and the rise of Iskander.

"But Allah has in some instances favoured the faithful," remarked Iskander; "I heard in my travels of your having captured a great princess of the Giaours!"

"God is great!" said an elderly Turk with a long white beard. "The hakim congratulates the faithful because they have taken a woman!"

"Not so, merely," replied Iskander; "I heard the woman was a princess. If so, the people of Franguestan will pay any ransom for their great women; and by giving up this fair Giaour, you may free many of the faithful."

"Mashallah!" said another ancient Turk, sipping his coffee. "The hakim speaks wisely."

"May I murder my mother!" exclaimed a young janissary, with great indignation. "But this is the very thing that makes me wild against Amurath. Is not this princess a daughter of that accursed Giaour, that dog of dogs, Hunniades? and has he not offered for her ransom our brave Karam Bey himself, and his chosen warriors? and has not Amurath said nay? And why has he said nay? Because his son, the Prince Mahomed, instead of fighting against the Giaours, has looked upon one of their women, and has become a mejnoun. Pah! May I murder my mother,—but if the Giaours were in full march to the city, I'd not fight. And let him tell this to the cadi who dares; for there are ten thousand of us, and we have sworn by the kettle—but we will not fight for Giaours, or those who love Giaours!"

"If you mean me, Ali, about going to the cadi," said the chief eunuch of Mahomed, who was standing by, "let me tell you I am no tale-bearer, and scorn to do an unmanly act. The young prince can beat the Giaours without the aid of those who are noisy enough in a coffee-house, when they are quiet enough in the field. And, for the rest of the business, you may all ease your hearts; for the frangy princess you talk of, is pining away, and will soon die. The sultan has offered a hundred purses of gold to any one who cures her; but the gold will never be counted by the hasnadar, or I will double it."

"Try your fortune, hakim," said several laughing loungers to Iskander.

"Allah has stricken the frangy princess," said the old Turk with a white beard.

"He will strike all Giaours," said his ancient companion, sipping his coffee. "Tis so written."

"Well! I do not like to hear of women-slaves pining to death," said the young janissary, in a softened tone, "particularly when they are young. Amurath should have ransomed her, or he might have given her to one of his officers, or any young fellow that had particularly distinguished himself." And so, twirling his mustachios, and flinging down his piastre, the young janissary strutted out of the coffee-house.

"When we were young," said the old Turk with the white beard to his companion, shaking his head, "when we were young—"

"We conquered Anatolia, and never opened our mouths," rejoined his companion.

"I never offered an opinion till I was sixty," said the old Turk; "and then it was one which had been in our family for a century."

"No wonder Hunniades carries every thing before him," said his companion.

"And that accursed Iskander," said the old man.

The chief eunuch, finishing his vase of sherbet, moved away. The Armenian physician followed him.

IX.

THE chief eunuch turned into a burial-ground, through which a way led, by an avenue of cypress-trees, to the quarter of the seraglio. The Armenian physician, accompanied by his page, followed him.

"Noble sir!" said the Armenian physician; "may I trespass for a moment on your lordship's attention?"

"Worthy hakim, is it you?" replied the chief eunuch, turning round with an encouraging smile of courteous condescension,—“your pleasure?”

“I would speak to you of important matters,” said the physician.

The eunuch carelessly seated himself on a richly-carved tomb, and crossing his legs with an air of pleasant superiority, adjusted a fine emerald that sparkled on his finger, and bade the hakim address him without hesitation.

“I am a physician,” said the Armenian.

The eunuch nodded.

“And I heard your lordship in the coffee-house mention that the sultan, our sublime master, had offered a rich reward to any one who could effect the cure of a favourite captive.”

“No less a reward than one hundred purses of gold,” remarked the eunuch. “The reward is proportioned to the exigency of the case. Believe me, worthy sir, it is desperate.”

“With mortal means,” replied the Armenian; “but I possess a talisman of magical influence, which no disorder can resist. I would fain try its efficacy.”

“This is not the first talisman that has been offered us, worthy doctor,” said the eunuch, smiling incredulously.

“But the first that has been offered on these terms,” said the Armenian. “Let me cure the captive, and of the one hundred purses, a moiety shall belong to yourself. Ay! so confident am I of success, that I deem it no hazard to commence our contract by this surety.” And so saying, the Armenian took from his finger a gorgeous carbuncle, and offered it to the eunuch. The worthy dependant of the seraglio had a great taste in jewellery. He examined the stone with admiration, and placed it on his finger with complacency. “I require no inducements to promote the interests of science, and the purposes of charity,” said the eunuch, with a patronising air. “’Tis assuredly a pretty stone, and, as the memorial of an ingenious stranger, whom I respect, I shall, with pleasure, retain it. You were saying something about a talisman. Are you serious? I doubt not that there are means which might obtain you the desired trial; but the Prince Mahomed is as violent when displeased or disappointed as munificent when gratified. Cure this Christian captive, and we may certainly receive the promised purses; fail, and your head will as assuredly be flung into the seraglio moat, to say nothing of my own.”

“Most noble sir!” said the physician; “I am willing to undertake the experiment on the terms you mentioned. Rest assured that the patient, if alive, must, with this remedy, speedily recover. You marvel! Believe me, had you witnessed the cures which it has already effected, you would only wonder at its otherwise incredible influence.”

“You have the advantage,” replied the eunuch, “of addressing a man who has seen something of the world. I travel every year to Anatolia with the Prince Mahomed. Were I a narrow-minded bigot, who had never been five miles from Adrianople in the whole course of my life, I might indeed be skeptical. But I am a patron of science, and have heard of talismans. How much might this ring weigh, think you!”

“I have heard it spoken of as a carbuncle of uncommon size,” replied the Armenian.

“Where did you say you lodged, hakim?”

“At the khan of Bedreddin.”

“A very proper dwelling. Well, we shall see. Have you more jewels? I might, perhaps, put you in the way of parting with some at good prices. The khan of Bedreddin is very conveniently situated. I may, perhaps, towards evening, taste your coffee at the khan of Bedreddin, and we will talk of this said talisman. Allah be with you, worthy hakim!” The eunuch nodded, not without encouragement, and went his way.

“Anxiety alone enabled me to keep my countenance,” said Nicæus. “A patron of science, forsooth! Of all the insolent, shallow-brained, rapacious coxcombs——”

“Hush, my friend!” said Iskander, with a smile. “The chief eunuch of the heir apparent of the Turkish empire is a far greater man than a poor prince, or a proscribed rebel. This worthy can do our business, and I trust will. He clearly bites, and a richer bait will, perhaps, secure him. In the mean time, we must be patient, and remember whose destiny is at stake.”

X.

THE chief eunuch did not keep the adventurous companions long in suspense; for before the muezzin had announced the close of day from the minarets, he had reached the khan of Bedreddin, and inquired for the Armenian physician.

“We have no time to lose,” said the eunuch to Iskander. “Bring with you whatever you may require, and follow me.”

The eunuch led the way, Iskander and Nicæus maintaining a respectful distance. After proceeding down several streets, they arrived at the burial-ground, where they had conversed in the morning; and when they had entered this more retired spot, the eunuch fell back, and addressed his companion.

“Now, worthy hakim,” he said, “if you deceive me, I will never patronise a man of science again. I found an opportunity of speaking to the prince this afternoon of your talisman, and he has taken from my representations such a fancy for its immediate proof, that I found it quite impossible to postpone its trial even until to-morrow. I mentioned the terms. I told the prince your life was the pledge. I said nothing of the moiety of the reward, worthy hakim. That is an affair between ourselves. I trust to your honour, and I always act thus with men of science.”

“I shall not disgrace my profession or your confidence, rest assured,” replied Iskander. “And am I to see the captive to-night?”

“I doubt it not. Are you prepared? We might, perhaps, gain a little time, if very necessary.”

“By no means, sir; truth is ever prepared.”

Thus conversing, they passed through the burial-ground, and approached some high, broad walls, forming a terrace, and planted with young sycamore trees. The eunuch tapped, with his silver stick, at a small gate, which opened and admitted them into a garden, full of large clumps of massy shrubs. Through these a winding walk led for some way, and then conducted them to an open lawn, on which was situated a vast and irregular building. As they approached the pile, a young man of very imperious aspect rushed forward from a gate, and abruptly accosted Iskander.

“Are you the Armenian physician?” he inquired.

Iskander bowed assent.

"Have you got your talisman? You know the terms? Cure this Christian girl, and you shall name your own reward; fail, and I shall claim your forfeited head."

"The terms are well understood, mighty prince," said Iskander, for the young man was no less a personage than the son of Amurath, and future conqueror of Constantinople; "but I am confident there will be no necessity for the terror of Christendom claiming any other heads than those of his enemies."

"Kafis will conduct you at once to your patient," said Mahomed. "For myself, I cannot rest until I know the result of your visit. I shall wander about these gardens, and destroy the flowers, which is the only pleasure now left me."

Kafis motioned to his companions to advance, and they entered the seraglio.

At the end of a long gallery they came to a great portal, which Kafis opened, and Iskander and Nicæus for a moment supposed that they had arrived at the chief hall of the tower of Babel, but they found the shrill din only proceeded from a large company of women, who were employed in distilling the rare atar of the jessamine flower. All their voices ceased on the entrance of the strangers, as if by a miracle; but when they had examined them, and observed that it was only a physician and his boy, their awe, or their surprise, disappeared; and they crowded round Iskander, some holding out their wrists, others lolling out their tongues, and some asking questions, which perplexed alike the skill and the modesty of the adventurous dealer in magical medicine. The annoyance, however, was not of great duration, for Kafis so belaboured their fair shoulders with his official baton, that they instantly retreated with precipitation, uttering the most violent shrieks, and bestowing on the eunuch so many titles, that Iskander and his page were quite astounded at the intuitive knowledge which the imprisoned damsels possessed of that vocabulary of abuse, which is in general mastered only by the experience of active existence.

Quitting this chamber, the eunuch and his companions ascended a lofty staircase. They halted, at length, before a door. "This is the chamber of the tower," said their guide, "and here we shall find the fair captive." He knocked, the door was opened by a female slave, and Iskander and Nicæus, with an anxiety they could with difficulty conceal, were ushered into a small but sumptuous apartment. In the extremity was a recess covered with a light gauzy curtain. The eunuch bidding them keep in the background, advanced, and cautiously withdrawing the curtain slightly aside, addressed some words in a low voice to the inmate of the recess. In a few minutes the eunuch beckoned to Iskander to advance, and whispered to him: "She would not at first see you, but I have told her you are a Christian, the more the pity, and she consents." So saying, he withdrew the curtain, and exhibited a veiled female figure lying on a couch.

"Noble lady," said the physician in Greek, which he had ascertained the eunuch did not comprehend; "pardon the zeal of a Christian friend. Though habited in this garb, I have served under your illustrious sire. I should deem my life well spent in serving the daughter of the great Hunniades."

"Kind stranger," replied the captive, "I was ill-prepared for such a meeting. I thank you for your sympathy, but my sad fortunes are beyond human aid."

"God works by humble instruments, noble lady," said Iskander, "and with his blessing we may yet prosper."

"I fear that I must look to death as my only refuge," replied Iduna, "and still more, I fear that it is not so present a refuge as my oppressors themselves imagine. But you are a physician; tell me then how speedily nature will make me free."

She held forth her hand, which Iskander took and involuntarily pressed. "Noble lady," he said, "my skill is mere pretence to enter these walls. The only talisman I bear with me is a message from your friends."

"Indeed!" said Iduna, in a very agitated tone.

"Restrain yourself, noble lady," said Iskander, interposing, "restrain yourself. Were you any other but the daughter of Hunniades, I would not have ventured upon this perilous exploit. But I know that the Lady Iduna has inherited something more than the name of her great ancestors—their heroic soul. If ever there were a moment in her life in which it behoved her to exert all her energies, that moment has arrived. The physician who addresses her, and his attendant who waits at hand, are two of the Lady Iduna's most devoted friends. There is nothing that they will not hazard to effect her delivery; and they have matured a plan of escape which they are sanguine must succeed. Yet its completion will require, on her part, great anxiety of mind, greater exertion of body, danger, fatigue, privation. Is the Lady Iduna prepared for all this endurance, and all this hazard?"

"Noble friend," replied Iduna, "for I cannot deem you a stranger, and none but a most chivalric knight could have entered upon this almost forlorn adventure; you have not, I trust, miscalculated my character. I am a slave, and unless Heaven will interpose, must soon be a dishonoured one. My freedom and my fame are alike at stake. There is no danger, and no suffering which I will not gladly welcome, provided there be even a remote chance of regaining my liberty and securing my honour."

"You are in the mind I counted on. Now, mark my words, dear lady. Seize an opportunity this evening of expressing to your jailers that you have already experienced some benefit from my visit, and announce your rising confidence in my skill. In the mean time I will make such a report that our daily meetings will not be difficult. For the present, farewell. The Prince Mahomed waits without, and I would exchange some words with him before I go."

"And must we part without my being acquainted with the generous friends to whom I am indebted for an act of devotion which almost reconciles me to my sad fate?" said Iduna. "You will not, perhaps, deem the implicit trust reposed in you by one whom you have no interest to deceive, and who, if deceived, cannot be placed in a worse position than she at present fills, as a very gratifying mark of confidence, yet that trust is reposed in you, and let me at least soothe the galling dreariness of my solitary hours, by the recollection of the friends to whom I am indebted for a deed of friendship which has filled me with a feeling of wonder from which I have not yet recovered."

"The person who has penetrated the seraglio of Constantinople in disguise, to rescue the Lady Iduna," answered Iskander, "is the Prince Nicæus."

"Nicæus!" exclaimed Iduna, in an agitated tone

"The voice to which I listen is surely not that of the Prince Nicæus; nor the form on which I gaze," she added, as she unveiled. Beside her stood the tall figure of the Armenian physician. She beheld his swarthy and unrecognised countenance. She cast her dark eyes around with an air of beautiful perplexity.

"I am a friend of the Prince Nicæus," said the physician. "He is here. Shall he advance? Alexis," called out Iskander, not waiting for her reply. The page of the physician came forward, but the eunuch accompanied him. "All is right," said Iskander to Kafis. "We are sure of our hundred purses. But, without doubt, with any other aid, the case were desperate."

"There is but one God," said the eunuch, polishing his carbuncle, with a visage radiant as the gem. "I never repented patronising men of science. The prince waits without. Come along." He took Iskander by the arm. "Where is your boy? What are you doing there, sir?" inquired the eunuch, sharply, of Nicæus, who was tarrying behind and kissing the hand of Iduna.

"I was asking the lady for a favour to go to the coffee-house with," replied Nicæus, with pouting lips; "you forget that I am to have none of the hundred purses."

"True," said the eunuch; "there is something in that. Here, boy, here is a piastre for you. I like to encourage men of science, and all that belong to them. Do not go and spend it all in one morning, boy, and when the fair captive is cured, if you remind me, boy, perhaps I may give you another."

XI.

KAFIS and his charge again reached the garden. The twilight was nearly past. A horseman galloped up to them, followed by several running footmen. It was the prince.

"Well, hakim," he inquired, in his usual abrupt style, "can you cure her?"

"Yes," answered Iskander, firmly.

"Now listen, hakim," said Mahomed. "I must very shortly leave the city, and proceed into Epirus at the head of our troops. I have sworn two things, and I have sworn them by the holy stone. Ere the new moon, I will have the heart of Iduna and the head of Iskander!"

The physician bowed.

"If you can so restore the health of this frangy girl," continued Mahomed, "that she may attend me within ten days into Epirus, you shall claim from my treasury what sum you like, and become physician to the seraglio. What say you?"

"My hope and my belief is," replied Iskander, "that within ten days she may breathe the air of Epirus."

"By my father's beard, you are a man after my own heart," exclaimed the prince; "and since thou leapest in talismans, hakim, can you give me a charm that will secure me a meeting with this Epirot rebel within the term, so that I may keep my oath. What say you?—what say you?"

"There are such spells," replied Iskander. "But mark, I can only secure the meeting, not the head."

"That is my part," said Mahomed, with an arrogant sneer. "But the meeting, the meeting?"

"You know the fountain of Kallista in Epirus. Its virtues are renowned."

"I have heard of it."

"Plunge your cimeter in its midnight waters thrice, on the eve of the new moon, and each time summon the enemy you would desire to meet. He will not fail you."

"If you cure the captive, I will credit the legend, and keep the appointment," replied Mahomed, thoughtfully.

"I have engaged to do that," replied the physician.

"Well, then, I shall redeem my pledge," said the prince.

"But mind," said the physician, "while I engage to cure the lady, and produce the warrior, I can secure your highness neither the heart of the one nor the head of the other."

"'Tis understood," said Mahomed.

XII.

THE Armenian physician did not fail to attend his captive patient at an early hour on the ensuing morn. His patron Kafis received him with an encouraging smile. "The talisman already works," said the eunuch: "she has passed a good night, and confesses to an improvement. Our purses are safe. Methinks I already count the gold. But I say, worthy hakim, come hither, come hither," and Kafis looked around to be sure that no one was within hearing. "I say," and here he put on a very mysterious air indeed, "the prince is generous: you understand? We go shares. We shall not quarrel. I never yet repented patronising a man of science, and I am sure I never shall. The prince you see is violent, but generous. I would not cure her too soon, eh?"

"You take a most discreet view of affairs," responded Iskander, with an air of complete assent, and they entered the chamber of the tower.

Iduna performed her part with great dexterity; but indeed it required less skill than herself and her advisers had at first imagined. Her malady, although it might have ended fatally, was, in its origin, entirely mental, and the sudden prospect of freedom, and of restoration to her country and her family, at a moment when she had delivered herself up to despair, afforded her a great and instantaneous benefit. She could not indeed sufficiently restrain her spirits, and smiled incredulously when Iskander mentioned the impending exertion and fatigues, with doubt and apprehension. His anxiety to return immediately to Epirus, determined him to adopt the measures for her rescue without loss of time, and on his third visit, he prepared her for making the great attempt on the ensuing morn. Hitherto Iskander had refrained from revealing himself to Iduna. He was induced to adopt this conduct by various considerations. He could no longer conceal from himself that the daughter of Hunniades exercised an influence over his feelings which he was unwilling to encourage. His sincere friendship for Nicæus, and his conviction that it was his present duty to concentrate all his thought and affection in the cause of his country, would have rendered him anxious to have resisted any emotions of the kind, even could he have flattered himself that there was any chance of their being returned by the object of his rising passion. But Iskander was as modest as he was brave and gifted. The disparity of age between himself and Iduna appeared an insuperable barrier to his hopes, even had there been no other obstacles Iskander struggled with his love, and with his strong mind the struggle, though painful, was not without success. He felt that he was acting in a manner which must ultimately tend to the advantage of his country, the happiness of his friend, and perhaps the maintenance of his own self-respect; for he had too much pride not to be very sensible to the bitterness of rejection.

Had he perceived more indications of a very cordial feeling subsisting between Nicæus and Iduna, he would, perhaps, not have persisted in maintaining his disguise. But he had long suspected that the passion of the Prince of Athens was not too favourably considered by the daughter of Hunniades, and he was therefore exceedingly anxious that Nicæus should possess all the credit of the present adventure, which Iskander scarcely doubted, if successful, would allow Nicæus to urge irresistible claims to the heart of a mistress whom he had rescued, at the peril of his life, from slavery and dishonour, to offer rank, reputation, and love. Iskander took, therefore, several opportunities of leading Iduna to believe that he was merely a confidential agent of Nicæus, and that the whole plan of her rescue from the seraglio of Adrianople had been planned by his young friend. In the mean time, during the three days on which they had for short intervals met, very few words had been interchanged between Nicæus and his mistress. Those words, indeed, had been to him of the most inspiring nature, and expressed such a deep sense of gratitude, and such lively regard, that Nicæus could no longer resist the delightful conviction that he had at length created a permanent interest in her heart. Often he longed to rush to her couch, and press her hand to his lips. Even the anticipation of future happiness could not prevent him from envying the good fortune of Iskander, who was allowed to converse with her without restraint; and bitterly, on their return to the khan, did he execrate the pompous eunuch for all the torture which he occasioned him by his silly conversation, and the petty tyranny of office with which Kaffis always repressed his attempts to converse for a moment with Iduna.

In the mean time all Adrianople sounded with the preparations for the immediate invasion of Epirus, and the return of Iskander to his country became each hour more urgent. Every thing being prepared, the adventurers determined on the fourth morning to attempt the rescue. They repaired as usual to the serail, and were attended by Kaffis to the chamber of the tower, who congratulated Iskander on their way on the rapid convalescence of the captive. When they had fairly entered the chamber, the physician being somewhat in advance, Nicæus, who was behind, commenced proceedings by knocking down the eunuch, and Iskander instantly turning round to his assistance, they succeeded in gagging and binding the alarmed and astonished Kaffis. Iduna then habited herself in a costume exactly similar to that worn by Nicæus, and which her friends had brought to her in their bag. Iskander and Iduna then immediately quitted the serail without notice or suspicion, and hurried to the khan, where they mounted their horses, that were in readiness, and hastened without a moment's loss of time to a fountain without the gates, where they awaited the arrival of Nicæus with anxiety. After remaining a few minutes in the chamber of the tower, the Prince of Athens stole out, taking care to secure the door upon Kaffis. He descended the staircase, and escaped through the serail without meeting any one, and had nearly reached the gate of the gardens, when he was challenged by some of the eunuch guard at a little distance.

"Hilloa!" exclaimed one, "I thought you passed just now!"

"So I did," replied Nicæus, with nervous effrontery; "but I came back for my bag, which I left behind," and giving them no time to reflect, he pushed his way through the gate with all the impudence of a page. He rushed through the burial ground, hurried through the streets, mounted his horse, and galloped through the gates. Iskander and Iduna were in sight, he waved his hand for them at once to proceed, and in a moment, without exchanging a word, they were all galloping at full speed, nor did they breathe their horses until sunset.

By nightfall they had reached a small wood of chestnut trees, where they rested for two hours, more for the sake of their steeds than their own refreshment, for anxiety prevented Iduna from indulging in any repose, as much as excitement prevented her from feeling any fatigue. Iskander lit a fire and prepared their rough meal, unharnessed the horses, and turned them out to their pasture. Nicæus made Iduna a couch of fern, and supported her head, while, in deference to his entreaties, she endeavoured in vain to sleep. Before midnight they were again on their way, and proceeded at a rapid pace towards the mountains, until a few hours before noon, when their horses began to sink under the united influence of their previous exertions and the increasing heat of the day. Iskander looked serious, and often threw a backward glance in the direction of Adrianople.

"We must be beyond pursuit," said Nicæus. "I dare say poor Kaffis is still gagged and bound."

"Could we but once reach the mountains," replied his companion, "I should have little fear, but I counted upon our steeds carrying us there without faltering. We cannot reckon upon more than three hours' start, prince. Our friend Kaffis is too important a personage to be long missed."

"The holy Virgin befriend us!" said the Lady Iduna. "I can urge my poor horse no more."

They had now ascended a small rising ground, which gave them a wide prospect over the plain. Iskander halted, and threw an anxious glance around him.

"There are some horsemen in the distance whom I do not like," said the physician.

"I see them," said Nicæus; "travellers like ourselves."

"Let us die sooner than be taken," said Iduna.

"Move on," said the physician, "and let me observe these horsemen alone. I would there were some forest at hand. In two hours we may gain the mountains."

The daughter of Hunniades and the Prince of Athens descended the rising ground. Before them, but at a considerable distance, was a broad and rapid river, crossed by a ruinous Roman bridge. The opposite bank of the river was the termination of a narrow plain, which led immediately to the mountains.

"Fair Iduna, you are safe," said the Prince of Athens.

"Dear Nicæus," replied his companion, "imagine what I feel. It is too wild a moment to express my gratitude."

"I trust that Iduna will never express her gratitude to Nicæus," answered the prince; "it is, not, I assure you, a favourite word with him."

Their companion rejoined them, urging his weary horse to its utmost speed.

"Nicæus!" he called out, "halt!"

They stopped their willing horses.

"How now!" my friend," said the prince; "you look grave!"

"Lady Iduna!" said the Armenian, "we are pursued."

Hitherto the prospect of success, and the consciousness of the terrible destiny that awaited failure, had supported Iduna under exertions which, under any other circumstances, must have proved fatal. But to learn, at the very moment that she was congratulating herself on the felicitous completion of their daring enterprise, that that dreaded failure was absolutely impending, demanded too great an exertion of her exhausted energies. She turned pale; she lifted up her imploring hands and eyes to heaven in speechless agony, and then bending down her head, wept with unrestrained and harrowing violence. The distracted Nicæus sprung from his horse, endeavoured to console the almost insensible Iduna, and then wofully glancing at his fellow-adventurer, wrung his hands in despair. His fellow-adventurer seemed lost in thought.

"They come," said Nicæus, starting; "methinks I see one on the brow of the hill. Away! fly! Let us at least die fighting. Dear, dear Iduna, would that my life could ransom thine. O God! this is indeed agony."

"Escape is impossible," said Iduna, in a tone of calmness which astonished them. "They must overtake us. Alas! brave friends, I have brought ye to this! Pardon me! pardon me! I am ashamed of my selfish grief. Ascribe it to other causes than a narrow spirit and a weak mind. One course is alone left to us. We must not be taken prisoners. Ye are warriors, and can die as such. I am only a woman, but I am the daughter of Hunniades. Nicæus, you are my father's friend; I beseech you, sheathe your dagger in my breast."

The prince in silent agony pressed his hands to his sight. His limbs quivered with terrible emotion. Suddenly he advanced and threw himself at the feet of his hitherto silent comrade. "O! Iskander!" exclaimed Nicæus, "great and glorious friend! my head and heart are both too weak for these awful trials—save her, save her!"

"Iskander!" exclaimed the thunderstruck Iduna. "Iskander!"

"I have, indeed, the misfortune to be Iskander, beloved lady," he replied. "This is, indeed, a case almost of desperation, but if I have to endure more than most men, I have, to inspire me, influences which fall to the lot of few—yourself and Epirus. Come! Nicæus, there is but one chance—we must gain the bridge." Thus speaking, Iskander caught Iduna in his arms, and remounting his steed, and followed by the Prince of Athens, hurried towards the river.

"The water is not fordable," said Iskander, when they had arrived at its bank. "The bridge I shall defend; and it will go hard if I do not keep them at bay long enough for you and Iduna to gain the mountains. Away; think no more of me; nay! no tear, dear lady, or you will unman me. An inspiring smile, and all will go well. Hasten to Croia, and let nothing tempt you to linger in the vicinity, with the hope of my again joining you. Believe me, we shall meet again, but act upon what I say, as if they were my dying words. God bless you, Nicæus! No murmuring. For once let the physician, indeed, command his page. Gentle lady, commend me to your father. Would I had such a daughter in Epirus, to head my trusty brethren if I fall! Tell the great Hunniades, my legacy to him is my country. Farewell, farewell!"

"I will not say farewell," exclaimed Iduna, "I too can fight. I will stay and die with you."

"See, they come! Believe me, I shall conquer. Fly, fly, thou noble girl! Guard her well, Nicæus. God bless thee, boy! Live and be happy. Nay, nay, not another word. The farther ye are both distant, trust me, the stronger will be my arm. Indeed, indeed, I do beseech ye, fly!"

Nicæus placed the weeping Iduna in her saddle, and after leading her horse over the narrow and broken bridge, mounted his own, and then they ascended together the hilly and winding track. Iskander watched them as they went. Often Iduna waved her kerchief to her forlorn champion. In the mean time Iskander tore off his Armenian robes and flung them into the river, tried his footing on the position he had taken up, stretched his limbs, examined his daggers, flourished his cimeter.

The bridge would only permit a single rider to pass abreast. It was supported by three arches, the centre one of very considerable size, the others small, and rising out of the shallow water on each side. In many parts the parapet wall was broken, in some even the pathway was almost impassable, from the masses of fallen stone and the dangerous fissures. In the centre of the middle arch was an immense key-stone, on which was sculptured, in high relief, an enormous helmet, which indeed gave among the people of the country, a title to the bridge.

A band of horsemen dashed at full speed, with a loud shout, down the hill. They checked their horses, when to their astonishment they found Iskander with his drawn cimeter, prepared to resist their passage. But they paused only for a moment, and immediately attempted to swim the river. But their exhausted horses drew back with a strong instinct from the rushing waters: one of the band alone, mounted on a magnificent black mare, succeeding in his purpose. The rider was halfway in the stream, his high-bred steed snorting and struggling in the strong current. Iskander, with the same ease as if he were plucking the ripe fruit from a tree, took up a ponderous stone, and hurled it with fatal precision at his adventurous enemy. The rider shrieked and fell, and rose no more: the mare, relieved from her burden, exerted all her failing energies, and succeeded in gaining the opposite bank. There, rolling herself in the welcome pasture, and neighing with a note of triumph, she revelled in her hard escape.

"Cut down the Giaour!" exclaimed one of the horsemen, and he dashed at the bridge. His fragile blade shivered into a thousand pieces as it crossed the cimeter of Iskander, and in a moment his bleeding head fell over the parapet.

Instantly the whole band, each emulous of revenging his comrades, rushed without thought at Iskander, and endeavoured to overpower him by their irresistible charge. His cimeter flashed like lightning. The two foremost of his enemies fell.

but the impulse of the numbers prevailed, and each instant, although dealing destruction with every blow, he felt himself losing ground. At length he was on the centre of the centre arch, an eminent position, which allowed him for a moment to keep them at bay, and gave him breathing-time. Suddenly he made a desperate charge, clove the head of the leader of the band in two, and beat them back several yards; then swiftly returning to his former position, he summoned all his supernatural strength, and stamping on the mighty, but mouldering key-stone, he forced it from its form, and broke the masonry of a thousand years. Amid a loud and awful shriek, horses and horsemen, and the dissolving fragments of the scene for a moment mingled, as it were, in airy chaos, and then plunged with a horrible splash into the fatal depths below. Some fell, and, stunned by the massy fragments, rose no more; others struggled again into light, and gained with difficulty their old shore. Amid them, Iskander, unhurt, swam like a river-god, and stabbed to the heart the only strong swimmer that was making his way in the direction of Epirus. Drenched and exhausted, Iskander at length stood upon the opposite margin, and wrang his garments, while he watched the scene of strange destruction.

Three or four exhausted wretches were lying bruised and breathless on the opposite bank: one drowned horse was stranded near them, caught by the rushes. Of all that brave company the rest had vanished, and the broad, and blue, and sunny waters rushed without a shadow beneath the two remaining arches.

"Iduna! thou art safe," exclaimed Iskander. "Now for Epirus!" So saying, he seized the black mare, renovated by her bath and pasture, and vaulting on her back, was in a few minutes bounding over his native hills.

XIII.

IN the mean time let us not forget the Prince of Athens and the Lady Iduna. These adventurous companions soon lost sight of their devoted champion, and entered a winding ravine, which gradually brought them to the summit of the first chain of the Epirot mountains. From it they looked down upon a vast and rocky valley, through which several mule tracks led in various directions, and entered the highest barrier of the mountains which rose before them, covered with forests of chestnut and ilex. Nicæus chose the track which he considered least tempting to pursuit, and towards sunset they had again entered a ravine washed by a mountain stream. The course of the waters had made the earth fertile and beautiful. Wild shrubs of gay and pleasant colours refreshed their wearied eyesight, and the perfumes of aromatic plants invigorated their jaded senses. Upon the bank, too, of the river, a large cross of roughly carved wood brought comfort to their Christian hearts, and while the holy emblem filled them with hope and consolation, and seemed an omen of refuge from their Moslem oppressors, a venerable eremite, with a long white beard descending over his dark robes, and leaning on a staff of thorn; came forth from an adjoining cavern to breathe the evening air and pour forth his evening orisons.

Iduna and Nicæus had hitherto prosecuted their sorrowful journey almost in silence. Exhausted with anxiety, affliction, and bodily fatigue, with difficulty the daughter of Hunniades could preserve her seat upon her steed. One thought alone interested her, and, by its engrossing influence, maintained her under all sufferings—the memory of Iskander. Since she first met him, at the extraordinary interview in her father's pavilion, often had the image of the hero recurred to her fancy, often had she mused over his great qualities and strange career. His fame, so dangerous to female hearts, was not diminished by his presence. And now, when Iduna recollected that she was indebted to him for all that she held dear, that she owed to his disinterested devotion, not only life, but all that renders life desirable,—honour and freedom, country and kindred,—that image was invested with associations and with sentiments, which, had Iskander himself been conscious of their existence, would have lent redoubled vigour to his arm, and fresh inspiration to his energy. More than once Iduna had been on the point of inquiring of Nicæus the reason which had induced alike him and Iskander to preserve so strictly the disguise of his companion. But a feeling which she did not choose to analyze, struggled successfully with her curiosity: she felt a reluctance to speak of Iskander to the Prince of Athens. In the mean time, Nicæus himself was not apparently very anxious of conversing upon the subject, and after the first rapid expressions of fear and hope as to the situation of their late comrade, they relapsed into silence, seldom broken by Nicæus, but to deplore the sufferings of his mistress,—lamentations which Iduna answered with a faint smile.

The refreshing scene wherein they had now entered, and the cheering appearance of the eremite were subjects of mutual congratulation, and Nicæus, somewhat advancing, claimed the attention of the holy man, announcing their faith, imprisonment, escape, and sufferings, and entreating hospitality and refuge. The eremite pointed with his staff to the winding path, which ascended the bank of the river to the cavern, and welcomed the pilgrims in the name of their blessed Saviour to his wild abode and simple fare.

The cavern widened when they entered, and comprised several small apartments. It was a work of the early Christians, who had found a refuge in their days of persecution, and art had completed the beneficent design of nature. The cavern was fresh, and sweet, and clean. Heaven smiled upon its pious inmate through an aperture in the roof; the floor was covered with rushes; in one niche rested a brazen cross, and in another a perpetual lamp burned before a picture, where Madonna smiled with meek tenderness upon her young divinity.

The eremite placed upon a block of wood, the surface of which he had himself smoothed, some honey, some dried fish, and a wooden bowl filled with the pure stream that flowed beneath them: a simple meal but welcome. His guests seated themselves upon a rushy couch, and while they refreshed themselves, he gently inquired the history of their adventures. As it was evident that the eremite, from her apparel, mistook the sex of Iduna, Nicæus thought fit not to deceive him, but passed her off as his brother. He described themselves as two Athenian youths, who had been captured while serving as volunteers under the great Hunniades, and who had effected their escape from Adrianople under circumstances of great peril and dificulty; and when he had gratified the eremite's curiosity respecting their Christian brethren in Paynim lands, and sympathetically marvelled with him at the advancing fortunes of the crescent, Nicæus, who perceived that Iduna stood in great need of rest, mentioned the fatigues of his more fragile brother, and requested permission for him to retire. Whereupon the eremite himself, fetching a load of fresh rushes, arranged them in one of the cells, and invited the fair Iduna to repose. The daughter of Hunniades, first humbling herself before the altar of the Virgin, and offering her gratitude for all the late mercies vouchsafed unto her, and then bidding a word of peace to her host and her companion, withdrew to her hard-earned couch, and soon was buried in a sleep as sweet and innocent as herself.

But repose fell not upon the eyelids of Nicæus in spite of all his labours. The heart of the Athenian prince was distracted by the two most powerful of passions—love and jealousy—and when the eremite, pointing out to his guest his allotted resting-place, himself retired to his regular and simple slumbers, Nicæus quitted the cavern, and standing upon the bank of the river, gazed in abstraction upon the rushing waters foaming in the moonlight. The Prince of Athens, with many admirable qualities, was one of those men who are influenced only by their passions, and who, in the affairs of life, are invariably guided by their imagination instead of their reason. At present all thought and feeling, all considerations, and all circumstances, merged in the overpowering love he entertained for Iduna, his determination to obtain her at all cost and peril, and his resolution that she should never again meet Iskander, except as the wife of Nicæus. Compared with this paramount object, the future seemed to vanish. The emancipation of his country, the welfare of his friend, even the maintenance of his holy creed, all those great and noble objects for which, under other circumstances, he would have been prepared to sacrifice his fortune and his life, no longer interested or influenced him; and while the legions of the crescent were on the point of pouring into Greece to crush that patriotic and Christian cause over which Iskander and himself had so often mused, whose interests the disinterested absence of Iskander, occasioned solely by his devotion to Nicæus, had certainly endangered, and, perhaps, could the events of the last few hours be known, even sacrificed, the Prince of Athens resolved, unless Iduna would consent to become his, at once to carry off the daughter of Hunniades to some distant country. Nor, indeed, even with his easily excited vanity, was Nicæus sanguine of obtaining his purpose by less violent means. He was already a rejected suitor, and under circumstances which scarcely had left hope. Nothing but the sole credit of her chivalric rescue could perhaps have obtained for him the interest in the heart of Iduna which he coveted. For while this exploit professed an irresistible claim to her deepest gratitude, it indicated also, on the part of her deliverer, the presence and possession of all those great qualities, the absence of which in the character and conduct of her suitor, Iduna had not, at a former period, endeavoured to conceal to be the principal cause of his rejection. And now, by the unhappy course of circumstances, the very deed on which he counted, with sanguine hope, as the sure means of his success, seemed as it were to have placed him in a still inferior situation than before. The constant society of his mistress had fanned the flame which, apart from her and hopeless, he had endeavoured to repress, to all its former force and ardour; while, on the other hand, he could not conceal from himself, that Iduna must feel that he had played in these great proceedings but a secondary part; that all the genius and all the generosity of the exploit rested with Iskander, who, after having obtained her freedom by so much energy, peril, sagacity, and skill, had secured it by a devoted courage which might shame all the knights of Christendom, perhaps, too, had secured it by his own life.

What if Iskander were no more? It was a great contingency. The eternal servitude of Greece, and the shameful triumph of the crescent, were involved, perhaps, in that single event. And could the possession of Iduna compensate for such disgrace and infamy? Let us not record the wild response of passion.

It was midnight ere the restless Nicæus, more exhausted by his agitating reverie, than by his previous exertions, returned into the cavern, and found refuge in sleep from all his disquietudes.

XIV.

THE eremite rose with the sun: and while he was yet at matins, was joined by Iduna, refreshed and cheerful after her unusual slumbers. After performing their devotions, her venerable host proposed that they should go forth and enjoy the morning air. So, descending the precipitous bank of the river, he led the way to a small glen, the bed of a tributary rivulet, now nearly exhausted. Beautiful clumps of birch trees, and tall thin poplars, rose on each side among the rocks, which were covered with bright mosses, and parasitical plants of gay and various colours. One side of the glen was touched with the golden and grateful beams of the rising sun, and the other was in deep shadow.

"Here you can enjoy nature and freedom in security," said the eremite; "for your enemies, if they have not already given up their pursuit, will scarcely search this sweet solitude."

"It is indeed sweet, holy father," said Iduna "but the captive, who has escaped from captivity, can alone feel all its sweetness."

"It is true," said the eremite; "I also have been a captive."

"Indeed! holy father. To the infidels?"

"To the infidels, gentle pilgrim."

"Have you been at Adrianople?"

"My oppressors were not the Paynim," replied the eremite, "but they were enemies far more dire—my own evil passions. Time was when my eye sparkled like thine, gentle pilgrim, and my heart was not as pure."

"God is merciful," said Iduna, "and without his aid, the strongest are but shadows."

"Ever think so," replied the eremite, "and you will deserve rather his love than his mercy. Thirty long years have I spent in this solitude, meditating upon the past, and it is a theme yet fertile in instruction. My hours are never heavy, and memory is to me what action is to other men."

"You have seen much, holy father?"

"And felt more. Yet you will perhaps think the result of all my experience very slight, for I can only say unto thee, Trust not in thyself."

"It is a great truth," remarked Iduna, "and leads to a higher one."

"Even so," replied the eremite. "We are full of wisdom in old age, as in winter this river is full of water, but the fire of youth, like the summer sun, dries up the stream."

Iduna did not reply. The eremite attracted her attention to a patch of cresses on the opposite bank of the stream. "Every morn I rise only to discover fresh instances of omnipotent benevolence," he exclaimed. "Yesterday ye tasted my honey and my fish. To-day I can offer ye a fresh dainty. We will break our fast in this pleasant glen. Rest thou here, gentle youth, and I will summon thy brother to our meal. I fear me much he does not bear so contented a spirit as thyself."

"He is older, and has seen more," replied Iduna.

The eremite shook his head, and leaning on his staff, returned to the cavern. Iduna remained seated on a mossy rock, listening to the awaking birds, and musing over the fate of Iskander. While she was indulging in this reverie, her name was called. She looked up with a blush, and beheld Nicæus.

"How fares my gentle comrade?" inquired the Prince of Athens.

"As well as I hope you are, dear Nicæus. We have been indeed fortunate in finding so kind a host."

"I think I may now congratulate you on your safety," said the prince. "This unfrequented pass will lead us in two days to Epirus, nor do I indeed now fear pursuit."

"Acts and not words must express in future how much we owe to you," said Iduna. "My joy would be complete if my father only knew of our safety, and if our late companion were here to share it."

"Fear not for my friend," replied Nicæus. "I have faith in the fortune of Iskander."

"If any one could succeed under such circumstances, he doubtless is the man," rejoined Iduna; "but it was indeed an awful crisis in his fate."

"Trust me, dear lady, it is wise to banish gloomy thoughts."

"We can give him only our thoughts," said Iduna, "and when we remember how much is dependent on his life, can they be cheerful?"

"Mine must be so, when I am in the presence of Iduna," replied Nicæus.

The daughter of Hunniades gathered moss from the rock and threw it into the stream.

"Dear lady," said the Prince of Athens, seating himself by her side, and stealing her gentle hand. "Pardon me if an irrepressible feeling at this moment impels me to recur to a subject, which, I would fain hope, were not so unpleasing to you, as once so unhappily you deemed it. O! Iduna, Iduna, best and dearest, we are once more together; once more I gaze upon that unrivalled form, and listen to the music of that matchless voice. I sought you, I perhaps violated my pledge, but I sought you in captivity and sorrow. Pardon me, pity me, Iduna! O! Iduna, if possible, love me!"

She turned away her head, she turned away her streaming eyes. "It is impossible not to love my deliverer," she replied, in a low and tremulous voice, "even could he not prefer the many other claims to affection which are possessed by the Prince of Athens. I was not prepared for this renewal of a most painful subject, perhaps under no circumstances; but least of all under those in which we now find ourselves.

"Alas!" exclaimed the prince; "I can no longer control my passion. My life, not my happiness merely, depends upon Iduna becoming mine. Bear with me, my beloved, bear with me! Were you Nicæus, you too would need forgiveness."

"I beseech you, cease!" exclaimed Iduna, in a firmer voice; and withdrawing her hand, she suddenly rose. "This is neither the time nor place for such conversation. I have not forgotten that, but a few days back, I was a hopeless captive, and that my life and fame are even now in danger. Great mercies have been vouchsafed to me; but still I perhaps need the hourly interposition of heavenly aid. Other than such worldly thoughts should fill my mind, and do. Dear Nicæus," she continued, in a more soothing tone, "you have nobly commenced a most heroic enterprise; fulfil it in like spirit."

He would have replied; but at this moment, the staff of the eremite sounded among the rocks. Baffled, and dark with rage and passion, the Prince of Athens quitted Iduna, and strolled towards the upper part of the glen, to conceal his anger and disappointment.

"Eat, gentle youth," said the eremite.

"Will not thy brother join us? What may be his name?"

"Nicæus, holy father."

"And thine?"

Iduna blushed and hesitated. At length, in her confusion, she replied "Iskander."

"Nicæus!" called out the eremite, "Iskander and myself await thee!"

Iduna trembled. She was agreeably surprised when the prince returned with a smiling countenance, and joined in the meal, with many cheerful words.

"Now, I propose," said the eremite, "that yourself and your brother Iskander should tarry with me some days, if, indeed, my simple fare have any temptation."

"I thank thee, holy father," replied Nicæus, "but our affairs are urgent; nor indeed could I have tarried here at all, had it not been for my young Iskander here, who, as you may easily believe, is little accustomed to his late exertions. But, indeed, towards sunset, we must proceed."

"Bearing with us," added Iduna, "a most grateful recollection of our host."

"God be with ye, wherever ye may proceed," replied the eremite.

"My trust is indeed in him," rejoined Iduna.

XV.

AND so, two hours before sunset, mounting their refreshed horses, Nicæus and Iduna quitted, with many kind words, the cavern of the eremite, and took their way along the winding of the river. Throughout the moonlit night they travelled, ascending the last and highest chain of mountains, and reaching the summit by dawn. The cheerful light of morning revealed to them the happy plains of a Christian country. With joyful spirits they descended into fertile land, and stopped at a beautiful Greek village, embowered in orchards and groves of olive trees.

The Prince of Athens instantly inquired for the primate, or chief personage of the village, and was conducted to his house; but its master, he was informed, was without, supervising the commencement of the vintage. Leaving Iduna with the family of the primate, Nicæus went in search of him. The vineyard was full of groups, busied in the most elegant and joyous of human occupations, gathering, with infinite bursts of merriment, the harvest of the vine. Some mounted on ladders, fixed against the festooning branches, plucked the rich bunches, and threw them below, where girls, singing in chorus, caught them in panniers, or their extended drapery. In the centre of the vineyard, a middle-aged man watched with a calm, but vigilant eye, the whole proceedings, and occasionally stimulated the indolent, or prompted the inexperienced.

"Christo!" said the Prince of Athens, when he had approached him. The primate turned round, but evidently did not immediately recognise the person who addressed him.

"I see," continued the prince, "that my meditated caution was unnecessary. My strange garb is a sufficient disguise."

"The Prince Nicæus!" exclaimed the primate. "He is, indeed, disguised, but will, I am sure, pardon his faithful servant."

"Not a word, Christo!" replied the prince. "To be brief. I have crossed the mountains from Roumelia, and have only within this hour recognised the spot whither I have chanced to arrive. I have a companion with me. I would not be known. You comprehend! Affairs of state. I take it for granted that there are none here who will recognise me, after three years' absence, in this dress."

"You may feel secure, my lord," replied Christo. "If you puzzled me, who have known you since you were no bigger than this bunch of grapes, you will quite confound the rest."

"'Tis well. I shall stay here a day or two, in order to give them an opportunity to prepare for my reception. In the mean time, it is necessary to send on a courier at once. You must manage all this for me, Christo. How are your daughters?"

"So, so, please your highness," replied Christo. "A man with seven daughters has got trouble for every day in the week."

"But not when they are as pretty as yours are?"

"Poh! poh! Handsome is that handsome does; and as for Alexina, she wants to be married."

"Very natural. Let her marry, by all means."

"But Helena wants to do the same."

"More natural still; for, if possible, she is prettier. For my part, I could marry them both."

"Ay, ay! that is all very well; but handsome is that handsome does. I have no objection to Alexina marrying, and even Helena; but then there is Lais——"

"Hah! hah! hah!" exclaimed the prince. "I see, my dear Christo, that my foster sisters give you a proper portion of trouble. However, I must be off to my travelling companion. Come in as soon as you can, my dear fellow, and we will settle every thing. A good vintage to you, and only as much mischief as is necessary." So saying, the prince tripped away.

"Well! who would have thought of seeing him here!" exclaimed the worthy primate. "The same gay dog as ever! What can he have been doing in Roumelia! Affairs of state, indeed! I'll wager my new epiphany scarf, that, whatever the affairs are, there is a pretty girl in the case."

XVI.

THE fair Iduna, after all her perils and sufferings, was at length sheltered in safety under a kind and domestic roof. Alexina, and Helena, and Lais, and all the other sisters emulated each other in the attentions which they lavished upon the two brothers, but especially the youngest. Their kindness, indeed, was only equalled by their ceaseless curiosity, and had they ever waited for the answers of Iduna to their questions, the daughter of Hunniades might, perhaps, have been somewhat puzzled to reconcile her responses with probability. Helena answered the questions of Alexina: Lais anticipated even Helena. All that Iduna had to do, was to smile and be silent, and it was universally agreed that Iskander was singularly shy as well as excessively handsome. In the mean time, when Nicæus met Iduna in the evening of the second day of their visit, he informed her that he had been so fortunate as to resume an acquaintance with an old companion in arms in the person of a neighbouring noble, who had invited them to rest at his castle at the end of their next day's journey. He told her likewise that he had despatched a courier to Croia to inquire after Iskander, who, he expected, in the course of a very few days, would bring them intelligence to guide their future movements, and decide whether they should at once proceed to the capital of Epirus, or advance into Bulgaria, in case Hunniades was still in the field. On the morrow, therefore, they proceeded on their journey. Nicæus had procured a litter for Iduna, for which her delicate health was an excuse to Alexina and her sisters, and they were attended by a small body of well-armed cavalry, for, according to the accounts which Nicæus had received, the country was still disturbed. They departed at break of day, Nicæus riding by the side of the litter, and occasionally making the most anxious inquiries after the well-being of his fair charge. An hour after noon they rested at a well, surrounded by olive trees, until the extreme heat was somewhat allayed: and then remounting, proceeded in the direction of an undulating ridge of green hills, that partially intersected the wide plain. Towards sunset the Prince of Athens withdrew the curtains of the litter, and called the attention of Iduna to a very fair castle, rising on a fertile eminence and sparkling in the quivering beams of dying light.

"I fear," said Nicæus, "that my friend Justinian will scarcely have returned, but we are old comrades, and he desired me to act as his seneschal. For your sake I am sorry, Iduna, for I feel convinced that he would please you."

"It is, indeed, a fair castle," replied Iduna, "and none but a true knight deserves such a noble residence."

While she spoke, the commander of the escort sounded his bugle, and they commenced the ascent of the steep, a winding road, cut through a thick wood of evergreen shrubs. The gradual and easy ascent soon brought them to a portal flanked with towers, which admitted them into the outworks of the fortification. Here they found several soldiers on guard, and the commander again sounding his bugle, the gates of the castle opened, and the seneschal, attended by a suite of many domestics, advanced and welcomed Nicæus and Iduna. The Prince of Athens dismounting, assisted his fair companion from the litter, and leading her by the hand, and preceded by the seneschal, entered the castle.

They passed through a magnificent hall, hung with choice armour, and ascending a staircase, of Pentelic marble, were ushered into a suite of lofty chambers, lined with oriental tapestry, and furnished with many costly couches and cabinets. While they admired a spectacle so different to any thing they had recently beheld or experienced, the seneschal, followed by a number of slaves in splendid attire, advanced and offered them rare and choice refreshments, coffee and confectionary, sherbets and spiced wines. When they had partaken of this elegant cheer, Nicæus intimated to the seneschal that the Lady Iduna might probably wish to retire, and instantly a discreet matron, followed by six most beautiful girls, each bearing a fragrant torch of cinnamon and roses, advanced and offered to conduct the Lady Iduna to her apartments.

The matron and her company of maidens conducted the daughter of Hunniades down a long gallery, which led to a suite of the prettiest chambers in the world. The first was an antechamber, painted like a bower, but filled with the music of living birds; the second, which was much larger, was entirely covered with Venetian mirrors, and resting on a bright Persian carpet, were many couches of crimson velvet, covered with a variety of sumptuous dresses; the third room was a bath, made in the semblance of a gigantic shell. Its roof was of transparent alabaster, glowing with shadowy light.

XVII.

A flourish of trumpets announced the return of the Lady Iduna, and the Prince of Athens, magnificently attired, came forward with a smile and led her, with a compliment on her resuming the dress of her sex, if not of her country, to the banquet. Iduna was not uninfluenced by that excitement which is insensibly produced by a sudden change of scene and circumstances, and especially by an unexpected transition from hardship, peril, and suffering, to luxury, security, and enjoyment. Their spirits were elevated and gay: she smiled upon Nicæus with a cheerful sympathy. They feasted, they listened to sweet music, they talked over their late adventures, and animated by their own enjoyment, they became more sanguine as to the fate of Iskander.

"In two or three days we shall know more," said Nicæus. "In the mean time, rest is absolutely necessary to you. It is only now that you will begin to be sensible of the exertion you have made. If Iskander be at Croia, he has already informed your father of your escape; if he have not arrived, I have arranged that a courier shall be despatched to Hunniades from that city. Do not be anxious. Fry to be happy. I am myself sanguine that you will find all well. Come, pledge me your father's health, fair lady, in this goblet of Tenedos!"

"How know I that at this moment he may not be at the point of death?" replied Iduna. "When I am absent from those I love, I dream only of their unhappiness."

"At this moment also," rejoined Nicæus, "he dreams perhaps of your imprisonment among barbarians. Yet how mistaken! Let that consideration support you. Come! here is to the hermite."

"As willing, if not as sumptuous a host as our present one," said Iduna; and when, by-the-by, do you think that your friend, the Lord Justinian, will arrive?"

"O! never mind him," said Nicæus. "He would have arrived to-morrow, but the great news which I gave him has probably changed his plans. I told him of the approaching invasion, and he has perhaps found it necessary to visit the neighbouring chieftains, or even to go on to Croia."

"Well-a-day!" exclaimed Iduna, "I would we were in my father's camp!"

"We shall soon be there, dear lady," replied the prince. "Come, worthy seneschal," he added, turning to that functionary, "drink to this noble lady's happy meeting with her friends."

XVIII.

THREE or four days passed away at the castle of Justinian, in which Nicæus used his utmost exertions to divert the anxiety of Iduna. One day was spent in examining the castle, on another he amused her with a hawking-party, on a third he carried her to the neighbouring ruins of a temple, and read his favourite Æschylus to her amid its lone and elegant columns. It was impossible for any one to be more amiable and entertaining, and Iduna could not resist from recognising his many virtues and accomplishments. The courier had not yet returned from Croia, which Nicæus accounted for by many satisfactory reasons. The suspense, however, at length became so painful to Iduna, that she proposed to the Prince of Athens that they should, without further delay, proceed to that city. As usual, Nicæus was not wanting in many plausible arguments in favour of their remaining at the castle, but Iduna was resolute.

"Indeed, dear Nicæus," she said, "my anxiety to see my father, or hear from him, is so great, that there is scarcely any danger which I would not encounter to gratify my wish. I feel that I have already taxed your endurance too much. But we are no longer in a hostile land, and guards and guides are to be engaged. Let me then depart alone!"

"Iduna!" exclaimed Nicæus, reproachfully "Alas! Iduna, you are cruel, but I did not expect this!"

"Dear Nicæus!" she answered, "you always misinterpret me! It would infinitely delight me to be restored to Hunniades by yourself, but these are no common times, and you are no common person. You forget that there is one that has greater claims upon you even than a forlorn maiden—your country. And whether Iskander be at Croia or not, Greece requires the presence and exertions of the Prince of Athens."

"I have no country," replied Nicæus, mournfully, "and no object for which to exert myself."

"Nicæus! Is this the poetic patriot who was yesterday envying Themistocles!"

"Alas! Iduna, yesterday you were my muse. I do not wonder you are wearied of this castle," continued the prince, in a melancholy tone. "This spot contains nothing to interest you; but for me, it holds all that is dear, and—O! gentle maiden, one smile from you, one smile of inspiration, and I would not envy Themistocles, and might perhaps rival him."

They were walking together in the hall of the castle; Iduna stepped aside and affected to eva mine a curious buckler. Nicæus followed her, and placing his arm gently in hers, led her away.

"Dearest Iduna," he said, "pardon me, but men struggle for their fate. Mine is in your power. It is a contest between misery and happiness, glory and perhaps infamy. Do not then wonder that I will not yield my chance of the brighter fortune without an effort. Once more I appeal to your pity if not to your love. Were Iduna mine, were she to hold out but the possibility of her being mine, there is no career—solemnly I avow what solemnly I feel—there is no career of which I could not be capable, and no conditions to which I would not willingly subscribe. But this certainty, or this contingency, I must have: I cannot exist without the alternative. And now, upon my knees, I implore her to grant it to me!"

"Nicæus," said Iduna, "this continued recurrence to a forbidden subject is most ungenerous."

"Alas! Iduna, my life depends upon a word, which you will not speak, and you talk of generosity! No! Iduna, it is not I that am ungenerous."

"Let me say then unreasonable, Prince Nicæus."

"Say what you like, Iduna, provided you say that you are mine."

"Pardon me, sir; I am free."

"Free! You have ever underrated me, Iduna. To whom do you owe this boasted freedom?"

"This is not the first time," remarked Iduna, "that you have reminded me of an obligation, the memory of which is indelibly impressed upon my heart, and for which even the present conversation cannot make me feel less grateful. I can never forget that I owe all that is dear to yourself and your companion."

"My companion!" replied the Prince of Athens, pale and passionate. "My companion! Am I ever to be reminded of my companion?"

"Nicæus!" said Iduna; "if you forget what is due to me, at least endeavour to remember what is due to yourself!"

"Beautiful being!" said the prince, advancing and passionately seizing her hand; "pardon me!—pardon me! I am not master of my reason; I am nothing, I am nothing while Iduna hesitates."

"She does not hesitate, Nicæus. I desire—I require that this conversation shall cease—shall never, never be renewed."

"And I tell thee, haughty woman," said the Prince of Athens, grinding his teeth, and speaking with violent action, "that I will no longer be despised with impunity. Iduna is mine, or is no one else's."

"Is it possible!" exclaimed the daughter of Hunniades. "Is it indeed come to this? But why am I surprised? I have long known Nicæus. I quit this castle instantly."

"You are a prisoner," replied the prince, very calmly, and leaning with folded arms against the wall.

"A prisoner!" exclaimed Iduna, a little alarmed—"A prisoner! I defy you, sir. You are only a guest like myself. I will appeal to the seneschal in the absence of his lord. He will never permit the honour of his master's flag to be violated by the irrational caprice of a passionate boy."

"What lord?" inquired Nicæus.

"Your friend, the Lord Justinian," answered Iduna. "He could little anticipate such an abuse of his hospitality."

"My friend, the Lord Justinian!" replied Nicæus, with a malignant smile. "I am surprised that a personage of the Lady Iduna's deep discrimination should so easily be deceived by 'a passionate boy!' Is it possible that you could have supposed for a moment that there was any other lord of this castle, save your devoted slave?"

"What!" exclaimed Iduna, really frightened.

"I have indeed the honour of finding the Lady Iduna my guest," continued Nicæus, in a tone of bitter raillery. "This castle of Kallista, the fairest in all Epirus, I inherit from my mother. Of late I have seldom visited it; but indeed it will become a favourite residence of mine, if it be, as I anticipate, the scene of my nuptial ceremony."

Iduna looked around her with astonishment, then threw herself upon a couch, and burst into tears. The Prince of Athens walked up and down the hall with an air of determined coolness.

"Perfidious!" exclaimed Iduna between her sobs.

"Lady Iduna," said the prince, and he seated himself by her side. "I will not attempt to palliate a deception which your charms could alone inspire and can alone justify. Hear me, Lady Iduna, hear me with calmness. I love you; I love with a passion which has been as constant as it is strong. My birth, my rank, my fortunes, do not disqualify me for a union with the daughter of the great Hunniades. If my personal claims may sink in comparison with her surpassing excellence, I am yet to learn that any other prince in Christendom can urge a more effective plea. I am young; the ladies of the court have called me handsome; by your great father's side I have broken some lances in your honour; and even Iduna once confessed she thought me clever. Come, come, be merciful! Let my beautiful Athens receive a fitting mistress. A holy father is in readiness, dear maiden. Come now, one smile! In a few days we shall reach your father's camp, and then we will kneel, as I do now, and beg a blessing on our happy union." As he spoke, he dropped upon his knee, and stealing her hand, looked into her face. It was sorrowful and gloomy.

"It is vain, Nicæus," said Iduna, "to appeal to your generosity; it is useless to talk of the past; it is idle to reproach you for the present. I am a woman, alone and persecuted, where I could least anticipate persecution. Nicæus. I never can be yours; and now I deliver myself to the mercy of Almighty God."

"Tis well," replied Nicæus. "From the tower of the castle you may behold the waves of the Ionian sea. You will remain here a close prisoner, until one of my galleys arrives from Piræus, to bear us to Italy. Mine you must be, Iduna. It remains for you to decide under what circumstances. Continue in your obstinacy, and you may bid farewell for ever to your country and to your father. Be reasonable, and a destiny awaits you which offers every thing that has hitherto been considered the source or cause of happiness." Thus speaking, the prince retired, leaving Lady Iduna to her own unhappy thoughts.

XL.

THE Lady Iduna was at first inclined to view the conduct of the Prince of Athens as one of those passionate and passing ebullitions in which her long acquaintance with him had taught her he was accustomed to indulge. But when on retiring soon after to her apartments, she was informed by her attendant matron that she must in future consider herself a prisoner, and not venture again to quit them without permission, she began to tremble at the possible violence of an ill-regulated mind. She endeavoured to interest her attendant in her behalf; but the matron was too well schooled to evince any feeling or express any opinion on the subject; and indeed, at length, fairly informed Iduna that she was commanded to confine her conversation to the duties of her office.

The Lady Iduna was very unhappy. She thought of her father, she thought of Iskander. The past seemed a dream; she was often tempted to believe that she was still, and had ever been, a prisoner in the serail of Adrianople; and that all the late wonderful incidents of her life were but the shifting scenes of some wild slumber. And then some slight incident, the sound of a bell, or the sight of some holy emblem, assured her she was in a Christian land, and convinced her of the strange truth that she was indeed in captivity, and a prisoner, above all others, to the fond companion of her youth. Her indignation at the conduct of Nicæus roused her courage; she resolved to make an effort to escape. Her rooms were only lighted from above; she determined to steal forth at night into the gallery; the door was secured. She hastened back to her chamber in fear and sorrow, and wept.

Twice in the course of the day the stern and silent matron visited Iduna with her food; and as she retired, secured the door. This was the only individual that the imprisoned lady ever beheld. And thus heavily rolled on upwards of a week. On the eve of the ninth day, Iduna was surprised by the matron presenting her a letter as she quitted the chamber for the night. Iduna seized it with a feeling of curiosity not unmingled with pleasure. It was the only incident that had occurred during her captivity. She recognised the handwriting of Nicæus, and threw it down with vexation at her silliness in supposing, for a moment, that the matron could have been the emissary of any other person.

Yet the letter must be read, and at length she opened it. It informed her that a ship had arrived from Athens at the coast, and that to-morrow she must depart for Italy. It told her also, that the Turks, under Mahomed, had invaded Albania; and that the Hungarians under the command of her father, had come to support the cross. It said nothing of Iskander. But it reminded her that little more than the same time that would carry her to the coast to embark for a foreign land, would, were she wise, alike enable Nicæus to place her in her father's arms, and allow him to join in the great struggle for his country and his creed. The letter was written with firmness, but tenderly. It left, however, on the mind of Iduna, an impression of the desperate resolution of the writer.

Now it so happened that as this unhappy lady jumped from her couch, and paced the room in the perturbation of her mind, the wind of her drapery extinguished her lamp. As her attendant or jailer, had paid her last visit for the day, there seemed little chance of its being again illumined. The miserable are always more unhappy in the dark. Light is the greatest of comforters. And this little misfortune seemed to the forlorn Iduna almost overwhelming. And as she attempted to look around, and wrung her hands in very wo, her attention was attracted by a brilliant streak of light upon the wall, which greatly surprised her. She groped her way in its direction, and slowly stretching forth her hand, observed that it made its way through a chink in the frame of one of the great mirrors which were inlaid in the wall. As she pressed the frame, she felt to her surprise that it sprang forward. Had she not been very cautious the advancing mirror would have struck her with great force, but she had presence of mind to withdraw her hand very gradually, repressing the swiftness of the spring. The aperture occasioned by the opening of the mirror consisted of a recess, formed by a closed up window. An old wooden shutter, or blind, in so ruinous a state, that the light freely made its way, was the only barrier against the elements. Iduna seized the handle which remained, at once drew it open with little difficulty.

The captive gazed with gladdened feelings upon the free and beautiful scene. Beneath her rose the rich and aromatic shrubs tinged with the soft and silver light of eve: before her extended the wide and fertile champaign, skirted by the dark and undulating mountains: in the clear sky, glittering and sharp, sparkled the first crescent of the new moon, an auspicious omen to the Moslem invaders.

Iduna gazed with joy upon the landscape, and then hastily descending from the recess, she placed her hands to her eyes, so long unaccustomed to the light. Perhaps, too, she indulged in momentary meditation. For suddenly seizing a number of shawls which were lying on the couches, she knotted them together, and then striving with all her force, she placed the heaviest couch on one end of the costly cord, and then throwing the other out of the window, and intrusting herself to the merciful care of the holy Virgin, the brave daughter of Humniades successfully dropped down into the garden below.

She stopped to breathe, and to revel in her emancipated existence. It was a bold enterprise gallantly achieved. But the danger had now only commenced. She found that she had lighted at the back of the castle. She stole along upon tip-toe, timid as a fawn. She remembered a small wicket-gate that led into the open country. She arrived at it. It was of course guarded. The single sentinel was kneeling before an image of St. George beside him was an empty drinking-cup and an exhausted wine-skin.

"Holy saint!" exclaimed the pious sentinel, "preserve us from all Turkish infidels!" Iduna stole behind him. "Shall men who drink no wine conquer true Christians!" continued the sentinel. Iduna placed her hand upon the lock. "We thank thee for our good vintage," said the sentinel. Iduna opened the gate with the noiseless touch which a feminine finger alone can command. "And for the rise of Lord Iskander!" added the sentinel. Iduna escaped!

Now she indeed was free. Swiftly she ran over the wide plain. She hoped to reach some town or village before her escape could be discovered, and she hurried on for three hours without resting. She came to a beautiful grove of olive trees that spread in extensive ramifications about the plain. And through this beautiful grove of olive trees her path seemed to lead. So she entered and advanced. And when she had journeyed for about a mile, she came to an open and very verdant piece of ground, which was, as it were, the heart of the grove. In its centre rose a fair and antique structure of white marble, shrouding from the noonday sun the perennial flow of a very famous fountain. It was near on midnight. Iduna was wearied, and she sat down upon the steps of the fountain for rest. And while she was musing over all the strange adventures of her life, she heard a rustling in the wood, and being alarmed, she rose and hid herself behind a tree.

And while she stood there, with palpitating heart, the figure of a man advanced to the fountain from an opposite direction of the grove. He went up the steps, and looked down upon the spring as if he were about to drink, but instead of doing that, he drew his cimeter and plunged it into the water, and called out with a loud voice the name of "Iskander!" three times. Whereupon Iduna, actuated by an irresistible impulse, came forward from her hiding-place, but instantly gave a loud shriek when she beheld—the Prince Mahomed!

"O! night of glory!" exclaimed the prince, advancing, "Do I indeed behold the fair Iduna! This is truly magic!"

"Away! away!" exclaimed the distracted Iduna, as she endeavoured to fly from him.

"He has kept his word, that cunning leech, better than I expected," said Mahomed, seizing her.

"As well as you deserve, ravisher!" exclaimed a majestic voice. A tall figure rushed forward from the wood and dashed back the Turk.

"I am here to complete my contract, Prince Mahomed," said the stranger, drawing his sword.

"Iskander!" exclaimed the prince.

"We have met before, prince. Let us so act now that we may meet for the last time."

"Infamous, infernal traitor," exclaimed Mahomed, "dost thou, indeed, imagine that I will sully my imperial blade with the blood of my runaway slave! No! I came here to secure thy punishment, but I cannot condescend to become thy punisher. Advance, guards, and seize him! Seize them both!"

Iduna flew to Iskander, who caught her in one arm, while he waved his cimeter with the other. The guards of Mahomed poured forth from the side of the grove whence the prince had issued.

"And dost thou, indeed, think, Mahomed," said Iskander, "that I have been educated in the seraglio to be duped by Moslem craft? I offer thee single combat if thou desirest it, but combat as we may, the struggle shall be equal." He whistled, and instantly a body of Hungarians, headed by Hunniades himself, advanced from the side of the grove whence Iskander had issued.

"Come on, then," said Mahomed; "each to his man." Their swords clashed, but the principal attendants of the son of Amurath, deeming the affair, under the present circumstances, assumed the character of a mere rash adventure, bore away the Turkish prince.

"To-morrow, then, this fray shall be decided, on the plains of Kallista," said Mahomed.

"Epirus is prepared," replied Iskander.

The Turks withdrew. Iskander bore the senseless form of Iduna to her father. Hunniades embraced his long lost child. They sprinkled her face with water from the fountain. She revived.

"Where is Nicaeus," inquired Iskander; "and how came you again, dear lady, in the power of Mahomed?"

"Alas! noble sir, my twice deliverer," answered Iduna, "I have, indeed, again been doomed to captivity, but my persecutor, I blush to say, was this time a Christian prince."

"Holy Virgin!" exclaimed Iskander. "Who can this villain be?"

"The villain, Lord Iskander, is your friend; and your pupil, dear father."

"Nicaeus of Athens!" exclaimed Hunniades.

Iskander was silent and melancholy.

Thereupon the Lady Iduna recounted to her father and Iskander, sitting between them on the margin of the fount, all that had occurred to her, since herself and Nicaeus parted with Iskander; nor did she omit to relate to Hunniades all the devotion of Iskander, respecting which, like a truly brave man, he had himself been silent. The great Hunniades scarcely knew which rather to do, to lavish his affection on his beloved child, or his gratitude upon Iskander. Thus they went on conversing for some time, Iskander placing his own cloak around Iduna, and almost unconsciously winding his arm around her unresisting form.

Just as they were preparing to return to the Christian camp, a great noise was heard in the grove, and presently, in the direction whence Iduna had arrived, there came a band of men, bearing torches and examining the grove in all directions in great agitation. Iskander and Hunniades stood upon their guard, but soon perceived they were Greeks. Their leader, seeing a group near the fountain, advanced to make inquiries respecting the object of his search, but when he indeed recognised the persons who formed the group, the torch fell from his grasp, and he turned away his head and hid his face in his hands.

Iduna clung to her father; Iskander stood with his eyes fixed upon the ground, but Hunniades, stern and terrible, disembarassing himself of the grasp of his daughter, advanced and laid his hand upon the stranger.

"Young man," said the noble father, "were it contrition instead of shame that inspired this attitude, it might be better. I have often warned you of the fatal consequences of a reckless indulgence of the passions. More than once I have predicted to you, that however great might be your confidence in your ingenuity and your resources, the hour would arrive when such a career would place you in a position as despicable as it was shameful. That hour has arrived, and that position is now filled by the Prince of Athens. You stand before the three individuals in this world whom you have most injured, and whom you were most bound to love and to protect. Here is a friend, who has hazarded his property and his existence for your life and your happiness. And you have made him a mere pander to your lusts, and then deserted him in his greatest necessities. This maiden was the companion of your youth, and entitled to your kindest offices. You have treated her infinitely worse than her Turkish captor. And for myself, sir, your father was my dearest friend. I endeavoured to repay his friendship by supplying his place to his orphan child. How I discharged my duty, it becomes not me to say: how you have discharged yours, this lady here, my daughter, your late prisoner, sir, can best prove."

"O! spare me, spare me, sir," said the Prince of Athens, turning and falling upon his knee. "I am most wretched. Every word cuts to my very core Just Providence has baffled all my arts, and I am grateful. Whether this lady can, indeed, forgive me, I hardly dare to think, or even hope. And yet forgiveness is a heavenly boon. Perhaps the memory of old days may melt her. As for yourself, sir—but I'll not speak, I cannot. Noble Iskander, if I mistake not, you may whisper words in that fair ear, less grating than my own. May you be happy! I will not profane your prospects with my vows. And yet I'll say farewell!"

The Prince of Athens turned away with an air of complete wretchedness, and slowly withdrew. Iskander followed him.

"Nicæus," said Iskander; but the prince entered the grove, and did not turn round.

"Dear Nicæus," said Iskander. The prince hesitated.

"Let us not part thus," said Iskander. "Iduna is most unhappy. She bade me tell you she had forgotten all."

"God bless her, and God bless you too!" replied Nicæus. "I pray you let me go."

"Nay! dear Nicæus, are we not friends?"

"The best and truest, Iskander. I will to the camp, and meet you in your tent ere morning break. At present, I would be alone."

"Dear Nicæus, one word. You have said upon one point, what I could well wish unsaid, and dared to prophesy what may never happen. I am not made for such supreme felicity. Epirus is my mistress, my Nicæus. As there is a living God, my friend, most solemnly I vow, I have had no thoughts in this affair, but for your honour."

"I know it, my dear friend, I know it," replied Nicæus. "I keenly feel your admirable worth. Say no more, say no more! She is a fit wife for a hero, and you are one!"

XX.

AFTER the battle of the bridge, Iskander had hurried to Croia without delay. In his progress, he had made many fruitless inquiries after Iduna and Nicæus, but he consoled himself for the unsatisfactory answers he received by the opinion that they had taken a different course, and the conviction that all must now be safe. The messenger from Croia that informed Hunniades of the escape of his daughter, also solicited his aid in favour of Epirus against the impending invasion of the Turks, and stimulated by personal gratitude as well as by public duty, Hunniades answered the solicitation in person, at the head of twenty thousand lances.

Hunniades and Iskander had mutually flattered themselves when apart, that each would be able to quell the anxiety of the other on the subject of Iduna. The leader of Epirus flattered himself that his late companions had proceeded at once to Transylvania, and the vaivode himself had indulged in the delightful hope that the first person he should embrace at Croia would be his long-lost child. When, therefore, they met, and were mutually incapable of imparting any information on the subject to each other, they were filled with astonishment and disquietude. Events, however, gave them little opportunity to indulge in anxiety or grief. On the day that Hunniades and his lances arrived at Croia, the invading army of the Turks under the Prince Mahomed crossed the mountains, and soon after pitched their camp on the fertile plain of Kallista.

As Iskander, by the aid of Hunniades and the neighbouring princes, and the patriotic exertions of his countrymen, was at this moment at the head of a force which the Turkish prince could not have anticipated, he resolved to march at once to meet the Ottomans, and decide the fate of Greece by a pitched battle.

The night before the arrival of Iduna at the famous fountain, the Christian army had taken up its position within a few miles of the Turks. The turbaned warriors wished to delay the engagement until the new moon, the eve of which was at hand. And it happened on that said eve that Iskander, calling to mind his contract with the Turkish prince made in the gardens of the seraglio at Adrianople, and believing from the superstitious character of Mahomed that he would not fail to be at the appointed spot, resolved, as we have seen, to repair to the fountain of Kallista.

And now from that fountain the hero retired, bearing with him a prize scarcely less precious than the freedom of the country, for which he was to combat on the morrow's morn.

Ere the dawn had broken, the Christian power was in motion. Iskander commanded the centre, Hunniades the right wing. The left was intrusted at his urgent request to the Prince of Athens. A mist that hung about the plain, allowed Nicæus to charge the right wing of the Turks almost unperceived. He charged with irresistible fury, and soon disordered the ranks of the Moslem. Mahomed with the reserve hastened to their aid. A mighty multitude of janissaries, shouting the name of Allah and his prophet, penetrated the Christian centre. Hunniades endeavoured to attack them on their flank, but was himself charged by the Turkish cavalry. The battle was now general, and raged with terrible fury. Iskander had secreted in his centre a new and powerful battery of cannon, presented to him by the pope, and which had just arrived from Venice. This battery played upon the janissaries with great destruction. He himself mowed them down with his irresistible cimeter.

Infinite was the slaughter! awful the uproar! But of all the Christian knights, this day, no one performed such mighty feats of arms as the Prince of Athens. With a reckless desperation, he dashed about the field, and every thing seemed to yield to his inspiring impulse. His example animated his men with such a degree of enthusiasm, that the division to which he was opposed, although encouraged by the presence of Mahomed himself, could no longer withstand the desperate courage of the Christians, and they fled in all directions. Then, rushing to the aid of Iskander, Nicæus, at the head of a body of picked men, dashed upon the rear of the janissaries, and nearly surrounded them. Hunniades instantly made a fresh charge upon the left wing of the Turks. A panic fell upon the Moslem, who were little prepared for such a demonstration of strength on the part of their adversaries. In a few minutes their order seemed generally broken, and their leaders in vain endeavoured to rally them. Waving his bloody cimeter, and bounding on his black charger, Iskander called upon his men to secure the triumph of the cross and the freedom of Epirus. Pursuit was now general.

XXI.

THE Turks were massacred by thousands. Mahomed, when he found that all was lost, fled to the mountains, with a train of guards and eunuchs, and left the care of his dispersed host to his pashas. The hills were covered with the fugitives and their pursuers. Some also fled to the sea-shore, where the Turkish fleet was at anchor. The plain was strewn with corpses and arms, and tents and standards. The sun was now high in the heavens. The mist had cleared away; but occasional clouds of smoke still sailed about.

A solitary Christian knight entered a winding pass in the green hills, apart from the scene of strife. The slow and trembling step of his wearied steed would have ill qualified him to join in the triumphant pursuit, even had he himself been physically enabled; but the Christian knight was covered with gore, unhappily not alone that of his enemies. He was, indeed, streaming with desperate wounds, and scarcely could his fainting form retain its tottering seat.

The winding pass, which, for some singular reason, he now pursued in solitude, instead of returning to the busy camp for aid and assistance, conducted the knight to a small green valley, covered with sweet herbs, and entirely surrounded by hanging woods. In the centre rose the ruins of a Doric fane: three or four columns gray and majestic. All was still and silent, save that in the clear blue sky an eagle flew, high in the air, but whirling round the temple.

The knight reached the ruins of the Doric fane, and with difficulty dismounting from his charger, fell upon the soft and flowery turf, and for some moments was motionless. His horse stole a few yards away, and, though scarcely less injured than its rider, instantly commenced cropping the inviting pasture.

At length the Christian knight slowly raised his head, and leaning on his arm, sighed deeply. His face was very pale; but as he looked up and perceived the eagle in the heaven, a smile played upon his pallid cheek, and his beautiful eye gleamed with a sudden flash of light.

"Glorious bird!" murmured the Christian warrior, "once I deemed that my career might resemble thine! 'Tis over now; and Greece, for which I would have done so much, will soon forget my immemorial name. I have stolen here to die in silence and in beauty. This blue air, and these green woods, and these lone columns, which oft to me have been a consolation, breathing of the poetic past, and of the days wherein I fain had lived, I have escaped from the fell field of carnage to die among them. Farewell! my country! Farewell to one more beautiful than Greece—farewell, Idu-na!"

These were the last words of Nicæus, Prince of Athens!

XXII.

WHILE the unhappy lover of the daughter of Hunniades breathed his last words to the solitary elements, his more fortunate friend received, in the centre of his scene of triumph, the glorious congratulations of his emancipated country. The discomfiture of the Turks was complete, and this overthrow, coupled with their recent defeat in Bulgaria, secured Christendom from their assaults during the remainder of the reign of Amurath the Second. Surrounded by his princely allies, and the chieftains of Epirus, the victorious standards of Christendom, and the triumphant trophies of the Moslem, Iskander received from the great Hunniades the hand of his beautiful daughter.—"Thanks to these brave warriors," said the hero, "I can now offer to your daughter a safe, an honourable, and a Christian home."

"It is to thee, great sir, that Epirus owes its security," said an ancient chieftain, addressing Iskander, "its national existence, and its holy religion. All that we have to do now is to preserve them; nor indeed do I see that we can more effectually obtain these great objects than by entreating thee to mount the redeemed throne of thy ancestors. Therefore I say, GOD SAVE ISKANDER, KING OF EPIRUS!"

And all the people shouted and said, "GOD SAVE THE KING! GOD SAVE ISKANDER, KING OF EPIRUS!"

CHAPTER I.

SOME ACCOUNT OF THE FAMILY OF ARMINE, AND ESPECIALLY OF SIR FERDINAND AND SIR RATCLIFFE.

THE family of Armine entered England with William the Norman. Ralph D'Ermyne was standard bearer of the Conqueror, and shared prodigally in the plunder, as appears by Domesday Book. At the time of the general survey, the family of Ermyne, or Armyne, possessed numerous manors in Nottinghamshire, and several in the shire of Lincoln. William d'Armyne, lord of the honour of Armyne, was one of the subscribing barons to the Great Charter. His predecessor died in the Holy Land before Ascalon. A succession of stout barons and valiant knights maintained the high fortunes of the family; and, in the course of the various struggles with France, they obtained possession of several fair castles in Guienne and Gascony. In the wars of the Roses the Armynes sided with the house of Lancaster. Ferdinand Armyne, who shared the exile of Henry the Seventh, was knighted on Bosworth Field, and soon after created Earl of Tewkesbury. Faithful to the Church, the second Lord Tewkesbury became involved in one of those numerous risings that harassed the last years of Henry the Eighth. The rebellion was unsuccessful, Lord Tewkesbury was beheaded, his blood attainted, and his numerous estates forfeited to the crown. A younger branch of the family, who had adopted Protestantism, married the daughter of Sir Francis Walsingham, and attracted, by his talents in negotiation, the notice of Queen Elizabeth. He was sent on a secret mission to the Low Countries, where, having greatly distinguished himself, he obtained on his return the restoration of the family estate of Armine, in Nottinghamshire, to which he retired after an eminently prosperous career, and amused the latter years of his life in the construction of a family mansion, built in that national style of architecture since described by the name of his royal mistress, at once magnificent and convenient. His son, Sir Walsingham Armine, figured in the first batch of baronets under James the First.

During the memorable struggle between the crown and the Commons, in the reign of the unhappy Charles, the Armine family became most distinguished cavaliers. The second Sir Walsingham raised a troop of horse, and gained great credit by charging at the head of his regiment, and defeating Sir Arthur Haselrigg's cuirassiers. It was the first time that that impenetrable band had been taught to fly; but the conqueror was covered with wounds. The same Sir Walsingham also successfully defended Armine House against the Commons, and commanded the cavalry at the battle of Newbury, where two of his brothers were slain. For these various services and sufferings Sir Walsingham was advanced to the dignity of a baron of the realm, by the title of Lord Armine, of Armine, in the county of Nottingham. He died without issue, but the baronetcy devolved on his youngest brother, Sir Ferdinando.

The Armine family, who had relapsed into popery, followed the fortunes of the second James, and the head of the house died at St. Germain's. His son, however, had been prudent enough to remain in England and support the new dynasty, by which means he contrived to secure his title and estates. Roman Catholics, however, the Armines always remained, and this circumstance accounts for this once distinguished family no longer figuring in the history of their country. As far, therefore, as the house of Armine was concerned, time flew during the next century with immemorable wing. The family led a secluded life on their estate, intermarrying only with the great Catholic families, and duly begetting baronets.

At length arose, in the person of the last Sir Ferdinand Armine, one of those extraordinary and rarely gifted beings who require only an opportunity to influence the fortunes of their nation, and to figure as a Cæsar or an Alcibiades. Beautiful, brilliant, and ambitious, the young and restless Armine quitted, in his eighteenth year, the house of his fathers, and his stepdame of a country, and entered the Imperial service. His blood and creed gained him a flattering reception; his skill and valour soon made him distinguished. The world rang with stories of his romantic bravery, his gallantries, his eccentric manners, and his political intrigues, for he nearly contrived to be elected King of Poland. Whether it were disgust at being foiled in this high object by the influence of Austria, or whether, as was much whispered at the time, he had dared to urge his insolent and unsuccessful suit on a still more delicate subject to the Empress Queen herself, certain it is that Sir Ferdinand suddenly quitted the Imperial service, and appeared at Constantinople in person. The man, whom a point of honour prevented from becoming a Protestant in his native country, had no scruples about his profession of faith at Stamboul; certain it is, that the English baronet soon rose high in the favour of the sultan, assumed the Turkish dress, conformed to the Turkish customs, and, finally, led against Austria a division of the Turkish army. Having gratified his pique by defeating the Imperial forces in a sanguinary engagement, and obtaining a favourable peace for the Porte, Sir Ferdinand Armine doffed his turban, and suddenly reappeared in his native country. After the sketch we have given of the last ten years of his life, it is unnecessary to observe that Sir Ferdinand Armine immediately became what is called extremely fashionable, and, as he was now in Protestant England, the empire of fashion was the only one in which the young Catholic could distinguish himself. Let us then charitably set down to the score of his political disabilities the fantastic dissipation and the frantic prodigality in which the liveliness of his imagination, and the energy of his soul, exhausted themselves. After three startling years he married the Lady Barbara Ratcliffe, whose previous divorce from her husband, the Earl of Faulconville, Sir Ferdinand had occasioned. He was, however, separated from his lady during the first year of their more hallowed union, and, retiring to Rome, Sir Ferdinand became apparently very devout. At the end of a year he offered to transfer the whole of his property to the Church, provided the Pope would allow him an annuity, and make him a Cardinal. His Holiness not deeming it fit to consent to the proposition, Sir Ferdinand quitted his capital in a huff, and, returning to England, laid claim to the peerages of Tewkesbury and Armine. Although assured of failing in these claims, and himself, perhaps, as certain of ill success as his lawyers, Sir Ferdinand, nevertheless, expended upwards of 60,000*l.* in their promotion, and was amply repaid for the expenditure in the gratification of his vanity in keeping his name before the public. He was, indeed, never content, except when he was astonishing mankind, and while he was apparently exerting all his efforts to become a King of Poland, a Roman cardinal, or an English peer, the crown, the coronet, and the scarlet hat, were in truth ever secondary points with him, compared to the sensation throughout Europe, which the effort was contrived and calculated to ensure.

On his second return to his native country, Sir Ferdinand had not re-entered society. For such a man, indeed, society, with all its superficial excitement, and all the shadowy variety with which it attempts to cloud the essential monotony of its nature, was intolerably dull and commonplace. Sir Ferdinand, on the contrary, shut himself up in Armine, having previously announced to the world that he was going to write his memoirs. This history, the construction of a castle, and the prosecution of his claims before the House of Lords, apparently occupied his time to his satisfaction, for he remained quiet for several years, until, on the breaking out of the French Revolution, he hastened to Paris, became a member of the Jacobin Club, and of the National Convention. The name of Citizen Armine appears among the regicides. Perhaps in this vote he avenged the loss of the crown of Poland, and the still more mortifying repulse he received from the mother of Marie Antoinette. After the execution of the royal victims, however, it was discovered that Citizen Armine had made them an offer to save their lives and raise an insurrection in La Vendee, provided he was made lieutenant-general of the kingdom. At his trial, which from the nature of the accusation and the character of the accused, occasioned to his gratification a great sensation, he made no effort to defend himself; but seemed to glory in the chivalric crime. He was hurried to the guillotine, and met his fate with the greatest composure, assuring the public with a mysterious air, that, had he lived four-and-twenty hours longer every thing would have been arranged, and the troubles which he foresaw impending for Europe prevented. So successfully had Armine played his part, that his mysterious and doubtful career occasioned a controversy, from which only the appearance of Napoleon distracted universal attention, and which, indeed, only wholly ceased within these few years. What were his intentions? Was he or was not he a sincere Jacobin? If he made the offer to the royal family, why did he vote for their death? Was he resolved, at all events, to be at the head of one of the parties? A middle course would not suit such a man; and so on. Interminable were the queries and their solutions, the pamphlets and the memoirs, which the conduct of this vain man occasioned, and which must assuredly have appeased his manes. Recently it has been discovered that the charge brought against Armine was perfectly false and purely malicious. Its victim, however, could not resist the dazzling celebrity of the imaginary crime, and he preferred the reputation of closing his career by conduct which at once perplexed and astonished mankind, to a vindication which would have deprived his name of some brilliant accessories, and spared him to a life of which he was, perhaps, wearied.

By the unhappy victim of his vanity and passion Sir Ferdinand Armine left one child, a son, whom he had never seen, now Sir Ratcliffe. Brought up in sadness and seclusion, education had faithfully developed the characteristics of a reserved and melancholy mind. Pride of lineage and sentiments of religion, which even in early youth darkened into bigotry, were not incompatible with strong affections, a stern sense of duty, and a spirit of chivalric honour. Limited in capacity, he was, however, firm in purpose. Trembling at the name of his father, and devoted to the unhappy parent whose presence he had scarcely ever quitted, a word of reproach had never escaped his lips against the chieftain of his blood, and one too whose career, how little soever his child could sympathize with it, still maintained, in men's mouths and minds, the name and memory of the house of Armine. At the death of his father, Sir Ratcliffe had just attained his majority, and he succeeded to immense estates encumbered with mortgages, and to considerable debts, which his feelings of honour would have compelled him to discharge, had they indeed been enforced by no other claim. The estates of the family, on their restoration, had not been entailed; but, until Sir Ferdinand, no head of the house had abused the confidence of his ancestors, and the vast possessions of the house of Armine has descended unimpaired; and unimpaired, as far as he was concerned, Sir Ratcliffe determined they should remain. Although, by the sale of the estates, not only the incumbrances and liabilities might have been discharged, but himself left in possession of a moderate independence, Sir Ratcliffe at once resolved to part with nothing. Fresh sums were raised for the payment of the debts, and the mortgages now consumed nearly the whole rental of the lands on which they were secured. Sir Ratcliffe obtained for himself only an annuity of three hundred per annum, which he presented to his mother, in addition to the small portion which she had received on her first marriage; and for himself, visiting Armine Place for the first time, he roamed for a few days with sad complacency about that magnificent demesne, and then, taking down from the walls of the magnificent hall the sabre with which his father had defeated the Imperial host, he embarked for Cadiz, and very shortly after his arrival obtained a commission in the Spanish service.

Although the hereditary valour of the Armines had descended to their forlorn representative, it is not probable that, under any circumstances, Sir Ratcliffe would have risen to any particular eminence in the country of his temporary adoption. His was not one of those minds born to command and to create; and his temper was too proud to serve and to solicit. His residence in Spain, however, was not altogether without satisfaction. It was during this sojourn that he gained the little knowledge of life and human nature he possessed; and the creed and solemn manners of the land harmonized with his faith and habits. Among these strangers, too, the proud young Englishman felt not so keenly the degradation of his house; and sometimes—though his was not the fatal gift of imagination—sometimes he indulged in day-dreams of its rise. Unpractised in business, and not gifted with that intuitive quickness which supplies experience and often baffles it, Ratcliffe Armine, who had not quitted the domestic hearth even for the purposes of education, was yet fortunate enough to possess a devoted friend; and this was Glastonbury, his tutor, and confessor to his mother. It was to him that Sir Ratcliffe intrusted the management of his affairs, with a confidence which was deserved; for Glastonbury sympathized with all his feelings, and was so wrapped up in the glory of the family, that he had no greater ambition in life than to become their historiographer, and had been for years employed in amassing materials for a great work dedicated to their celebrity.

When Ratcliffe Armine had been absent about three years, his mother died. Her death was unexpected. She had not fulfilled two-thirds of the allotted period of the Psalmist, and in spite of many sorrows she was still beautiful. Glastonbury, who communicated to him the intelligence in a letter in which he vainly attempted to suppress his own overwhelming affliction, counselled his immediate return to England, if but for a season, and the unhappy Ratcliffe followed his advice. By the death of his mother Sir Ratcliffe Armine became possessed, for the first time, of a very small but still an independent income; and having paid a visit, soon after his return to his native country, to a Catholic nobleman, to whom his acquaintance had been of some use when travelling in Spain, he became enamoured of one of his daughters, and his passion being returned, and not disapproved by the father, he was soon after married to Constance, the eldest daughter of Lord Grandison.

CHAPTER II.

ARMINE DESCRIBED.

AFTER his marriage Sir Ratcliffe determined to reside at Armine. In one of the largest parks in England there yet remained a fragment of a vast Elizabethan pile, that in old days bore the name of Armine Place. When Sir Ferdinand had commenced building Armine Castle, he had pulled down the old mansion, partly for the sake of its site, and partly for the sake of its materials. Long lines of turreted and many-windowed walls, tall towers, and lofty arches now rose in picturesque confusion on the green ascent where heretofore old Sir Walsingham had raised the fair and convenient dwelling, which he justly deemed might have served the purpose of a long posterity. The hall and chief staircase of the castle, and a gallery, alone were finished; and many a day had Sir Ferdinand passed in arranging the pictures, the armour, and choice rarities, of these magnificent apartments. The rest of the building was a mere shell; nor was it in all parts even roofed in. Heaps of bricks and stone, and piles of timber, appeared in all directions; and traces of the sudden stoppage of the great work might be observed in the temporary saw-pits still remaining, the sheds for the workmen, and the kilns and furnaces, which had never been removed. Time, however, that had stained the neglected towers with an antique tint, and had permitted many a generation of birds to build their sunny nests on all the coignes of vantage of the unfinished walls, had exercised a mellowing influence even on these rude accessories, and in the course of years they had been so drenched by the rain, and so buffeted by the wind, and had become so covered with moss and ivy, that they rather added to, than detracted from the picturesque character of the whole mass.

A few hundred yards from the castle, but situate on the same verdant rising ground, and commanding, although well sheltered, an extensive view over the wide park, was the fragment of the old Place that we have noticed. The rough and undulating rent which marked the severance of the building was now thickly covered with ivy, which in its gamesome luxuriance had contrived also to climb up a remaining stack of tall chimneys, and to spread over the covering of the large oriel window. This fragment contained a set of very pleasant chambers which, having been occupied by the late baronet, were of course furnished with great taste and comfort; and there was, moreover, accommodation sufficient for a small establishment. Armine Place, before Sir Ferdinand, unfortunately for his descendants, determined in the eighteenth century on building a feudal castle, had been situate in very famous pleasure-grounds, which extended at the back of the mansion over a space of several hundred acres. The grounds in the immediate vicinity of the buildings had of course suffered severely, but the far greater portion had only been neglected; and there were some indeed who deemed, as they wandered through the arbour walks of this enchanting wilderness, that its beauty had been materially enhanced even by this very neglect. It seemed like a forest in a beautiful romance; a green and bowery wilderness where Boccaccio would have loved to woo, and Watteau to paint. So artfully, indeed, had the walks been planned, that they seemed interminable, nor was there a single point in the whole plaisance where the keenest eye could have detected a limit. Sometimes you wandered in those arched and winding walks dear to pensive spirits; sometimes you emerged on a plot of turf, blazing in the sunshine, a small and bright savannah, and gazed with wonder on the group of black and mighty cedars that rose from its centre, with their sharp and spreading foliage. The beautiful and the vast blended together; and the moment after you had beheld with delight a bed of geraniums or of myrtles, you found yourself in an amphitheatre of Italian pines. A strange exotic perfume filled the air; you trod on the flowers of other lands; and shrubs and plants, that usually are only trusted from their conservatories like sultanas from their jealousies, to sniff the air and recall their bloom, here learning from hardship the philosophy of endurance, had struggled successfully even against northern winters, and wanted now in native and unpruned luxuriance. Sir Ferdinand, when he resided at Armine, was accustomed to fill these pleasure-grounds with macaws, and other birds of gorgeous plumage; but these had fled away with their master, all but two swans, which still floated on the surface of an artificial lake, narrow, but of great and unswerving length, and which marked the centre of this Paradise.

In the remains of the ancient seat of his father, Sir Ratcliffe Armine and his bride now sought a home. The principal chamber of Armine Place was a large irregular room, a low but richly-carved oaken roof, studded with achievements. This apartment was lighted by the oriel window we have mentioned, the upper panes of which contained some very ancient specimens of painted glass, and, having been fitted up by Sir Ferdinand as a library, contained a large collection of valuable books. From the library, you entered through an arched door of painted glass into a small room, of which, it being much out of repair when the family arrived, Lady Armine had seized the opportunity of gratifying her taste in the adornment. She had hung it with some old-fashioned pea-green damask, that exhibited to advantage several copies of Spanish paintings by herself, for her ladyship was a very skilful artist. The third and remaining chamber was the dining-room, a somewhat gloomy chamber, being shadowed by a neighbouring chestnut. A portrait of Sir Ferdinand, when a youth, in a Venetian dress, was suspended over the old-fashioned fireplace; and opposite hung a fine hunting piece by Schneiders. Lady Armine was a very amiable and accomplished woman. She had enjoyed all the advantage of foreign education under the inspection of a cautious parent; and a residence on the Continent, while it had afforded her many graces, had not, as unfortunately sometimes is the case, divested her of those more substantive though less showy qualities of which the husband knows the value. She was pious and dutiful: her manners were graceful, for she had visited courts and mixed in the most polished circles, but she had fortunately not learned to affect insensibility as a system, or to believe that the essence of good breeding consists in showing your fellow-creatures that you despise them. Her cheerful temper soaced the constitutional gloom of Sir Ratcliffe, and, indeed, had originally won his heart even more than her remarkable beauty; and while at the same time she loved a country life, she possessed, in a lettered taste, in a beautiful and highly-cultivated voice, and in a scientific knowledge of music and of painting, all those resources which prevent retirement degenerating into loneliness. Her foibles, if we must confess that she was not faultless, endeared her to her husband, for her temper reflected his own pride, and she possessed the taste for splendour which was also his native mood, although circumstances had compelled him to stifle its gratification.

Love, pure and profound, had alone prompted the union between Ratcliffe Armine and Constance Grandison. Doubtless, like all of her race, she might have chosen amid the wealthiest of the Catholic nobles and gentry one who would have been proud to have mingled his life with hers; but, with a soul not insensible to the splendid accidents of existence, she yielded her heart to one who could repay the rich sacrifice only with devotion. His poverty, his pride, his dangerous and hereditary gift of beauty, his mournful life, his illustrious lineage, his reserved and romantic mind, had at once attracted her fancy and captivated her heart. She shared all his aspirations and sympathized with all his hopes; and the old glory of the house of Armine, and its revival and restoration, were the object of her daily thoughts, and often of her nightly dreams.

With these feelings Lady Armine settled herself at her new home scarcely with a pang that the whole park in which she lived was let out as a grazing ground, and only trusting, as she beheld the groups of ruminating cattle, that the day might yet come for the antlered tenants of the bowers to resume their shady dwellings. The good man and his wife who hitherto had inhabited the old Place, and shown the castle and the plaisance to passing travellers, were, under the new order of affairs, promoted to the respective offices of serving-man and cook, or butler and housekeeper, as they styled themselves in the village. A maiden brought from Grandison to wait on Lady Armine completed the establishment, with her young brother, who, among numerous duties, performed the office of groom, and attended to a pair of beautiful white ponies which Sir Ratcliffe drove in a phaeton. This equipage, which was remarkable for its elegance, was the especial delight of Lady Armine, and certainly the only piece of splendour in which Sir Ratcliffe indulged. As for neighbourhood, Sir Ratcliffe, on his arrival, of course received a visit from the rector of the parish, and, by the courteous medium of this gentleman, he soon occasioned it to be generally understood that he was not anxious that the example of his rector should be followed. The intimation, in spite of much curiosity, was of course respected. Nobody called upon the Armines. This happy couple, however, were too much engrossed with their own society to require amusement from any other sources than themselves. The honeymoon was passed in wandering in the pleasure-grounds, and in wondering at their own marvellous happiness. Then Lady Armine would sit on a green bank and sing her choicest songs, and Sir Ratcliffe repaid her for her kindness by speeches even softer than serenades. The arrangement of their dwelling occupied the second month: each day witnessed some felicitous yet economical alteration of her creative taste. The third month Lady Armine determined to make a garden.

"I wish," said her affectionate husband, as he toiled with delight in her service, "I wish, my dear Constance, that Glastonbury was here; he was such a capital gardener."

"Let us ask him, dear Ratcliffe; and, perhaps, for such a friend, we have already allowed too great a space of time to elapse without sending an invitation."

"Why, we are so happy," said Sir Ratcliffe, smiling; "and yet Glastonbury is the best creature in the world. I hope you will like him, dear Constance."

"I am sure I shall, dear Ratcliffe. Give me that geranium, love. Write to him to-day; write to Glastonbury to-day."

CHAPTER III.

ARRIVAL OF GLASTONBURY.

ADRIAN GLASTONBURY was a younger son of an old but decayed English family. He had been educated at a college of Jesuits in France, and had entered at an early period of life the service of the Romish church, whose communion his family had never quitted. At college young Glastonbury had been alike distinguished for his assiduous talents, and for the extreme benevolence of his disposition. He was one of those minds to which refinement is natural, and which learning and experience never deprive of simplicity. Apparently, his passions were not violent; perhaps they were restrained by his profound piety. Next to his devotion, Glastonbury was most remarkable for his taste. The magnificent temples, in which the mysteries of the Deity and saints he worshipped were celebrated, developed the latent predisposition for the beautiful, which became almost the master sentiment of his life. In the inspired and inspiring paintings that crowned the altars of the churches and the cathedrals in which he ministered, Glastonbury first studied art; and it was as he glided along the solemn shade of those Gothic aisles, gazing on the brave groining of the vaulted roofs, whose deep and sublime shadows so beautifully contrasted with the sparkling shrines and the delicate chancies below, that he first imbibed that passion for the architecture of the middle ages that afterwards led him on many a pleasant pilgrimage, with no better companions than a wallet and a sketch-book. Indeed, so very sensible was Glastonbury of the influence of the early and constant scene of his youth on his imagination, that he was wont to trace his love of heraldry, of which he possessed a remarkable knowledge, to the emblazoned windows that perpetuated the memory and the achievements of many a pious founder.

When Glastonbury was about twenty-one years of age, he unexpectedly inherited from an uncle a sum which, though by no means considerable, was for him a sufficient independence; and as no opening in the service of the church at this moment offered itself, which he considered it a duty to pursue, he determined to gratify that restless feeling which seems inseparable from the youth of men gifted with fine sensibilities, and which probably arises in an unconscious desire to quit the commonplace, and to discover the ideal. He wandered on foot throughout the whole of Switzerland and Italy; and after more than three years' absence, returned to England with several thousand sketches, and a complete Alpine Hortus Siccus. He was even more proud of the latter than of having kissed the pope's toe. In the next seven years the life of Glastonbury was nearly equally divided between the duties of a sacred profession and the gratification of his simple and elegant taste. He resided principally in Lancashire, where he became librarian to a Catholic nobleman of the highest rank, whose notice he had first attracted by publishing a description of his grace's residence, illustrated by his drawings. The duke, who was a man of fine taste and antiquarian pursuits, and an exceedingly benevolent person, sought Glastonbury's acquaintance in consequence of the publication, and from that moment a close and cherished intimacy subsisted between them.

In the absence of the family, however, Glastonbury found time for many excursions; by means of which he at last completed drawings of all our cathedrals. There remained for him still the abbeys and minsters of the West of England, a subject on which he was ever very eloquent. Glastonbury performed all these excursions on foot, armed only with an ashen staff, which he had cut in his early travels, and respecting which he was very superstitious; so that he would have no more thought of journeying without this stick than most other people without their hat. Indeed, to speak the truth, Glastonbury has been known to quit a house occasionally without that necessary appendage, for, from living much alone, he was not a little absent; but, instead of piquing himself on such eccentricities, they ever occasioned him mortification. Yet Glastonbury was a universal favourite, and ever a welcome guest. In his journeys he had no want of hosts; for there was not a Catholic family which would not have been hurt had he passed them without a visit. He was indeed a rarely accomplished personage. An admirable scholar and profound antiquary, he possessed also a considerable practical knowledge of the less severe sciences, was a fine artist, and no contemptible musician. His pen, too, was that of a ready writer;—if his sonnets be ever published, they will rank among the finest in our literature.

Glastonbury was about thirty when he was induced by Lady Barbara Armine to quit a roof where he had passed some happy years, and to undertake the education of her son Ratcliffe, a child of eight years of age. From this time Glastonbury in a great degree withdrew himself from his former connexions, and so completely abandoned his previous mode of life, that he never quitted his new home. His pupil repaid him for his zeal rather by the goodness of his disposition, and his unblemished conduct, than by any remarkable brilliancy of talents or acquirements: but Ratcliffe, and particularly his mother, were capable of appreciating Glastonbury; and certain it is, whatever might be the cause, he returned their sympathy with deep emotion, for every thought and feeling of his existence seemed dedicated to their happiness and prosperity.

So great indeed was the shock which he experienced at the unexpected death of Lady Barbara, that for some time he meditated assuming the cowl; and, if the absence of his pupil prevented the accomplishment of this project, the plan was only postponed, not abandoned. The speedy marriage of Sir Ratcliffe followed. Circumstances had prevented Glastonbury from being present at the ceremony. It was impossible for him to retire to the cloister without seeing his pupil. Business, if not affection, rendered an interview between them necessary. It was equally impossible for Glastonbury to trouble a bride and bridegroom with his presence. When, however, three months had elapsed, he began to believe that he might venture to propose a meeting to Sir Ratcliffe; but while he was yet meditating on this step, he was anticipated by the receipt of a letter containing a very warm invitation to Armine.

It was a beautiful sunshiny afternoon in June. Lady Armine was seated in front of the place looking towards the park, and busied with her work; while Sir Ratcliffe, stretched on the grass, was reading to her the last poem of Scott, which they had just received from the neighbouring town.

"Ratcliffe, my dear," said Lady Armine, "some one approaches."

"A trumper, Constance?"

"No, no, my love, rise; it is a gentleman."

"Who can it be?" said Sir Ratcliffe, rising; "perhaps it is your brother, love. Ah! no, it is—it is Glastonbury!"

And at these words, he ran forward, jumped over the iron hurdle which separated their lawn from the park, nor stopped his quick pace until he reached a middle-aged man of very prepossessing appearance, though certainly not unsullied by the dust, for assuredly the guest had travelled far and long.

"My dear Glastonbury," exclaimed Sir Ratcliffe, embracing him, and speaking under the influence of an excitement in which he rarely indulged, "I am the happiest fellow alive. How do you do? I will introduce you to Constance directly. She is dying to know you, and quite prepared to love you as much as myself. O! my dear Glastonbury, you have no idea how happy I am. She is a perfect angel."

"I am sure of it," said Glastonbury, very seriously.

Sir Ratcliffe hurried his tutor along. "Here is my best friend, Constance," he eagerly exclaimed. Lady Armine rose and welcomed Mr. Glastonbury very cordially. "Your presence, my dear sir, has, I assure you, been long desired by both of us," she said, with a delightful smile.

"No compliments, believe me," added Sir Ratcliffe, "Constance never pays compliments. Do you, sweet? She fixed upon your own room, herself. She always calls it Mr. Glastonbury's room; she does, upon my word. Is not she an angel?"

"Ah! madam," said Mr. Glastonbury, laying his hand very gently on the shoulder of Sir Ratcliffe, and meaning to say something very felicitous, "I know this dear youth well; and I have always thought whoever could claim his heart should be counted a very fortunate woman."

"And such the possessor esteems herself," replied Lady Armine, with a smile.

Sir Ratcliffe, after a quarter of an hour or so had passed in conversation, said, "Come, Glastonbury, you have arrived at a good time; for dinner is at hand. Let me show you to your room. I fear you have had a hot day's journey—thank God, we are together again—Give me your staff—I will take care of it—no fear of that—so, this way—you have seen the old Place before?—Take care of that step—I say, Constance," said Sir Ratcliffe, in a suppressed voice, and running back to his wife, "how do you like him?"

"Very much, indeed."

"But do you really?"

"Really, truly."

"Angel!" exclaimed the gratified Sir Ratcliffe.

CHAPTER IV.

PROGRESS OF AFFAIRS AT ARMINE.

LIFE is adventurous. Events are perpetually occurring, even in the calmness of domestic existence, which change in an instant the whole train and tenor of our thoughts and feelings, and often materially influence our fortunes and our character. It is strange, and sometimes as profitable as it is singular, to recall our state on the eve of some acquaintance which transfigures our being; with some man whose philosophy revolutionizes our minds; with some woman whose charms metamorphose our career. These retrospective meditations are fruitful of self-knowledge.

The visit of Glastonbury was one of those incidents, which, from the unexpected results that they occasion, swell into events. He had not been long a guest at Armine before Sir Ratcliffe and his lady could not refrain from mutually communicating to each other the gratification they should feel could Glastonbury be induced to cast his lot among them. His benevolent and placid temper, his many accomplishments, and the entire affection which he evidently entertained for everybody that bore the name and for every thing that related to the fortunes of Armine, all pointed him out as a friend alike to be cherished and to be valued. Under his auspices the garden of the fair Constance soon flourished; his taste guided her pencil and his voice accompanied her lute. Sir Ratcliffe, too, thoroughly enjoyed his society; Glastonbury was with him the only link, in life, between the present and the past. They talked over old times together; and sorrowful recollections lost half their bitterness from the tenderness of his sympathetic reminiscences. Sir Ratcliffe, too, was conscious of the value of such a companion for his gifted wife. And Glastonbury, moreover, among his many accomplishments, had the excellent quality of never being in the way. He was aware that young people, and especially young lovers, are not averse sometimes to being alone; and his friends, in his absence, never felt that he was neglected, because his pursuits were so various, and his resources so numerous, that they were sure he was employed and amused.

In the pleasure of Armine, at the termination of a long turfen avenue of purple beeches, there was a turreted gate, flanked by round towers, intended by Sir Ferdinand for one of the principal entrances of his castle. Over the gate were small but convenient chambers, to which you ascend by a winding staircase in one of the towers; the other was a mere shell. It was sunset; the long vista gleamed in the dying rays, that shed also a rich breadth of light over the bold and baronial arch. Our friends had been examining the chambers, and Lady Armine, who was a little wearied by the exertion, stood opposite the building, leaning on her husband and his friend.

"A man might go far, and find a worse dwelling than that portal," said Glastonbury, musingly. "Methinks life might glide away pleasantly enough in those little rooms, with one's books and drawings, and this noble avenue for a pensive stroll."

"I wish to heaven, my dear Glastonbury, you would try the experiment," said Sir Ratcliffe. "Ah! do, Mr. Glastonbury," added Lady Armine, "take pity upon us!"

"At any rate, it is not so dull as a cloister," added Sir Ratcliffe, "and, say what they like, there is nothing like living among friends."

"You will find me very troublesome," replied Glastonbury with a smile, and then, turning the conversation, evidently more from embarrassment than distaste, he remarked the singularity of the purple beeches.

Their origin was uncertain; but one circumstance is sure; that, before another month had passed, Glastonbury was tenant for life of the portal of Armine Castle, and all his books and collections were safely stowed and arranged in the rooms with which he had been so much pleased.

The course of time for some years flowed on happily at Armine. In the second year of their marriage Lady Armine presented her husband with a son. Their family was never afterwards increased, but the proud father was consoled by the sex of his child for the recollection that the existence of his line depended upon the precious contingency of a single life. The boy was christened Ferdinand. With the exception of an annual visit to Lord Grandison, the Armine family never quitted their home. Necessity as well as taste induced this regularity of life. The affairs of Sir Ratcliffe did not improve. His mortgagees were more strict in their demands of interest, than his tenants in payment of their rents. His man of business, who had made his fortune in the service of the family, was not wanting in accommodation to his client; but he was a man of business: he could not sympathize with the peculiar feelings and fancies of Sir Ratcliffe, and he persisted in seizing every opportunity of urging on him the advisability of selling his estates. However, by strict economy and temporary assistance from his lawyer, Sir Ratcliffe, during the first ten years of his marriage, managed to carry on affairs, and though occasional embarrassment sometimes caused him fits of gloom and despondency, the sanguine spirit of his wife, and the confidence in the destiny of their beautiful child which she regularly enforced upon him, maintained on the whole his courage. All their hopes and joys were indeed centered in the education of the little Ferdinand. At ten years of age he was one of those spirited, and at the same time docile, boys, who seem to combine with the wild and careless grace of childhood the thoughtfulness and self-discipline of maturer age. It was the constant and truthful boast of his parents, that in spite of all his liveliness, he had never in the whole course of his life disobeyed them. In the village, where he was idolized, they called him "the little prince;" he was so gentle and so generous; so kind, and yet so dignified in his demeanour. His education was very remarkable; for though he never quitted home, and lived indeed in such extreme seclusion, so richly gifted were those few persons with whom he passed his life, that it would have been difficult to have fixed upon a youth, however favoured by fortune, who enjoyed greater advantages for the cultivation of his mind and manners. From the first dawn of the intellect of the young Armine, Glastonbury had devoted himself to its culture; and the kind scholar, who had not shrunk from the painful and patient task of impregnating a young mind with the seeds of knowledge, had bedewed its budding promise with all the fertilizing influence of his learning and his taste. As Ferdinand advanced in years, he had participated in the accomplishments of his mother; from her he derived not only a taste for the fine arts, but no unskilful practice. She, too, had cultivated the rich voice with which nature had endowed him; and it was his mother who taught him not only to sing, but to dance. In more manly accomplishments Ferdinand could not have found a more skilful instructor than his father, a consummate sportsman, and who, like all his ancestors, was remarkable for his finished horsemanship, and the certainty of his aim. Under a roof, too, whose inmates were distinguished for their sincere piety and unaffected virtue, the higher duties of existence were not forgotten; and Ferdinand Armine was early and ever taught to be sincere, dutiful, charitable, and just; and to have a deep sense of the great account hereafter to be delivered to his Creator. The very foibles of his parents which he imbibed tended to the maintenance of his magnanimity. His illustrious lineage was early impressed upon him, and inasmuch as little now was left to them but their honour, so was it doubly incumbent upon him to preserve that chief treasure, of which fortune could not deprive them, unscathed.

This much of the education of Ferdinand Armine. With great gifts of nature, with lively and highly cultivated talents, and a most affectionate and disciplined temper, he was adored by the friends, who nevertheless had too much sense to spoil him. But for his character, what was that? Perhaps, with all their anxiety and all their care, and all their apparent opportunities for observation, the parents and the tutor are rarely skilful in discovering the character of their child or charge. Custom blunts the fineness of psychological study: those with whom we have lived long and early, are apt to blend our essential and our accidental qualities in one bewildering association. The consequences of education and of nature are not sufficiently discriminated. Nor is it, indeed, marvellous, that for a long time temperament should be disguised and even stifled by education; for it is, as it were, a contest between a child and a man.

There were moments when Ferdinand Armine loved to be alone; when he could fly from all the fondness of his friends, and roam in solitude amid the wild and desolate pleasure-grounds, or wander for hours in the halls and galleries of the castle, gazing on the pictures of his ancestors. He ever experienced a strange satisfaction in beholding the portrait of his grandfather. He would stand sometimes abstracted for many minutes before the portrait of Sir Ferdinand, in the gallery, painted by Reynolds, before his grandfather left England, and which the child already singularly resembled. But was there any other resemblance between them than form and feature? Did the fiery imagination and the terrible passions of that extraordinary man lurk in the innocent heart and the placid mien of his young descendant? Awful secrets these, which this history shall unfold. No matter now! Behold, he is a light-hearted and airy child! Thought passes over his brow like a cloud in a summer-sky, or the shadow of a bird over the sunshiny earth; and he skims away from the silent hall and his momentary reverie, to fly a kite or chase a butterfly!

CHAPTER V.

A DOMESTIC SCENE.

YEARS glided away without any remarkable incidents in the life of young Ferdinand. He seldom quitted home, except as companion to Glastonbury in his pedestrian excursions, when he witnessed a different kind of life to that displayed in an annual visit which he paid to Grandison. The boy amused his grandfather, with whom, therefore, he became a favourite. The old lord, indeed, would have had no objection to his grandson passing half the year with him; and he always returned home with a benediction, a letter full of praises, and a ten-pound note. Lady Armine was quite delighted with these symptoms of affection on the part of her father towards her child; and augured from them the most important future results. But Sir Ratcliffe, who was not blessed with so sanguine a temperament as his amiable lady, and who, unbiassed by blood, was perhaps better qualified to form an opinion of the character of his father-in-law, never shared her transports, and seldom omitted an opportunity of restraining.

"It is all very well, my dear," he would observe, "for Ferdinand to visit his relations. Lord Grandison is his grandfather. It is very proper that he should visit his grandfather. I like him to be seen at Grandison. That is all very right. Grandison is a first-rate establishment, where he is certain of meeting persons of his own class, with whom circumstances unhappily"—and here Sir Ratcliffe sighed—"debar him from mixing: and your father, Constance, is a very good sort of man. I like your father, Constance, you know, very much. No person ever could be more courteous to me than your father has ever been. I have no complaints to make of your father, Constance; or your brother, or indeed of any member of your family. I like them all; I like them very much. Persons more kind, or more thoroughly bred, I am sure I never knew. And I think they like us—I do indeed—I think they like us very much. They appear to me to be always really glad to see us, and to be unaffectedly sorry when we quit them. I am sure I should be very happy if it were in my power to return their hospitality, and welcome them at Armine: but it is useless to think of that. God only knows whether we shall be able to remain here ourselves. All I want to make you feel, my love, is, that if you are building any castle in that little brain of yours on the ground of expectations from Grandison, trust me, you will be disappointed, my dear, you will indeed."

"But my love—"

"If your father die to-morrow, my dear, he will not leave us a shilling. And who can complain? I cannot. He has always been very frank. I remember when we were going to marry, and I was obliged to talk to him about your portion—I remember it as if it were only yesterday—I remember his saying, with the most flattering smile in the world, 'I wish the £5,000, Sir Ratcliffe, were £50,000, for your sake; particularly, as it never will be in my power to increase it.'"

"But my dear Ratcliffe, surely he may do something for his favourite, Ferdinand?"

"My dear Constance—there you are again! Why favourite? I hate the very word. Your father is a good-natured man, a very good-natured man—your father is one of the best-natured men I ever was acquainted with. He has not a single care in the world, and he thinks nobody else has; and what is more, my dear, nobody ever could persuade him that anybody else has. He has no idea of our situation; he never could form an idea of our situation. If I chose to attempt to make him understand it, he would listen with the greatest politeness, shrug his shoulders at the end of the story, tell me to keep up my spirits, and order another bottle of Madeira, in order that he might illustrate his precept by practice. He is a good natured selfish man. He likes us to visit him, because you are gay and agreeable, and because I never asked a favour of him in the whole course of our acquaintance: he likes Ferdinand to visit him, because he is a handsome, fine-spirited boy, and his friends congratulate him on having such a grandson. And so Ferdinand is his favourite; and next year I should not be surprised were he to give him a pony; and perhaps, if he die, he will leave him fifty guineas to buy a gold watch."

"Well, I dare say you are right, Ratcliffe; but still nothing that you can say, will ever persuade me that Ferdinand is not papa's decided favourite."

"Well! we shall soon see what this favour is worth," retorted Sir Ratcliffe, rather bitterly. "Regularly every visit for the last three years, your father has asked me what I intended to do with Ferdinand. I said to him last year, more than I thought I ever could say to any one—I told him that Ferdinand was now fifteen, and that I wished to get him a commission; but that I had no influence to get him a commission, and no money to pay for it, if it were offered me. I think that was pretty plain; and I have been surprised ever since, that I ever could have placed myself in such a degrading position as to say so much."

"Degrading, my dear Ratcliffe," said his wife.

"I felt it as such; and such I still feel it."

At this moment Glastonbury, who was standing at the other end of the room, examining a large folio, and who had evidently been very uneasy during the whole conversation, attempted to quit the room.

"My dear Glastonbury," said Sir Ratcliffe, with a forced smile, "you are alarmed at our domestic broils. Pray, do not leave the room. You know we have no secrets from you."

"No, indeed, do not go, Mr. Glastonbury," added Lady Armine: "and if indeed there be a domestic broil,"—and here she rose and kissed her husband,—"at any rate witness our reconciliation."

Sir Ratcliffe smiled, and returned his wife's embrace with much feeling.

"My own Constance," he said, "you are the dearest wife in the world; and if I ever feel unhappy, believe me it is only because I do not see you in the position to which you are entitled."

"I know no fortune to be compared to your love, Ratcliffe; and as for our child, nothing will ever persuade me that all will not go right, and that he will not restore the fortunes of the family."

"Amen!" said Glastonbury, closing the book with a reverberating sound. "Nor indeed can I believe that Providence will ever desert a great and pious line!"

CHAPTER VI.

CONTAINING ANOTHER DOMESTIC SCENE.

LADY ARMINE and Glastonbury were both too much interested in the welfare of Sir Ratcliffe, not to observe with deep concern that a great, although gradual, change had occurred in his character during the last five years. He had become moody and querulous, occasionally even irritable. His constitutional melancholy, long diverted by the influence of a vigorous youth, the society of a charming woman, and the interesting feelings of a father, began to reassert its ancient and essential sway, and at times even to deepen into gloom. Sometimes whole days elapsed without his ever indulging in conversation; his nights, once tranquil, were now remarkable for their restlessness; his wife was alarmed at the sighs and agitation of his dreams. He quite abandoned also his field sports, and none of those innocent sources of amusement, in which it was once his boast their retirement was so rich, now interested him. In vain Lady Armine sought his society in her walks, or consulted him about her flowers. His frigid and monosyllabic replies discouraged all her efforts. No longer did he lean over her easel, or call for a repetition of his favourite song. At times these dark fits passed away, and if not cheerful, he was at least serene. But, on the whole, he was an altered man; and his wife could no longer resist the miserable conviction, that he was an unhappy one.

She, however, was at least spared the mortification, the bitterest that a wife can experience, of feeling that this change in his conduct was occasioned by any indifference towards her; for, averse as Sir Ratcliffe was to converse on a subject so hopeless and ungrateful as the state of his fortune, still there were times in which he could not refrain from communicating to the partner of his bosom all the causes of his misery, and these, indeed, too truly had she divined.

"Alas!" she would sometimes say, as she tried to compose his restless pillow; "what is this pride, to which you men sacrifice every thing? For me, who am a woman, love is sufficient. O! my Ratcliffe, why do you not feel like your Constance? What if these estates be sold, still we are Armines! and still our dear Ferdinand is spared to us! Believe me, love, that if deference to your feelings has prompted my silence, I have long felt that it would be wiser for us at once to meet a necessary evil. For God's sake, put an end to the tortures of this life, which is destroying us both. Poverty, absolute poverty, with you and with your love, I can meet even with cheerfulness; but indeed, my Ratcliffe, I can bear our present life no longer; I shall die, if you be unhappy. And O! dearest Ratcliffe, if that were to happen which sometimes I fear has happened, if you were no longer to love me—"

But here Sir Ratcliffe assured her of the reverse. "Only think," she would continue, "if when we married we had voluntarily done that which we may now be forced to do, we really should have been almost rich people; at least we should have had quite enough to live in ease, and even elegance. And now we owe thousands to that horrible Bagster, who, I am sure, cheated your father out of nose and home, and, I dare say, after all, wants to buy Armine for himself."

"He buy Armine! An attorney buy Armine!

Never, Constance, never—I will be buried in its ruins first. There is no sacrifice that I would not sooner make—"

"But, dearest love, suppose we sell it to some one else, and suppose, after paying every thing, we have thirty thousand pounds left. How well we could live abroad on the interest of thirty thousand pounds!"

"There would not be thirty thousand pounds left now!"

"Well, five-and-twenty, or even twenty. I could manage on twenty. And then we could buy a commission for dear Ferdinand."

"But to leave our child!"

"Could not he go into the Spanish service. Perhaps you could get a commission in the Spanish Guards for nothing. They must remember you there. And such a name is Armine! I have no doubt that the king would be quite proud to have another Armine in his guard. And then we could live at Madrid; and that would be so delightful; because you speak Spanish so beautifully, and I could learn it very quickly. I am very quick at learning languages. I am indeed."

"I think you are very quick at every thing, dear Constance. I am sure you are really a treasure of a wife; I have cause every hour to bless you; and if it were not for my own sake, I should say that I wished you had made a happier marriage."

"O! do not say that, Ratcliffe; say any thing but that, Ratcliffe. If you love me, I am the happiest woman that ever lived. Be sure always of that."

"I wonder if they do remember me at Madrid!"

"To be sure they do. How could they forget you—how could they forget my Ratcliffe! I dare say, you go to this day by the name of the handsome Englishman."

"Poh! I remember when I left England before—I had no wife then, no child, but I remembered who I was—and when I thought I was the last of our race, and that I was in all probability going to spill the little blood that was spared of us in a foreign soil—O! Constance, I do not think I ever could forget the agony of that moment. Had it been for England, I would have met my fate without a pang. No! Constance, I am an Englishman—I am proud of being an Englishman. My fathers helped to make this country what it is; no one can deny that, and no consideration in the world shall ever induce me again to quit this island."

"But suppose we do not quit England. Suppose we buy a small estate, and live at home."

"A small estate at home! A small, new estate! Bought of a Mr. Hopkins, a great tallow-chandler, or some stock-jobber about to make a new flight from a lodge to a park. O no! that would be too degrading."

"But suppose we keep one of our own manors?"

"And be reminded every instant of every day of those we have lost; and hear of the wonderful improvements of our successors. I should go mad."

"But suppose we live in London?"

"Where?"

"I am sure I do not know, but I should think we might get a nice little house somewhere."

"In a suburb! a fitting lodgment for Lady Armine. No! at any rate we will have no witness to our fall."

"But could not we try some place near my father's?"

"And be patronised by the great family with whom I had the good fortune of being connected. No! my dear Constance, I like your father very well, but I could not stand his cleemosynary haunches of venison, and great baskets of apples and cream cheeses sent with the housekeeper's duty."

"But what shall we do, dear Ratchliffe?"

"My love, there is no resisting fate. We must live or die at Armine, even if we starve."

"Perhaps something will turn up. I dreamed the other night that dear Ferdinand married an heiress. Suppose he were? What do you think?"

"Why, even then, that he would not be as lucky as his father. Good night, love!"

CHAPTER VII.

CONTAINING AN UNEXPECTED VISIT TO LONDON AND ITS CONSEQUENCES.

THE day after the conversation in the library to which Glastonbury had been an unwilling listener, he informed his friends that it was necessary for him to visit the metropolis; and as young Ferdinand had never yet seen London, he proposed that he should accompany him. Sir Ratchliffe and Lady Armine cheerfully assented to this proposition; and as for Ferdinand, it is difficult to describe the delight which the anticipation of his visit occasioned him. The three days that were to elapse before his departure did not seem sufficient to ensure the complete packing of his portmanteau; and his excited manner, the rapidity of his conversation, and the restlessness of his movements, were very diverting.

"Mamma! is London twenty times bigger than Nottingham? How big is it, then? Shall we travel all night! What o'clock is it now? I wonder if Thursday will ever come? I think I shall go to bed early, to finish the day sooner. Do you think my cap is good enough to travel in? I shall buy a hat in London. I shall get up early the very first morning, and buy a hat. Do you think my uncle is in London? I wish Augustus were not at Eton, perhaps he would be there. I wonder if Mr. Glastonbury will take me to see St. Paul's! I wonder if he will take me to the play! I'd give any thing to go to the play. I should like to go to the play and St. Paul's! Mamma! do you think six shirts are enough? I think I had better take eight. I am sure there must be room for eight. What fun it will be dining on the road!"

It did indeed seem that Thursday never would come; yet it came at last. The travellers were obliged to rise before the sun, and drive over to Nottingham to meet their coach; so they bade their adieus the previous eve. As for Ferdinand, so fearful was he of losing the coach that he scarcely slept, and was never convinced that he was really in time until he found himself planted in breathless agitation outside of the Dart light post-coach. It was the first time in his life that he had ever travelled outside of a coach. He felt all the excitement of expanding experience and advancing manhood. They whirled along: at the end of every stage Ferdinand followed the example of his fellow-travellers and dismounted, and then with sparkling eyes hurried to Glastonbury, who was inquiring how he sped. "Capital travelling, isn't it, sir? Did the ten miles within the hour. You have no idea what a fellow our coachman is; and the guard, such a fellow our guard!—Don't wait here a moment. Can I get any thing for you? We dine at Millfield. What fun!"

Away whirled the dashing Dart over the rich plains of our merry midland; a quick and dazzling vision of golden corn-fields, and lawn pasture land; farmhouses embowered in orchards and hamlets shaded by the straggling members of some vast and ancient forest. Then rose in the distance the dim blue towers or the graceful spire of some old cathedral, and soon the spreading causeways announce their approach to some provincial capital. The coachman flanks his leaders, who break into a gallop; the guard sounds his triumphant bugle; the coach bounds over the noble bridge that spans a stream covered with craft; public buildings, guildhalls, and county jails, rise on each side. Rattling through many an inferior way, they at length emerge into the High Street, the observed of all observers, and mine host of the Red Lion or the White Hart, followed by all his waiters, advances from his portal with a smile to receive the "gentlemen passengers."

"The coach stops here half an hour, gentlemen: dinner quite ready!"

'Tis a delightful sound. And what a dinner! What a profusion of substantial delicacies! What mighty and Iris-tinted rounds of beef! What vast and marble-veined ribs! What gelatinous veal pies! What colossal hams! Those are evidently prize cheeses! And how invigorating is the perfume of those various and variegated pickles! Then the bustle emulating the plenty; the ringing of bells, the clash of thoroughfare, the summoning of ubiquitous waiters, and the all-pervading feeling of omnipotence, from the guests, who order what they please, to the landlord, who can produce and execute every thing they can desire. 'Tis a wondrous sight! Why should a man go and see the pyramids and cross the desert, when he has not beheld York Minster or travelled on the Road!

Our little Ferdinand, amid all this novelty, heartily enjoyed himself, and did ample justice to mine host's good cheer. They were soon whirling again along the road, but at sunset, Ferdinand, at the instance of Glastonbury, availed himself of his inside place, and, wearied by the air and the excitement of the day, he soon fell soundly asleep.

Several hours had elapsed when, awaking from a confused dream, in which Armine and all he had lately seen were blended together; he found his fellow-travellers slumbering, and the mail dashing along through the illuminated streets of a great city. The streets were thickly thronged. Ferdinand stared at the magnificence of the shops blazing with lights, and the multitude of men and vehicles moving in all directions. The guard sounded his bugle with treble energy, and the coach suddenly turned through an arched entrance into the court-yard of an old-fashioned inn. His fellow-passengers started, and rubbed their eyes.

"So! we have arrived. I suppose," grumbled one of these gentlemen, taking off his night-cap.

"Yes, gentlemen, I am happy to say our journey is finished," said a more polite voice; "and a very pleasant one I have found it. Porter, have you goodness to call me a coach."

"And one for me," added the gruff voice.

"Mr. Glastonbury," whispered the awe-struck Ferdinand, "is this London!"

"This is London; but we have yet two or three miles to go before we reach our quarters. I think we had better alight and look after our luggage. Gentlemen, good evening!"

It was ten o'clock. Mr. Glastonbury hailed a coach, in which, having safely deposited their portmanteaus, he and Ferdinand entered: but our young friend was so entirely overcome by his feelings and the genius of the place, that he was quite unable to make an observation. Each minute the streets seemed to grow more spacious and more brilliant, and the multitude more dense and more excited. Beautiful buildings, too, rose before him; palaces, and churches, and streets, and squares of imposing architecture; to his inexperienced eye and unsophisticated spirit, their route appeared a never-ending triumph. To the hackney-coachman, however, who had no imagination, and who was quite satiated with metropolitan experience, it only appeared that he had an exceedingly good fare, and that he was jogging up from Bishopgate street to Charing Cross.

When Jarvis, therefore, had safely deposited his charge at Morley's Hotel, in Cockspur street, and had extorted from them an extra shilling, in consideration of their evident rustication, he bent his course to the Opera House, for clouds were gathering, and, with the favour of Providence, there seemed a chance about midnight of picking up some helpless beau, or desperate eabless dandy, the choicest victim in a midnight shower of these public conveyances.

The coffee-room at Morley's was a new scene of amusement to Ferdinand, and he watched with great diversion the two evening papers portioned out among twelve eager quidnuncs, and the evident anxiety which they endured, and the nice diplomacies to which they resorted to obtain the envied journals. The entrance of our two travellers, so alarmingly increasing the demand over the supply, at first seemed to attract considerable and not very friendly notice; but when a malignant half-pay officer, in order to revenge himself for the restless watchfulness of his neighbour, a very political doctor of divinity, offered the journal, which he had long finished, to Glastonbury, and it was declined, the general alarm visibly diminished. Poor Mr. Glastonbury had never looked into a newspaper in his life, save the County Chronicle, to which he occasionally contributed a communication giving an account of the digging up of some old coins, signed Antiquarius; or of the exhumation of some fossil remains, to which he more boldly appended his initials.

In spite of the strange clatter in the streets, Ferdinand slept well, and the next morning, after an early breakfast, himself and his fellow-traveller set out on their peregrinations. Young and sanguine, full of health and enjoyment, innocent and happy, it was with difficulty that Ferdinand could restrain his spirits, as he mingled in the bustle of the streets. It was a bright sunny morning, and, although the end of June, the town was yet quite full.

"Is this Charing Cross, sir?—I wonder if we shall ever be able to get over.—Is this the fullest part of the town, sir?—What a fine day, sir!—How lucky we are in the weather?—We are lucky in every thing!—Whose house is that?—Northumberland House!—Is it the Duke of Northumberland's! Does he live there! How I should like to see it!—Is it very fine!—Who is that!—What is this!—The Admiralty; O! let me see, the Admiralty!—The Horse Guards.—O! where, where? Let us set our watches by the Horse Guards. The guard of our coach always sets his watch by the Horse Guards.—Mr. Glastonbury, which is the best clock, the Horse Guards or St. Paul's!—Is that the Treasury! Can we go in!—That is Downing street, is it!—I never heard of Downing street.—What do they do in Downing street!—Is this Charing Cross still, or is it Parliament street!—Where does Charing Cross end, and where does Parliament street begin!—By Jove, I see Westminster Abbey!"

After visiting Westminster Abbey, and the two Houses of Parliament, Mr. Glastonbury, looking at his watch, said it was now time to call upon a friend of his who lived in St. James's Square. This was the nobleman with whom early in life Glastonbury had been connected, and with whom and whose family he had become so great a favourite, that, notwithstanding his retired life, they had never permitted the connexion entirely to subside. During the very few visits which he had made to the metropolis, he always called in St. James's Square, and his reception always assured him that his remembrance imparted pleasure.

When Glastonbury sent up his name he was instantly admitted, and ushered up stairs. The room was very full, but it consisted only of a family party. The old dutchess, who was a most interesting personage, with fine gray hair, a clear blue eye, and a most soft voice, was surrounded by her grandchildren, who were at home for the midsummer holidays, and who had gathered together at her house this morning to consult upon amusements. Among them was her grandson, the heir presumptive of the house, a youth of the age of Ferdinand, and of a very prepossessing appearance. It was difficult to meet a more amiable and agreeable family, and nothing could exceed the kindness with which they all welcomed Glastonbury. The duke himself soon appeared in his morning gown. "My dear, dear Glastonbury," said the kind-hearted old gentleman, "I heard you were here, and I would come. Caroline will not let me enter her rooms in these rags, but to-day I am to be excused. This shall be a holiday for us all. Why, man, you bury yourself alive!"

"Mr. Armine," said the dutchess, pointing to Ferdinand.

"Mr. Armine, how do you do? Your grandfather and I were very well acquainted. I am proud and glad to know his grandson. I hope your father, Sir Rutcliffe, and Lady Armine are quite well. Well, my dear Glastonbury, I hope you have come to stay a long, long time. You must dine with us every day, you must indeed. You know we are very old-fashioned people; we do not go much into the world; so you will find us at home every day; and we will do what we can to amuse your young friend. Why! I should think he was about the same age as Digby! Is he at Eton? His grandfather was! I never shall forget the time he cut off old Barnard's pigtail. He was a wonderful man—Poor Sir Ferdinand!—He was indeed!"

While his grace and Glastonbury maintained their conversation, Ferdinand conducted himself with so much spirit and propriety towards the rest of the party, and gave them such a lively and graceful narrative of all his travels up to town, and the wonders he had already witnessed, that they were quite delighted with him; and, in short, from this moment, during his visit to London, he was scarcely ever out of their society, and every day became a greater favourite with them. His letters to his mother, for he wrote to her almost every day, recounted all their successful efforts for his amusement, and it seemed that he passed his mornings in a round of sight-seeing, and that he went to the play every night of his life. Perhaps there never existed a human being who at this moment more thoroughly enjoyed life than Ferdinand Armine.

In the mean time, while he thought only of amusement, Mr. Glastonbury was not inattentive to his more important interests; for the truth is that this excellent man had introduced him to the family only with the hope of interesting the feelings of the duke in his behalf. His grace was a man of a very generous disposition. He sympathized with the recital of Glastonbury, as he detailed to him the unfortunate situation of this youth, sprung from so illustrious a lineage, and yet cut off by a combination of unhappy circumstances, from almost all those natural sources whence he might have expected support and countenance. And when Glastonbury, seeing that the duke's heart was moved, added, that all he required for him, Ferdinand, was a commission in the army, for which his parents were prepared to advance the money, his grace instantly declared that he would exert all his influence to obtain their purpose.

Mr. Glastonbury was, therefore, more gratified than surprised when, a few days after the conversation which we have mentioned, his noble friend informed him, with a smile, that he believed all might be arranged, provided his young charge could make it convenient to quit England at once. A vacancy had unexpectedly occurred in a regiment just ordered to Malta, and an ensigncy had been promised to Ferdinand Armine. Mr. Glastonbury gratefully closed with the offer. He sacrificed a fourth part of his moderate independence in the purchase of the commission and the outfit of his young friend, and had the supreme satisfaction, ere the third week of their visit was completed, of forwarding a gazette to Armine, containing the appointment of Ferdinand Armine as ensign in the Royal Fusiliers.

CHAPTER VIII.

A VISIT TO GLASTONBURY'S CHAMBER.

It was arranged that Ferdinand should join his regiment by the next Mediterranean packet, which was not to quit Palmouth for a fortnight. Glastonbury and himself, therefore, lost no time in bidding adieu to their kind friends in London, and hastening to Armine. They arrived the day after the gazette. They found Sir Ratcliffe waiting for them at the town, and the fond smile and cordial embrace with which he greeted Glastonbury, more than repaid that good man for all his exertions. There was, notwithstanding, a perceptible degree of constraint both on the part of the baronet and his former tutor. It was very evident that Sir Ratcliffe had something on his mind, of which he wished to disburden himself; and it was equally apparent that Glastonbury was very unwilling to afford him an opportunity. Under these rather awkward circumstances, it was perhaps fortunate that Ferdinand talked without ceasing, giving his father an account of all he had seen, done, and heard, and of all the friends he had made, from the good Duke of —, to that capital fellow, the guard of the coach.

They were at the park gates: Lady Armine was there to meet them. The carriage stopped; Ferdinand jumped out and embraced his mother. She kissed him, and ran forward and extended both her hands to Mr. Glastonbury. "Deeds, not words, must show her feelings," she said; and the tears glittered in her beautiful eyes; Glastonbury, with a blush, pressed her hand to his lips. After dinner, during which Ferdinand recounted all his adventures, Lady Armine invited him, when she rose, to walk with her in the garden. It was then with an air of considerable confusion, clearing his throat, and filling his glass at the same time, that Sir Ratcliffe said to his remaining guest,

"My dear Glastonbury, you cannot suppose that I believe that the days of magic have returned. This commission—both Constance and myself feel, that is, we are certain—that you are at the bottom of it all. The commission is purchased. I could not expect the duke, deeply as I feel his generous kindness, to purchase a commission for my son: I could not permit it. No, Glastonbury," and here Sir Ratcliffe became more animated, "you could not permit it; my honour is safe in your hands?" Sir Ratcliffe paused for a reply.

"On that score my conscience is very clear," replied Glastonbury.

"It is then, it must be then as I suspect," rejoined Sir Ratcliffe. "I am your debtor for this great service."

"It is easy to count your obligations to me," said Glastonbury; "but mine to you and yours are incalculable."

"My dear Glastonbury," said Sir Ratcliffe, pushing his glass away, as he rose from his seat and walked up and down the room, "I may be proud, but I have no pride for you. I owe you too much—indeed, my dear friend, there is nothing that I would not accept from you, were it in your power to grant what you would desire. It is not pride, my dear Glastonbury, do not mistake me, it is not pride that prompts this explanation—but, but, had I your command of language, I would explain myself more readily—but the truth is, I—I cannot permit that you should suffer for us, Glastonbury, I cannot indeed."

Mr. Glastonbury looked at Sir Ratcliffe steadily; then rising from his seat, he took the baronet's arm, and without saying a word walked slowly towards the gates of the castle where he lodged, and which we have before described. When he had reached the steps of the tower, he withdrew his arm, and saying, "let me be pioneer," invited Sir Ratcliffe to follow him. They accordingly entered his chamber.

It was a small room lined with shelves of books except in one spot, where was suspended a portrait of Lady Barbara, which she had bequeathed him in her will. The floor was covered with so many boxes and cases, that it was not very easy to steer a course when you had entered. Glastonbury however, beckoned to his companion to seat himself in one of his two chairs, while he unlocked a small cabinet, from a drawer of which he brought forth a paper.

"It is my will," said Glastonbury, handing it to Sir Ratcliffe, who laid it down on the table.

"Nay, I wish you, my dear friend, to peruse it, for it concerns yourself."

"I would rather learn its contents from yourself, if you positively desire me," replied Sir Ratcliffe.

"I have left every thing to our child," said Glastonbury; for thus, when speaking to the father alone, he would often style the son.

"May it be long before he enjoys the bequest," said Sir Ratcliffe, brushing away a tear, "long, very long."

"As the Almighty pleases," said Glastonbury, crossing himself with great devotion. "But living or dead, I look upon all as Ferdinand's, and hold myself but the steward of his inheritance, which I will never abuse."

"O! Glastonbury, no more of this, I pray; you have wasted a precious life upon our forlorn race. Alas! how often and how keenly do I feel, that had it not been for the name of Armine, your great talents and goodness might have gained for you an enviable portion of earthly felicity; yes, Glastonbury, you have sacrificed yourself to us."

"Would that I could!" said the old man, with brightening eyes and an unaccustomed energy of manner. "Would that I could! would that any act of mine—I care not what—could revive the fortunes of the house of Armine. Honoured forever be the name, which with me is associated with all that is great and glorious in man, and (here his voice faltered, and he turned away his face) exquisite and enchanting in woman!"

"No, Ratcliffe," he resumed, "by the memory of one I cannot name—by that blessed and sainted being from whom you derived your life, you will not, you cannot, deny this last favour I ask, I entreat, I supplicate you to accord me—me, who have ever eaten of your bread, and whom your roof hath ever shrouded!"

"My friend, I cannot speak," said Sir Ratcliffe, throwing himself back in the chair, and covering his face with his right hand. "I know not what to say; I know not what to feel."

Glastonbury advanced and gently took his other hand. "Dear Sir Ratcliffe," he observed, in his usual calm, sweet voice, "if I have erred you will pardon me. I did believe that, after my long and intimate connexion with your house; after having for nearly forty years sympathized as deeply with all your fortunes as if, indeed, your noble blood flowed in these old veins; after having been honoured on your side with a friendship which has been the consolation and charm of my existence—indeed, too great a blessing, I did believe, more especially when I reminded myself of the unrestrained manner in which I had availed myself of the advantages of that friendship, I did believe—actuated by feelings which perhaps I cannot describe, and thoughts to which I cannot now give utterance—that I might venture, without offence, upon this slight service. Ay, that the offering might be made in the spirit of the most respectful affection, and not altogether be devoid of favour in your sight."

"Excellent, kind-hearted man!" said Sir Ratcliffe, pressing the hand of Glastonbury in his own; "I accept your offering in the spirit of perfect love. Believe me, dearest friend, it was no feeling of false pride that for a moment influenced me; I only felt—"

"That in venturing upon this humble service, I deprived myself of some portion of my means of livelihood; you have mistaken. When I cast my lot at Armine, I sank a portion of my capital on my life; so slender are my wants here, and so little does your dear lady permit me to desire, that, believe me, I have never yet expended upon myself this apportioned income; and, as for the rest, it is, as you have seen, destined for our Ferdinand. Yet a little time, and Adrian Glastonbury must be gathered to his fathers. Why, then, deprive him of the greatest gratification of his remaining years? the consciousness that, to be really serviceable to those he loves, it is not necessary for him to cease to exist."

"May you never repent your devotion to our house!" said Sir Ratcliffe, rising from his seat. "Time was we could give them who served us something better than thanks; but, at any rate, these come from the heart."

CHAPTER IX.

THE LAST DAY AND THE LAST NIGHT.

IN the mean time, the approaching departure of Ferdinand was the great topic of interest at Armine. It was settled that his father should accompany him to Falmouth, where he was to embark; and that they should pay a visit on their way to his grandfather, whose seat was situated in the west of England. This separation, now so near at hand, occasioned Lady Armine the deepest affliction, but she struggled to suppress her emotion. Yet often, while apparently busied with the common occupations of the day, the tears trickled down her cheek; and often she rose from her restless seat, while surrounded by those she loved, to seek the solitude of her chamber, and indulge her overwhelling sorrow. Nor was, indeed, Ferdinand less sensible of the bitterness of this separation. With all the excitement of his new prospects, and the feeling of approaching adventure and fancied independence, so flattering to inexperienced youth, he could not forget that his had been a very happy home. Nearly seventeen years of an innocent existence had passed, undisturbed by a single bad passion, and un sullied by a single action that he could regret. The river of his life had glided along, reflecting only a cloudless sky. But if he, indeed, had been dutiful and happy—if at this moment of severe examination his conscience were indeed serene—he could not but feel how much this enviable state of mind was to be attributed to those who had, as it were, imbued his life with love; whose never-varying affection had developed all the kindly feelings of his nature, had anticipated all his wants, and listened to all his wishes; had assisted him in difficulty, and guided him in doubt; had invited confidence by kindness, and deserved it by sympathy; had robbed instruction of all its labour, and discipline of all its harshness.

It was the last day; on the morrow he was to quit Armine. He strolled about among the mouldering chambers of the castle, and a host of thoughts and passions, like clouds in a stormy sky, coursed over his hitherto serene and light-hearted breast. In this first great struggle of his soul, some symptoms of his latent nature developed themselves, and, amid the rifts of the mental tempest, occasionally he caught some glimpses of self-knowledge. Nature, that had endowed him with a fiery imagination and a reckless courage, had tempered those dangerous, and hitherto those undeveloped and untried gifts, with a heart of infinite sensibility. Ferdinand and Armine was, in truth, a singular blending of the daring and the soft; and now, as he looked around him, and thought of his illustrious and fallen race, and especially of that extraordinary man, of whose splendid and ruinous career—that man's own creation—the surrounding pile seemed a fitting emblem, he asked himself if he had not inherited the energies with the name of his grand-sire, and if their exertion might not yet revive the glories of his line. He felt within him alike the power and the will: and while he indulged in magnificent reveries of fame, and glory, and heroic action, of which career, indeed, his approaching departure was to be the commencement, the association of ideas led his recollection to those beings from whom he was about to depart. His fancy dropped like a bird of paradise in full wing, tumbling exhausted in the sky; he thought of his innocent and happy boyhood; of his father's thoughtful benevolence, his sweet mother's gentle assiduities, and Glastonbury's devotion; and he demanded aloud, in a voice of misery, whether fate indeed could supply a lot more exquisite than to pass existence in these calm and beauteous bowers with such beloved companions.

His name was called: it was his mother's voice. He dashed away a desperate tear, and came forth with a smiling face. His mother and father were walking together at a little distance. He joined them.

"Ferdinand," said Lady Armine, with an air of affected gayety, "we have just been settling that you are to send me a gazelle from Malta." And in this strain, speaking of slight things, yet all in some degree touching upon the mournful incident of the morrow, did Lady Armine for some time converse, as if she were all this time trying the fortitude of her mind, and accustoming herself to a catastrophe which she was resolved to meet with fortitude.

While they were walking together, Glastonbury, who was hurrying from his rooms to the Place, for the dinner hour was at hand, joined them, and they entered their home together. It was singular at dinner, too, in what excellent spirits everybody determined to be. The dinner, also, generally a very simple repast, was almost as elaborate as the demeanour of the guests, and, although no one felt inclined to eat, consisted of every dish and delicacy which was supposed to be a favourite with Ferdinand. Sir Ratcliffe, in general so grave, was to-day quite joyous, and produced a magnum of claret, which he had himself discovered in the old cellars, and of which even Glastonbury, an habitual water-drinker, ventured to partake. As for Lady Armine, she scarcely ever ceased talking; she found a jest in every sentence, and seemed only uneasy when there was silence. Ferdinand, of course, yielded himself to the apparent spirit of the party; and, had a stranger been present, he could only have supposed that they were celebrating some anniversary of domestic joy. It seemed rather a birthday feast than the last social meeting of those who had lived together so long, and loved each other so dearly.

But, as the evening drew on, their hearts began to grow heavy, and every one was glad that the early departure of the travellers on the morrow was an excuse for speedily retiring.

"No adieu to-night!" said Lady Armine with a gay air, as she scarcely returned the habitual embrace of her son. "We shall be all up to-morrow."

So wishing his last good night, with a charged heart and faltering tongue, Ferdinand Armine took up his candle and retired to his chamber. He could not refrain from exercising an unusual scrutiny when he had entered the room. He held up the light to the old accustomed walls, and threw a parting glance of affection at the curtains. There was the glass vase which his mother had never omitted each day to fill with fresh flowers, and the counterpane that was her own handiwork. He kissed it; and, flinging off his clothes, was glad when he was surrounded by darkness, and buried in his bed.

There was a gentle tap at his door. He started.

"Are you in bed, my Ferdinand?" inquired his mother's voice.

Ere he could reply he heard the door open, and he observed a tall white figure approaching him.

Lady Armine, without speaking, knelt down by his bedside, and took him in her arms. She buried her face in his breast. He felt her tears upon his heart. He could not move; he could not speak. At length he sobbed aloud.

"May our Father that is in heaven bless you, my darling child; may He guard over you; may He preserve you!" Very weak was her still solemn voice. "I would have spared you this, my darling. For you, not for myself, have I controlled my feelings. But I knew not the strength of a mother's love. Alas! what mother has a child like thee? O! Ferdinand, my first, my only-born—child of love, and joy, and happiness, that never cost me a thought of sorrow, so kind, so gentle, and so dutiful!—must we, O! must we indeed part?"

"It is too cruel," continued Lady Armine, kissing with a thousand kisses her weeping child. "What have I done to deserve such misery as this? Ferdinand, beloved Ferdinand, I shall die."

"I will not go, mother, I will not go," wildly exclaimed the boy, disengaging himself from her embrace, and starting up in his bed. "Mother, I cannot go. No, no, it never can be good to leave a home like this."

"Hush! hush! my darling. What words are these? How unkind, how wicked is it of me to say all this! Would that I had not come! I only meant to listen at your door a minute, and hear you move, perhaps to hear you speak—and like a fool—how naughty of me!—never, never shall I forgive myself—like a miserable fool I entered."

"My own, own mother—what shall I say!—what shall I do? I love you, mother, with all my heart, and soul, and spirit's strength; I love you, mother. There is no mother loved as you are loved!"

"Tis that that makes me mad. I know it. O! why are you not like other children, Ferdinand? When your uncle left us, my father said 'Good-bye,' and shook his hand, and he, he scarcely kissed us, he was so glad to leave his home; but you—To-morrow—no, not to-morrow. Can it be to-morrow!"

"Mother, let me get up and call my father, and tell him I will not go."

"Good God! what words are these? Not go! 'Tis all your hope to go; all ours, dear child. What would your father say were he to hear me speak thus? O! that I had not entered! What a fool I am!"

"Dearest, dearest mother, believe me we shall soon meet."

"Shall we soon meet? God! how joyous will be the day!"

"And I—I will write to you by every ship."

"O! never fail, Ferdinand, never fail."

"And send you a gazelle, and you shall call it by my name, dear mother."

"Darling child!"

"You know I have often stayed a month at grandpapa's, and once six weeks. Why! eight times six weeks, and I shall be home again."

"Home! home again! eight times six weeks—A year, nearly a year! It seems eternity. Winter, and spring, and summer, and winter again—all to pass away. And for seventeen years he has scarcely been out of my sight. O! my idol, my beloved, my darling Ferdinand, I cannot believe it; I cannot believe that we are to part."

"Mother, dearest mother, think of my father, dearest; think how much his hopes are placed on me—think, dearest mother, how much I have to do. All now depends on me, you know. I must restore our house."

"O! Ferdinand, I dare not express the thoughts that rise upon me; yet I would say that, had I but my child, I could live in peace, how or where I care not."

"Dearest mother, you unman me."

"It is very wicked. I am a fool—I never, no! never shall I pardon myself for this night, Ferdinand."

"Sweet mother, I beseech you calm yourself. Believe me we shall indeed meet very soon, and, somehow or other, a little bird whispers to me we shall yet be very happy."

"But will you be the same Ferdinand to me as before! Ay! there it is, my child. You will be a man when you come back, and be ashamed to love your mother. Promise me now," said Lady Armine with extraordinary energy, "promise me, Ferdinand, you will always love me. Do not let them make you ashamed of loving me. They will joke, and jest, and ridicule all home affections. You are very young, sweet love, very, very young, and very inexperienced and susceptible. Do not let them spoil your frank and beautiful nature. Do not let them lead you astray. Remember Armine, sweetest dear, dear Armine, and those who live there. Trust me, O! yes, indeed believe me, darling, you will never find friends in this world like those you leave at Armine."

"I know it," exclaimed Ferdinand, with streaming eyes; "God be my witness how deeply I feel that truth. If I forget thee and them, dear mother, may God indeed forget me."

"My darling, darling Ferdinand," said Lady Armine, in a calm tone, "I am better now. I hardly am sorry that I did come now. It will be a consolation to me in your absence to remember all you have said. Good night, my beloved child, my darling love, good night. I shall not come down to-morrow, dear. We will not meet again—I will say good-bye to you from the window. Be happy, O!

be happy, my dear Ferdinand, and as you say, indeed, we shall soon meet again. Eight-and-forty weeks! Why that are eight-and-forty weeks! It is not quite a year. Courage, my sweet boy! let us keep up each other's spirits, love. Who knows what may yet come from this your first venture in the world! I am full of hope. I trust you will find all that you want. I packed up every thing myself. Whenever you want any thing write to your mother. Mind you have eight packages; I have written them down on a card, and placed it on the hall table. And take the greatest care of old Sir Ferdinand's sword. I am very superstitious about that sword, and while you have it I am sure you will succeed. I have ever thought that, had he taken it with him to France, all would have gone right with him. God bless, God Almighty bless you, child. Be of good heart. I will write you every thing that takes place, and, as you say, we shall soon meet. Indeed after to-night," she added in a mournful tone, "we have naught else to think of but of meeting. I fear it is very late. Your father will be surprised at my absence." She rose from his bed and walked up and down the room several times in silence; then again approaching him, she folded him in her arms and instantly quitted the chamber, without again speaking.

CHAPTER X.

THE ADVANTAGE OF BEING A FAVORITE GRANDSON.

THE exhausted Ferdinand found consolation in sleep. When he woke the dawn was just breaking. He dressed and went forth to look, for the last time, on his hereditary woods. The air was cold, but the sky was perfectly clear, and the beams of the rising sun soon spread over the blue heaven. How fresh, and glad, and sparkling was the surrounding scene! With what enjoyment did he inhale the soft and renovating breeze. The dew quivered on the grass, and the carol of the wakening birds, roused from their slumbers by the spreading warmth, resounded from the groves. From the green knoll on which he stood, he beheld the clustering village of Armine, a little agricultural settlement, formed of the peasants alone who lived on the estate. The smoke began to rise in blue curls from the cottage chimneys, and the church clock struck the hour of five. It seemed to Ferdinand that those labourers were far happier than he, since the setting sun would find them still at Armine: happy, happy Armine!

The sound of carriage-wheels aroused him from his reverie. The fatal moment had arrived. He hastened to the gate according to his promise, to bid farewell to Glastonbury. The good old man was up. He pressed his pupil to his bosom and blessed him with a choking voice.

"Dearest and kindest friend!" murmured Ferdinand.

Glastonbury placed around his neck a small golden crucifix that had belonged to Lady Barbara. "Wear it next your heart, my child," said he: "it will remind you of your God, and of us all." Ferdinand quitted the tower with a thousand blessings.

When he came in sight of the Place he saw his father standing by the carriage, which was already packed. Ferdinand ran into the house to get the card which had been left on the hall table for him by his mother. He ran over the list with the old and faithful domestic, and shook hands with him. Nothing now remained. All was ready. His father was seated. Ferdinand stood a moment in thought.

"Let me run up to my mother, sir?"

"You had better not, my child," replied Sir Ratcliffe, "she does not expect you. Come, come along."

So he slowly seated himself, with his eyes fixed on the window of his mother's chamber; and, as the carriage drove off, the window opened, and a hand waved a white handkerchief. He saw no more; but as he saw it, he clenched his hand in agony.

How different was this journey to London from his last! He scarcely spoke a word. Nothing interested him but his own feelings. The guard and the coachman, and the bustle of the inn, and the passing spectacles of the road, appeared a collection of impertinences. All of a sudden it seemed that his boyish feelings had deserted him. He was glad when they arrived in London, and glad that they were to stay in it only a single day. Sir Ratcliffe and his son called upon the duke; but, as they had anticipated, the family had quitted town. Our travellers put up at Hatchett's, and the following night started for Exeter in the Devonport mail. Ferdinand arrived at the western metropolis without having interchanged with his father scarcely a hundred sentences. At Exeter, after a night of most welcome rest, they took a post-chaise, and proceeded by a cross-road to Grandison.

When Lord Grandison, who as yet perfectly unacquainted with the revolutions in the Armine family, had clearly comprehended that his grandson had obtained a commission without either troubling him for his interest, or putting him in the disagreeable predicament of refusing his money, there were no bounds to the extravagant testimonials of his affection, both towards his son-in-law and his grandson. He seemed, indeed, quite proud of such relations; he patted Sir Ratcliffe on his back, asked a thousand questions about his darling Constance, and hugged and slobbered over Ferdinand, as if he were a child of five years old. He informed all his guests daily (and the house was very full) that Lady Armine was his favourite daughter, and Sir Ratcliffe his favourite son-in-law, and Ferdinand especially his favourite grandchild. He insisted upon Sir Ratcliffe always sitting at the head of his table, and always placed Ferdinand on his own right hand. He asked his butler aloud at dinner why he had not given a particular kind of Burgundy, because Sir Ratcliffe Armine was here.

"Darbois," said the old nobleman, "have not I told you that that Clos de Vougoet is always to be kept for Sir Ratcliffe Armine? It is his favourite wine. Clos de Vougoet directly to Sir Ratcliffe Armine. I do not think, my dear madam, (turning to a fair neighbour,) that I have yet had the pleasure of introducing you to my son-in-law, my favourite son-in-law, Sir Ratcliffe Armine.—He married my daughter Constance, my favourite daughter Constance.—Only here for a few days, a very, very few days indeed.—Quite a flying visit.—I wish I could see the whole family oftener and longer.—Passing through to Falmouth with his son, this young gentleman on my right my grandson, my favourite grandson, Ferdinand.—Just got his commission.—Ordered for Malta immediately.—He is in the Fusileers, the Royal Fusileers.—Very difficult, my dear madam, in these days to obtain a commission, especially a commission in the Royal Fusileers.—Very great interest required, very great interest indeed.—But the Armines are a most ancient family, very highly connected—very highly connected; and, between you and me, the Duke of —— would do any thing for them.—Come, come, Captain Armine, take a glass of wine with your old grandfather."

"How attached the old gentleman appears to be to his favourite grandson," whispered the lady to her neighbour.

"Delightful! yes!" was the reply; "I believe he is the favourite grandson."

In short, the old gentleman got so excited by the universal admiration lavished on his favourite grandson, that he finally insisted on seeing the young hero in his regimentals; and when Ferdinand took his leave, after a great many whispered blessings, his domestic feelings were worked up to such a pitch of enthusiasm, that he absolutely presented his grandson with a hundred-pound note.

"Thank you, my dear grandpapa," said the astonished Ferdinand, who really did not expect more than fifty—perhaps even a moiety of that more moderate sum; "thank you, my dear grandpapa; I am very much obliged to you, indeed."

"I wish I could do more for you; I do, indeed," said Lord Grandison; "but nobody ever thinks of paying his rent now. You are my grandson, my favourite grandson, my dear favourite daughter's only child. And you are an officer in his majesty's service—an officer in the Royal Fusileers—only think of that! It is the most unexpected thing that ever happened to me. To see you so well and so unexpectedly provided for, my dear child, has taken a very great load off my mind; it has indeed. You have no idea of a parent's anxiety in these matters; you have not indeed, especially of a grandfather. You will some day, I warrant you," continued the noble grandfather, with an expression between a giggle and a leer; "but do not be wild, my dear Ferdinand, do not be too wild, at least. Young blood must have its way; but be cautious; now, do; be cautious, my dear child. Do not get into any scrapes; at least do not get into any very serious scrapes; and, whatever happens to you," and here his lordship assumed a very serious, and even a solemn tone, "remember you have friends; remember, my dear boy, you have a grandfather, and that you, my dear Ferdinand, are his favourite grandson."

This passing visit to Grandison rather rallied the spirits of our travellers. When they arrived at Falmouth, they found, however, that the packet, which waited for government despatches, was not yet to sail. Sir Ratcliffe scarcely knew whether he ought to grieve or to rejoice at the reprieve; but he determined to be gay. So Ferdinand and himself passed their mornings, in visiting the mines, Pendennis Castle, and the other lions of the neighbourhood; and returned in the evening to their cheerful hotel, with good appetites for their agreeable banquet, the mutton of Dartmoor and the cream of Devon.

At length, however, the hour of separation approached; a message awaited them at the inn, on their return from one of their rambles, that Ferdinand must be on board at an early hour on the morrow. That evening the conversation between Sir Ratcliffe and his son was of a graver nature than they usually indulged in. He spoke to him in confidence of his affairs. Dark hints, indeed, had before reached Ferdinand; nor, although his parents had ever spared his feelings, could his intelligent mind have altogether refrained from guessing much that had never been formally communicated. Yet the truth was worse even than he had anticipated. Ferdinand, however, was young and sanguine. He encouraged his father with his hopes, and supported him by his sympathy. He expressed to Sir Ratcliffe his confidence that the generosity of his grandfather would prevent him at present from becoming a burden to his own parent, and he inwardly resolved that no possible circumstances should never induce him to abuse the benevolence of Sir Ratcliffe.

The moment of separation arrived. Sir Ratcliffe pressed to his bosom his only, his loving, and his beloved child. He poured over Ferdinand the deepest, the most fervid blessing that a father ever granted to a son. But, with all this pious consolation, it was a moment of agony.

BOOK II.

CHAPTER I.

PARTLY RETROSPECTIVE, YET VERY NECESSARY TO BE PERUSED.

THE courteous reader will have the kindness to understand that an interval of nearly five years had elapsed between the event which formed the subject of our last chapter and the recall to England of the regiment in which Captain Armine now commanded a company. This period of time had passed away not unfruitful of events in the experience of that family, in whose fate and feelings I have attempted to excite the interest of the reader. In this interval Ferdinand Armine had paid one short visit to his native land; a visit which had certainly been accelerated, if not absolutely occasioned, by the untimely death of his cousin Augustus, the presumptive heir of Grandison. This unforeseen event produced a very great revolution in the prospects of the family of Armine: for although the title and entailed estates of Grandison devolved to a very distant branch, the personal property of the old lord was of great amount; and, as he had no male heir now living, conjectures as to its probable dispositions were now rife among all those who could possibly become interested in it. Whatever arrangement the old lord might decide upon, it seemed nearly certain that the Armine family must be greatly benefited. Some persons even went so far as to express their conviction that every thing would be left to Mr. Armine, who everybody now discovered to have always been a particular favourite with his grandfather. At all events, Sir Ratcliffe, who ever maintained upon the subject a becoming silence, thought it as well that his son should remind his grandfather personally of his existence; and it was at his father's suggestion that Ferdinand had obtained a short leave of absence, at the first opportunity, to pay a hurried visit to Grandison and his grandfather.

The old lord yielded him a reception which might have flattered the most daring hopes. He embraced Ferdinand, and pressed him to his heart a thousand times; he gave him his blessing in the most formal manner every morning and evening; and assured everybody that he now was not only his favourite, but his only grandson. He did not even hesitate to affect a growing dislike for his own seat, because it was not in his power to leave it to Ferdinand; and he endeavoured to console that fortunate youth for this indispensable deprivation by mysterious intimations that he would, perhaps, find quite enough to do with his money in completing Armine castle, and maintaining its becoming splendour. The sanguine Ferdinand returned to Malta with the conviction that he was his grandfather's heir; and even Sir Ratcliffe was almost disposed to believe that his son's expectations were not without some show of probability, when he found that Lord Grandison had absolutely furnished him with the funds for the purchase of his company.

Ferdinand was fond of his profession. He had entered it, indeed, under the most favourable circumstances. He had joined a crack regiment in a crack garrison. Malta is certainly a most delightful station. Its city, Valetta, equals in its noble architecture, if it even do not exceed, any capital in Europe; and although it must be confessed that the surrounding region is little better than a rock, the vicinity, nevertheless, of Barbary, of Italy, and of Sicily, presents exhaustless resources to the lovers of the highest order of natural beauty. If that fair Valetta, with its streets of palaces, its picturesque fort and magnificent church, only crowned some green and azure island of the Ionian Sea, Corfu, for instance, I really think that the ideal of landscape would be realized.

To Ferdinand, who was inexperienced in the world, the dissipation of Malta, too, was delightful. It must be confessed that, under all circumstances, the first burst of emancipation from domestic routine hath in it something very fascinating. However you may be indulged at home, it is impossible to break the train of childish associations—it is impossible to escape from the feeling of dependence and the habit of submission. Charming hour when you first order your own servants and ride your own horses, instead of your father's! It is delightful even to kick about our own furniture; and there is something manly and magnanimous in paying our own taxes. Young, lively, kind, accomplished, good-looking, and well-bred, Ferdinand Armine had in him all the elements of popularity; and the novelty of popularity quite intoxicated a youth who had passed his life in a rural seclusion, where he had been appreciated, but not huzzaced. Ferdinand was not only popular, but proud of being popular. He was popular with the governor, he was popular with his colonel, he was popular with his mess, he was popular throughout the garrison. Never was a person so popular as Ferdinand Armine. He was the best rider among them, and the deadliest shot; and he soon became an oracle at the billiard-table, and a hero in the racket-court. His refined education, however, fortunately preserved him from the fate of many other lively youths; he did not degenerate into a mere hero of sports and brawls, the genius of male revels, the arbiter of roistering suppers, and the Comus of a club. His boyish feelings had their play; he soon exuded the wanton heat of which a public school would have served as a safety valve. He returned to his books, his music, and his pencil. He became more quiet, but was not less liked. If he lost some companions, he gained many friends; and, on the whole, the most boisterous wassaillers were proud of the accomplishments of their comrade; and often an invitation to a mess dinner was accompanied by a hint that Armine dined there, and that there was a chance of hearing him sing. Ferdinand now became as popular with the governor's lady as with the governor himself, was quite idolized by his colonel's wife, while not a party throughout the island was considered perfect without the presence of Mr. Armine.

Excited by his situation, Ferdinand was soon tempted to incur expenses which his income did not justify. The facility of credit afforded him not a moment to pause; every thing he wanted was furnished him; and, until the regiment quitted the garrison, he was well aware that a settlement of accounts was never even desired. Amid this imprudence he was firm, however, in his resolution never to trespass on the resources of his father. It was with difficulty that he even brought himself to draw for the allowance which Sir Ratcliffe insisted on making him; and he would gladly have saved his father from making even this advance, by vague intimations of the bounty of Lord Grandison, had he feared not this conduct might have led to suspicious and disagreeable inquiries. It cannot be denied that his debts occasionally caused him anxiety, but they were not considerable; he quieted his conscience by the belief that, if he were pressed, his grandfather could scarcely refuse to discharge a few hundred pounds for his favourite grandson; and, at all events, he felt that the ultimate resource of selling his commission was still reserved for him. If these vague prospects did not drive away compunction, the qualms of conscience were generally allayed in the evening assembly, in which his vanity was gratified. At length he paid his first visit to England. That was a happy meeting. His kind father, his dear, dear mother, and the faithful Glastonbury, experienced some of the most transporting moments of their existence, when they beheld, with admiring gaze, the hero who returned to them. Their eyes were never satiated with beholding him; they hung upon his accents. Then came the triumphant visit to Grandison; and then Ferdinand returned to Malta, in the full conviction that he was the heir of fifteen thousand a-year.

Among many other, there is one characteristic of capitals in which Valetta is not deficient: the facility with which young heirs apparent, presumptive, or expectant, can obtain any accommodation they desire. The terms—never mind the terms—who ever thinks of them? As for Ferdinand Armine, who, as the only son of an old baronet, and the supposed future inheritor of Armine Park, had always been looked upon by tradesmen with a gracious eye, he found that his popularity in this respect was not at all diminished by his visit to England, and its supposed consequences, slight expressions, uttered on his return in the confidence of convivial companionship, were repeated, misrepresented, exaggerated, and circulated in all quarters. We like those whom we love to be fortunate. Everybody rejoices in the good luck of a popular character; and soon it was generally understood that Ferdinand Armine had become next in the entail of thirty thousand a-year and a peerage.

Moreover, he was not long to wait for his inheritance. The usurers pricked up their ears, and such numerous proffers of accommodation and assistance were made to the fortunate Mr. Armine, that he really found it quite impossible to refuse them, or to reject the loans that were almost forced on his acceptance.

Ferdinand Armine had passed the Rubicon. He was in debt. If youth but knew the fatal misery that they are entailing on themselves the moment they accept a pecuniary credit to which they are not entitled, how they would start in their career how pale they would turn! how they would tremble, and clasp their hands in agony at the precipice on which they are disporting! Debt is the prolific mother of folly and of crime; it taints the course of life in all its streams. Hence so many unhappy marriages, so many prostituted pens, and venal politicians! It hath a small beginning, but a giant's growth and strength. When we make the monster, we make our master, who haunts us at all hours, and shakes his whip of scorpions forever in our sight. The slave hath no overseer so severe. Faustus, when he signed the bond with blood, did not secure a doom more terrific. But when we are young, we must enjoy ourselves. True; and there are few things more gloomy than the recollection of a youth that has not been enjoyed. What prosperity of manhood, what splendour of old age, can compensate for it! Wealth is power; and in youth, of all seasons of life, we require power, because we can enjoy every thing that we can command. What, then, is to be done? I leave the question to the schoolmen, because I am convinced that to moralize with the inexperienced availeth nothing.

The conduct of men depends upon their temperament, not upon a bunch of musty maxims. No one had been educated with more care than Ferdinand Armine; in no heart had stricter precepts of moral conduct ever been instilled. But he was lively and impetuous, with a fiery imagination, violent passions, and a daring soul. Sanguine he was as the day; he could not believe in the night of sorrow, and the impenetrable gloom that attends a career that has failed. The world was all before him; and he dashed at it like a young charger in his first strife, confident that he must rush to victory, and never dreaming of death.

Thus would I attempt to account for the extreme imprudence of his conduct on his return from England. He was confident in his future fortunes; he was excited by the applause of the men, and the admiration of the women; he determined to gratify, even to satiety, his excited and restless vanity, he broke into profuse expenditure; he purchased a yacht; he engaged a villa; his racing horses and his servants exceeded all other establishments except the governor's in breeding, in splendour, and in number. Occasionally wearied with the monotony of Malta, he obtained a short leave of absence, and passed a few weeks at Naples, Palermo, and Rome, where he glittered in the most brilliant circles, and whence he returned laden with choice specimens of art and luxury, and followed by the report of strange and flattering adventures. Finally, he was the prime patron of the Maltese opera, and brought over a celebrated Prima Donna from San Carlos in his own vessel.

In the midst of his career, Ferdinand received intelligence of the death of Lord Grandison. For tunately, when he received it, he was alone; there was no one, therefore, to witness his blank dismay when he discovered that, after all, he was not his grandfather's heir! After a vast number of the most trifling legacies to his daughters, and their husbands, and their children, and all his favourite friends, Lord Grandison left the whole of his personal property to his granddaughter Katherine, the only remaining child of his son, who had died early in life, and the sister of the lately deceased Augustus.

What was to be done now? His mother's sanguine mind—for Lady Armine broke to him the fatal intelligence—already seemed to anticipate the only remedy for this “unjust will.” It was a remedy delicately intimated, but the intimation fell upon a fine and ready ear. Yes! he must marry; he must marry his cousin; he must marry Katherine Grandison. Ferdinand looked around him at his magnificent rooms; the damask hangings of Tunis, the tall mirrors from Marseilles, the inlaid tables, the marble statues, and the alabaster vases that he had purchased at Florence and at Rome, and the delicate mats that he had himself imported from Algiers. He looked around and he shrugged his shoulders—“All this must be paid,” thought he; “and, alas! how much more!” And then came across his mind a recollection of his father and his cares, and innocent Armine, and dear Glastonbury, and his sacrifice. Ferdinand shook his head and sighed.

“How have I repaid them!” thought he. “Thank God they know nothing. Thank God they have only to bear their own disappointments and their own privations; but it is in vain to moralize. The future, not the past, must be my motto. To retreat is impossible; I may yet advance and conquer. Katherine Grandison; only think of my little cousin Kate for a wife! They say that it is not the easiest task in the world to fan a lively flame in the bosom of a cousin. The love of cousins is proverbially not of a very romantic character. ’Tis well I have not seen her much in my life, and very little of late. Familiarity breeds contempt, they say. Will she dare to despise me?” He glanced at the mirror. The inspection was not unsatisfactory. Plunged in profound meditation, he paced the room.

CHAPTER II.

IN WHICH CAPTAIN ARMINE ACHIEVES WITH RAPIDITY A RESULT WHICH ALWAYS REQUIRES GREAT DELIBERATION.

It so happened that the regiment in which Captain Armine had the honour of commanding a company, was at this time under orders of immediate recall to England; and within a month of his receipt of the fatal intelligence of his being, as he styled it, disinherited, he was on his way to his native land. This speedy departure was fortunate, because it permitted him to retire before the death of Lord Grandison became generally known, and consequently commented upon and inquired into. Previous to quitting the garrison, Ferdinand had settled his affairs for the time without the slightest difficulty, as he was still able to raise any money that he required.

On arriving at Falmouth, Ferdinand learnt that his father and mother were at Bath, on a visit to his maiden aunt, Miss Grandison, with whom his cousin now resided. As the regiment was quartered at Exeter, he was enabled in a very few days to obtain leave of absence, and join them. In the first rapture of meeting all disappointment was forgotten, and in the course of a day or two, when this sentiment had somewhat subsided, Ferdinand perceived that the shock which his parents must have necessarily experienced, was already considerably softened by the prospect in which they secretly indulged, and which various circumstances combined in inducing them to believe was by no means a visionary one.

His cousin Katherine was about his own age; mild, elegant, and very pretty. Being very fair, she looked extremely well in her deep mourning. She was not remarkable for the liveliness of her mind, yet not devoid of observation, although easily influenced by those whom she loved, and with whom she lived. Her maiden aunt evidently exercised a powerful control over her conduct and opinions: and Lady Armine was a favourite sister of this maiden aunt. Without therefore apparently directing her will, there was no lack of effort from this quarter to predispose Katherine in favour of her cousin. She heard so much of her cousin Ferdinand, of his beauty, and his goodness, and his accomplishments, that she had looked forward to his arrival with feelings of no ordinary interest. And, indeed, if the opinions and sentiments of those with whom she lived could influence, there was no need of any artifice to predispose her in favour of her cousin. Sir Rateliff and Lady Armine were wrapped up in their son. They seemed scarcely to have another idea, feeling, or thought in the world, but his existence and his felicity; and although their good sense had ever preserved them from the silly habit of uttering his panegyric in his presence, they amply compensated for this painful restraint when he was away. Then he was ever the handsomest, the cleverest, the most accomplished, and the most kind-hearted and virtuous of his sex. Fortunate the parents blessed with such a son! thrice fortunate the wife blessed with such a husband!

It was, therefore, with no ordinary emotion that Katherine Grandison heard that this perfect cousin Ferdinand had at length arrived. She had seen little of him even in his boyish days, and even then he was rather a hero in their Lilliputian circle.

Ferdinand Armine was always looked up to at Grandison, and always spoken of by her grandfather as a very fine fellow indeed; a wonderfully fine fellow, his favourite grandson, Ferdinand Armine; and now he had arrived. His knock was heard at the door, his step was on the stairs, the door opened, and certainly his first appearance did not disappoint his cousin Kate. So handsome, so easy, so gentle, and so cordial; they were all the best friends in a moment. Then he embraced his father with such fervour, and kissed his mother with such fondness; it was very evident that he had an excellent heart. His arrival, indeed, was a revolution. Their mourning days seemed at once to disappear: and although they of course entered society very little, and never frequented any public amusement, it seemed to Katherine that all of a sudden she lived in a round of delightful gaiety. Ferdinand was so amusing and so accomplished!

He sang with her, he played with her; he was always projecting long summer rides, and long summer walks. Then his conversation was so different to every thing to which she had ever listened. He had seen so many things and so many persons; every thing that was strange, and everybody that was famous. His opinions were so original, his illustrations so apt and lively, his anecdotes so inexhaustible and sparkling! Poor, inexperienced, innocent Katherine! Her cousin in four-and-twenty hours found it quite impossible to fall in love with her; and so he determined to make her fall in love with him. He quite succeeded. She adored him. She did not believe that there was any one in the world so handsome, so good, so clever! No one, indeed, who knew Ferdinand Armine, could deny that he was a rare being; but, had there been any acute and unprejudiced observers who had known him in his younger and happier hours, they would perhaps have remarked some difference in his character and conduct, and not a favourable one. He was indeed more brilliant, but not quite so interesting as in old days; far more dazzling, but not quite so apt to charm. No one could deny his lively talents and his perfect breeding, but there was a restlessness about him, an excited and exaggerated style, which might have made some suspect that his demeanour was an effort, and that under a superficial glitter, by which so many are deceived, there was no little deficiency of the genuine and sincere. Katherine Grandison, however, was not one of those profound observers. She was easily captivated. Ferdinand, who really did not feel sufficient emotion to venture upon a scene, made his proposals to her when they were riding in a green lane; the sun just setting, and the evening star glittering through a vista. The lady blushed, and wept, and sobbed, and hid her fair and streaming face, but the result was as satisfactory as our hero could desire. The young equestrians kept their friends in the Crescent at least two hours for dinner, and then had no appetite for the repast when they had arrived. Nevertheless the maiden aunt, although a very particular personage, made this day no complaint, and was evidently far from being dissatisfied with anybody or any thing. As for Ferdinand, he called for a tumbler of Champagne, and secretly drank his own health, as the luckiest fellow of his acquaintance, with a pretty, amiable, and high-bred wife, with all his debts paid, and the house of Armine restored.

CHAPTER III.

IN WHICH FERDINAND RETURNS TO ARMINE.

It was settled that a year must clapse from the death of Lord Grandison before the young couple could be united, a reprieve which did not occasion Ferdinand any very acute grief. In the mean time the Grandisons were to pass at least the autumn at Armine, and thither the united families proposed soon to direct their progress. Ferdinand, who had been nearly two months at Bath, and was a little wearied of courtship, contrived to quit that city before his friends, on the plea of visiting London, to arrange about selling his commission; for it was agreed that he should quit the army.

On his arrival in London, having spoken to his agent, and finding town quite empty, he set off immediately for Armine, in order that he might have the pleasure of being there a few days without the society of his intended; run through the woods on the approaching first of September; and, especially, embrace his dear Glastonbury. For it must not be supposed that Ferdinand had forgotten for a moment this invaluable friend; on the contrary, he had written to him several times since his arrival; always assuring him that nothing but important business could prevent him from instantly paying him his respects.

It was with feelings of no common emotion, it was with feelings even of agitation, that Ferdinand beheld the woods of his ancient home rise in the distance, and soon the towers and turrets of Armine Castle. Those venerable bowers, that proud and lordly house, were not then to pass away from their old and famous line? He had redeemed the heritage of his great ancestry; he looked with unmingled complacency on the magnificent landscape, once to him a source of as much anxiety as affection. What a change in the destiny of the Armines! Their glory restored; his own devoted and domestic hearth, once the prey of so much care and gloom, crowned with ease, and happiness, and joy; on all sides a career of splendour and felicity. And he had done all this! What a prophet was his mother! She had ever indulged the fond conviction that her beloved son would be their restorer. How wise and pious was the undeviating confidence of kind old Glastonbury in their fate! With what pure, what heartfelt delight, would that faithful friend listen to his extraordinary communication!

His carriage dashed through the park gates as if the driver were sensible of his master's pride and exultation. Glastonbury was ready to welcome him, standing in the flower-garden, which he had made so rich and beautiful, and which had been the charm and consolation of many of their humble hours.

"My dear, dear father," exclaimed Ferdinand, embracing him, for thus he ever styled his old tutor.

But Glastonbury could not speak; the tears quivered in his eyes and trickled down his faded cheek. Ferdinand led him into the house.

"How well you look, dear father," continued Ferdinand; "you really look younger and heartier than ever. You received all my letters, I am sure; and yours—how kind of you to remember and to write to me! I never forgot you, my dear, dear friend. I never forgot you. Do you know I am the happiest fellow in the world? I have the greatest news in the world to tell my Glastonbury! and we owe every thing to you, every thing. What would Sir Ratcliffe have been without you? what should I have been? Fancy the best news you can, dear friend, and it is not as good as I have got to tell. You will rejoice, you will be delighted! We shall furnish a castle! by Jove, we shall furnish a castle! we shall, indeed, and you shall build it! No more gloom; no more care. The Armines shall hold their heads up again, by Jove they shall! Dearest, dearest of men, I dare say you think me mad. I am mad; mad with joy. How that Virginian creeper has grown! I have brought you such lots of plants, my father! a complete Sicilian Hortus Siccus. Ah, John, faithful John! give me your hand. How is your wife? Take care of my pistol-case. Ask Louis; he knows all.

about every thing. Well, my dear, dear Glastonbury, and how have you been! how is the old tower! how are the old books, and the old staff, and old arms, and the old every thing? dear, dear, Glastonbury!"

While the carriage was unpacking, and the dinner table prepared, the friends walked in the garden, and from thence strolled towards the tower, where they remained some time pacing up and down the beechen avenue. It was very evident, on their return, that Ferdinand had communicated his great intelligence. The countenance of Glastonbury was quite radiant with delight. Indeed, although he had dined, he accepted with readiness Ferdinand's invitation to repeat the ceremony; nay, he quaffed more than one glass of wine: and, I believe, even drank the health of every member of the united families of Armine and Grandison. It was late, very late, before the companions parted, and retired for the night; and I think, before they bade each other good night, they must have talked over every circumstance that had occurred in their experience since the birth of Ferdinand.

CHAPTER IV.

IN WHICH SOME LIGHT IS THROWN ON THE TITLE OF THIS WORK.

How delicious, after a long, long absence, to walk on a sunny morning, and find ourselves at home! Ferdinand could scarcely credit that he was really again at Armine. He started up in his bed, and rubbed his eyes, and stared at the unaccustomed, yet familiar sights, and, for a moment, Malta, and the Royal Fusiliers, Bath and his betrothed, were all a dream; and then he remembered the visit of his dear mother to this very room on the eve of his first departure. He had returned; in safety he had returned, and in happiness, to accomplish all her hopes, and to reward her for all her solicitude. Never felt any one more content than Ferdinand Armine—more content and more grateful.

He rose and opened the casement; a rich and exhilarating perfume filled the chamber; he looked with a feeling of delight and pride over the broad and beautiful park; the tall trees rising and flinging their taller shadows over the bright and dewy turf, and the last mists clearing away from the distant woods, and blending with the spotless sky. Every thing was sweet and still, save, indeed, the carol of the birds, or the tinkle of some restless bell-wether. It was a rich autumnal morn. And yet, with all the excitement of his new views in life, and the blissful consciousness of the happiness of those he loved, he could not but feel that a great change had come over his spirit since the days he was wont to ramble in this old haunt of boyhood. His innocence was gone. Life was no longer that deep unbroken trance of duty and of love from which he had been roused to so much care; and if not remorse, at least to so much compunction. He had no secrets then. Existence was not then a subterfuge, but a calm and candid state of serene enjoyment. Feelings then were not compromised for interests; and then it was the excellent that was studied, not the expedient. "Yet such I suppose is life," murmured Ferdinand; "we moralize when it is too late; nor is there any thing more silly than to regret. One event makes another: what we anticipate seldom occurs; what we least expect generally happens; and time can only prove which is most for our advantage. And surely I am the last person who should look grave. Our ancient house rises from its ruins; the beings I love most in the world are not only happy, but indebted to me for their happiness, and I—I myself, with every gift of fortune suddenly thrown at my feet—what more can I desire? Am I not satisfied? Why do I even ask the question? I am sure I know not. It rises like a devil in my thoughts, and spoils every thing. The girl is young, noble, and fair—and loves me. And her—I love her—at least I suppose I love her. I love her at any rate as much as I love, or ever did love, woman. There is no great sacrifice, then, on my part; there should be none; there is none; unless, indeed, it be that a man does not like to give up without a struggle all his chance of romance and rapture.

"I know not how it is, but there are moments I almost wish that I had no father and no mother; ay! not a single friend or relative in the world, and that Armine was sunk into the very centre of the earth. If I stood alone in the world, methinks I might find a place that suits me;—now every thing seems ordained for me, as it were, beforehand. My spirit has had no play. Something whispers me that, with all its flush prosperity, this is neither wise nor well. God knows that I am not heartless, and would be grateful; and yet, if life can afford me no deeper sympathy than I have yet experienced, I cannot but hold it, even with all its sweet affections, as little better than a dull delusion."

While Ferdinand was thus moralizing at the casement, Glastonbury appeared beneath; and his appearance dissipated in an instant this gathering gloom. "Let us breakfast together," proposed Ferdinand. "I have breakfasted these two hours," replied the hermit of the gate. "I hope that on the first night of your return to Armine you have proved auspicious dreams."

"My bed and I are old companions," said Ferdinand; "and we agreed very well. I tell you what, my dear Glastonbury, we will have a stroll together this morning, and talk over our plans of last night. Go into the library and look over my sketch-books. You will find them on my pistol-case, and I will be with you anon."

In due time the friends commenced their ramble. Ferdinand soon became excited by Glastonbury's various suggestions for the completion of the castle; and as for the old man himself, between his architectural creation and the restoration of the family, to which he had been so long devoted, he was in a rapture of enthusiasm, which afforded an amusing contrast to his usual meek and subdued demeanour.

"Your grandfather was a great man," said Glastonbury, who in old days seldom ventured to mention the name of the famous Sir Ferdinand: "there is no doubt he was a very great man. He had great ideas. How he would glory in our present prospects! 'Tis strange what a strong confidence I have ever had in the destiny of your house. I felt sure that Providence would not desert you. There is no doubt we must have a portcullis." "Decidedly a portcullis," said Ferdinand.

shall make all the drawings yourself, my dear Glastonbury, and supervise every thing. We will not have a single anachronism. It shall be perfect."

"Perfect," echoed Glastonbury; "really perfect! It shall be a perfect Gothic castle. I have such treasures for the work. All the labours of my life have tended to this object. I have all the emblazonings of your house since the conquest. There shall be three hundred shields in the hall. I will paint them myself. O! there is no place in the world like Armine!"

"Nothing," said Ferdinand; "I have seen a great deal, but, after all, there is nothing like Armine."

"Had we been born to this splendour," said Glastonbury, "we should have thought little of it. We have been mildly and wisely chastened. I cannot sufficiently admire the wisdom of Providence, which has tempered, by such a wise dispensation, the too eager blood of your race."

"I should be sorry to pull down the old Place," said Ferdinand.

"It must not be," said Glastonbury; "we have lived there happily, though humbly."

"I would we could move it to another part of the park, like the house of Loretto," said Ferdinand with a smile.

"We can cover it with ivy," observed Glastonbury, looking somewhat grave.

The morning stole away in these agreeable plans and prospects. At length the friends parted, agreeing to meet again at dinner. Glastonbury repaired to his tower, and Ferdinand, taking his gun, sauntered into the surrounding wilderness.

But he felt no inclination for sport. The conversation with Glastonbury had raised a thousand thoughts over which he longed to brood. His life had been a scene of such constant excitement, since his return to England, that he had enjoyed little opportunity of indulging in calm self-communion; and now that he was at Armine, and alone, the contrast between his past and his present situation struck him so forcibly, that he could not refrain from falling into a reverie upon his fortunes. It is wonderful—all wonderful—very, very wonderful. There seemed, indeed, as Glastonbury affirmed, a providential dispensation in the whole transaction. The fall of his family—the heroic, and, as it now appeared, prescient firmness with which his father had elung, in all their deprivations, to his unproductive patrimony—his own education—the extinction of his mother's house—his very follies, once to him a cause of so much unhappiness, but which it now seemed were all the time compelling him, as it were, to his prosperity;—all these, and a thousand other traits and circumstances, flitted over his mind, and were each in turn the subject of his manifold meditation. Willing was he to credit that destiny had reserved for him the character of restorer: that duty, indeed, he had accepted, and yet—

He looked around him as if to see what devil was whispering in his ear. He was alone. No one was there or near. Around him rose the silent bowers, and scarcely the voice of a bird or the hum of an insect disturbed the deep tranquillity. But a cloud seemed to rest on the fair and pensive brow of Ferdinand Armine. He threw himself on the turf, leaning his head on one arm, and with the other plucking wild flowers, which he as hastily, almost as fretfully, flung away.

"Conceal it as I will," he exclaimed, "I am a victim; disguise them as I may, all the considerations are worldly. There is, there must be, something better in this world than power, and wealth, and rank; and surely there must be felicity more rapturous even than securing the happiness of a parent. Ah! dreams in which I have so oft and so fondly indulged, are yet, indeed, after all, but fantastical and airy visions? Is love, indeed, a delusion, or am I marked out from men alone to be exempted from its delicious bondage? It must be a delusion. All laugh at it, all jest about it, all agree in stigmatizing it the vanity of vanities. And does my experience contradict this harsh but common fame? Alas! what have I seen or known to give the lie to this ill-report? No one—nothing. Some women I have met more beautiful, assuredly, than Kate, and many, many less fair; and some have crossed my path with a wild and brilliant grace, that has for a moment dazzled my sight, and, perhaps, for a moment lured me from my way. But these shooting stars have but glittered transiently in my heaven, and only made me, by their evanescent brilliancy, more sensible of its gloom. Let me believe then, O! let me of all men then believe, that the forms that inspire the sculptor and the painter have no models in nature; that that combination of beauty and grace, of fascinating intelligence and fond devotion, over which men brood in the soft hours of their young loneliness, is but the promise of a better world and not the charm of this one.

"But, what terror in that truth! what despair! what madness! Yes! at this moment of severest scrutiny, how profoundly I feel that life without love is worse than death! How vain and void, how flat and fruitless, appear all those splendid accidents of existence for which men struggle, without this essential and pervading charm! What a world without a sun! Yes! without this transcendent sympathy, riches and rank, and even power and fame, seem to me at best but jewels set in a coronet of lead!

"And who knows whether that extraordinary being, of whose magnificent yet ruinous career this castle is in truth a fitting emblem, I say who knows whether the secret of his wild and restless course is not hidden in this same sad lack of love! Perhaps, while the world, the silly superficial world, marvelled and moralized of his wanton life, and poured forth their anathemas against his heartless selfishness, perchance he all the time was sighing for some soft bosom whereon to pour his overwhelming passion—even as I am!

"O! nature! why art thou beautiful! My heart requires not, imagination cannot paint, a sweeter or a fairer scene than these surrounding bowers. This azure vault of heaven, this golden sunshine, this deep and blending shade, these rare and fragrant shrubs, yon grove of green and tallest pines, and the bright gliding of this swan-crowned lake—my soul is charmed with all this beauty and this sweetness! I feel no disappointment here; my mind does not here outrun reality; here there is no cause to mourn over ungratified hopes and fanciful desires. Is it then my destiny that I am to be baffled only in the dearest desires of my heart?"

At this moment the loud and agitated barking of his dogs at some little distance roused Ferdinand from his reverie. He called them to him, and soon one of them obeyed his summons, but instantly returned to his companion with such significant ge-cures, panting and yelping, that Ferdinand supposed that Basto was caught perhaps in some trap; so, taking up his gun, he proceeded to the dog's rescue.

To his great surprise, as he was about to emerge from a bower on to a plot of turf, in the centre of which grew a very large cedar, he beheld a lady in a riding-habit standing before the tree, and evidently admiring its beautiful proportions.

Her countenance was raised and motionless. It seemed to him that it was more radiant than the sunshine. He gazed with rapture on the dazzling brilliancy of her complexion, the delicate regularity of her features, and the large violet-tinted eyes, fringed with the longest and the darkest lashes that he had ever beheld. From her position her hat had fallen to the very back of her head, revealing her lofty and pellucid brow, and the dark and lustrous locks that were braided over her temples. The whole countenance combined that brilliant health and that classic beauty which we associate with the idea of some nymph tripping over the dew-bespangled meads of Ida, or glancing amid the hallowed groves of Greece. Although the lady could scarcely have seen eighteen summers, her stature was above the common height; but language cannot describe the startling symmetry of her superb figure.

There is no love but love at first sight. This is the transcendent and surpassing offspring of sheer and unpolluted sympathy. All other is the illegitimate result of observation, of reflection, of compromise, of comparison, of expediency. The passions that endure flash like the lightning: they scorch the soul, but it is warmed forever. Miserable man whose love rises by degrees upon the frigid morning of his mind! Some hours indeed of warmth and lustre may perchance fall to his lot; some moments of meridian splendour, in which he basks in what he deems eternal sunshine. But then how often overcast by the clouds of care, how often dusked by the blight of misery and misfortune! And certain as the gradual rise of such affection is its gradual decline, and melancholy set. Then, in the chill dim twilight of his soul, he execrates custom; because he has madly expected that feelings could be habitual that were not homogeneous, and because he has been guided by the observation of sense, and not by the inspiration of sympathy.

Amid the gloom and travail of existence suddenly to behold a beautiful being, and, as instantaneously, to feel an overwhelming conviction that with that fair form forever our destiny must be entwined; that there is no more joy but in her joy, no sorrow but when she grieves; that in her sight of love, in her smile of fondness, hereafter is all bliss; to feel our flaunting ambition fade away like a shrivelled gourd before her visions; to feel fame a juggle and posterity a lie; and to be prepared at once, for this great object, to forfeit and fling away all former hopes, ties, schemes, views; to violate in her favour every duty of society;—this is a lover, and this is love! Magnificent, sublime, divine sentiment! An immortal flame burns in the breast of that man who adores and is adored. He is an ethereal being. The accidents of earth touch him not. Revolutions of empires, changes of creed, mutations of opinion, are to him but the clouds and meteors of a stormy sky. The schemes and struggles of mankind are, in his thinking, but the anxieties of pigmies, and the fantastical achievements of apes. Nothing can subdue him. He laughs alike at loss of fortune, loss of friends, loss of character. The deeds and thought of men are to him equally indifferent. He does not mingle in their paths of callous bustle, or hold himself responsible to the airy impostures before which they bow down. He is a mariner, who, in the sea of life, keeps his gaze fixedly on a single star; and, if that do not shine, he lets go the rudder, and glories when his bark descends into the bottomless gulf.

Yes! it was this mighty passion that now raged in the heart of Ferdinand Armine, as, pale, trembling, panting, he withdrew a few paces from the overwhelming spectacle, and leaned against a tree in a chaos of emotion. What had he seen? What ravishing vision had risen upon his sight? What did he feel? What wild, what delicious, what maddening impulse now pervaded his frame? A storm seemed raging in his soul—a mighty wind, dispelling in its course the sullen clouds and vapours of long years. He was, indeed, as one possessed, waving his agitated arm to heaven, and stamping his restless foot upon the uncongenial earth. Silent he was, indeed, for he was speechless; though the big drop that quivered on his brow, and the slight foam that played upon his lip, proved the difficult triumph of passion over expression. But, as the wind clears the heaven, passion eventually tranquillizes the soul. The tumult of the mind gradually subsided; the flitting memories, the scudding thoughts, that for a moment had coursed about in such wild order, vanished and melted away, and a feeling of bright serenity succeeded, a sense of beauty and of joy, and of hovering and circumambient happiness.

He advanced, he gazed again; the lady was still there. Changed, indeed, her position; her front was towards him. She had gathered a flower, and was examining its beauty.

"Henrietta!" exclaimed a manly voice from the adjoining wood. Before she could answer, a stranger came forward, a man of middle age, but of an appearance remarkably prepossessing. He was tall and dignified, fair, with a very aquiline nose. One of Ferdinand's dogs followed him barking.

"I cannot find the gardener anywhere," said the stranger; "I think we had better remount."

"Ah, me! what a pity," exclaimed the lady.

"Let me be your guide," said Ferdinand, advancing.

The lady rather started; the gentleman, not at all discomposed, welcomed Ferdinand with great elegance, and said, "I feel that we are intruders, sir. But we were informed by the woman at the lodge that the family were not here present, and that we should find her husband in the grounds."

"The family are not at Armine," replied Ferdinand; "I am sure, however, Sir Rateliff would be most happy for you to walk about the grounds as much as you please; and as I am well acquainted with them, I should feel delighted to be your guide."

"You are really too courteous, sir," replied the gentleman; and his beautiful companion rewarded Ferdinand with a smile like a sunbeam, that played about her countenance till it finally settled into two exquisite dimples, and revealed to him rows of teeth that, for a moment, he believed to be even the most beautiful feature of the surpassing visage.

They sauntered along, every one developing new beauties in their progress, and deriving from his companions renewed expressions of rapture. The dim bowers, the shining glades, the tall rare trees, the luxuriant shrubs, the silent and sequestered lake, in turn enchanted them, until, at length, Ferdinand, who had led them with experienced taste through all the most striking points of the pleasure, brought them before the walls of the castle.

"And here is Armine Castle," he said; "it is little better than a shell, and yet contains something which you might like to see."

"O! by all means," exclaimed the lady.

"But we are spoiling your sport," suggested the gentleman.

"I can always kill partridges," replied Ferdinand, laying down his gun; "but I cannot always find agreeable companions."

So saying, he opened the massy portal of the castle, and they entered the hall. It was a lofty chamber, of dimensions large enough to feast a thousand vassals, with a dais and a rich Gothic screen, and a gallery for the musicians. The walls were hung with arms and armour admirably arranged; but the parti-coloured marble floor was so covered with piled-up cases of furniture, that the general effect of the scene was not only greatly marred, but it was even difficult in some parts to trace a path.

"Here," said Ferdinand, jumping upon a huge case, and running to the wall, "here is the standard of Ralph D'Ermy, who came over with the Conqueror, and founded the family in England. Here is the sword of William D'Army, who signed Magna Charta. Here is the complete coat armour of the second Ralph, who died before Ascalon. This case contains a diamond-hilted sword, given by the empress to the great Sir Ferdinand, for defeating the Turks; and here is a Mameluke sabre, given to the same Sir Ferdinand by the sultan, for defeating the empress."

"O! I have heard so much of that great Sir Ferdinand," said the lady, "I think he must have been the most interesting character that ever existed."

"He was a marvellous being," answered her guide, with a peculiar look, "and yet I know not whether his descendants have not cause to rue his genius."

"O! never, never!" said the lady; "what is wealth to genius? How much prouder, were I an Armine, should I be of such an ancestor, than of a thousand others, even if they had left me this castle as complete as he wished it to be!"

"Well, as to that," replied Ferdinand, "I believe I am somewhat of your opinion; though I fear he lived in too late an age for such order of minds. It would have been better for him, perhaps, if he had succeeded in becoming King of Poland."

"I hope there is a portrait of him," said the lady; "there is nothing I long so much to see. I feel quite in love with the great Sir Ferdinand."

"I rather think there is a portrait," replied her companion, somewhat dryly. "We will try to find it out. Do not you think I make an excellent cicero?"

"Indeed, most excellent," replied the lady.

"I perceive you are master of your subject," replied the gentleman, thus affording Ferdinand an easy opportunity of telling them who he was. The hint, however, was not accepted.

"And now," said Ferdinand, "we will ascend the staircase."

Accordingly they mounted a large spiral staircase, which indeed filled the space of a round tower, and was lighted from the top by a lantern of rich coloured glass, on which were emblazoned the arms of the family. Then they entered the vestibule,—an apartment spacious enough for a saloon; which, however, was not fitted up in the Gothic style, but of which the painted ceiling, the gilded panels, and inlaid floor, were more suitable indeed to a French palace. The brilliant doors of this vestibule opened in many directions upon long suites of state-chambers, which indeed merited the description of shells. They were nothing more: of many the flooring was not even laid down; the walls of all were rough and plastered.

"Ah!" said the lady, "what a pity it is not finished!"

"It is indeed desolate," observed Ferdinand, "but here perhaps is something more to your taste." So saying, he opened another door, and ushered them into the picture gallery.

It was a superb chamber, nearly two hundred feet in length, and contained only portraits of the family, or pictures of their achievements. It was of a pale green colour, lighted from the top; and the floor, of oak and ebony, was partially covered with a single Persian carpet, of the most fanciful pattern and brilliant die, a present from the sultan to the great Sir Ferdinand. The earlier annals of the family were illustrated by a series of paintings, by modern masters, representing the battle of Hastings, the siege of Ascalon, the meeting at Runnymede, the various invasions of France, and some of the most striking incidents in the wars of the Roses, in all of which a valiant Army prominently figured. At length they stood before the first contemporary portrait of the Army family, one of Cardinal Stephen Army, by an Italian master. The great dignitary was legate of the pope in the time of the seventh Henry, and in his scarlet robes and ivory chair, looked like a papal Jupiter, not unworthy himself of wielding the thunder of the Vatican. From him the series of the family portraits was unbroken; and it was very interesting to trace, in this excellently arranged collection, the history of national costume. Holbein had commemorated the Lords Tewkesbury rich in velvet, and golden chains, and jewels. The statesmen of Elizabeth and James, and their beautiful and gorgeous dames, followed; and then came many a gallant cavalier by Vandyke. One admirable picture contained Lord Armine and his brave brothers, seated together in a tent round a drum, on which his lordship was apparently planning the operations of the campaign. Then followed a long series of unmemorable baronets, and their more interesting wives and daughters, touched by the pencil of Kneller, of Lely, or of Hudson, squires in wigs and scarlet jackets, and powdered dames in hoops and farthingales.

They stood before the crowning effort of the room, the masterpiece of Reynolds. It represented a full-length portrait of a young man, apparently just past his minority. The side of the figure was alone exhibited, and the face glanced at the spectator over the shoulder, in a favourite position of Vandyke. It was a countenance of ideal beauty. A profusion of dark brown curls was dashed aside from a lofty forehead of dazzling brilliancy. The face was perfectly oval; the nose, though small, was high and aquiline, and exhibited a remarkable dilation of the nostril; the curling lip was shaded by a very delicate mustachio; and the general expression, indeed, of the mouth and of the large gray eyes, would have been perhaps arrogant and imperious, had not the extraordinary beauty of the whole countenance rendered it fascinating.

It was indeed a picture to gaze upon and to return to; one of those visages which, after having once beheld, haunt us at all hours, and flit across our mind's eye unexpected and unbidden. So great indeed was the effect that it produced upon the present visitors to the gallery, that they stood before it for some minutes in silence; the scrutinizing glance of the gentleman indeed was more than once diverted from the portrait to the countenance of his conductor, and the silence was eventually broken by our hero.

"And what think you," he inquired, "of the famous Sir Ferdinand?"

The lady started, looked at him, withdrew her glance, and appeared somewhat confused. Her companion replied, "I think, sir, I cannot err in believing that I am indebted for much courtesy to his descendant."

"I believe," said Ferdinand, laughing, "that I should not have much trouble in proving my pedigree. I am generally considered an ugly likeness of my grandfather."

The gentleman smiled, and then said, "I hardly know whether I can style myself your neighbour, for I live nearly ten miles distant. It would, however, afford me sincere gratification to see you at Ducie Bower. I cannot welcome you in a castle. My name is Temple," he continued, offering his card to Ferdinand. "I need not now introduce you to my daughter. I was not unaware that Sir Ratcliffe Armine had a son, but I understood that he was abroad."

"I have returned to England within these two months," replied Ferdinand, "and to Armine within these two days. I deem it fortunate that my return has afforded me an opportunity of welcoming you and Miss Temple. But you must not talk of our castle, for that you know is our folly. Pray come now and visit our older and humbler dwelling; and take some refreshment after your long ride."

This offer was declined, but with great courtesy. They quitted the castle, and Mr. Temple was about to direct his steps towards the lodge, where he had left his own and his daughter's horses; but Ferdinand persuaded them to return through the park, which he proved to them very satisfactorily must be the nearest way. He even asked permission to accompany them; and, while his groom was saddling his horse, he led them to the old Place, and the flower-garden.

"You must be very fatigued, Miss Temple. I wish that I could persuade you to enter and rest yourself."

"Indeed, no: I love flowers too much to leave them."

"Here is one that has the recommendation of novelty as well as beauty," said Ferdinand, plucking a strange rose, and presenting it to her. "I sent it to my mother from Barbary."

"You live amidst beauty."

"I think that I never remember Armine looking so well as to-day."

"A silvan scene requires sunshine," replied Miss Temple. "We have, indeed, been most fortunate in our visit."

"It is something brighter than the sunshine that makes it so fair," replied Ferdinand; but at this moment the horses appeared.

CHAPTER V.

IN WHICH CAPTAIN ARMINE IS VERY ABSENT DURING DINNER.

"You are well mounted," said Mr. Temple to Ferdinand.

"'Tis a barb—I brought it over with me."

"'Tis a beautiful creature," said Miss Temple.

"Hear that, Selim," said Ferdinand; "prick up thine ears, my steed. I perceive that you are an accomplished horsewoman, Miss Temple. You know our country, I dare say, well?"

"I wish I knew it better. This is only the second summer that we have passed at Ducie."

"By-the-by; I suppose you know my landlord, Captain Armine?" said Mr. Temple.

"No," said Ferdinand; "I do not know a single person in the county. I have myself scarcely been at Armine for these five years, and my father and mother do not visit any one."

"What a beautiful oak!" exclaimed Miss Temple, desirous of turning the conversation.

"It has the reputation of being planted by Sir Francis Walsingham," said Ferdinand. "An ancestor of mine married his daughter. He was the father of Sir Walsingham, the portrait in the gallery with the white stick. You remember it?"

"Perfectly: that beautiful portrait! It must be at all events a very old tree."

"There are few things more pleasing to me than an ancient place," said Mr. Temple.

"Doubly pleasing when in possession of an ancient family," added his daughter.

"I fear such feelings are fast wearing away," said Ferdinand.

"There will be a reaction," said Mr. Temple.

"They cannot destroy the poetry of time," said the lady.

"I hope I have no very inveterate prejudices," said Ferdinand; "but I should be sorry to see Armine in any other hands than our own, I confess."

"I never would enter the park again," said Miss Temple.

"As far as worldly considerations are concerned," continued Ferdinand, "it would, perhaps, be much better for us if we were to part with it."

"It must, indeed, be a costly place to keep up," said Mr. Temple.

"Why, as far as that is concerned," said Ferdinand, "we let the kine rove and the sheep browse where our fathers hunted the stag and slew their falcons. I think if they were to rise from their graves, they would be ashamed of us."

"Nay!" said Miss Temple, "I think yonder cattle are very picturesque. But the truth is, any thing would look well in such a park as this. There is such a variety of prospect."

The park of Armine, indeed, differed very materially from those vamped-up sheep-walks and ambitious paddocks which are now honoured with the title. It was, in truth, the old chase, and little shorn of its original proportions. It was many miles in circumference, abounding in hill and dale, and offering much variety of appearance. Sometimes it was studded with ancient timber, single trees of extraordinary growth, and rich clumps that seemed coeval with the foundation of the family. Tracts of wild champaign succeed these, covered with gorse and fern. Then came stately avenues of sycamore or Spanish chestnut, fragments of stately woods, that in old days, doubtless, reached the vicinity of the mansion house. And these were in turn succeeded by modern coverts.

At length our party reached the gate whence Ferdinand had calculated that they should quit the park. He would willingly have accompanied them. He bade them farewell with regret, which was softened by the hope expressed by all of a speedy meeting.

"I wish, Captain Armine," said Miss Temple, "we had your turf to canter home upon. Now, mind you do not get locked up in the picture gallery, by mistake, and forget to come to Ducie."

"That is, indeed, impossible," said Ferdinand.

"By-the-by, Captain Armine," said Mr. Temple, "ceremony should scarcely subsist between country neighbours, and certainly we have given you no cause to complain of our reserve. As you are alone at Armine, perhaps you would come over and dine with us to-morrow. If you can manage to come early, we will see whether we may not contrive to kill a bird together; and pray remember we can give you a bed, which I think, all things considered, it would be but wise to accept."

"I accept every thing," said Ferdinand, smiling; "all your offers. Good morning, my dearest sir; good morning, Miss Temple."

"Miss Temple, indeed!" exclaimed Ferdinand, when he had watched them out of sight. "Exquisite, enchanting, adored being! Without thee, what is existence? How dull, how blank does every thing even now seem! It is as if the sun had just set. O! that form! that radiant countenance! that musical and thrilling voice! Those tones still vibrate on my ear, or I should deem it all a vision! Will to-morrow ever come? O! that I could express to you, my love, my overwhelming, my absorbing, my burning passion! Beautiful, beautiful Henrietta! Thou hast a name, methinks, I ever loved. Where am I!—what do I say!—what wild, what maddening words are these? Am I not Ferdinand Armine, the betrothed—the victim? Even now methinks I hear the chariot wheels of my bride. God! if she be there—if she indeed be at Armine on my return—I'll not see her—I'll not speak to them—I'll fly. I'll cast to the winds all ties and duties—I will not be dragged to the altar, a miserable sacrifice, to redeem, by my forfeited felicity, the worldly fortunes of my race. O! Armine, Armine—she would not enter thy walls again, if other blood but mine swayed thy fair demesne: and I, shall I give thee another mistress, Armine? It would indeed be treason! Without her I cannot live. Without her form bounds over this turf, and glances in these arbours, I never wish to view them. All the inducements to make the wretched sacrifice once meditated then vanish; for Armine without her is a desert—a tomb—a hell. I am free then. Excellent logician! But this woman—I am bound to her. Bound? The word makes me tremble. I shiver: I hear the clank of my fetters. Am I, indeed, bound? Ay! in honour, honour and love. A contest! Pah! The idol must yield to the divinity!"

With these wild words and wilder thoughts bursting from his lips and dashing through his mind; his course as irregular, and as reckless as his fancies; now fiercely galloping, now breaking into a sudden halt, Ferdinand at length arrived at home; and his quick eye perceived, in a moment, that the dreaded arrival had not taken place. Glastonbury was in the flower-garden, on one knee before a vase, over which he was training a creeper. He looked up as he heard the approach of Ferdinand. His presence and benignant smile in some degree stilled the fierce emotions of his pupil. Ferdinand felt that the system of dissimulation must now commence; besides, he was always careful to be most kind to Glastonbury. He would not allow that any attack of spleen, or even illness, could ever justify a careless look or expression to that dear friend.

"I hope, my dear father," said Ferdinand, "I am punctual to our hour?"

"The sun-dial tells me," said Glastonbury, "that you have arrived to the moment; and I rather think that yonder approaches a summons to our repast. I hope you have passed your morning agreeably?"

"If all days would pass as sweet, my father, I should indeed be blessed."

"I, too, have had a fine morning of it. You must come to-morrow, and see my grand emblazonry of the Ratchliffe and Armine coats; I mean it for the gallery." With these words they entered the Place.

"You do not eat, my child," said Glastonbury to his companion.

"I have taken too long a ride, perhaps," said Ferdinand; who, indeed, was much too excited to have an appetite, and so abstracted that any one but Glastonbury would have long before detected his absence.

"I have changed my hour to-day," continued Glastonbury, "for the pleasure of dining with you; and I think to-morrow you had better change your hour, and dine with me."

"By-the-by, my dear father, you, who know every thing, do you happen to know a gentleman of the name of Temple in this neighbourhood?"

"I think I heard that Mr. Ducie had let the Bower to a gentleman of that name."

"Do you know who he is?"

"I never asked; for I feel no interest except about proprietors, because they enter into my County History. But I think I once heard that this Mr. Temple had been our minister at some foreign court. You give me a fine dinner, and eat nothing yourself. This pigeon is very savoury."

"I will trouble you. I think there once was a Henrietta Armine, my father?"

"The beautiful creature!" said Glastonbury, laying down his knife and fork; "she died young. She was a daughter of Lord Armine, and the Queen, Henrietta Maria, was her god-mother. It grieves me much that we have no portrait of her. She was very fair, her eyes of a sweet light blue."

"O, no! dark, my father; dark and deep as the violet."

"My child, the letter-writer, who mentions her death, describes them as light blue. I know of no other record of her beauty."

"I wish they had been dark," said Ferdinand, recovering himself; "However, I am glad there was a Henrietta Armine; 'tis a beautiful name."

"I think that Armine makes any name sound well," said Glastonbury. "No more wine, indeed, my child. Nay! if I must," continued he with a benevolent smile, "I will drink to the health of Miss Grandison!"

"Ah!" almost shrieked Ferdinand.

"My child, what is the matter?" inquired Glastonbury.

"A gnat, a fly, a wasp; something stung me. O! pah!—it is better now," said Ferdinand.

"Try some remedy," said Glastonbury; "let me fetch my oil of lilies. 'Tis a specific."

"O! no; 'tis nothing; nothing indeed. A fly, only a fly; nothing more; only a venomous fly. Sharp at the moment; nothing more."

The dinner was over: they retired to the library. Ferdinand walked about the room restless and moody. At length he belaboured himself of the piano, and affecting an anxiety to hear some of the favourite compositions of Glastonbury, he contrived to occupy his companion. In time, however, his old tutor invited him to take his violoncello and join him in a concerto. Ferdinand, of course, complied with this invitation, but the result was not very satisfactory. After a series of blunders, which were the natural result of his thoughts being occupied on other objects, he was obliged to plead a headach, and was glad when he could escape to his chamber.

Rest, however, no longer awaited him on his old pillow. It was at first delightful to escape from the restraint upon his reveries which he had lately experienced. He leaned for an hour over his empty fire-place in mute abstraction. The cold, however, in time drove him to bed, but he could not sleep. His eyes indeed were closed, but the vision of Henrietta Temple was not less apparent to him. He recalled every feature of her countenance, every trait of her conduct, every word indeed that she had expressed. The whole series of her observations, from the moment he had first seen her, until the moment they had parted, were accurately repeated, her very tones considered, and her very attitudes pondered over. Many were the hours that he heard strike: he grew restless and feverish. Sleep would not be commanded. He jumped out of bed, he opened the casement, he beheld in the moonlight the Barbary rose-tree of which he had presented her a flower. This consoling spectacle assured him that he had not been, as he had almost imagined, the victim of a dream. He knelt down and invoked all heavenly and earthly blessings on Henrietta Temple and his love. The night air, and the earnest invocation together, cooled his brain, and nature soon delivered him exhausted to repose.

CHAPTER VI.

IN WHICH CAPTAIN ARMINE PAYS HIS FIRST VISIT TO DUCIE.

YES! it is the morning. Is it possible? Shall he again behold her? That form of surpassing beauty, that bright, that dazzling countenance, again are they to bless his entranced vision. Shall he speak to her again? That musical and thrilling voice, shall it again sound and echo in his enraptured ear?

Ferdinand had reached Armine so many days before his calculated arrival, that he did not expect his family, and the Grandisons, to arrive for at least a week. What a respite did he not now feel this delay: if ever he could venture to think of the subject at all. He drove it indeed from his thoughts. The fascinating present completely engrossed his existence. He waited until the post arrived. It brought no letters; letters now so dreaded! He jumped upon his horse and galloped towards Ducie.

Now while our hero directs his course towards the mansion of his beloved, the reader will perhaps not be displeased to learn something more of the lady and her father than Ferdinand gleaned from the scanty knowledge of Glastonbury. Mr. Temple was the younger son of a younger branch of a noble family. He inherited no patrimony, but had been educated for the diplomatic service, and the influence of his family had early obtained him very distinguished appointments. He was envoy to a German court, when a change of ministry occasioned his recall, and he retired after a long career of able and assiduous service, comforted by a pension and glorified by a privy-councillorship. He was an acute and accomplished man, practised in the world, with great self-control, yet devoted to his daughter, the only offspring of a wife whom he had lost early and loved much. Deprived at a very tender age of that parent of whom she would have become peculiarly the charge, Henrietta Temple found in the devotion of her father all that consolation of which her forlorn state was susceptible. She was not delivered over to the custody of a governess, or to the even less sympathetic supervision of relations. Mr. Temple never permitted his daughter to be separated from him; he cherished her life and he directed her education. Resident in a city which arrogates to itself, not without justice, the title of the German Athens, his pupil availed herself of all those advantages which were offered to her by the instruction of the most skilful professors. Few persons were more accomplished than Henrietta Temple, even at an early age, but her rare accomplishments were not her most remarkable characteristics. Nature, who had accorded to her that extraordinary beauty which we have attempted to describe, had endowed her with great talents, and a soul of sublime temper. It was often remarked of Henrietta Temple—and the circumstance may doubtless be in some degree accounted for by the little interference and influence of women in her education—that she never was a girl. She expanded at once from a charming child into a magnificent woman. She had entered life very early, and had presided at her father's table for a year before his recall from his mission. Few women, in so short a period, had received so much homage; but she listened to compliments with a careless, though courteous ear, and received more ardent aspirations with a smile. The men, who were puzzled, voted her cold and heartless; but men should remember that fineness of taste, as well as apathy of temperament, may account for an unsuccessful suit. Assuredly Henrietta Temple was not deficient in feeling. She entertained for her father sentiments almost of idolatry; and those more intimate or dependent acquaintances best qualified to form an opinion of her character, spoke of her always as a soul gushing with tenderness. Notwithstanding their mutual devotion to each other, there were not many points of resemblance between the characters of Mr. Temple and his daughter—for she was remarked for a frankness of demeanour and a simplicity, yet strength of thought which remarkably contrasted with the artificial manners, and the conventional opinions and conversations of her sire. A mind at once thoughtful and energetic, permitted Henrietta Temple to form her own judgments; and an artless candour, which her father never could eradicate from her habits, generally impelled her to express them. It was, indeed, impossible, even for him long to find fault with these ebullitions, however the diplomatist might deplore them; for nature had so imbued the existence of this being with that indefinable charm which we call grace, that it was not in your power to behold her a moment without being enchanted. A glance, a movement, a sunny smile, a word of thrilling music, and all that was left to you was to adore. There was, indeed, in Henrietta Temple that rare and extraordinary combination of intellectual strength, and physical softness, which marks out the woman capable of exercising an irresistible influence over mankind. In the good old days, she might have occasioned a siege of Troy or a battle of Actium. She was one of those women who make nations mad, and for whom a man of genius would willingly peril the empire of the world!

So at least deemed Ferdinand Armine as he cantered through the park, talking to himself, apostrophizing the woods, and shouting his passion to the winds. It was scarcely noon when he reached Ducie Bower. This was a Palladian pavilion, situated in the midst of the most beautiful gardens, and surrounded by green hills. The sun shone brightly, the sky was without a cloud; it appeared to him that he had never beheld a more elegant and sparkling scene. It was a temple worthy of the divinity it enshrined. A façade of four Ionic columns fronted an octagonal hall, adorned with statues, which led into a saloon of considerable size and exquisite proportion. Ferdinand thought that he had never in his life entered so brilliant a chamber. The lofty walls were covered with an Indian paper of vivid fancy, and adorned with several pictures, which his practised eye assured him were of great merit. The room, without being inconveniently crowded, was amply stored with furniture, every article of which bespoke a refined and luxurious taste; easy chairs of all descriptions, most inviting couches, cabinets of choice inlay, and grotesque tables covered with articles of virtue; all these charming infinite nothings, which a person of taste might some time back have easily collected during a long residence on the Continent. A large lamp of Dresden china was suspended from the painted and gilded ceiling. The three tall windows opened on the gardens, and admitted a perfume so rich and various, that Ferdinand could easily believe the fair mistress, as she told him, was indeed a lover of flowers. A light bridge in the distant wood, that bounded the furthest lawn, indicated that a stream was at hand. What with the beauty of the chamber, the richness of the exterior scene, and the bright sun that painted every object with its magical colouring and made every thing appear even more fair and brilliant, Ferdinand stood for some moments quite entranced. A door opened, and Mr. Temple came forward and welcomed him with great cordiality.

After they had passed a half hour in looking at the pictures and in conversation to which they gave rise, Mr. Temple, proposing an adjournment to luncheon, opened a door exactly opposite to the one by which he had entered, and conducted Ferdinand into a dining-room, of which the suitable decoration wonderfully pleased his taste. A subdued tint pervaded every part of the chamber: the ceiling was painted in gray tinted frescos of a classical and festive character, and the side table, which stood in a recess supported by four magnificent columns, was adorned with very choice Etruscan vases. The air of repose and stillness which distinguished this apartment, was heightened by the vast conservatory into which it led, blazing with light and beauty, rows of orange trees in bloom, clusters of exotic plants of radiant tint, the sound of a fountain, and gorgeous forms of tropic birds.

"How beautiful!" exclaimed Ferdinand.

"'Tis pretty," said Mr. Temple, carving a pasty, "but we are very humble people, and cannot vie with the lords of Gothic castles."

"It appears to me," said Ferdinand, "that Ducie Bower is the most exquisite place I ever beheld."

"If you had seen it two years ago, you would have thought differently," said Mr. Temple; "I assure you I dreaded becoming its tenant. Henrietta is entitled to all the praise, as she took upon herself the whole responsibility. There is not on the banks of the Brenta a more dingy and desolate villa than Ducie appeared when we first came; and as for the gardens, they were a perfect wilderness. She made every thing. It was one vast desolate and neglected lawn, used as a sheep-walk when we arrived. As for the ceilings, I was almost tempted to whitewash them, and yet you see they have cleaned wonderfully; and after all it only required a little taste and labour. I have not laid out much money here. I built the conservatory, to be sure. Henrietta could not live without a conservatory."

"Miss Temple is quite right," pronounced Ferdinand. "It is impossible to live without a conservatory."

At this moment the heroine of their conversation entered the room, and Ferdinand turned pale as death. She extended to him her hand with a most graceful smile; as he touched it, he trembled from head to foot.

"You were not fatigued, I hope, by your ride, Miss Temple," at length he contrived to say.

"O, no! not in the least! I am an experienced horsewoman. Papa and I take the longest rides together."

As for eating with Henrietta Temple in the room, Ferdinand found that quite impossible. The moment she appeared, his appetite vanished. Anxious to speak, yet deprived of his accustomed fluency, he began to praise Ducie.

"You must see it," said Miss Temple; "shall we walk round the grounds?"

"My dear Henrietta," said her father, "I dare say Captain Armine is at this moment sufficiently tired; besides, when he moves, he will like, perhaps, to take his gun; you forget he is a sportsman, and that he cannot waste his morning in talking to ladies and picking flowers."

"O! indeed, sir, I assure you," said Ferdinand, "there is nothing I like so much as talking to ladies, and picking flowers; that is to say, when the ladies have as fine taste as Miss Temple, and the flowers are as beautiful as those at Ducie."

"Well, you shall see my conservatory, Captain Armine," said Miss Temple; "and you shall go end kill partridges afterwards." So saying, she entered the conservatory, and Ferdinand followed her, leaving Mr. Temple to his pasty.

"These orange groves remind me of Palermo," said Ferdinand.

"Ah!" said Miss Temple, "I have never been in the sweet south!"

"You seem to me a person born to live in a Sicilian palace," said Ferdinand; "to wander in perfumed groves, and to glance in a moonlight warmer than this sun."

"I see you pay compliments," said Miss Temple, looking at him archly, and meeting a glance serious and soft.

"Believe me, not to you."

"What do you think of this flower?" said Miss Temple, turning away rather quickly, and pointing to a strange plant. "It is the most singular thing in the world; but if it be tended by any other person than myself, it withers. Is it not droll?"

"I think not," said Ferdinand.

"I excuse you for your incredulity; no one does believe it; no one can; and yet it is quite true. Our gardener gave it up in despair. I wonder what it can be."

"I think it must be some enchanted prince," said Ferdinand.

"O! if I thought so, how I should long for a wand to emancipate him!" said Miss Temple.

"I would break your wand if you had one," said Ferdinand.

"Why?" said Miss Temple.

"O! I don't know," said Ferdinand, "I suppose because I believe you are sufficiently enchanting without one."

"I am bound to consider that most excellent logic," said Miss Temple.

"Do you admire my fountain and my birds?" she continued, after a short pause. "After Armine, Ducie appears a little tawdry toy."

"Ducie is Paradise," said Ferdinand. "I should like to pass my life in this conservatory."

"As an enchanted prince, I suppose," said Miss Temple.

"Exactly," said Captain Armine; "I would willingly this instant become a flower, if I were sure Miss Temple would cherish my existence."

"Cut off your tendrils, and drown you with a watering pot," said Miss Temple; "you really are very Sicilian in your conversation, Captain Armine."

"Come," said Mr. Temple, who now joined them, "if you really should like to take a stroll round the grounds, I will order the keeper to meet us at the cottage"

"A very excellent proposition," said Miss Temple.

"But you must get a bonnet, Henrietta—I must forbid your going out uncovered."

"No, papa, this will do," said Miss Temple, taking a handkerchief, twisting it round her head, and tying it under her chin.

"You look like an old woman, Henrietta," said her father, smiling.

"I shall not say what you look like, Miss Temple," said Captain Armine, with a glance of admiration, "lest you should think that I was this time even talking Sicilian."

"I reward you for your forbearance with a rose," said Miss Temple, plucking a flower. "It is a return for your beautiful present of yesterday."

Ferdinand pressed the gift to his lips.

They went forth; they stepped into a paradise, where the sweetest flowers seemed grouped in every combination of the choicest forms—baskets, and vases, and beds of infinite fancy. A thousand bees and butterflies filled the air with their glancing shapes and cheerful music, and the birds from the neighbouring groves joined in the chorus of melody. The wood walks through which they now rambled, admitted at intervals glimpses of the ornate landscape, and occasionally the view extended beyond the enclosed limits, and exhibited the clustering and embowered roofs of the neighbouring village, or some woody hill studded with a farmhouse, or a distant spire. As for Ferdinand, he strolled along, full of beautiful thoughts and thrilling fancies, in a dreamy state which had banished all recollection or consciousness but of the present. He was happy; positively, perfectly, supremely happy. He was happy for the first time in his life. He had no conception that life could afford such bliss as now filled his being. What a chain of miserable, tame, factitious sensations seemed the whole course of his past existence. Even the joys of yesterday were nothing to these; Armine was associated with too much of the commonplace and the gloomy to realize the ideal in which he now revelled. But now all circumstances contributed to enchant him. The novelty, the beauty of the scene, harmoniously blended with his passion. The sun seemed to him a more brilliant sun than the orb that illumined Armine; the sky more clear, more pure, more odorous. There seemed a magic sympathy in the trees, and every flower reminded him of its mistress. And then he looked around and beheld her. Was he positively awake! Was he in England! Was he in the same globe in which he had hitherto moved and acted? What was this entrancing form that moved before him? Was it indeed a woman?

O! dea certé!

That voice, too, now wilder than the wildest bird, now low, and hushed, yet always sweet—where was he, what did he listen to, what did he behold, what did he feel! The presence of her father alone restrained him from falling on his knees and expressing to her his adoration.

At length our friends arrived at a picturesque and ivy-grown cottage, where the keeper with their guns and dogs awaited Mr. Temple and his guest. Ferdinand, although a keen sportsman, beheld the spectacle with dismay. He execrated, at the same time, the existence of partridges, and the invention of gunpowder. To resist his fate, however, was impossible; he took his gun and turned to bid his hostess adieu.

"I do not like to quit Paradise at all," he said in a low voice; "must I go?"

"O! certainly," said Miss Temple. "It will do you a great deal of good. Take care you do not shoot papa, for, somehow or other, you really appear to be very absent to-day."

The caution of Miss Temple, although given in jest, was not altogether without some foundation. Captain Armine did contrive not to kill her father, but that was all. Never did any one, especially for the first hour, shoot more wildly. In time, however, Ferdinand sufficiently rallied to recover his reputation with the keeper, who from his first observation began to wink his eye to his son, an attendant bush-beater, and occasionally even thrust his tongue in side his cheek—a significant gesture perfectly understood by the imp. “For the life of me, Sam,” he afterwards profoundly observed, “I couldn’t make out this here captain by no manner of means whatsoever. At first I thought as how he was going to put the muzzle to his shoulder. Hang me, if ever I see such a gentleman. He missed every thing; and at last if he didn’t hit the longest flying shots without taking aim. Hang me, if ever I see such a gentleman. He hit every thing. That ere captain puzzled me, surely.”

The party at dinner was increased by a neighbouring squire and his wife, and the rector of the parish. Ferdinand was placed at the right hand of Miss Temple. The more he beheld her, the more beautiful she seemed. He detected every moment some charm before unobserved. It seemed to him that he never was in such agreeable society, though, sooth to say, the conversation was not of a very brilliant character. Mr. Temple recounted the sport of the morning to the squire, whose ears kindled at a congenial subject, and every preserve in the county was then discussed, with some episodes on poaching. The rector, an old gentleman, who had dined in old days at Armine Place, reminded Ferdinand of the agreeable circumstance, sanguine, perhaps, that the invitation might lead to a renewal of his acquaintance with that hospitable board. He was painfully profuse in his description of the public days of the famous Sir Ferdinand. From the service of plate to the thirty servants in livery, nothing was omitted.

“Our friend deals in Arabian tales,” whispered Ferdinand to Miss Temple; “you can be a witness that we live quietly enough now.”

“I shall certainly never forget my visit to Armine,” replied Miss Temple; “it was one of the most agreeable days of my life.”

“And that is saying a great deal, for I think your life must have abounded in agreeable days.”

“I cannot, indeed, lay any claim to that misery which makes many people interesting,” said Miss Temple; “I am a very commonplace person, for I have been always happy.”

When the ladies withdrew, there appeared but little inclination on the part of the squire and the rector to follow their example; and Captain Armine, therefore, soon left Mr. Temple to his fate, and escaped to the drawing-room. He glided to a seat on an ottoman, by the side of his hostess, and listened in silence to the conversation. What a conversation! At any other time, under any other circumstances, Ferdinand would have been teased and wearied with its commonplace current; all the dull detail of country tattle, in which the squire’s lady was a proficient, and with which Miss Temple was too highly bred not to appear to sympathize—and yet the conversation, to Ferdinand, appeared quite charming. Every accent of Henrietta’s sounded like wit; and when she bent her head in assent to her companion’s obvious deductions, there was about each movement a grace so ineffable, that Ferdinand could have sat in silence and listened, entranced, forever; and, occasionally, too, she turned to Captain Armine, and appealed on some point to his knowledge or his taste. It seemed to him that he had never listened to sounds so sweetly thrilling as her voice. It was a birdlike burst of music, that well became the sparkling sunshine of her violet eyes.

His late companions entered. Ferdinand rose from his seat; the windows of the saloon were open; he stepped forth into the garden. He felt the necessity of being a moment alone. He proceeded a few paces beyond the ken of man, and then leaning on a statue, and burying his face in his arm, he gave way to irresistible emotion. What wild thoughts dashed through his impetuous soul at that instant, it is difficult to conjecture. Perhaps it was passion that inspired that convulsive reverie; perchance it might have been remorse. Did he abandon himself to those novel sentiments which in a few brief hours had changed all his aspirations, and coloured his whole existence; or was he tortured by that dark and perplexing future, from which his imagination in vain struggled to extricate him?

He was roused from his reverie, brief but tumultuous, by the note of music, and then by the sound of a human voice. The stag detecting the huntsman’s horn could not have started with more wild emotion. But one fair organ could send forth that voice. He approached, he listened; the voice of Henrietta Temple floated to him on the air, breathing with a thousand odours. In a moment he was at her side. The squire’s lady was standing by her; the gentlemen, for a moment arrested from a political discussion, formed a group in a distant part of the room, the rector occasionally venturing in a practised whisper to enforce a disturbed argument. Ferdinand glided in unobserved by the fair performer. Miss Temple not only possessed a voice of rare tone and compass, but this delightful gift of nature had been cultivated with refined art. Ferdinand, himself a musician, and passionately devoted to vocal melody, listened with unexaggerated rapture.

“O! beautiful!” exclaimed he, as the songstress ceased.

“Captain Armine!” cried Miss Temple, looking round with a wild, bewitching smile. “I thought you were meditating in the twilight.”

“Your voice summoned me.”

“You care for music?”

“For little else.”

“You sing?”

“I hum.”

“Try this.”

“With you?”

Ferdinand Armine was not unworthy of singing with Henrietta Temple. His mother had been his able instructress in the art even in his childhood, and his frequent residence at Naples and other parts of the south, had afforded him ample opportunities of perfecting a talent thus early cultivated. But to-night the love of something beyond his art inspired the voice of Ferdinand. Singing with Henrietta Temple, he poured forth to her in safety all the passion which raged in his soul. The squire’s lady looked confused; Henrietta herself grew pale; the politicians ceased even to whisper, and advanced from their corner to the instrument, and when the duet was terminated, Mr. Temple offered his sincere congratulations to his guest. Henrietta also turned with some words of commendation to Ferdinand; but the words were faint and confused, and finally requesting Captain Armine to favour them by singing alone, she rose and vacated her seat.

Ferdinand took up the guitar; and accompanied himself to a Neapolitan air. It was gay and festive, a ritornella which might summon your mistress to dance in the moonlight. And then, and many congratulations, he offered the guitar to Miss Temple.

"No one will listen to a simple melody after anything so brilliant," said Miss Temple, as she touched a string, and, after a slight prelude, sang these words:—

THE DESERTED.

I.

Yes! weeping is madness,
Away with this tear,
Let no sign of sadness
Betray the wild anguish I fear.
When we meet him to-night,
Be mute then my heart!
And my smile be as bright,
As if we were never to part.

II.

Girl! give me the mirror
That said I was fair;
Alas! fatal error,
This picture reveals my despair.
Smiles no longer can pass.
O'er this faded brow,
And I shiver this glass,
Like his love and his fragile vow!

"The music," said Ferdinand, full of enthusiasm, "is—"

"Henrietta's," replied her father.

"And the words?—"

"Were found in my canary's cage," said Henrietta Temple, rising and putting an end to the conversation.

CHAPTER VII.

IN WHICH CAPTAIN ARMINE INDULGES IN A REVERY.

THE squire's carriage was announced, and then came his lady's shawl. How happy was Ferdinand, when he recollected that he was to remain at Ducie. Remain at Ducie! Remain under the same roof as Henrietta Temple. What bliss!—what ravishing bliss! All his life—and his had not been a monotonous one—it seemed that all his life could not afford a situation so adventurous and so sweet as this. Now they have gone. The squire and his lady, and the worthy rector who recollected Armine so well—they have all departed, all the adieux are uttered; after this little and unavoidable bustle, silence reigns in the saloon of Ducie. Ferdinand walked to the window. The moon was up; the air was sweet and hushed; the landscape clear though soft. O! what would he not have given to have strolled in that garden with Henrietta Temple, to have poured forth his whole soul to her, to have told her how wondrous fair she was, how wildly bewitching, and how he loved her, how he sighed to bind his fate with hers, and live forever in the brilliant atmosphere of her grace and beauty.

"Good night, Captain Armine," said Henrietta Temple.

He turned hastily round, he blushed, he grew pale. There she stood, in one hand a light, the other extended to her father's guest. He pressed her hand, he sighed, he looked confused; then suddenly letting go her hand, he walked quickly towards the door of the saloon, which he opened that she might retire.

"The happiest day of my life has ended," he muttered.

"You are so easily content, then, that I think you must always be happy."

"I fear I am not as easily content as you imagine."

She has gone. Hours, many and long hours, must elapse before he sees her again, before he again listens to that music, watches that airy grace, and meets the bright flashing of that fascinating eye. What misery was there in this idea! How little had he seemed hitherto to prize the joy of being her companion. He cursed the hours which had been wasted away from her in the morning's sport; he blamed himself that he had not even sooner quitted the dining-room, or that he had left the saloon for a moment, to commune with his own thoughts in the garden. With difficulty he restrained himself from reopening the door, to listen for the distant sound of her footsteps, or catch, perhaps, along some corridor, the fading echo of her voice. But Ferdinand was not alone—Mr. Temple still remained. That gentleman raised his face from the newspaper, as Captain Armine advanced to him; and, after some observations about the day's sport, and a hope that he would repeat his trial of the Ducie preserves to-morrow, proposed their retirement. Ferdinand of course assented, and, in a moment, he was ascending with his host the noble and Italian staircase; and he then was ushered from the vestibule into his room.

His previous visit to this chamber had been so hurried, that he had only made a general observation on its appearance. Little inclined to slumber, he now examined it more critically. In a recess was a French bed of simple furniture. On the walls, which were covered with a rustic paper, were suspended several drawings, representing views in Saxon Switzerland. They were so bold and spirited that they arrested attention; but the quick eye of Ferdinand instantly detected the initials of the artist in the corner. They were letters that made his heart tremble, as he gazed with admiring fondness on her performances. Before a sofa, covered with a chintz of a corresponding pattern with the paper of the walls, was placed a small French table, on which were writing materials; and his toilet table and his mantelpiece were profusely ornamented with rare flowers: on all sides were symptoms of female taste and feminine consideration.

Ferdinand carefully withdrew from his coat the flower that Henrietta had given him in the morning, and which he had worn the whole day. He kissed it; he kissed it more than once; he pressed its somewhat faded form to his lips with cautious delicacy; then tending it with the utmost care, he placed it in a vase of water, which holding in his hand, he threw himself into an easy chair, with his eyes fixed on the gift he most valued in the world.

An hour passed, and Ferdinand Armine remained fixed in the same position. But no one who beheld that beautiful and pensive countenance, and the dreamy softness of that large gray eye, could for a moment conceive that his thoughts were less sweet than the object on which they appeared to gaze. No distant recollections disturbed him now, no memory of the past, no fear of the future. The delicious present monopolized his existence. The ties of duty, the claims of domestic affection, the worldly considerations that by a cruel dispensation had seemed, as it were, to taint even his innocent and careless boyhood, even the urgent appeals of his critical and perilous situation—all, all were forgotten in one intense delirium of absorbing love.

Anon he rose from his seat, and paced his room for some minutes, with his eyes fixed on the ground. Then throwing off his clothes, and taking the flower from the vase, which he previously placed on the table, he deposited it in his bosom. "Beautiful, beloved flower," exclaimed he; "thus, thus will I win and wear your mistress!"

CHAPTER VIII.

A STRANGE DREAM.

RESTLESS are the dreams of the lover that is young. Ferdinand Armine started awake from the agony of a terrible slumber. He had been walking in a garden with Henrietta Temple—her hand was clasped in his—her eyes fixed on the ground, as he whispered most delicious words. His face was flushed, his speech panting and low. Gently he wound his vacant arm around her graceful form; she looked up, her speaking eyes met his, and their trembling lips seemed about to cling into a—

When lo! the splendour of the garden faded, and all seemed changed and dim: instead of the beautiful arched walks, in which a moment before they appeared to wander, it was beneath the vaulted roof of some temple that they now moved; instead of the led of glowing flowers from which he was about to pluck an offering for her bosom, an altar rose, from the centre of which upsprang a quick and lurid tongue of fire. The dreamer gazed upon his companion, and her form was tinted with the dusky hue of the flame, and she held to her countenance a scarf, as if oppressed by the unnatural heat. Great fear suddenly came over him. With haste, yet with delicacy, he himself withdrew the scarf from the face of his companion, and this movement revealed the visage of—Miss Grandison.

Ferdinand Armine awoke and started up in his bed. Before him still appeared the unexpected figure. He jumped out of the bed—he gazed upon the form with staring eyes and open mouth. She was there—assuredly she was there: it was Katherine—Katherine his betrothed—sad and reproachful. The figure faded before him; he advanced with outstretched hand; in his desperation he determined to clutch the escaping form; and he found in his grasp his dressing-gown, which he had thrown over the back of a chair.

"A dream, and but a dream, after all," he muttered to himself; "and yet a strange one."

His brow was heated; he opened the casement. It was still night; the moon had vanished, but the stars were still shining. He recalled with an effort the scene with which he had become acquainted yesterday for the first time. Before him, serene and still, rose the bowers of Ducie. And their mistress? That angelic form whose hand he had clasped in his dream, was not then merely a shadow. She breathed, she lived, and under the same roof, Henrietta Temple was at this moment under the same roof as himself; and what were her slumbers? Were they wild as his own, or sweet and innocent as herself? Did his form flit over her closed vision at this charmed hour, as hers had visited his? Had it been scared away by an apparition as awful!

Bore any one to her the same relation as Katherine Grandison to him? A fearful surmise, that had occurred to him now for the first time, and which it seemed could never again quit his brain. The stars faded away—the breath of morn was abroad—the chant of birds arose. Exhausted in body and in mind, Ferdinand Armine flung himself upon his bed, and soon was lost in slumbers undisturbed as the tomb.

CHAPTER IX.

WHICH I HOPE MAY PROVE AS AGREEABLE TO THE READER AS TO OUR HERO.

Ferdinand's servant, whom he had despatched the previous evening to Armine, returned early in the morning with his master's letters; one from his mother, and one from Miss Grandison. They were all to arrive at the Place on the day after the morrow. Ferdinand opened these epistles with a trembling hand. The sight of Katherine's, his Katherine's handwriting was almost as terrible as his dream. It recalled to him, with a dreadful reality, his actual situation, which he had driven from his thoughts. He had quitted his family, his family who were so devoted to him, and whom he so loved, happy, nay, triumphant, a pledged and rejoicing bridegroom. What had occurred during the last eight-and-forty hours seemed completely to have changed all his feelings, all his wishes, all his views, all his hopes! He had in that interval met a single human being, a woman, a girl, a young and innocent girl; he had looked upon a girl and listened to her voice, and his soul was as changed as the earth by the sunrise. As lying in his bed he read these letters, and mused over their contents, and all the thoughts that they suggested, the strangeness of life, the mystery of human nature, were painfully impressed upon him. His melancholy father, his fond and confiding mother, the devoted Glastonbury, all the mortifying circumstances of his illustrious race, rose in painful succession before him. Nor could he forget his own wretched follies and that fatal visit to Bath, of which the consequences clanked upon his memory like a degrading and disgraceful fetter. The burthen of existence seemed intolerable. That domestic love, which had so solaced his existence, recalled now only the most painful associations. In the wilderness of his thoughts, he wished himself alone in the world, to struggle with his fate and mould his fortunes. He felt himself a slave and a sacrifice. He cursed Armine, his ancient house, and his broken fortunes. He felt that death was preferable to life without Henrietta Temple. But even supposing that he could extricate himself from his rash engagement; even admitting that all worldly considerations might be thrown aside, that the pride of his father, and his mother's love, and Glastonbury's pure hopes might all be outraged; what chance, what hope, was there of obtaining his great object? What was he—what was he, Ferdinand Armine, free as the air from the claims of Miss Grandison, with all sense of duty rooted out of his once sensitive bosom, and existing only for the gratification of his own wild fancies! A beggar, worse than a beggar, without a home, without the possibility of a home to offer the lady of his passion; nay, not even secure that the harsh process of the law might not instantly claim its victim, and he himself be hurried from the altar to the jail!

Moody and melancholy, he repaired to the saloon, he beheld Henrietta Temple, and the cloud left his brow and lightness came to his heart. Never had she looked so beautiful, so fresh and bright, so like a fair flower with the dew upon its leaves. Her voice penetrated his soul, her sunny smile warmed his breast. Her father greeted him too with kindness, and inquired after his slumbers, which he assured Mr. Temple had been satisfactory.

"I find," continued Mr. Temple, "that the post has brought me some business to-day which, I fear, claims the morning to transact. But I hope you will not forget your promise to try again our preserves. I fear they are not very rich; but we poor tenants of the soil can scarcely vie with you lords of the land. The keeper will be ready whenever you summon him."

Ferdinand muttered something about trouble and intrusion, and the expected arrival of his family, but Miss Temple pressed him to accept the offer with so much expression that refusal was impossible.

After breakfast Mr. Temple retired to his library, and Ferdinand found himself alone for the first time with Henrietta Temple.

She was copying a miniature of Charles the First. Ferdinand looked over her shoulder.

"A melancholy countenance!" he observed.

"It is a favourite one of mine," she replied.

"Yet you are always gay!"

"Always."

"I envy you, Miss Temple."

"What, are you melancholy?"

"I have every cause."

"Indeed, I should have thought the reverse."

"I look upon myself as the most unfortunate of human beings," replied Ferdinand.

He spoke so seriously, in a tone of such deep and bitter feeling, that Miss Temple could not resist looking up at her companion. His countenance was indeed most gloomy.

"You surprise me," said Miss Temple; "I think that few people ought to be unhappy, and I rather suspect fewer are than we imagine."

"All I wish is," replied he, "that the battle of Newbury had witnessed the extinction of our family as well as our peerage."

"A peerage, and such a peerage as yours, is a fine thing," said Henrietta Temple, "a very fine thing; but I would not grieve, if I were you, for that; I would sooner be an Armine without a coronet, than many a brow I wot of, with."

"You misconceived a silly phrase," rejoined Ferdinand. "I was not thinking of the loss of our coronet, though that is only part of the system. Our family I am sure are fated. Birth without honour, estates without fortune, life without happiness, that is our lot."

"As for the first," said Miss Temple, "the honourable are always honoured; money, in spite of what they say, I feel is not the greatest thing in the world; and as for misery, I confess I do not very readily believe in the misery of youth."

"May you never prove it," replied Ferdinand; "may you never be, as I am, the victim of family profligacy and family pride." So saying, he turned away, and taking up a book, for a few minutes seemed wrapped in his reflections.

He suddenly resumed the conversation in a more cheerful tone. Holding a volume of Petrarch in his hand, he touched lightly, but with grace, on Italian poetry; then diverged into his travels, recounted an adventure with sprightliness, and replied to Miss Temple's lively remarks with gayety and readiness. The morning advanced; Miss Temple closed her portfolio, and visited her flowers, inviting him to follow her. Her invitation was scarcely necessary: his movements were regulated by hers; he was as faithful to her as her shadow. From the conservatory they entered the garden. Ferdinand was as fond of gardens as his mistress. She praised the flower-garden of Armine. He gave her some account of its principal creator. The character of Glastonbury highly interested Miss Temple. Love is confidential; it has no fear of ridicule; Ferdinand entered with freedom, and yet with grace, into family details, from which, at another time and to another person, he would have been the first to shrink. The imagination of Miss Temple was greatly interested by his simple, and, to her, affecting account of this ancient line living in their hereditary solitude, with all their noble pride and haughty poverty. The scene, the circumstances, were all such as please a maiden's fancy; and he, the natural hero of this singular history, seemed deficient in none of those heroic qualities which the wildest spirit of romance might require for the completion of its spell. Beautiful as his ancestors, and, she was sure, as brave, young, spirited, graceful, and accomplished; a gay and daring spirit blended with the mournful melody of his voice, and occasionally contrasted with the somewhat subdued and chastened character of his demeanour.

"Well, do not despair," said Henrietta Temple "riches did not make Sir Ferdinand happy. I feel confident the house will yet flourish."

"I have no confidence," replied Ferdinand; "I feel the struggle with our fate to be fruitless. Once, indeed, I felt like you; there was a time when I took even a fancied pride in all the follies of my grandfather. But that is past; I have lived to execrate his memory."

"Hush! hush!"

"Yes, to execrate his memory; I repeat, to execrate his memory; his follies stand between me and my happiness."

"Indeed I see not that."

"May you never! I cannot disguise from myself that I am a slave, and a wretched one, and that his career has entailed this curse of servitude upon me. But away with this! You must think me, Miss Temple, the most egotistical of human beings, and yet, to do myself justice, I scarcely ever remember having spoken of myself so much before."

"Will you walk with me," said Miss Temple, after a moment's silence; "you seem little inclined to avail yourself of my father's invitation to solitary sport. But I cannot stay at home, for I have visits to pay, although I fear you will consider them rather dull ones."

"Why so?"

"My visits are to cottages."

"I love nothing better. I used ever to be my mother's companion on such occasions."

So, crossing the lawn, they entered a beautiful wood of considerable extent, which formed the boundary of the grounds, and after some time passed in most agreeable conversation, emerged upon a common of no ordinary extent or beauty, for it was thickly studded in some parts with lofty timber, while in others the furze and fern gave richness and variety to the vast wilderness of verdant turf, scarcely marked except by the light hoof of Miss Temple's palfrey.

"It is not so grand as Armine Park," said Miss Temple; "but we are proud of our common."

The thin gray smoke that rose in different directions, was a beacon to the charitable visits of Miss Temple. It was evident that she was a visitor both habitual and beloved. Each cottage door was familiar to her entrance. The children smiled at her approach; their mothers rose and courtesied with affectionate respect. How many names and how many wants had she to remember; yet nothing was forgotten! Some were rewarded for industry, some were admonished not to be idle; but all were treated with an engaging suavity more efficacious than gifts or punishments. The aged were solaced by her visits; the sick forgot their pains; and as she listened with sympathizing patience to long narratives of rheumatic griefs, it seemed her presence in each old chair, her tender inquiries and sanguine hopes, brought even more comfort than her plenteous promises of succour from the Bower in the shape of arrowroot and gruel, port wine and flannel petticoats.

This scene of sweet simplicity brought back old days and old places to the memory of Ferdinand Armine. He thought of the time when he was a happy boy at his innocent home; his mother's boy, the child she so loved and looked after, when a cloud upon her brow brought a tear into his eye, and when a kiss from her lips was his most dear and desired reward. The last night he had passed at Armine, before his first departure, rose up to his recollection; all his mother's passionate fondness, all her wild fear that the day might come when her child would not love her as dearly as he did then. That time had come. But a few hours back—ay! but a few hours back—and he had sighed to be alone in the world, and had felt those domestic ties which had been the joy of his existence, a burden, and a curse. A tear stole down his cheek; he stepped forth from the cottage to conceal his emotion. He seated himself on the trunk of a tree, a few paces withdrawn; he looked upon the setting sun that gilded the distant landscape with its rich yet pensive light. The scenes of the last five years flitted across his mind's eye in fleet succession; his dissipation, his vanity, his desperate folly, his hollow worldliness. Why, O! why had he ever left his unpolluted home? Why could he not have lived and died in that silvan paradise? Why, O! why was it impossible to admit his beautiful companion into that sweet and serene society? Why should his love for her make his heart a rebel to his hearth? Money, horrible money! It seemed to him that the contiguous cottage and the labour of his hands with her, were preferable to palaces and crowds of retainers without her inspiring presence. And why not screw his courage to the sticking-point, and commune in confidence with his parents? They loved him; yes, they idolized him! For him, for him alone, they sought the restoration of their house and fortunes. Why, Henrietta Temple was a treasure richer than any his ancestors had counted. Let them look on her, let them listen to her, let them breathe as he had done in her enchantment; and could they wonder, could they murmur at his conduct? Would they not, O! would they not rather admire, extol it!

But then, his debts, his infernal, his overwhelming debts. All the rest might be faced. His desperate engagement might be broken, his family might be reconciled to obscurity and poverty: but, ruin! what was to grapple with his impending ruin? Now his folly stung him, now the scorpion entered his soul. It was not the profligacy of his ancestor, it was not the pride of his family then, that stood between him and his love; it was his own culpable and heartless career! He covered his face with his hands; something touched him lightly, it was the parasol of Miss Temple.

"I am afraid," she said, "that my visits have wearied you; but you have been very kind and good."

He rose rapidly with a slight blush. "Indeed," he replied, "I have passed a most delightful morning, and I was only regretting that life consisted of any thing else but cottages and yourself."

They were late; they heard the first dinner-bell at Ducie as they re-entered the wood. "We must hurry on," said Miss Temple; "dinner is the only subject on which papa is a tyrant. What a sunset! I wonder if Lady Armine will return on Saturday. When she returns, I hope you will make her call upon us, for I want to copy all the pictures in your gallery."

"If they were not heirlooms, I would give them you," said Ferdinand; "but as it is, there is only one way by which I can manage it."

"What way?" inquired Miss Temple, very innocently.

"I forget," replied Ferdinand with a peculiar smile. Miss Temple seemed to comprehend a little more clearly, and looked a little confused.

CHAPTER X.

AN EVENING STROLL.

IN spite of his perilous situation, an indefinite sensation of happiness pervaded the soul of Ferdinand Armine, as he made his hurried toilet, and hastened to the domestic board of Ducie, where he was now the solitary guest. His eye caught Miss Temple's as he entered the room. It seemed to beam upon him with interest and kindness. His courteous and agreeable host welcomed him with polished warmth. It seemed that a feeling of intimacy was already established among them, and he fancied himself already looked upon as an habitual member of their circle. All dark thoughts are driven away. He was gay and pleasant, and duly maintained with Mr. Temple that conversation in which his host excelled. Miss Temple spoke little, but listened with evident interest to her father and Ferdinand. She seemed to delight in their society, and to be gratified by Captain Armine's evident sense of her father's agreeable qualities.

When dinner was over, they all rose together, and repaired to the saloon.

"I wish Mr. Glastonbury were here," said Miss Temple, as Ferdinand opened the instrument. "You must bring him, some day, and then our concert will be perfect."

Ferdinand smiled, but the name of Glastonbury made him shudder. His countenance changed at the future plans of Miss Temple. "Some day," indeed, when he might also take the opportunity of introducing his betrothed! But the voice of Henrietta Temple drove all care from his bosom; he abandoned himself to the intoxicating present. She sang alone; and then they sang together; and, as he arranged her books, or selected her theme, a thousand instances of the interest with which she inspired him developed themselves. Once he touched her hand, and he pressed his own, unseen, to his lips.

Though the room was lit up, the windows were open and admitted the moonlight. The beautiful saloon was full of fragrance and of melody; the fairest of women dazzled Ferdinand with her presence; his heart was full; his senses ravished; his hopes were high. Could there be such a demon as care in such a paradise? Could sorrow ever enter here? Was it possible that these bright halls and odorous bowers could be polluted by the miserable considerations that reigned too often supreme in his unhappy breast? An enchanted scene had suddenly risen from the earth for his delight and fascination. Could he be unhappy? Why, if all went darker even than he sometimes feared, that man had not lived in vain who had beheld Henrietta Temple! All the troubles of the world were folly here; this was fairyland, and he, some knight who had fallen from a gloomy globe upon some starry regions flashing with perennial lustre.

The hours flew on; the servants brought in that light banquet whose entrance in the country seems the only method of reminding our guests that there is a morrow.

"Tis the last night," said Ferdinand, smiling, with a sigh. "One more song; only one more. Mr. Temple, be indulgent; it is the last night. I feel," he added, in a lower tone, to Henrietta, "I feel exactly as I did when I left Armine for the first time."

"Because you are going to return to it? That is wilful!"

"Wilful or not, I would that I might never see it again."

"For my part, Armine is to me the very land of romance."

"It is strange."

"No spot on earth ever impressed me more. It is the finest combination of art, and nature, and poetical associations I know; it is indeed unique."

"I do not like to differ with you on any subject."

"We should be dull companions, I fear, if we agreed upon every thing."

"I cannot think it."

"Papa," said Miss Temple, "one little stroll upon the lawn; one little, little stroll. The moon is so bright; and autumn, this year, has brought us as yet no dew." And as she spoke, she took up her scarf and wound it round her head. "There," she said, "I look like the portrait of the Turkish page in Armine gallery; don't I?"

There was a playful grace about Henrietta Temple, a wild and brilliant simplicity, which was the more charming, because it was blended with peculiarly high breeding. No person in ordinary society was more calm, or enjoyed a more complete self-possession; yet no one, in the more intimate relations of life, indulged more in those little unstudied bursts of nature, which seemed almost to remind one of the playful child rather than the polished woman; and which, under such circumstances, are infinite, captivating. As for Ferdinand Ar-mine, he looked upon the Turkish page with a countenance beaming with admiration; he wished it was Turkey wherein he then beheld her, or any other strange land, where he could have placed her on his courser, and galloped away in pursuit of a fortune wild as his soul.

They walked in the garden, the arms of Henrietta Temple linked between her father's and Captain Armine's. Though the year was in decay, summer had lent this night to autumn, it was so soft and sweet. The moonbeam fell brightly upon Ducie Bower, and the illumined saloon contrasted effectively with the natural splendour of the exterior scene. Mr. Temple reminded Henrietta of a brilliant fête which had been given at a Saxon palace, and which some circumstances of similarity recalled to his recollection. Ferdinand could not speak, but found himself unconsciously pressing Henrietta Temple's arm to his heart. The Saxon palace brought back to Miss Temple a wild melody which had been sung in the gardens on that night. She asked her father if he recollected it, and hummed the air as she made the inquiry. Her gentle murmur soon expanded into song. It was one of those wild and natural lyrics that spring up in mountainous countries, and which seem to mimic the prolonged echoes that in such regions greet the ear of the pastor and the huntsman.

O! why did this night ever have an end!

CHAPTER XI.

A MORNING WALK.

It was solitude that brought despair to Ferdinand Armine. The moment he was alone his real situation thrust itself upon him; the moment that he had quitted the presence of Henrietta Temple, he was as a man under the influence of music when the orchestra suddenly stops. The source of all his inspiration failed him; this last night at Ducie was dreadful. Sleep was out of question; he did not affect even the mimicry of retiring, but paced up and down his room the whole night, or flung himself, when exhausted, upon a restless sofa. Occasionally he varied these monotonous occupations, by pressing his lips to the drawings which bore her name; then, relapsing into a profound reverie, he sought some solace in recalling the scenes of the morning, all her movements, every word she had uttered, every look which had illumined his soul. In vain he endeavoured to find consolation in the fond belief that he was not altogether without interest in her eyes. Even the conviction that his passion was returned, in the situation in which he was plunged, would, however flattering, be rather a source of fresh anxiety and perplexity. He took a volume from the single shelf of books that was slung against the wall; it was a volume of Corinne. The fervid eloquence of the poetess sublimated his passion: and, without disturbing the tone of his excited mind, relieved in some degree its tension, by busying his imagination with other, though similar, emotions. As he read, his mind became more calm and his feelings deeper, and, by the time his lamp grew ghastly in the purple light of morning that now entered his chamber, his soul seemed so stilled, that he closed the volume, and though sleep was impossible, he remained nevertheless calm and absorbed.

When the first sounds assured him that some were stirring in the house, he quitted his room, after some difficulty found a maid-servant by whose aid he succeeded in getting into the garden. He took his way to the common where he had observed, the preceding day, a fine sheet of water. The sun had not risen more than an hour; it was a fresh and ruddy morn. The cottagers were just abroad. The air of the plain invigorated him, and the singing of the birds, and all those rural sounds, that rise with the husbandman, brought to his mind a wonderful degree of freshness and serenity. Occasionally he heard the gun of an early sportsman, to him at all times an animating sound; but when he had plunged into the water, and found himself struggling with that inspiring element, all sorrow seemed to leave him. His heated brow became cool and clear—his aching limbs vigorous and elastic—his jaded soul full of hope and joy. He lingered in the liquid and vivifying world, playing with the stream, for he was an expert and practised swimmer; and often, after nights of southern dissipation, had recurred to this natural bath for health and renovation.

The sun had now risen far above the horizon; the village clock had long struck seven; Ferdinand was three miles from Ducie Bower. It was time to return, yet he loitered on his way, the air was so sweet and fresh, the scene so pretty, and his mind, in comparison with his recent feelings, so calm, and even happy. Just as he emerged from the woods, and entered the grounds of Ducie, he met Miss Temple. She stared, and she had cause. Ferdinand, indeed, presented rather an unusual figure; his head uncovered, his hair matted, and his countenance glowing with his exercise, but his figure clothed in the identical evening dress in which he had bid her a tender good night.

"Captain Armine!" exclaimed Miss Temple, "you are an early riser, I see."

Ferdinand looked a little confused. "The truth is," he replied, "I have not risen at all. I could not sleep; why, I know not; the evening, I suppose, was too happy for so commonplace a termination; so I escaped from my room as soon as I could do so without disturbing your household; and I have been bathing, which refreshes me always more than slumber."

"Well, I could not resign my sleep, were it only for the sake of my dreams."

"Pleasant I trust they were. 'Rosy dreams and slumbers light' are for ladies as fair as you."

"I am grateful that I always fulfil the poet's wish; and what is more, I wake only to gather roses—see here!"

She extended to him a flower.

"I deserve it," said Ferdinand, "for I have not neglected your first gift," and he offered her the rose she had given him the first day of his visit. "Tis shrivelled," he added, "but still very sweet—at least to me."

"It is mine now," said Henrietta Temple.

"Ah! you will throw it away."

"Do you think me, then, so insensible to galantry so delicate?"

"It cannot be to you what it is to me," replied Ferdinand.

"It is a memorial," said Miss Temple.

"Of what, and of whom?" inquired Ferdinand.

"Of friendship and a friend."

"Tis something to be Miss Temple's friend."

"I am glad you think so. I believe I am very vain, but certainly I like to be—liked."

"Then you can always gain your wish without an effort."

"Now I think we are very good friends," said Miss Temple, "considering we have known each other so short a time. But then papa likes you so much."

"I am honoured as well as gratified by the kindly disposition of so agreeable a person as Mr. Temple. I can assure his daughter that the feeling is mutual. Your father's opinion influences you?"

"In every thing. He has been so kind a father, that it would be worse than ingratitude to be less than devoted to him."

"Mr. Temple is a very enviable person."

"But Captain Armine knows the delight of a parent who loves him. I love my father as you love your mother."

"I have, however, lived to feel that no person's opinion could influence me in every thing; I have lived to find that even filial love—and God knows mine was powerful enough—is, after all, but a pallid moonlight beam, compared with——"

"See! my father kisses his hand to us from the window. Let us run and meet him."

CHAPTER XII.

CONTAINING AN OMINOUS INCIDENT.

The last adieus are bidden; Ferdinand is on his road to Armine, flying from the woman whom he adores, to meet the woman to whom he is betrothed. He reined in his horse as he entered the park. As he slowly approached his home, he could not avoid feeling that, after so long an absence, he had not treated Glastonbury with the kindness and consideration he merited. While he was torturing his invention for an excuse for his conduct, he observed his old tutor in the distance; and riding up and dismounting, he joined that faithful friend. Whether it be that love and falsehood are, under any circumstances, inseparable, Ferdinand Armine, whose frankness was proverbial, found himself involved in a long and confused narrative of a visit to a friend, whom he had unexpectedly met, whom he had known abroad, and to whom he was under the greatest obligations. He even affected to regret this temporary estrangement from Armine after so long a separation, and to rejoice at his escape. No names were mentioned, and the unsuspecting Glastonbury, delighted again to be his companion, inconvenienced him with no cross-examination. But this was only the commencement of the system of degrading deception which awaited him.

Willingly would Ferdinand have devoted all his time and feelings to his companion; but in vain he struggled with the absorbing passion of his soul. He dwelt in silence upon the memory of the last three days, the most eventful period of his existence. He was moody and absent, silent when he should have spoken, wandering when he should have listened, hazarding random observations instead of conversing, or breaking into hurried and inappropriate comments; so that to any worldly critic of his conduct he would have appeared at the same time both dull and excited. At length he made a desperate effort to accompany Glastonbury to the picture gallery, and listen to his plans. The scene, indeed, was not ungrateful to him, for it was associated with the existence and the conversation of the lady of his heart: he stood entranced before the picture of the Turkish page, and lamented to Glastonbury, a thousand times, that there was no portrait of Henrietta Armine.

"I would sooner have a portrait of Henrietta Armine, than the whole gallery together," said Ferdinand.

Glastonbury stared.

"I wonder if there ever will be a portrait of Henrietta Armine. Come, now, my dear Glastonbury," he continued, with an air of remarkable excitement, "let us have a wager upon it. What are the odds? Will there ever be a portrait of Henrietta Armine? I am quite fantastic to-day. You are smiling at me. Now do you know, if I had a wish certain to be gratified, it should be to add a portrait of Henrietta Armine to our gallery?"

"She died very young," remarked Glastonbury.

"But my Henrietta Armine should not die young," said Ferdinand. "She should live, breathe, smile—she—"

Glastonbury looked very confused.

So strange is love, that this kind of veiled allusion to his secret passion relieved and gratified the overcharged bosom of Ferdinand. He pursued the subject with enjoyment. Anybody but Glastonbury might have thought that he had lost his senses, he laughed so loud, and talked so fast about a subject which seemed almost nonsensical; but the good Glastonbury ascribed these ebullitions to the wanton spirit of youth, and smiled out of sympathy, though he knew not why, except that his pupil appeared happy.

At length they quitted the gallery; Glastonbury resumed his labours in the hall, where he was copying an escutcheon; and, after hovering a short time restlessly around his tutor, now escaping into the garden that he might muse over Henrietta Temple undisturbed, and now returning for a few minutes to his companion, lest the good Glastonbury should feel mortified by his neglect, Ferdinand broke away altogether, and wandered far into the plaisance.

He came to the green and shady spot where he had first beheld her. There rose the cedar, spreading its dark form in solitary grandeur, and holding, as it were, its state among its subject woods. It was the same scene, almost the same hour: but where was she? He waited for her form to rise, and yet it came not. He shouted Henrietta Temple, yet no fair vision blessed his expectant sight. Was it all a dream? Had he been but lying beneath these branches in a rapturous trance, and had he only woken to the shivering dulness of reality? What evidence was there of the existence of such a being as Henrietta Temple? If such a being did not exist, of what value was life? After a glimpse of paradise, could he breathe again in this tame and frigid world? Where was Ducie? Where were its immortal bowers, those roses of supernatural fragrance, and the celestial melody of its halls? That garden, wherein he wandered and hung upon her accents; that wood, among whose shadowy boughs she glided like an antelope; that pensive twilight, on which he had gazed with such subdued emotion; that moonlight walk, when her voice floated, like Ariel's, in the purple sky: were these all phantoms? Could it be that this morn. this very morn he had beheld Henrietta Temple, had conversed with her alone, had bidden her a soft adieu? What—was it this day that she had given him the rose?

He threw himself upon the turf, and gazed upon the flower. The flower was young and beautiful as herself, and just expanding into perfect life. To the fantastic brain of love there seemed a resemblance between this rose and her who had culled it. Its stem was tall, its countenance was brilliant, an aromatic essence pervaded its being. As he held it in his hand, a bee came hovering round its charms, eager to revel in its fragrant loveliness. More than once had Ferdinand driven the bee away, when suddenly it succeeded in alighting on the rose. Jealous of his rose, Ferdinand, in his haste, shook the flower, and the fragile head fell from the stem!

A feeling of deep melancholy came over him, with which he found it in vain to struggle, and which he could not analyze. He rose, and pressing the flower to his heart, he walked away and rejoined Glastonbury, whose task was nearly accomplished. Ferdinand seated himself upon one of the high cases which had been stowed away in the hall, folding his arms, swinging his legs, and whistling the German air which Miss Temple had sung the preceding night.

"That is a wild and pretty air," said Glastonbury, who was devoted to music. "I never heard it before. You travellers pick up choice things. Where did you find it?"

"I am sure I cannot tell, my dear Glastonbury; I have been asking myself the same question the whole morning. Sometimes I think I dreamt it."

"A few more such dreams would make you a rare composer," observed Glastonbury, smiling.

"Ah! my dear Glastonbury, talking of music, I know a musician, such a musician, a musician whom I should like to introduce you to above all persons in the world."

"You always loved music, dear Ferdinand; 'tis in the blood. You come from a musical stock on your mother's side. Is Miss Grandison musical?"

"Yes—no—that is to say, I forget—some commonplace accomplishment in the art, she has, I believe; but I was not thinking of that sort of thing; I was thinking of the lady who taught me this air."

"A lady!" said Glastonbury; "the German ladies are highly cultivated."

"Yes! the Germans, and the women especially, have a remarkably fine musical taste," rejoined Ferdinand, recovering from his blunder.

"I like the Germans very much," said Glastonbury, "and I admire that air."

"O! my dear Glastonbury, you shall hear it sung by moonlight."

"Indeed!" said Glastonbury.

"Yes; if you could only hear her sing it by moonlight, I venture to say, my dear Glastonbury, that you would confess that all you had ever heard, or seen, or imagined, of enchanted spirits floating in the air, and filling the air with supernatural symphonies, was realized."

"Indeed!" said Glastonbury, "a most accomplished performer, no doubt! Was she professional?"

"Who?" inquired Ferdinand.

"Your songstress."

"Professional! O! ah! yes! No! she was not a professional singer, but she was fit to be one; and that is an excellent idea, too; for I would sooner, after all, be a professional singer, and live by my art, than marry against my inclination, or not marry according to it."

"Marry!" said Glastonbury, rather astonished; "what, is she going to be married against her will? Poor devoted thing!"

"Devoted, indeed!" said Ferdinand; "there is no greater curse on earth."

Glastonbury shook his head.

"The affections should not be forced," the old man added; "our feelings are our own property, often our best."

Ferdinand fell into a fit of abstraction; then, suddenly turning round, he said, "Is it possible that I have been away from Armine only two days. Do you know it really seems to me a year!"

"You are very kind to say so, my Ferdinand," said Glastonbury.

CHAPTER XIII.

IN WHICH CAPTAIN ARMINE FINDS REASON TO BELIEVE IN THE EXISTENCE OF FAIRIES.

It is difficult to describe the restlessness of Ferdinand Armine. His solitary dinner was an excuse for quitting Glastonbury: but to eat is as impossible as to sleep, to a man who is really in love. He took a spoonful of soup, and then jumping up from his chair, he walked up and down the room, thinking of Henrietta Temple. Then to-morrow occurred to him, and that other lady that to-morrow was to bring. He drowned the thought in a bumper of claret. Wine, mighty wine! thou best and surest consolation! What care can withstand thy inspiring influence? from what scrape canst thou not, for a moment, extricate the victim? Who can deny that our spiritual nature in some degree depends upon our corporeal condition? A man without a breakfast is not a hero; a hero well fed is full of audacious invention. Every thing depends upon the circulation. Let but the blood flow freely, and a man of imagination is never without resources. A fine pulse is a talisman; a charmed life; a balance at our banker's. It is good luck; it is eternity; it is wealth. Nothing can withstand us; nothing injure us; it is inexhaustible riches. So felt Ferdinand Armine, though on the verge of a moral precipice. To-morrow! what of to-morrow? Did to-morrow daunt him? Not a jot. He would wrestle with to-morrow, laden as it might be with curses, and dash it to the earth. It should not be a day; he would blot it out of the calendar of time; he would effect a moral eclipse of its influence. He loved Henrietta Temple. She should be his. Who could prevent him? Was he not an Armine? Was he not the near descendant of that bold man who passed his whole life in the voluptuous indulgence of his unrestrained volition? Bravo! he willed it and it should be done. Every thing yields to determination. What a fool! what a miserable craven fool had he been to have frightened himself with the flimsy shadows of petty worldly cares! He was born to follow his own pleasure; it was supreme; it was absolute; he was a despot; he set every thing and everybody at defiance; and, filling a huge tumbler to the health of the great Sir Ferdinand, he reeled to bed, glorious as an emperor.

On the whole, Ferdinand had not committed so great an indiscretion as the reader, of course shocked, might at first imagine. For the first time for some days he slept, and slept soundly. Next to wine, a renovating slumber perhaps puts us in the best humour with our destiny. Ferdinand awoke refreshed and sanguine, full of inventive life, which soon developed itself in a flow of most improbable conclusions. His most rational scheme, however, appeared to consist in winning Henrietta Temple, and turning pirate, or engaging in the service of some distant and disturbed state. Why might he not free Greece, or revolutionize Spain, or conquer the Brazils? Others had embarked in these bold enterprises; men not more desperate than himself, and not better qualified for the career. Young, courageous, a warrior by profession, with a name of traditional glory throughout the courts of Christendom, perhaps even remembered in Asia, he seemed just the individual to carve out a glorious heritage with his sword. And as for his parents, they were not in the vale of years; let them dream on in easy obscurity, and maintain themselves at Armine until he returned to redeem his hereditary domain. All that was requisite was the concurrence of his adored mistress. Perhaps, after all his foolish fears, and all his petty anxiety, he might live to replace upon her brow the ancient coronet of Tewkesbury! Why not? The world is strange; nothing happens that we anticipate: when apparently stifled by the commonplace, we are on the brink of stepping into the adventurous. If he married Miss Grandison, his career was closed: a most unnatural conclusion for one so young and bold. It was evident that he must marry Henrietta Temple; and then? Why, then something would happen totally unexpected and unforeseen. Who could doubt it? Not he!

He rose, he mounted his horse, and galloped over to Ducie Common. Its very aspect melted his heart. He called at the cottages he had visited two days before. Without inquiring after Miss Temple, he contrived to hear a thousand circumstances relating to her which interested and charmed him. In the distance rose the woods of Ducie; he gazed upon them as if he could never withdraw his sight from their deep and silent forms. O, that sweet Bower! Why was there any other world but Ducie? All his brave projects of war, and conquest, and imperial plunder seemed dull and vain now. He sickened at the thought of action. He sighed to gather roses, to listen to songs sweeter than the nightingale, and wander forever in moonlit groves.

He turned his horse's head; slowly and sorrowfully he directed his course to Armine. Had they arrived! The stern presence of reality was too much for all his slight and glittering visions. What was he after all! This future conqueror was a young officer on leave, obscure except in his immediate circle, with no inheritance, and very much in debt; awaited with anxiety by his affectionate parents, and a young lady whom he was about to marry—for her fortune? Most impotent epilogue to a magnificent reverie!

The post arrived at Armine in the afternoon. As Ferdinand, nervous as a child returning to school, tardily regained home, he recognised the approaching postman. Ha! a letter? What was its import? The blessing of delay? or was it the herald of their instant arrival? Pale, and sick at heart, he tore open the hurried lines of Katherine. The maiden aunt had stumbled while getting out of a pony phaeton, and experienced a serious accident; their visit to Armine was necessarily postponed. He read no more. The colour returned to his cheek, reinforced by his heart's liveliest blood. A thousand thoughts, a thousand wild hopes, and wilder plans came over him. Here was, at least, one interposition in his favour; others would occur. He felt fortunate. He rushed to the tower, to tell the news to Glastonbury. His tutor ascribed his agitation to the shock, and attempted to console him. In communicating the intelligence, he was obliged to finish a letter; it expressed a hope, that, if their visit were postponed for more than a day or two, Katherine's dearest Ferdinand would return to Bath.

Ferdinand wandered forth into the park to enjoy his freedom. A burden had suddenly fallen from his frame; a cloud that had vanished. To-day, that was so accursed, was to be marked now in his calendar with red chalk. Even Armine pleased him; its sky was brighter, its woods more vast and green. They had not arrived; they would not arrive to-morrow, that was certain; the third day, too, was a day of hope. Why! three days, three whole days of unexpected, unhopèd for freedom, it was eternity! What might not happen in three days! In three days he might fairly remain in expectation of fresh letters. It could not be anticipated, it was not even desired, that he should instantly repair to them. Come, he would forget this curse, he would be happy. The past, the future should be nothing; he would revel in the auspicious present.

Thus communing with himself, he sauntered along, musing over Henrietta Temple, and building bright castles in the air. A man engaged with his ideas is insensible of fatigue. Ferdinand found himself at the park gate that led to Ducie; intending only a slight stroll, he had already rambled half-way to his beloved. It was a delicious afternoon: the heat of the sun had long abated; the air was sweet and just beginning to stir; not a sound was heard, except the last blow of the woodman's axe, or the occasional note of some joyous bird waking from its siesta. Ferdinand passed the gate; he entered the winding road, the road that Henrietta Temple had so admired; a beautiful green lane, indeed with banks of flowers, and hedges of tall trees. He strolled along, our happy Ferdinand, indefinite of purpose, almost insensible whether he were advancing or returning home. He plucked the wild flowers, and pressed them to his lips, because she had admired them—rested on a bank—lounged on a gate—cut a stick from the hedge—traced Henrietta Temple in the road, and then turned the words into Henrietta Armine—and so, and so, and so—he, at length, stared at finding himself on Ducie Common.

Beautiful common! How he loved it! How familiar every tree and rustic roof had become to him! Could he ever forget the morning he had bathed in those fresh waters! What lake of Italy, what heroic wave of the midland ocean, could rival in his imagination that simple basin! He drew near to the woods of Ducie, glowing with the setting sun. Surely there was no twilight like the twilight of this land! The woods of Ducie are entered. He recognised the path over which she had glided; he knelt down and kissed that sacred earth. As he approached the pleasure-grounds, he turned off into a side path, that he might not be perceived, he caught, through a vista, the distant glimpse of the mansion. The sight of that roof, wherein he had been so happy; of that roof that contained all that he cared or thought for in this world, overcame him. He leaned against a tree, and hid his face.

The twilight died away, the stars stole forth, and Ferdinand ventured in the spreading gloom of night to approach the mansion. He threw himself upon the turf, and watched the chamber where she lived. The windows were open, there were lights within the room, but the thin curtains were drawn, and concealed the inmates. Happy, happy chamber! All that was bright, and fair, and sweet, were concentrated in those charming walls!

The curtain is withdrawn; an arm—an arm which cannot be mistaken—pulls back the drapery. Is she coming forth? No, she does not; but he sees, distinctly he sees her. She sits in an old chair that he had often praised; her head rests upon her arm—her brow seems pensive: and in her other hand she holds a volume that she scarcely appears to read. O! may he gaze upon her forever! May this celestial scene, this seraphic hour, never pass away. Bright stars—O! do not fade; thou summer wind that playest upon his brow, perfumed by her flowers, refresh him forever; beautiful night, be forever the canopy of a scene so sweet and still; let existence glide away in gazing on yon delicate and tender vision!

Dreams of fantastic love—the curtain closes; a ruder hand than hers has shut her from his sight! It has all vanished; the stars seem dim, the autumnal air is dank and harsh; and where he had gazed on heaven, a bat flits wild and fleet. Poor Ferdinand, unhappy Ferdinand, how dull and depressed our brave gallant has become! Was it her father who had closed the curtain? Could he, himself, thought Ferdinand, have been observed?

Hark! a voice softer and sweeter than the night breaks upon the air. It is the voice of his beloved—and, indeed, with all her singular and admirable qualities, I do not know that there was any thing more remarkable about Henrietta Temple than her voice. It was a rare voice; so that in speaking, and in the most ordinary conversation, there was no one whose utterance was more natural and less unstudied; it forcibly affected you. She could not give you a greeting, bid you an adieu, or make the most routine remark, without impressing you with her power and sweetness. It sounded like a bell, sweet, and clear, and thrilling; it was quite astonishing—ay! it was ridiculous—what influence a little word uttered by this woman, without thought, would have upon your life. Of such fine clay is man made.

That beautiful voice recalled to Ferdinand all his fading visions: it renewed the spell which had recently enchanted him; it conjured up again all those sweet spirits that had a moment since hovered over him with their auspicious pinions. He could not, indeed, see her; her form, indeed, was shrouded, but her voice reached him; a voice attuned to tenderness, even to love; a voice that ravished his ear, melted his soul, and blended with his whole existence. His heart fluttered, his pulse beat high, he sprang up, he advanced to the window! Yes! a few paces alone divide them: a single step and he will be at her side. His hand is outstretched to clutch the curtain, his —, when suddenly the music ceased. His courage vanished with its inspiration. For a moment he lingered, but his heart misgave him, and he stole back to his solitude.

What a mystery is love! All the necessities and habits of our life sink before it. Food and sleep, that seem to divide our being, as day and night divide time, lose all their influence over the lover. He is, indeed, a spiritualized being, fit only to live upon ambrosia, and slumber in an imaginary paradise. The cares of the world do not touch him; its most stirring events are to him but the dusty incidents of by-gone annals. All the fortune of the world without his mistress is misery; and with her all its mischances a transient dream. Revolutions, earthquakes, the change of governments, the fall of empires, are to him but childish games distasteful to a manly spirit. Men love in the plague, and forget the pest, though it rages about them. They bear a charmed life, and think not of destruction until it touches their idol, and then they die without a pang, like zealots for their persecuted creed. A man in love wanders in the world as a somnambulist, with eyes that seem to open to those that watch him, yet in fact view nothing but their own inward fancies.

O! that night at Ducie, through whose long hours Ferdinand Armine, in a tumult of enraptured passions, wandered in the lawns, and groves, feeding on the image of its enchanting mistress, watching the solitary light in her chamber that was to him as the Pharos to a mariner in a tumultuous voyage! The morning, the gray cold morning, came at last; he had outwatched the stars, and listened to the matins of the waking birds. It was no longer possible to remain in the gardens unobserved; he regained the common.

What should he do? whether should he wend his course? To Armine; O! not to Armine; never could he return to Armine without the heart of Henrietta Temple. Yes! on that great venture he had now resolved; on that mighty hazard all should now be staked. Reckless of consequences, one vast object now alone sustained him. Existence without her was impossible! Ay! a day, a day, a single, a solitary day, should not elapse without breathing to her his passion, and seeking his fate from her dark eyes!

He strolled along to the extremity of the common. It was a great table land, from whose boundary you looked down in small rich valleys; and into one of these, winding his way through fields of golden grain and pastures, of which the fertile soil was testified by their vigorous hedges, he now descended. A long, low farmhouse, with gable ends and ample porch, an antique building that in old days might have been some manorial residence, attracted his attention. Its picturesque form, its angles and twisted chimneys, its porch covered with jessamine and egantine, its verdant homestead and its orchard rich with ruddy fruit, its vast barns and long lines of ample stacks, produced altogether a rural picture complete and cheerful. Near it ran a stream, which Ferdinand followed, and which, after a devious and rapid course, emptied itself into a deep and capacious pool, touched by the early sunbeam, and grateful to the swimmer's eye. Here Ferdinand made his natural toilet; and afterwards slowly returning to the farmhouse, sought an agreeable refuge from the sun in its fragrant porch.

The farmer's wife, accompanied by a pretty daughter with downcast eyes, came forth and invited him to enter. While he courteously refused her offer, he sought her hospitality. The good wife brought a table, and placed it in the porch, and covered it with a napkin purer than snow. Her viands were fresh eggs, milk warm from the cow, and bread she had herself baked. Even a lover might feed on such sweet food. This happy valley and this cheerful settlement wonderfully touched the fancy of Ferdinand. The season was mild and sunny, the air scented by the flowers that rustled in the breeze, the bees soon came to rife their sweetness, and flights of white and blue pigeons ever and anon skimmed along the sky from the neighbouring gables that were their dovecotes. Ferdinand made a salutary, if not a plenteous meal; and when the table was removed, exhausted by the fatigue and excitement of the last four-and-twenty hours, he stretched himself at full length in the porch, and fell into a gentle and dreamless slumber.

Hours elapsed before he awoke, vigorous indeed, and wonderfully refreshed; but the sun had already greatly declined. To his astonishment, as he moved, there fell from his breast a most beautiful nosegay. He was charmed with this delicate attention from his hostess, or perhaps from her pretty daughter with those downcast eyes. There seemed a refinement about the gift, and the mode of its offering, which scarcely could be expected from these kind yet simple rustics. The flowers, too, were most rare and choice; geraniums, such as are found only in lady's bower, a cape jessamine, some musky carnations, and a rose that seemed the sister of the one that he had borne from Ducie. They were most delicately bound together, too, by a bright blue riband, fastened by a golden and turquoise pin. This was most strange; this was an adventure more suitable to a Sicilian palace than an English farmhouse; to the gardens of a princess than the clustered porch of his kind hostess. Ferdinand gazed at the bouquet with a glance of blended perplexity and pleasure; then he entered the farmhouse, and made inquiries of his hostess, but they were fruitless. The pretty daughter with the downcast eyes was there too; but her very admiration of the gift, so genuine and unrestrained, proved, if testimony indeed were necessary, that she was not his unknown benefactor: admirer, he would have said; but Ferdinand was in love, and modest. All agreed no one, to their knowledge, had been there, and so Ferdinand, cherishing his beautiful gift, was fain to quit his new friends in as much perplexity as ever.

CHAPTER XIV.

WHICH CONTAINS AN INCIDENT THAT IS THE TERMINATION OF MOST TALES, THOUGH ALMOST THE BEGINNING OF THE PRESENT.

It was about two hours before sunset that Captain Armine summoned up courage to call at Ducie Bower. He inquired for Mr. Temple, and learned, to his surprise, that Mr. Temple had quitted Ducie yesterday morning for Scotland.

"And Miss Temple?" said Ferdinand.

"Is at home, sir," replied the servant.

Ferdinand was ushered into the saloon. She was not there. Our hero was very nervous he had been bold enough in the course of his walk from the farmhouse, and indulged in a thousand imaginary conversations with his mistress; but, now that he was really about to meet her, all his fire and fancy deserted him. Every thing occurred to him inauspicious to his suit; his own situation, the short time she had known him, his uncertainty of the state of her affections. How did he know she was not engaged to another! why should she not be betrothed as well as himself? This contingency had occurred to him before, and yet he had driven it from his thoughts. He began to be jealous; he began to think himself a very great fool; at any rate, he resolved not to expose himself any further. He was clearly premature; he would call to-morrow or next day; to speak to her now was certainly impossible.

The door opened; she entered, radiant as the day! What a smile! what dazzling teeth! what ravishing dimples! her eyes flashed like summer lightning; she extended him a hand white and soft as one of those doves that had played about him in the morning. Surely never was any one endowed with such an imperial presence. So stately, so majestic, and yet withal so simply gracious; full of such airy artlessness, at one moment she seemed an empress, and then only a beautiful child; and the hand and arm that seemed fashioned to wave a sceptre, in an instant appeared only fit to fondle a gazelle or pluck a flower.

"How do you do!" she said; and he really fancied she was going to sing. He was not yet accustomed to that marvellous voice. It broke upon the silence, like a silver bell just touched by the summer air. "It is very kind of you to come and see a lone maiden," she continued; "papa has deserted me, and without any preparation. I cannot endure to be separated from him, and this is almost the only time that he has refused my solicitation to accompany him. But he must travel far and quickly. My uncle has sent for him; he is very unwell, and papa is his trustee. There is business; I do not know what it is, but I dare say not very agreeable. By-the-by, I hope Lady Armine is well?"

"My papa has deserted me," said Ferdinand with a smile. "They have not yet arrived, and some days may yet elapse before they reach Armine."

"Indeed! I hope they are well."

"Yes; they are well."

"Did you ride here?"

"No."

"You did not walk?"

"I hardly know how I came; I believe I walked."

"You must be very tired; and you are standing! pray sit down; sit in that chair; you know that is your favourite chair."

And Ferdinand seated himself in the very chair in which he had watched her the preceding night.

"This is certainly my favourite chair," he said; "I know no seat in the world I prefer to this."

"Will you take some refreshment! I am sure you will; you must be very tired. Take some hock; let me order some hock—papa always takes hock and soda water. I shall order some hock and soda water for you." She rose and rang the bell in spite of his remonstrance.

"And have you been walking, Miss Temple?" inquired Ferdinand.

"I was thinking of strolling now," she replied; "but I am glad you have called, for I want an excuse to be idle."

An hour passed away, nor was the conversation on either side very brilliantly supported. Ferdinand seemed dull, but, indeed, was only moody, revolving in his mind many strange incidents and feelings, and then turning for consolation in his perplexities to the enchanting vision on which he still could gaze. Nor was Miss Temple, indeed, in her usually sparkling vein; her liveliness seemed an effort; she was more constrained, she was less fluent than before. Ferdinand, indeed, rose more than once to depart; yet still he remained. He lost his cap; he looked for his cap; he found his cap; and then again seated himself. Again he rose, restless and disquieted, wandered about the room, looked at a picture, plucked a flower, pulled the flower to pieces.

"Miss Temple," he at length observed, "I am afraid I am very stupid!"

"Because you are silent?"

"Is not that a sufficient reason?"

"Nay! I think not—I think I am rather fond of silent people myself; I cannot bear to live with a person who feels bound to talk because he is my companion. The whole day passes sometimes without papa and myself exchanging fifty words; yet I am very happy; I do not feel that we are dull;" and Miss Temple pursued her work, which she had previously taken up.

"Ah! but I am not your papa; when we are very intimate with people, when they interest us, we are engaged with their feelings, we do not perpetually require their ideas. But an acquaintance, as I am, only an acquaintance, a miserable acquaintance, unless I speak or listen, I have no business to be here; unless I in some degree contribute to the amusement or the convenience of my companion, I degenerate into a bore."

"I think you are very amusing, and you may be useful if you like, very;" and she offered him a skein of silk, which she requested him to hold.

It was a beautiful hand that was extended to him, a beautiful hand is an excellent thing in woman; it is a charm that never falls, and, better than all, it is a means of fascination that never disappears. Women carry a beautiful hand with them to the grave, when a beautiful face has long ago vanished or ceased to enchant. The expression of the hand, too, is inexhaustible; and when the eyes we may have worshipped no longer flash or sparkle, the ringlets with which we may have played are covered with a cap, or worse, a turban, and the symmetrical presence which in our sonnets has reminded us so oft of antelopes and wild gazelles, have all, all vanished; the hand, the immortal hand, defying alike time and care, still vanquishes, and still triumphs; and, small, soft, and fair, by an airy attitude, a gentle pressure, or a new ring, renews with untiring grace the spell that bound our enamoured and adoring youth!

But in the present instance there were eyes as bright as the hand, locks more glossy and luxuriant than Helen of Troy's, a cheek pink as a shell, and breaking into dimples like a May morning into sunshine, and lips from which stole forth a perfume sweeter than the whole conservatory. Ferdinand sat down on a chair opposite Miss Temple, with the extended skein.

"Now this is better than doing nothing!" she said, catching his eye with a glance half kind, half arch. "I suspect, Captain Armine, that your melancholy originates in idleness."

"Ah! if I could only be employed every day in this manner!" ejaculated Ferdinand.

"Nay! not with a distaff; but you must do something. You must get into parliament."

"You forget that I am a Catholic," said Ferdinand.

Miss Temple slightly blushed, and talked rather quickly about her work; but her companion would not relinquish the subject.

"I hope you are not prejudiced against my faith," said Ferdinand.

"Prejudiced! Dear Captain Armine, do not make me repent too seriously a giddy word. I feel it is wrong that matters of taste should mingle with matters of belief; but, to speak the truth, I am not quite sure that a Howard or an Armine, who was a Protestant, like myself, would quite please my fancy as much as in their present position, which, if a little inconvenient, is very picturesque."

Ferdinand smiled. "My great-grandmother was a Protestant," said Ferdinand. "Margaret Armine. Do you think Margaret a pretty name?"

"Queen Margaret! yes! a fine name, I think; barring its abbreviation."

"I wish my great-grandmother's name had not been Margaret," said Ferdinand very seriously.

"Now, why should that respectable dame's baptism disturb your fancy?" inquired Miss Temple.

"I wish her name had been Henrietta," replied Ferdinand. "Henrietta Armine. You know there was a Henrietta Armine once?"

"Was there?" said Miss Temple, rising. "Our skein is finished. You have been very good. I must go and see my flowers. Come." And as she said this little word, she turned her fair and finely finished neck, and looked over her shoulder at Ferdinand with an arch expression of countenance peculiar to her. That winning look, indeed, that clear, sweet voice, and that quick graceful attitude, blended into a spell, which was irresistible. His heart yearned for Henrietta Temple, and rose at the bidding of her voice.

From the conservatory they stepped into the garden. It was a most delicious afternoon; the sun had sunk behind the grove, and the air, which had been throughout the day somewhat oppressive, was now warm, but mild. At Ducie there was a fine old terrace facing the western hills, that bound the valley in which the Bower was situated. These hills, a ridge of moderate elevation, but of very picturesque form, parted just opposite the terrace, as if on purpose to admit the setting sun, like inferior existences that had, as it were, made way before the splendour of some mighty lord or conqueror. The lofty and sloping bank which this terrace crowned was covered with rare shrubs, and occasionally a group of tall trees sprang up among them, and broke the view with an interference which was far from ungraceful—while ivy and other creepers, preading forth from large marble vases, had extended over their trunks, and sometimes even in their play, had touched their topmost branches. Between the terrace and the distant hills extended a vast tract of pasture land, green and well wooded by its rich hedge-rows; not a roof was visible, though many farms and hamlets were at hand; and, in the heart of a rich and populous land, here was a region where the shepherd or the herdsman were the only evidences of human existence. It was thither, a grateful spot at such an hour, that Miss Temple and her companion directed their steps. The last beam of the sun flashed across the flaming horizon as they gained the terrace; the hills, well wooded, or presenting a bare and acute outline to the sky, rose sharply defined in form; while in another direction some more distant elevations were preaded with a rich purple tint, touched sometimes with a rosy blaze of soft and flickering light. The whole scene, indeed, from the humble pasture land that was soon to creep into darkness, to the proud hills whose sparkling crests were yet touched by the living beam, was bathed with lucid beauty and luminous softness, and blended with the glowing canopy of the lustrous sky. But on the terrace, and the groves that rose beyond it, and the glades and vistas into which they opened, fell the full glory of the sunset. Each moment a new shadow, now rosy, now golden, now blending in its shifting tints all the glory of the iris, fell over the rich pleasure-grounds, its groups of rare and noble trees, and its dim or glittering avenues.

The vespers of the birds were faintly dying away, the last low of the returning kine sounded over the lea, the tinkle of the sheep-bell was heard no more, the thin white moon began to gleam, and Hesperus glittered in the fading sky. It was the twilight hour!

That delicious hour that softens the heart of man—what is its magic? Not merely its beauty; it is not more beautiful than the sunrise. It is its repose. Our tumultuous passions sink with the sun; there is a fine sympathy between us and our world, and the stillness of nature is responded to by the serenity of the soul.

At this sacred hour our hearts are pure. All worldly cares, all those vulgar anxieties and aspirations that at other seasons hover like vultures over our existence, vanish from the serene atmosphere of our susceptibility. A sense of beauty, a sentiment of love pervade our being. But if at such a moment solitude is full of joy—if, even when alone, our native sensibility suffices to entrance us with a tranquil, yet thrilling, bliss—how doubly sweet, how multiplied must be our fine emotions, when the most delicate influence of human sympathy combines with the power and purity of material and moral nature, and completes the exquisite and enchanting spell!

Ferdinand Armine turned from the beautiful world around him, to gaze upon a countenance sweeter than the summer air, softer than the gleaming moon, brighter than the evening star. The shadowy light of purple eve fell upon the still and solemn presence of Henrietta Temple. Irresistible emotion impelled him; softly he took her gentle hand, and scarcely winding round her waist his trembling arm, he bent his head, and murmured to her, "Most beautiful, I love thee!"

As in the oppressive stillness of some tropic night, a single drop is the refreshing harbinger of a shower that clears the heavens, so even this slight expression relieved in an instant the intensity of his o'erburdened feelings, and warm, quick, and gushing, flowed the words that breathed his fervid adoration. "Yes!" he continued, "in this fair scene, O! let me turn to something fairer still. Beautiful, beloved Henrietta, I can repress no longer the emotions that, since I first beheld you, have vanquished my existence. I love you, I adore you, life in your society is heaven; without you I cannot live. Deem me, O! deem me not too bold, sweet lady; I am not worthy of you, yet let me love! I am not worthy of you, but who can be! Ah! if I dared but venture to offer you my heart, if indeed that humblest of all possessions might indeed be yours, if my adoration, if my devotion, if the consecration of my life to you, might in some degree compensate for its little worth, if I might live even but to hope—

"You do not speak, my treasure; my beloved is silent. Miss Temple, Henrietta, admirable Henrietta, have I offended you! am I indeed the victim of hopes too high and fancies too supreme? O! pardon me, most beautiful, I pray your pardon. Is it a crime to feel, perchance too keenly, the sense of beauty like to thine, dear lady? Ah! tell me I am forgiven; tell me indeed you do not hate me. I will be silent, I will never speak again. Yet, let me walk with you. Cease not to be my companion because I have been too bold. Pity me, pity me, dearest, dearest Henrietta. If you but knew how I have suffered, if you but knew the nights that brought no sleep, the days of fever, that had been mine since first we met; if you but knew how I have fed but upon one sweet idea, one sacred image of absorbing life, since first I gazed on your transcendent form, indeed I think that you would pity, that you would pardon, that you might even—

"Tell me, is it my fault that you are beautiful? O! how beautiful, my wretched and exhausted soul too surely feels! Is it my fault those eyes are like the dawn, that thy sweet voice thrills through my frame, and but the lightest touch of that light hand falls like a spell on my entranced form? Ah! Henrietta, be merciful, be kind!"

He paused for a second, and yet she did not answer; but her cheek fell upon his shoulder, and the gentle pressure of her hand was more eloquent than language. That slight sweet signal was to him as the sunrise on the misty earth. Full of hope, and joy, and confidence, he took her in his arms, sealed her cold lips with a burning kiss, and vowed to her his eternal and almighty love!

He bore her to an old stone bench placed on the terrace. Still she was silent: but her hand clasped his, and her head rested on his bosom. The gleaming moon now glittered, the hills and woods were silvered by its beams, and the far meads were bathed with its clear, fair light. Not a single cloud curtailed the splendour of the stars. What a rapturous soul was Ferdinand Armine's as he sat that night on the old bench, on Ducie terrace, shrouding from the rising breeze the trembling form of Henrietta Temple! And yet it was not cold that made her shiver.

The clock of Ducie church struck ten. She moved, saying, in a faint voice, "We must go home, my Ferdinand!"

BOOK III.

CHAPTER I.

IN WHICH CAPTAIN ARMINE PROVES HIMSELF A COMPLETE TACTICIAN.

THE midnight moon flung its broad beams over the glades and avenues of Armine, as Ferdinand, riding Miss Temple's horse, re-entered the park. His countenance was paler than the spectral light that guided him on his way. He looked little like a pledged and triumphant lover; but in his contracted brow and compressed lip might be read the determination of his soul. There was no longer a contest between poverty and pride, between the maintenance or destruction of his ancient house, between his old engagement and his present passion; that was past. Henrietta Temple was the light in the Pharos, amid all his stormy fortunes; thither he directed all the energies of his being; and to gain that port, or sink, was his unflinching resolution.

It was deep in the night before he again beheld the towers and turrets of his castle, and the ivy-covered fragment of the old Place seemed to sleep in peace under its protecting influence. A wild and beautiful event had happened since last he quitted those ancient walls. And what would be its influence upon them? But it is not for the passionate lover to moralize. For him, the regrets of the past and the chances of the future are alike lost in the ravishing and absorbing present. For a lover that has just secured the object of his long and tumultuous hopes, is as a diver who has plucked a jewel from the bed of some rare sea. Panting and wild he lies upon the beach, and the gem that he clutches is the sole idea that engrosses his existence.

Ferdinand is within his little chamber; that little chamber where his mother had bid him so passionate a farewell. Ah! he loves another woman better than his mother now! Nay, even a feeling of embarrassment and pain is associated with the recollection of that fond and elegant being, that he had recognised once as the model of all feminine perfection, and who had been to him so gentle and so devoted. He drives his mother from his thoughts. It is of another voice that he now muses; it is the memory of another's glance that touches his eager heart. He falls into a reverie; the passionate past is acted again before him; in his glittering eye and the rapid play of his features may be traced the tumult of his soul. A doubt crosses his brow. Is he indeed so happy—is it not all a dream? He takes from his bosom the handkerchief of Henrietta Temple. He recognises upon it her magical initials, worked in her own fine dark hair. A smile of triumphant certainty irradiates his countenance, as he rapidly presses the memorial to his lips, and imprints upon it a thousand kisses; and, holding this cherished testimony of his felicity to his heart, sleep at length descended upon the exhausted frame of Ferdinand Armine.

But the night that brought dreams to Ferdinand Armine, brought him not visions more marvellous and magical than his waking life. He who loves, lives in an ecstatic trance. The world that surrounds him is not the world of working man: it is fairyland. He is not of the same order as the labouring myriads on which he seems to tread. They are to him but a swarm of humble-minded and humble-mannered insects. For him, the human species is represented by a single individual, and of her he makes an idol. All that is bright and rare is but invented and devised to adorn and please her. Flowers for her were made so sweet and birds so musical. All nature seems to bear an intimate relation to the being we adore; and, as to us life would now appear intolerable, a burden or insupportable and wearing toil, without this transcendent sympathy, so we cannot help fancying that were its sweet and subtle origin herself to quit this inspired scene, the universe itself would not be unconscious of its deprivation, and somewhat of the world's lustre might be missed, even by the most callous.

The morning burst, as beautiful as such love. A rosy tint suffused the soft and tremulous sky, and tinted with a delicate hue the tall trees and the wide lawns, freshened with the light and vanishing dew. The air was vocal with a thousand songs; all was bright and clear, cheerful and golden. Ferdinand awoke from delicious dreams, and gazed upon the scene that responded to his own bright and glad emotions, and inhaled the balmy air, ethereal as his own soul. Love, that can illumine the dark hovel and the dismal garret, that sheds a ray of enchanting light over the close and busy city, seems to mount with a lighter and more glittering pinion in an atmosphere as brilliant as its own plumes. Fortunate the youth, the romance of whose existence is placed in a scene befitting its fair and marvellous career; fortunate the passion that is breathed in palaces, amid the ennobling creations of surrounding art, and greets the object of its fond solicitude amid perfumed gardens, and in the shade of green and silent woods! Whatever may be the harsher course of his career, however the cold world may cast its dark shadows upon his future path, he may yet consider himself thrice blessed to whom this graceful destiny has fallen, and amid the storms and troubles of after-life may look back to these hours, fair as the dawn, beautiful as the twilight, with solace and satisfaction. Disappointment may wither up his energies, oppression may bruise his spirit; but balked, daunted, deserted, crushed, lone where once all was sympathy, gloomy where all was light, still he has not lived in vain.

Business, however, rises with the sun. The morning brings cares, and, although with braced energies and renovated strength then is the season that we are best qualified to struggle with the harassing brood, still Ferdinand Armine, the involved son of a ruined race, seldom rose from his couch, seldom recalled consciousness after repose, without a pang. Nor was there indeed magic withal in the sweet spell that now bound him to preserve him from this black invasion. Anxiety was one of the ingredients of the charm. He might have forgotten his own broken fortunes, his audacious and sanguine spirit might have built up many a castle for the future, as brave as that of Armine; but the very inspiring recollection of Henrietta Temple, the very remembrance of the past and triumphant eve, only the more forced upon his memory the conviction that he was, at this moment, engaged also to another, and bound to be married to two women.

Something must be done; Miss Grandison might arrive this very day. It was an improbable incident, but still it might occur. While he was thus musing, his servant brought him his letters, which had arrived the preceding day—letters from his mother and Katherine, his Katherine. They brought present relief. The invalid had not amended; their movements were still uncertain. Katherine, "his own Kate," expressed even a fond faint wish that he would return. His resolution was taken in an instant. He decided with the prescient promptitude of one who has his dearest interests at stake. He wrote to Katherine that he would instantly fly to her, only that he daily expected his attendance would be required in town, on military business of urgent importance to their happiness. This might, this must, necessarily delay their meeting. The moment he received his summons to attend the Horse Guards, he should hurry off. In the mean time, she was to write to him here; and at all events not to quit Bath for Armine, without giving him a notice of several days. Having despatched this letter, and another to his mother, Ferdinand repaired to the tower, to communicate to Glastonbury the necessity of his immediate departure for London, but he also assured that good old man of his brief visit to that city. The pang of this unexpected departure was softened by the positive promise of returning in a very few days, and returning with his family.

Having made these arrangements, Ferdinand now felt that come what might, he had at least secured for himself a certain period of unbroken bliss. He had a faithful servant, an Italian, in whose discretion he had justly unlimited confidence. To him Ferdinand intrusted the duty of bringing, each day, his letters to his retreat, which he had fixed upon should be that same picturesque farmhouse, in whose friendly porch he had found the preceding day such a hospitable shelter, and where he experienced that charming adventure which now rather delighted than perplexed him.

CHAPTER II.

A DAY OF LOVE.

MEANWHILE the beautiful Henrietta sat in her bower, her music neglected, her drawing thrown aside. Even her birds were forgotten and her flowers untended. A soft tumult filled her frame; now rapt in revery she leaned her head upon her fair hand in charmed abstraction; now rising from her restless seat she paced the chamber, and thought of his quick coming. What was this mighty revolution that a few short days—a few brief hours had occasioned? How mysterious, yet how irresistible—how overwhelming! Her father was absent, that father on whose fond idea she had alone lived; from whom the slightest separation had once been pain; and now that father claims not even her thoughts. Another and a stranger's image, is throned in her soul! She who had moved in the world so variously—who had received so much homage, and been accustomed from her childhood to all that is considered accomplished and fascinating in man, and had passed through the ordeal with a calm clear spirit; behold, she is no longer the mistress of her thoughts or feelings; she had fallen before a glance, and yielded in an instant to a burning word!

But could she blame herself? Did she repent the rapid and ravishing past? Did regret mingle with her wonder? Was there a pang of remorse, however slight, blending its sharp tooth with all her bliss? O! no! Her love was perfect, and her joy was full. She offered her vows to that Heaven that had accorded her happiness so supreme; she felt only unworthy of a destiny so complete. She marvelled in the meekness and purity of her spirit, why one so gifted had been reserved for her, and what he could recognise in imperfect and inferior qualities to devote to them the fondness of his rare existence.

Ferdinand Armine! Did there indeed ever breathe, had the wit of poet ever yet devised, a being so choice? So young, so beautiful, so lively and accomplished, so deeply and variously interesting! Was that sweet voice, indeed, only to sound in her enchanted ear—that graceful form to move only for the pleasure of her watchful eye? That quick and airy fancy but to create for her delight, and that soft, gentle heart, to own no solicitude but for her will and infinite gratification? And could it be possible that he loved her, that she was indeed his pledged and panting bride, that the accents of his adoration still echoed in her ear, and his fond embraces still clung to her mute and trembling lips! Would he always love her? Would he always be so fond? Would he be as faithful as he was now devoted? Ah! she would not lose him. That heart should never escape her. Her life should be one long vigilant device to enchain his being.

What was she five days past? Is it possible that she lived before she met him? Of what did she think, what do! Could there be pursuits without this companion, plans or feelings without this sweet friend? Life must have been a blank, rapid, and dull, and weary. She could not recall herself before that morning ride to Armine. How rolled away the day! How heavy must have been the hours! All that had been uttered before she listened to Ferdinand seemed without point; all that was done before he lingered at her side aimless and without an object.

O, Love! in vain they moralize; in vain they teach us thou art a delusion; in vain they dissect thine inspiring sentiment, and would mortify us into misery by its degrading analysis. The sage may announce that gratified vanity is thine aim and end; the lover glances with contempt at his cold-blooded philosophy. Nature assures him thou art a beautiful and sublime emotion; and, he answers, canst thou deprive the sun of its heat because its ray may be decomposed; or does the diamond blaze with less splendour because thou canst analyze its effulgence!

A gentle rustling sounded at the window; Henrietta looked up, but the sight deserted her fading vision, as Ferdinand seized with softness her softer hand, and pressed it to his lips.

A moment since, and she had longed for his presence as the infant for its mother; a moment since, and she had murmured that so much of the morn had passed without his society; a moment since, and it had seemed that no time could exhaust the expression of her feelings. How she had sighed for his coming! How she had hoped that this day she might convey to him what last night she had so weakly, so imperfectly attempted! And now she sat trembling and silent, with downcast eyes and changing countenance!

"My Henrietta!" exclaimed Ferdinand; "My beautiful Henrietta, it seemed we never should meet again, and yet I rose almost with the sun."

"My Ferdinand," replied Miss Temple, scarcely daring to meet his glance, "I cannot speak; I am so happy that I cannot speak."

"Ah! tell me, sweetest, have you thought of me very much! Did you observe I stole your handkerchief last night? See! here it is; when I slept, I kissed it and wore it next my heart."

"Dear handkerchief! Ah! give it me, my Ferdinand," she faintly murmured, extending her hand; and then she added, in a firmer and livelier tone, "And did he really kiss it! did he really kiss it before he slept, and wear it near his heart!"

"Near thine; for thine it is, love! Sweet, you look so beautiful to-day! It seems to me you never looked half so fair. Those eyes are so brilliant—so very blue—so like the violet! There is nothing like your eyes."

"Except your own."

"You have taken away your hand. Give me back my hand, my Henrietta. I will not quit it. The whole day it shall be clasped in mine. Ah! what a hand! so soft—so very soft! There is nothing like your hand."

"Yours is as soft, Ferdinand."

"O! Henrietta! I do love you so! I wish that I could tell you how I loved you! As I rode home last night, it seemed that I had not conveyed to you a tithe, nay, a thousandth part of what I feel."

"You cannot love me, Ferdinand, more than I love you."

"Say so again! Tell me very often—tell me a thousand times, how much you love me. Unless you tell me a thousand times, Henrietta, I never can believe that I am so blessed."

They went forth into the garden. Nature, with the splendid sky and the sweet breeze, seemed to smile upon their passion. Henrietta plucked the most beautiful flowers, and placed them in his breast.

"Do you remember the rose at Armine?" said Ferdinand, with a fond smile.

"Ah! who would have believed that it would have led to this!" said Henrietta, with downcast eyes.

"I am not more in love now than I was then," said Ferdinand.

"I dare not speak of my feelings," said Miss Temple. "Is it possible that it can be but five days back since we first met! It seems another era."

"I have no recollection of any thing that occurred, before I saw you beneath the cedar," replied Ferdinand; "that is the date of my existence. I saw you, and I loved. My love was at once complete; I have no confidence in any other; I have no confidence in the love that is the creature of observation, and reflection, and comparison, and calculation. Love, in my opinion, should spring from innate sympathy; it should be superior to all situations, all ties, all circumstances."

"Such, then, we must believe, is ours," replied Henrietta, in a somewhat grave and musing tone; "I would willingly embrace your creed. I know not why I should be ashamed of my feelings. They are natural, and they are pure. And yet I tremble. But as long as you do not think lightly of me, Ferdinand, for whom should I care!"

"My Henrietta! my angel! my adored and beautiful! I worship you—I reverence you. Ah! my Henrietta, if you only knew how I doat upon you, you would not speak thus. Come, let us ramble in our woods."

So saying, he withdrew her from the more public situation in which they were then placed, and entered, by a winding walk, those beautiful bowers that had given so fair and fitting a name to Ducie. Ah! that was a ramble of rich delight, as, winding his arm round her light waist, he poured into her palpitating ear all the eloquence of his passion. Each hour that they had known each other was analyzed, and the feelings of each moment were compared. What sweet and thrilling confessions! Eventually it was settled, to the complete satisfaction of both, that both had fallen in love at the same time, and that they had been mutually and unceasingly thinking of each other from the first instant of their meeting.

The conversation of lovers is inexhaustible. Hour glided away after hour, as Ferdinand alternately expressed his passion and detailed the history of his past life. For the curiosity of woman, lively at all times, is never so keen, so exacting, and so interested, as in her anxiety to become acquainted with the previous career of her lover. She is jealous of all that he has done before she knew him; of every person to whom he has spoken. She will be assured a thousand times that he never loved before, yet she credits the first affirmation. She envies the mother who knew him as a child, even the nurse that may have rocked his cradle. She insists upon a minute and finished portraiture of his character and life.

Why did he not give it? More than once it was upon his lips to reveal all; more than once he was about to pour forth all his sorrows, all the entanglements of his painful situation; more than once he was about to make the full and mortifying confession, that, though his heart was hers, there existed another, who even at that moment might claim the hand that Henrietta clasped with so much tenderness. But he checked himself. He would not break the charm that surrounded him; he would not disturb the clear and brilliant stream in which his life was at this moment flowing; he had not courage to change by a worldly word the scene of celestial enchantment in which he now moved and breathed. Let me add, in some degree for his justification, that he was not altogether unmindful of the feelings of Miss Grandison. Sufficient misery remained, at all events, for her, without adding the misery of making her rival a confidant in her mortification. The deed must be done, and done promptly; but, at least, there should be no unnecessary witnesses to its harrowing achievement.

So he looked upon the radiant brow of his Henrietta, wreathed with smiles of innocent triumph, sparkling with unalloyed felicity, and beaming with unbroken devotion. Should the shade of a dark passion for a moment cloud that heaven, so bright and so serene? Should even a momentary pang of jealousy or distrust pain that pure and unsullied breast? In the midst of contending emotions, he pressed her to his heart with renewed energy, and, bending down his head, imprinted an embrace upon her blushing forehead.

They seated themselves on a bank, which, it would seem, nature had created for the convenience of lovers. The softest moss and the brightest flowers decked its elastic and fragrant side. A spreading beech tree shaded their heads from the sun, which now indeed was on the decline; and occasionally its wide branches rustled with the soft breeze, that passed over them in renovating and gentle gusts. The woods widened before them, and, at the termination of a well-contrived avenue, they caught the roofs of the village and the tall tower of Ducie Church. They had wandered for hours without weariness, yet the repose was grateful, while they listened to the birds, and plucked beautiful wild flowers.

"Ah! I remember," said Ferdinand, "that it was not far from here, while slumbering indeed in the porch of my pretty farmhouse, that the fairy of the spot dropped on my breast these beautiful flowers that I now wear. Did you not observe them, my sweet Henrietta? Do you know that I am rather mortified, that they have not made you at least a little jealous?"

"I am not jealous of fairies, dear Ferdinand."

"And yet I half believe that you are a fairy, my Henrietta."

"A very substantial one, I fear, my Ferdinand. Is this a compliment to my form?"

"Well, then, a sylvan nymph, much more, I assure you, to my fancy; perhaps the rosy dryad of this fair tree; rambling in woods, and bounding over commons, scattering beautiful flowers, and dreams as bright."

"And were your dreams bright yesterday morning?"

"I dreamt of you."

"And when you awoke?"

"I hastened to the source of my inspiration."

"And if you had not dreamt of me?"

"I should have come to have inquired the reason why."

Miss Temple looked upon the ground; a blended expression of mirth and sentiment played over her features, and then looking up with a smile contending with her tearful eye, she hid her face in his breast and murmured, "I watched him sleeping. Did he indeed dream of me?"

"Darling of my existence," exclaimed the enraptured Ferdinand; "exquisite, enchanting being! Why am I so happy? What have I done to deserve bliss so ineffable? But tell me, beauty, tell me how you contrived to appear and vanish without witnesses. For my inquiries were severe, and these good people must have been less artless than I imagined to have withstood them successfully."

"I came," said Miss Temple, "to pay them a visit, with me not uncommon. When I entered the porch I beheld my Ferdinand asleep. I looked upon him for a moment, but I was frightened and stole away unperceived. But I left the flowers more fortunate than your Henrietta!"

"Sweet love!"

"Never did I return home," continued Miss Temple, "more sad and more dispirited. A thousand times I wish that I was a flower, that I might be gathered and worn upon your heart. You smile, my Ferdinand. Indeed I feel I am very foolish, yet I know not why, I am now neither ashamed nor afraid to tell you any thing. I was so miserable when I arrived home, my Ferdinand, that I went to my room and wept. And he then came! O! what heaven was mine! I wiped the tears from my face and came down to see him. He looked so beautiful and happy!"

"And you, sweet child, O! who could have believed, at that moment, that a tear had escaped from those bright eyes!"

"Love makes us hypocrites, I fear, my Ferdinand; for a moment before I was so wearied that I was lying on my sofa quite wretched. And then, when I saw him, I pretended that I had not been out, and was just thinking of a stroll. O! my Ferdinand! will you pardon me?"

"It seems to me that I never loved you until this moment. Is it possible that human beings ever loved each other as we do?"

Now came the hour of twilight. While in this fond strain the lovers interchanged their hearts, the sun had sunk, the birds grown silent, and the star of evening twinkled over the tower of Ducie. The bat and the beetle warned them to return. They rose reluctantly and retraced their steps to Ducie, with hearts even softer than the melting hour.

"Must we then part?" exclaimed Ferdinand. "O! must we part! How can I exist even an instant without your presence, without at least the consciousness of existing under the same roof? O! would I were one of your serving-men, to listen to your footstep, to obey your bell, and ever and anon to catch your voice! O! now I wish indeed Mr. Temple were here, and then I might be your guest."

"My father!" exclaimed Miss Temple, in a somewhat serious tone. "My poor father! I ought to have written to him to-day! Why have I not? O! talk not of my father, speak only of yourself."

They stood in silence as they were about to emerge upon the lawn, and then Miss Temple said, "Dear Ferdinand, you must go; indeed you must. Press me not to enter, darling. If you love me, now let us part. I shall retire immediately, that the morning may sooner come. God bless you, my Ferdinand. May he guard over you, and keep you forever and ever. Sweet, sweet love, you weep! Indeed you must not; you will drive me mad if you do this. Ferdinand, darling, darling Ferdinand, be good, be kind; for my sake do not this. I love you, sweetest; what can I do more? The time will come we will not part, but now we must. Good night, my Ferdinand; good night, idol of my soul! Nay, if you will, these lips indeed are yours. Promise me you will not remain here. Well, then, when the light is out in my chamber, leave Ducie. Promise me this, sweet, and early to-morrow, earlier than you think, I will pay a visit to your cottage. Now, sweet, be good, and to-morrow we will breakfast together. There, now!" she added in a gay tone, "you see woman's wit has the advantage." And so without another word she ran away.

CHAPTER III.

WHICH ON THE WHOLE IS FOUND VERY CONSOLING.

THE separation of lovers, even with an immediate prospect of union, involves a sentiment of deep melancholy. The reaction of our solitary emotions, after a social impulse of such peculiar excitement, very much disheartens and depresses us. Mutual passion is complete sympathy. Under such an influence there is no feeling so strong, no fancy so delicate, that it is not instantly responded to. Our heart has no secrets, though our life may. Under such an influence, each unconsciously labours to enchant the other; each struggles to maintain the reality of that ideal, which has been reached in a moment of happy inspiration. Then is the season when the voice is ever soft, the eye ever bright, and every movement of the frame airy and picturesque; each accent is full of tenderness, each glance of affection, each gesture of grace. We live in a heaven of our own creation. All happens that can contribute to our perfect satisfaction, and can insure our complete self-complacency. We give and we receive felicity. We adore and we are adored. Love is the May-day of the heart.

But a cloud nevertheless will dim the genial lustre of that soft and brilliant sky, when we are alone; when the soft voice no longer sighs, and the bright eye no longer beams, and the form we worship no longer moves before our enraptured vision. Our happiness becomes too much the result of reflection. Our faith is not less devout, but it is not so fervent. We believe in the miracle, but we no longer witness it.

And as the light was extinguished in the chamber of Henrietta Temple, Ferdinand Armine felt for a moment as if his sun had set forever. There seemed to be now no evidence of her existence. Would to-morrow ever come? And if it came, would the rosy hours indeed bring her in their radiant car? What if this night she died? He shuddered at this wild imagination. Yet it might be; such direful calamities had been. And now he felt his life was involved in hers, and that under such circumstances his instant death must complete the catastrophe. There was then much at stake. Had it been yet his glorious privilege that her fair cheek should have found a pillow on his heart; could he have been permitted to have rested without her door but as her guard; even if the same roof at any distance had screened both their heads; such dark conceptions would not perhaps have risen up to torture him; but as it was, they haunted him like evil spirits as he took his lonely way over the common to gain his new abode.

Ah! the morning came, and such a morn! Bright as his love! Ferdinand had passed a dreary night, and when he woke he could not at first recognise the locality. It was not Armine. Could it be Ducie? As he stretched his limbs and rubbed his eyes, he might be excused for a moment fancying that all the happiness of yesterday was indeed a vision. He was, in truth, sorely perplexed, as he looked around the neat but humble chamber, and caught the first beam of the sun struggling through a casement shadowed by the jessamine. But on his heart there rested a curl of dark and flowing hair, and held together by that very turquoise of which he fancied he had been dreaming. Happy, happy Ferdinand! Why shouldst thou have cares! and may not the course even of thy true love run smooth!

He recks not of the future! What is the future to one so blessed? The sun is up, the lark is singing, the sky is bluer than the loved jewel at his heart. She will be here soon. No gloomy images disturb him now. Cheerfulness is the dowry of the dawn.

Will she indeed be here? Will Henrietta Temple indeed come to visit him? Will that consummate being before whom, but a few days back, he stood entranced—to whose mind the very idea of his existence had not then even occurred—will she be here anon to visit him? to visit her beloved! What has he done to be so happy? What fairy has touched him and his dark fortunes with her wand? What talisman does he grasp to call up such bright adventures of existence. He does not err. He is an enchanted being; a spell indeed pervades his frame; he moves in truth in a world of marvels and miracles. For what fairy has a wand like love, what talisman can achieve the deeds of passion.

He quitted the rustic porch, and strolled up the lane that led to Ducie. He started at a sound; it was but the spring of a wandering bird. Then the murmur of a distant wheel turned him pale; and he stopped and leaned on a neighbouring gate with a panting heart. Was she at hand? There is not a moment when the heart palpitates with such delicate suspense as when we await our mistress in the spring days of our passion. Man watching the sunrise from the mountain, awaits not an incident to him more beautiful; more genial, and more impressive. With her presence it would seem that both light and heat fall at the same time upon our heart; our emotions are warm and sunny, that a moment ago seemed dim and frigid; a thrilling sense of joy pervades our frame; the air is sweeter, and our ears seem to echo with the music of a thousand birds.

The sound of the approaching wheel became more audible; it drew near, nearer; but lost the delicacy that distance lent it. Alas! it did not propel the car of a fairy, or the chariot of a heroine, but a cart, whose taxed springs bowed beneath the portly form of an honest yeoman, who gave Captain Armine a cheerful good-morrow as he jogged by, and flanked his jolly whip with unmerciful dexterity. The loudness of the unexpected salute, the crack of the echoing thong, shook the fine nerves of a fanciful lover, and Ferdinand looked so confused, that if the honest yeoman had only stopped to observe him, the passenger might have really been excused for mistaking him for a poacher, at the least, by his guilty countenance.

This little worldly interruption broke the wings of Ferdinand's soaring fancy. He fell to earth. Doubt came over him whether Henrietta would indeed come. He was disappointed, and so he became distrustful. He strolled on, however, in the direction of Ducie, yet slowly, as there was more than one road, and to miss each other would have been mortifying. His quick eye was in every quarter; his watchful ear listened in every direction; still she was not seen, and not a sound was heard except the hum of day. He became nervous, agitated, and began to conjure up a crowd of unfortunate incidents.—Perhaps she was ill; that was very bad.—Perhaps her father had suddenly returned. Was that worse? Perhaps something strange had happened.—Perhaps—

Why! why does his face turn so pale, and why is his step so suddenly arrested? Ah! Ferdinand Armine, is not thy conscience clear! That pang was sharp. No, no, it is impossible; clearly, absolutely impossible; this is weak, indeed. See! he smiles! He smiles at his weakness. He waves his arm as if in contempt. He casts away, with defiance, his idle apprehensions. His step is more assured, and the colour returns to his cheek. And yet her father must return. Was he prepared for that occurrence? This was a searching question. It induced a long, dark train of harassing recollections. He stopped to ponder. In what a web of circumstances was he now involved! Howsoever he might act, self-extrication appeared impossible. Perfect candour to Miss Temple might be the destruction of her love; even modified to her father, would certainly produce his banishment from Ducie. As the betrothed of Miss Grandison, Miss Temple would abjure him; as the lover of Miss Temple, under any circumstances, Mr. Temple would reject him. In what light would he appear to Henrietta were he to dare to reveal the truth? Would she not look upon him as the unresisting libertine of the hour, engaging in levity her heart, as he had already trifled with another's? For that absorbing and overwhelming passion, pure, primitive, and profound, to which she now responded with an enthusiasm as fresh, as ardent, and as immaculate; she would only recognise the fleeting fancy of a vain and worldly spirit, eager to add another triumph to a long list of conquests, and proud of another evidence of his irresistible influence. What security was there for her that she too should not in turn be forgotten for another? that another eye should not shine brighter than hers, and another voice sound to his ear with a sweeter tone? O, no! he dared not disturb and sully the bright flower of his present existence; he shrank from the fatal word that would dissolve the spell that enchanted them, and introduce all the calculating cares of a harsh world into the thoughtless Eden in which they now wandered. And, for her father, even if the sad engagement with Miss Grandison did not exist, with what front could Ferdinand solicit the hand of his daughter? What prospect could he hold out of worldly prosperity to the anxious consideration of a parent? Was he himself independent? Was he not worse than a beggar? Could he refer Mr. Temple to Sir Ratcliffe? Alas! it would be an insult to both! In the mean time, every hour, Mr. Temple might return, or something reach the ear of Henrietta fatal to all his aspirations. Armine, with all its cares, Bath, with all its hopes; his melancholy father, his fond and sanguine mother, the tender-hearted Katherine, the devoted Glastonbury, all rose up before him, and crowded on his tortured imagination. In the agony of his mind he wished himself alone in the world; he sighed for some earthquake to swallow up Armine and all its fatal fortunes; and as for those parents, so affectionate and virtuous, and to whom he had hitherto been so dutiful and devoted, he turned from their idea with a sensation of weariness, almost of hatred.

He sat down on the trunk of a tree and buried his face with his hands. His reverie had lasted some time, when a gentle sound disturbed him. He looked up; it was Henrietta. She had driven over the common in her pony-chaise, and unattended. She was but a few steps from him; and, as he looked up, he caught her fond smile. He sprang from his seat; he was at her side in an instant; his heart beat so tumultuously, that he could not speak; all dark thoughts were forgotten; he seized with a trembling touch her extended hand, and gazed upon her with a glance of ecstasy. For, indeed, she looked so beautiful, that it seemed to him he had never before done justice to her surpassing loveliness. There was a bloom upon her cheek, as upon some choice and delicate fruit; her violet eyes sparkled like gems; while the dimples played and quivered on her cheeks; as you may sometimes watch the sunbeam on the pure surface of fair water. Her countenance, indeed, was wreathed with smiles. She seemed the happiest thing on earth; the very personification of a poetic spring; lively, and fresh, and innocent; sparkling, and sweet, and soft. When he beheld her, Ferdinand was reminded of some gay bird, or airy antelope; she looked so bright and joyous!

"He is to get in," said Henrietta, with a smile, "and drive her to their cottage. Have I not managed well to come alone! We shall have such a charming drive to-day."

"You are so beautiful," murmured Ferdinand.

"I am content if you but think so. You did not hear me approach? What were you doing? Plunged in meditation? Now tell me truly, were you thinking of her?"

"Indeed, I have no other thought. O, my Henrietta! you are so beautiful to-day. I cannot talk of any thing but your beauty."

"And how did you sleep? Are you comfortable? I must see your room. I have brought you some flowers to make it pretty."

They soon reached the farmhouse. The good-wife seemed a little surprised when she observed her guest driving Miss Temple, but far more pleased. Henrietta ran into the house to see the children, spoke some kind words to the little maiden, and asked if their guest had breakfasted. Then, turning to Ferdinand, she said, "Have you forgot that you are to give me a breakfast? It shall be in the porch. Is it not sweet and pretty? See, here are your flowers, and I have brought you some fruit."

The breakfast was arranged. Miss Temple made tea for Ferdinand, and prepared every thing for him. "But you do not play your part, sweet Henrietta," he said; "I cannot breakfast alone."

She affected to share his repast, that he might partake of it; but, in truth, she only busied herself in arranging the flowers. Yet she conducted herself with so much dexterity, that Ferdinand had the opportunity of gratifying his appetite, without being placed in a position, awkward at all times, insufferable for a lover, that of eating in the presence of others who do not join you in the occupation.

"Now," she suddenly said, sitting by his side, and placing a rose in his dress, "I have a little plan to-day, which I think will be quite delightful. You shall drive her to Armine."

Ferdinand started. He thought of Glastonbury. His miserable situation recurred to him. This was the bitter drop in the cup; yes! in the very plenitude of his rare felicity he experienced a pang. His confusion was not unobserved by Miss Temple; for she was very quick in her perception; but she could not comprehend it. It did not rest on her mind, particularly when Ferdinand assented to her proposition, but added, "I forgot that Armine is more interesting to you than to me. All my associations with Armine are painful. Ducie is my delight."

"Ah! my romance is at Armine; yours at Ducie. What we live among, we do not always value. And yet I love my home," she added, in a somewhat subdued, even serious tone; "all my associations with Ducie are sweet and pleasant. Will they always be so?"

She hit upon a key to which the passing thoughts of Ferdinand too completely responded; but he restrained the mood of his mind. As he grew grave, he affected cheerfulness. "My Henrietta must always be happy," he said, "at least, if her Ferdinand's love can make her so."

She did not reply, but she pressed his hand. Then, after a moment's silence, she said, "My Ferdinand must not be low-spirited about dear Armine. I have confidence in our destiny, sweet; I see a happy, a very happy future."

Who could resist so fair a prophet? Not the sanguine mind of the enamoured Ferdinand Armine. He drank inspiration from her smiles, and dwelt with delight on the tender accents of her animating sympathy. "I never shall be low-spirited with you, my beloved," he replied; "you are my good genius. O! Henrietta! what heaven it is to be together!"

"Darling! I bless you for these words. We will not go to Armine to-day. Let us walk. And to speak the truth—for I am not ashamed of saying any thing to you—it would be hardly discreet, perhaps, to be driving about the country in this guise. And yet," she added, after a moment's hesitation, "what care I for what people say? O! Ferdinand, I think only of you!"

That was a delicious ramble which these young and enamoured creatures took that sunny morn! The air was sweet, the earth was beautiful, and yet they were insensible to every thing but their mutual love. Inexhaustible is the converse of fond hearts! A simple story, too, and yet there are so many ways of telling it! "How strange that we should have ever met!" said Henrietta Temple.

"Indeed, I think it most natural," said Ferdinand, "I will believe it the fulfilment of a happy destiny. For all that I have sighed for now I meet, and more, much more than my imagination could ever hope for!"

"Only think of that morning drive," resumed Henrietta, "such a little time ago, and yet it seems an age! Let us believe in destiny, sweet Ferdinand, or you must think of me, I fear, that which I would not wish."

"My darling, darling Henrietta, I can think of you only as the noblest and the sweetest of beings. My love is ever equalled by my gratitude!"

"Sweet Ferdinand, I had read of such feelings, but did not believe in them. I did not believe, at least, that they were reserved for me. And yet I have met many persons, and seen something more, much more than falls to the lot of women of my age. Believe me, indeed, my Ferdinand, my eye has hitherto been undazzled, and my heart untouched."

He pressed her hand.

"And then," she resumed, "in a moment—but it seemed not like a common life. That beautiful wilderness, that ruinous castle! As I gazed around me, I felt not as is my custom. I felt as if some fate were impending, as if my life and lot were bound up, as it were, with that strange and silent scene. And then he came forward, and I beheld him so unlike all other men—so beautiful, so pensive! O! my Ferdinand, pardon me for loving you!" and she gently turned her head, and hid her face on his breast.

"Darling, darling Henrietta," lowly breathed the enraptured lover, "best, and sweetest, and loveliest of women, your Ferdinand, at that moment, was not less moved than you were. Speechless and pale I had watched my Henrietta, and I felt that I beheld the being to whom I must dedicate my existence."

"O! I shall never forget the moment when I stood before the portrait of Sir Ferdinand and recognised my child. Do you know my heart was prophetic; I wanted not that confirmation of a strange conjecture. I felt that you must be an Armine. I had heard so much of your grandfather, so much of your family. I loved them for their glory, and for their lordly sorrows."

"Ah! my Henrietta, 'tis that alone that galls me. It is bitter to introduce my bride to our house of cares."

"You shall never think it so," she replied with animation. "I will prove a true Armine. Happier in the honour of that name, than in the most rich possessions! O! my Ferdinand, you do not know me yet. Your wife shall not disgrace you or your lineage. I have a spirit worthy of you, Ferdinand; at least, I dare to hope so. I can break, but I will not bend. We will wrestle together with all our cares; and my Ferdinand, animated by his Henrietta, shall restore the house."

"Alas! my noble-minded girl, I fear a severe trial awaits us. I can offer you only love."

"Is there any thing else in this world?"

"But, to bear you from a roof of luxury, where you have been cherished from your cradle, with all that ministers to the delicate delights of woman, to—O! my Henrietta, you know not the disheartening and depressing burden of domestic cares." His voice faltered as he recalled his melancholy father; and the disappointment, perhaps the destruction, that his passion was preparing for his roof.

"There shall be no cares, my Ferdinand; I will endure every thing; I will animate all. I have energy; indeed I have, my Ferdinand. I have, young as I may be, I have often inspired, often urged on my father. Sometimes, he says, that had it not been for me, he would not have been what he is. He is my father, the best and kindest parent that ever loved his child; yet, what are fathers to you, my Ferdinand; and, if I could assist him, what may I not do for—"

"Alas! my Henrietta, we have no theatre for action. You forget our creed."

"It was the great Sir Ferdinand's. He made a theatre."

"My Henrietta is ambitious," said Ferdinand, smiling.

"Dearest, I would be content—nay! that is a weak phrase—I would, if the choice were in my power now to select a life most grateful to my views and feelings, choose some delightful solitude, even as Armine, and pass existence with no other aim but to delight my Ferdinand. But we were speaking of other circumstances. Such happiness, it is said, is not for us. And I wished to show you that I have a spirit that can struggle with adversity, and a soul prescient of overwhelming it."

"You have a spirit I reverence, and a soul I worship, nor is there a happier being in the world than Ferdinand Armine. With such a woman as you every fate must be a triumph. You have touched, my darling, upon a chord of my heart that has sounded before, though in solitude. It was but the wind that played on it before; but now that tone rings with a purpose. This is glorious sympathy. Let us leave Armine to its fate. I have a sword, and it shall go hard if I do not carve out a destiny worthy even of Henrietta Temple."

CHAPTER IV.

HENRIETTA VISITS ARMINE, WHICH LEADS TO A RATHER PERPLEXING ENCOUNTER.

THE communion of this day, of the spirit of which the conversation just noticed may convey an intimation, produced a very inspiring effect on the mind of Ferdinand. Love is inspiration; it encourages to great deeds, and develops the creative faculty of our nature. Few great men have flourished, who, were they to be candid, would not acknowledge the vast advantages they have experienced in the earlier years of their career from the spirit and sympathy of woman. It is woman whose prescient admiration strings the lyre of the desponding poet, whose genius is afterwards to be recognised by his race, and which often embalms the memory of the gentle mistress whose kindness solaced him in less glorious hours. How many an official portfolio would never have been carried, had it not been for her sanguine spirit and assiduous love! How many a depressed and despairing advocate has clutched the Great Seal, and taken his precedence before princes, borne onward by the breeze of her inspiring hope, and illumined by the sunshine of her prophetic smile! A female friend, amiable, clever, and devoted, is a possession more valuable than parks and palaces; and, without such a muse, few men can succeed in life—none be content.

The plans and aspirations of Henrietta Temple had relieved Ferdinand from a depressing burden. Inspired by her creative sympathy, a new scene opened to him, adorned by a magnificent perspective. His sanguine imagination sought refuge in a triumphant future. That love for which he had hitherto schooled his mind to sacrifice every worldly advantage, appeared suddenly to be transformed into the very source of earthly success. Henrietta Temple was to be the fountain, not only of his bliss, but of his prosperity. In the revel of his audacious fancy he seemed, as it were, by a beautiful retribution, to be already rewarded for having devoted, with such unhesitating readiness, his heart upon the altar of disinterested affection. Lying on his cottage couch, he indulged in dazzling visions; he wandered in strange lands with his beautiful companion, and offered at her feet the quick rewards of his unparalleled achievements.

Recurring to his immediate situation, he resolved to lose no time in bringing his affairs to a crisis. He was even working himself up to his instant departure, solaced by the certainty of his immediate return, when the arrival of his servant announced to him that Glastonbury had quitted Armine on one of those antiquarian rambles to which he was accustomed. Gratified that it was now in his power to comply with the wish of Henrietta to visit his home, and perhaps, in truth, not very much mortified that so reasonable an excuse had arisen for the postponement of his intended departure, Ferdinand instantly rose, and as speedily as possible took his way to Ducie.

He found Henrietta in the garden. He had arrived, perhaps, earlier than he was expected; yet what joy to see him. And, when he himself proposed an excursion to Armine, her grateful smile melted his very heart. Indeed, Ferdinand this morning was so gay and light-hearted, that his excessive merriment might almost have been as suspicious as his passing gloom the previous day. Not less tender and fond than before, his sportive fancy indulged in infinite expressions of playful humour, and delicate pranks of love. When he first recognised her, gathering a nosegay, too, for him, himself unobserved, he stole behind her on tiptoe, and suddenly clasping her delicate waist, and raising her gently in the air, "Well, lady-bird," he exclaimed, "I too will pluck a flower!"

Ah! when she turned round her beautiful face, full of charming confusion, and uttered a faint cry of fond astonishment, as she caught his bright glance, what happiness was Ferdinand Armine's, as he felt this enchanting creature was his, and pressed to his bosom her noble and throbbing form!

"Perhaps this time next year, we may be travelling on mules, love," said Ferdinand, as he flourished his whip, and the little pony trotted along. Henrietta smiled. "And then," continued he, "we shall remember our pony-chaise, that we turn up our noses at now. Donna Henrietta, joggled to death over dull vegas, and picking her way across rocky sierras, will be a very different person to Miss Temple, of Ducie Bower. I hope you will not be very irritable, my child; and pray vent your spleen upon your muleteer, and not upon your husband."

"Now, Ferdinand, how can you be so ridiculous!"

"O! I have no doubt I shall have to bear all the blame. 'You brought me here,' it will be, 'ungrateful man, is this your love! not even post-horses!'"

"As for that," said Henrietta, "perhaps we shall have to walk. I can fancy ourselves—you with an Andalusian jacket, a long gun, and I fear, a cigar; and I with all the baggage."

"Children and all," added Ferdinand.

Miss Temple looked somewhat demure, turned away her face a little, but said nothing.

"But what think you of Vienna, sweetest?" inquired Ferdinand, in a more serious tone; "upon my honour I think we might do great things there. A regiment and a chamberlainship at the least!"

"In mountains or in cities I shall be alike content, provided Ferdinand be my companion," replied Miss Temple.

Ferdinand let go the reins, and dropped his whip. "My darling, darling Henrietta," he exclaimed, looking in her face, "what an angel you are!"

This visit to Armine was so delightful to Miss Temple,—she experienced so much gratification in wandering about the park, and over the old castle, and gazing on Glastonbury's tower, and wondering when she should see him, and talking to her Ferdinand about every member of his family,—that Captain Armine, unable to withstand the irresistible current, postponed from day to day his decisive visit to Bath, and, confident in the future, would not permit his soul to be the least daunted by any possible conjuncture of ill-fortune. A week, a whole happy week glided away, and spent almost entirely at Armine. Their presence there was scarcely noticed by the single female servant who remained; and, if her curiosity had been excited, she possessed no power of communicating it into Somersetshire. Besides, she was unaware that her young master was nominally in London. Sometimes an hour was snatched by Henrietta from roaming in the plaisance, and interchanging vows of mutual love and admiration, to the picture gallery, where she had already commenced a miniature copy of the portrait of the great Sir Ferdinand. As the sun set they departed in their little equipage. Ferdinand wrapped his Henrietta in his fur cloak, for the autumn dews began to rise, and, thus protected, the journey of ten miles was ever found too short. It is the habit of lovers, however innocent their passion, to grow every day less discreet; for every day their almost constant companionship becomes more a necessity. Miss Temple had almost unconsciously contrived at first that Captain Armine, in the absence of her father, should not be observed too often at Ducie; but now Ferdinand drove her home every evening, and drank tea at the Bower, and the evening closed with music and song. Each night he crossed over the common to his farmhouse more fondly and devotedly in love.

One morning at Armine, Henrietta being alone in the gallery busied with her drawing, Ferdinand having left her for a moment to execute some light commission for her, she heard some one enter, and, looking up to catch his glance of love, she beheld a venerable man, of a very mild and benignant appearance, and dressed in black, standing, as if a little surprised, at some distance. Herself not less confused, she nevertheless bowed, and the gentleman advanced with hesitation, and with a faint blush returned her salute, and apologized for his intrusion. "He thought Captain Armine might be there."

"He was here but this moment," replied Miss Temple; "and doubtless will instantly return." Then she turned to her drawing with a trembling hand.

"I perceive, madam," said the gentleman, advancing and speaking in a very soft and engaging tone, while looking at her labour with a mingled air of diffidence and admiration, "that you are a very fine artist."

"My wish to excel may have assisted my performance," replied Miss Temple.

"You are copying the portrait of a very extraordinary personage," said the stranger.

"Do you think that it is like Captain Armine?" inquired Miss Temple, with some hesitation.

"It is always so considered," replied the stranger.

Henrietta's hand faltered; she looked at the door of the gallery, then at the portrait: never was she yet so anxious for the reappearance of Ferdinand. There was a silence which she was compelled to break, for the stranger was both mute and motionless, and scarcely more assured than herself.

"Captain Armine will be here immediately, I have no doubt."

The stranger bowed. "If I might presume to criticise so finished a performance," he remarked, "I should say that you had conveyed, madam, a more youthful character than the original presents."

Henrietta did not venture to confess that such was her intention. She looked again at the door, mixed some colour, then cleared it immediately off her palette. "What a beautiful gallery is this!" she exclaimed, as she changed her brush, which was, however, without a fault.

"It is worthy of Armine," said the stranger.

"Indeed there is no place so interesting," said Miss Temple.

"It pleases me to hear it praised," said the stranger.

"You are well acquainted with it?" inquired Miss Temple.

"I have the happiness to live here," said the stranger.

"I am not then mistaken in believing that I speak to Mr. Glastonbury."

"Indeed, madam, that is my name," replied the gentleman; "I fancy we have often heard of each other. This is a most unexpected meeting, madam, but for that reason not less delightful. I have myself just returned from a ramble of some days, and entered the gallery little aware that the family had arrived. You met, I suppose, my Ferdinand on the road. Ah! you wonder, perhaps, at my familiar expression, madam. He has been my Ferdinand so many years, that I cannot easily school myself no longer to style him so. But I am aware that there are now other claims—"

"My dearest Glastonbury," exclaimed Ferdinand Armine, starting as he re-entered the gallery, and truly in as great a fright as a man could well be, who, perhaps, but a few hours ago, was to conquer in Spain or Germany. At the same time, pale and eager, and talking with excited rapidity, he embraced his tutor, and scrutinized the countenance of Henrietta to ascertain whether his fatal secret had been discovered. That countenance was fond, and, if not calm, not more confused than the unexpected appearance under the circumstances might account for. "You have often heard me mention Mr. Glastonbury," he said, addressing himself to Henrietta. "Let me now have the pleasure of making you acquainted. My oldest, my best friend, my second father—an admirable artist, too, I can assure you. He is qualified to decide even upon your skill. And when did you arrive, my dearest friend! and where have you been? Our old haunts, our old haunts! Many sketches, many sketches? What abbey have you explored, what antique treasure have you discovered? I have such a fine addition for your herbar! The Barbary cactus, just what you wanted; I found it in my volume of Shelley; and beautifully dried—beautifully; it will quite charm you. What do you think of this drawing? Is it not beautiful? quite the character, is it not?" Ferdinand paused for lack of breath.

"I was just observing as you entered," said Glastonbury, very quietly, "to Miss—"

"I have several letters for you," said Ferdinand, interrupting him, and trembling from head to foot lest he might say Miss Grandison. "Do you know that you are just the person I wanted to see! How fortunate that you should just arrive! I was so annoyed to find you were away. I cannot tell you how much I was annoyed."

"Your dear parents?" inquired Glastonbury.

"Are quite well," said Ferdinand, "perfectly well. They will be so glad to see you—so very glad. They do so long to see you, my dearest Glastonbury. You cannot imagine how they long to see you."

"I shall find them within, think you?" inquired Glastonbury.

"O! they are not here," said Ferdinand; "they have not yet arrived. I expect them every day. Every day I expect them. I have prepared every thing for them—every thing. What a wonderful autumn it has been!"

And Glastonbury fell into the lure, and talked about the weather, for he was learned in the seasons, and prophesied by many circumstances a hard winter. While he was thus conversing, Ferdinand extracted from Henrietta that Glastonbury had not been in the gallery more than a very few minutes; and he felt assured that nothing very fatal had transpired. All this time Ferdinand was reviewing his painful situation with desperate rapidity and prescience. All that he aspired to now was that Henrietta should quit Armine in as happy ignorance as she had arrived; as for Glastonbury, Ferdinand cared not what he might suspect, or ultimately discover. These were future evils, that subsided into insignificance compared with any discovery on the part of Miss Temple.

Comparatively composed, Ferdinand now suggested to Henrietta to quit her drawing, which, indeed, was so advanced, that it might be finished at Ducie; and, never leaving her side, and watching every look, and hanging on every accent of his old tutor, he even ventured to suggest that they should visit the tower. The proposal, he thought, might lull any suspicion that might have been excited on the part of Miss Temple. Glastonbury expressed his gratification at the suggestion, and they quitted the gallery, and entered the avenue of beech trees.

"I have heard so much of your tower, Mr. Glastonbury," said Miss Temple, "I am sensible, I assure you, of the honour of being admitted."

The extreme delicacy that was a characteristic of Glastonbury preserved Ferdinand Armine from the dreaded danger. It never for an instant entered Glastonbury's mind that Henrietta was not Miss Grandison; he thought it a little extraordinary, indeed, that she should arrive at Armine only in the company of Ferdinand; but much might be allowed to plighted lovers; besides, there might be some female companion, some aunt or cousin, for aught he knew, at the Place. It was only his parents that Ferdinand had said had not yet arrived. At all events, he felt at this moment that Ferdinand, perhaps, even because he was alone with his intended bride, had no desire that any formal introduction or congratulations should take place, and only pleased that the intended wife of his pupil should be one so beautiful, so gifted, and so gracious, one apparently so worthy in every way of his choice and her lot, Glastonbury relapsed into his accustomed ease and simplicity, and exerted himself to amuse the young lady with whom he had become so unexpectedly acquainted, and with whom, in all probability, it was his destiny in future to be so intimate. As for Henrietta, nothing had occurred in any way to give rise to the slightest suspicion in her mind. The agitation of Ferdinand at this unexpected meeting between his tutor and his betrothed was in every respect natural. Their engagement, as she knew, was at present a secret to all; and although, under such circumstances, she herself at first was disposed not to feel very much at her ease, still she was so well acquainted with Mr. Glastonbury from report, and he was so unlike the common characters of the censorious world, that she was, from the first, far less annoyed than she otherwise would have been, and soon regained her usual composure, and was even gratified and amused with the adventure.

A load, however, fell from the heart of Ferdinand, when he and his beloved bade Glastonbury a good afternoon. This accidental, and almost fatal interview, terribly reminded him of his difficult and dangerous position; it seemed the commencement of a series of misconceptions, mortifications, and misfortunes, which it was absolutely necessary to prevent by instantly arresting them with the utmost energy and decision. It was bitter to quit Armine and all his joys, but in truth the arrival of his family was very doubtful; and, until the confession of his real situation was made, every day might bring some disastrous discovery. Some ominous clouds in the horizon formed a capital excuse for hurrying Henrietta off to Ducie. They quitted Armine at an unusually early hour. As they drove along, Ferdinand revolved in his mind the adventure of the morning, and endeavoured to stimulate himself to the exertion of instantly repairing to Bath. But he had not courage to confide his purpose to Henrietta. When, however, they arrived at Ducie, they were welcomed with intelligence which rendered the decision, on his part, absolutely necessary. But we will reserve this for the next chapter.

CHAPTER V.

WHICH CONTAINS SOMETHING VERY UNEXPECTED.

MISS TEMPLE had run up stairs to take off her bonnet; Ferdinand stood before the wood-fire in the saloon. Its clear and fragrant flame was agreeable after the cloudy sky of their somewhat chill drive. He was musing over the charms of Henrietta, and longing for her reappearance, when she entered: but her entrance filled him with alarm. She was very pale, her lips nearly as white as her forehead. An expression of dread was impressed on her agitated countenance. Ere he could speak she held forth her hand to his extended grasp. It was cold, it trembled.

"Good God! my sweetest; you are ill!" he exclaimed.

"No!" she faintly murmured, "not ill." And then she paused, as if stifled, leaning down her head with eyes fixed upon the ground.

The conscience of Ferdinand pricked him. Had she heard——

But he was reassured by her accents of kindness. "Pardon me, dearest," she said; "I am agitated—I shall soon be better."

He held her hand with firmness while she leaned upon his shoulder. After a few minutes of harrowing silence, she said, in a smothered voice, "Papa returns to-morrow."

Ferdinand turned as pale as she; the blood fled to his heart, his frame trembled, his knees tottered, his passive hand scarcely retained hers; he could not speak. All the possible results of his return flashed across his mind, and presented themselves, in terrible array, to his alarmed imagination. He could not meet Mr. Temple,—that was out of the question. Some explanation must immediately and inevitably ensue, and that must precipitate the fatal discovery. The great object was to prevent any communication between Mr. Temple and Sir Ratchiff before Ferdinand had broken his situation to his father. How he now wished he had not postponed his departure for Bath! Had he only quitted Armine when first convinced of the hard necessity, the harrowing future would now have been the past; the impending scenes, however dreadful, would have ensued; perhaps he might have been at Ducie at this moment, with a clear conscience and a frank purpose, and with no difficulties to overcome but those which must necessarily arise from Mr. Temple's natural consideration for the welfare of his child. These, however difficult to combat, seemed light in comparison with the perplexities of his involved situation. Ferdinand bore Henrietta to a seat, and hung over her in agitated silence, which she ascribed only to his sympathy in her distress, but which, in truth, was rather to be attributed to his own uncertain purpose, and to the confusion of an invention which he now ransacked for desperate expedients.

While he was thus revolving in his mind the course which he must now pursue, he sat down on the ottoman on which her feet rested, and pressed her hand to his lips while he summoned to his aid all the resources of his imagination. It at length appeared to him that the only mode by which he could now gain time, and secure himself from dangerous explanations, was to involve Henrietta in a secret engagement. There was great difficulty, he was aware, in accomplishing this purpose. Miss Temple was devoted to her father; and though for a moment led away, by the omnipotent influence of an irresistible passion, to enter into a compact without the sanction of her parent, her present agitation too clearly indicated her keen sense that she had not conducted herself towards him in her accustomed spirit of unswerving and immaculate duty; that, if not absolutely indelicate, her behaviour must appear to him very inconsiderate, very rash, perhaps even unfeeling. Unfeeling! What—to that father, that fond and widowed father, of whom she was the only and cherished child! All his goodness, all his unceasing care, all his anxiety, his ready sympathy, his watchfulness for her amusement, her comfort, her happiness, his vigilance in her hours of sickness, his pride in her beauty, her accomplishments, her affection, the smiles and tears of long, long years—all passed before—till at last she released herself with a quick movement from the hold of Ferdinand, and, clasping her hands together, burst into a sigh so bitter, so profound, so full of anguish, that Ferdinand started from his seat.

"Henrietta!" he exclaimed, "my beloved Henrietta!"

"Leave me," she replied, in a tone almost of sternness. He rose and walked up and down the room, overpowered by contending emotions. The severity of her voice, that voice that hitherto had fallen upon his ear like the warble of a summer bird, filled him with consternation. The idea of having offended her, of having seriously offended her—of being to her, to Henrietta, his Henrietta, that divinity to whom his idolatrous fancy clung with such rapturous devotion, in whose very smiles and accents it is no exaggeration to say he lived and had his being—the idea of being to her, even for a transient moment, an object of repugnance, seemed something too terrible for thought, too intolerable for existence. All his troubles, all his cares, all his impending sorrows, vanished into thin air compared with this unforeseen and sudden visitation. O! what was future evil, what was to-morrow, pregnant as it might be with misery, compared with the quick agony of 'ho instant! As long as she smiled, every difficulty appeared surmountable; as long as he could listen to her accents of tenderness, there was no discon-sation with which he could not struggle. Come what come may, throned in the palace of her heart he was a sovereign who might defy the world in arms; but, thrust from that great seat, he was a fugitive without a hope, an aim, a desire; dull, timid, exhausted, broken-hearted!

And she had bid him leave her. Leave her! Henrietta Temple had bid him leave her! Did he leave? Was this the same world in which a few hours back he breathed, and blessed his God for breathing! What had happened? What strange event, what miracle had occurred, to work this awful, this portentous change? Why, if she had known all, if she had suddenly shared that sharp and perpetual woe, every gnawing at his own secret heart, even amid his joys; if he had revealed to her, if any one had betrayed to her his distressing secret, could she have said more? Why! it was to shun this, it was to spare himself this horrible catastrophe, that he had involved himself in his agonizing, his inextricable difficulties. Inextricable they must be now; for where, now, was the inspiration that before was to animate him to such great exploits? How could he struggle any longer with his fate? How could he now carve out a destiny? All that remained for him now was to die; and, in the madness of his sensations, death seemed to him the most desirable consummation.

The temper of a lover is exquisitely sensitive. Mortified and miserable, at any other time Ferdinand, in a fit of harrassed love and irritable devotion, might have instantly quitted the presence of a mistress who had treated him with such unexpected and such undeserved harshness. But the thought of the morrow—the mournful conviction that this was the last opportunity for their undisturbed communion—the recollection that, at all events, their temporary separation was impending; all these considerations had checked his first impulse. Besides, it must not be concealed that more than once it occurred him that it was utterly impossible to permit Henrietta to meet her father in her present mood. With her determined spirit and strong emotions, and her difficulty of concealing her feelings; smarting, too, under the consciousness of having parted with Ferdinand in anger, and of having treated him with injustice; and, therefore, doubly anxious to bring affairs to a crisis, a scene in all probability would instantly ensue: and Ferdinand recoiled at present from the consequences of any explanations.

Unhappy Ferdinand! It seemed to him that he had never known misery before. He wrung his hands in despair—his mind seemed to desert him. Suddenly he stopped—he looked at Henrietta,—her face was still pale, her eyes fixed upon the decaying embers of the fire, her attitude unchanged. Either she was unconscious of his presence, or she did not choose to recognise it. What were her thoughts?

Still of her father? Perhaps she contrasted that fond and faithful friend of her existence, to whom she owed such an incalculable debt of gratitude, with the acquaintance of the hour, to whom, in a moment of insanity, she had pledged the love that could alone repay it. Perhaps, in the spirit of self-torment, she conjured up against this too successful stranger all the menacing spectres of suspicion, distrust, and deceit; recalled to her recollection the too just and too frequent tales of man's impurity and ingratitude; and tortured herself by her own apparition, the merited victim of his harshness, his neglect, or his desertion. And when she had at the same time both shocked and alarmed her fancy by these distressful and degrading images, exhausted by these imaginary vexations, and eager for consolation in her dark despondency, she may have recurred to the yet innocent cause of her sorrow and apprehension, and perhaps accused herself of cruelty and injustice for visiting on his head the mere consequences of her own fitful and morbid temper. She may have recalled his unvarying tenderness, his unceasing admiration; she may have recollected those impassioned accents that thrilled her heart, those glances of rapturous affection that fixed her eye with fascination. She may have conjured up that form over which of late she had mused in a trance of love—that form bright with so much beauty, beaming with so many graces, adorned with so much intelligence, and hallowed by every romantic association that could melt the heart or mould the spirit of woman; she may have conjured up this form, that was the god of her idolatry, and rushed again to the altar in an ecstasy of devotion.

The shades of evening were fast descending—the curtains of the chamber were not closed—the blaze of the fire had died away. The flickering light fell upon the solemn countenance of Henrietta Temple, now buried in the shade, now transiently illuminated by the fitful flame.

On a sudden he advanced, with a step too light even to be heard, knelt at her side, and, not venturing to touch her hand, pressed his lips to her arm, and with streaming eyes, and in a tone of plaintive tenderness, murmured, "What have I done?"

She turned—her eyes met his—a wild expression of fear, surprise, delight, played over her countenance; then, bursting into tears, she threw her arms round his neck, and hid her face upon his breast.

He did not disturb this effusion of her suppressed emotions. His throbbing heart responded to her tumultuous soul. At length, when the strength of her passionate affections had somewhat decreased—when the convulsive sobs had subsided into gentle sighs, and ever and anon he felt the pressure of her sweet lips sealing her remorseful love and charming repentance upon his bosom—he dared to say, "O! my Henrietta, you did not doubt your Ferdinand?"

"Darling, beloved, dearest, sweetest Ferdinand, you are too good, too kind, too faultless—and I am very wicked."

He raised himself gently from her side, bearing up her form at the same time, and contrived, with one arm round her waist, to place himself in her chair, and seat her on his knee. Then taking her hand and covering it with kisses, while her head rested on his shoulder, he said, in a distinct but very low voice, "Now tell me, darling, why were you unhappy?"

"Papa," sighed Henrietta, "dearest papa, that the day should come when I should grieve to meet him!"

"And why should my darling grieve?" said Ferdinand.

"I know not; I ask myself what have I done? what have I to fear? It is no crime to love; it may be a misfortune—God knows I have almost felt to-night that such it was. But no, I never will believe that it can be either wrong or unhappy to love you."

"Bless you, my sweetest, for such sweet words," replied Ferdinand. "If my heart can make you happy, felicity should be your lot."

"It is my lot. I am happy, quite happy, and grateful for my happiness."

"And your father, our father let me call him, (she pressed his hand when he said this,) he will be happy too?"

"So I would hope."

"If the fulfilment of my duty can content him," continued Ferdinand, "Mr. Temple shall not repent his son-in-law."

"O! do not call him Mr. Temple; call him father. I love to hear you call him father."

"Then what alarms my child?"

"I hardly know," said Henrietta in a hesitating tone. "I think, I think it is the suddenness of all this. He has gone—he comes again; he went—he returns; and all has happened. So short a time, too, Ferdinand. It is a life to us; to him, I fear," and she smiled and hid her face, "it is only—a fortnight."

"We have seen more of each other, and known more of each other, in this fortnight, than we might have in an acquaintance which had continued a life."

"'Tis true—'tis very true. We feel this, Ferdinand, because we know it. But papa will not feel like us: we cannot expect him to feel like us. He does not know my Ferdinand as I know him. Papa, too, though the dearest, kindest, fondest father that ever lived, though he had no thought but for my happiness, and lives only for his daughter, papa naturally is not as young as we are. He is, too, what is called a man of the world. He has seen a great deal—he has formed his opinions on men and life. We cannot expect that he will change them in your, I mean our, favour. Men of the world are of the world, worldly. I do not think they are always right—I do not myself believe in their infallibility. There is no person more clever and more judicious than papa. No person is more considered. But there are characters so rare, that men of the world do not admit them into their general calculations—and such is my Ferdinand's."

Here Ferdinand seemed plunged in thought, but he pressed her hand, though he said nothing.

"He will think we have known each other too short a time," continued Miss Temple. "He will be mortified, perhaps alarmed, when I inform him I am no longer his."

"Then do not inform him," said Ferdinand.

She started.

"Let me inform him," continued Ferdinand, giving another turn to his meaning, and watching her countenance with an unflinching eye.

"Dearest Ferdinand—always prepared to bear every burden!" exclaimed Miss Temple. "How generous and good you are! No, it would be better for me to speak first to my father. My soul, I will never have a secret from you, and you, I am sure, will never have one from your Henrietta. This is the truth; I do not repent the past, I glory in it; I am yours, and I am proud to be yours. Were the past to be again acted, I would not falter. But I cannot conceal from myself that, as far as my father is concerned, I have not conducted myself towards him with frankness, with respect, or with kindness. There is no fault in loving you. Even were he to regret, he could not blame such an occurrence: but he will regret, he will blame, he has a right both to regret and blame, my doing more than love you: my engagement, without his advice, his sanction, his knowledge, or even his suspicion!"

"You take too refined a view of our situation, sweet Henrietta," replied Ferdinand. "Why should you not spare your father the pain of such a communication, if painful it would be? What has passed is between ourselves, and ought to be between ourselves. If I request his permission to offer you my hand, and he yields his consent, is not that ceremony enough?"

"I have never concealed any thing from papa," said Henrietta, "but I will be guided by you."

"Leave, then, all to me," said Ferdinand; "be guided but by the judgment of your own Ferdinand, my sweet Henrietta, and believe me all will go right. I will break this intelligence to your father. So we will settle it?" he continued inquiringly.

"It shall be so."

"Then arises the question," said Ferdinand, "when it would be most advisable for me to make the communication. Now, your father, Henrietta, who is a man of the world, will of course expect that, when I do make it, I shall be prepared to speak definitely to him upon all matters of business. He will think, otherwise, that I am trifling with him. To go and request of a man like your father, a shrewd, experienced man of the world, like Mr. Temple, permission to marry his daughter, without showing to him that I am prepared with the means of maintaining a family; is little short of madness. He would be offended with me, he would be prejudiced against me. I must, therefore, settle something first with Sir Ratcliffe. Much you know, unfortunately, I cannot offer your father; but still, sweet love, there must at least be an appearance of providence and management. We must not disgust your father with our match."

"O! how can he be disgusted with my Ferdinand?"

"Darling! This, then, is what I propose—that, as to-morrow we must comparatively be separated, I should take advantage of the next few days, I should rush to Bath, and bring affairs to some arrangement. Until my return I would advise you to say nothing to your father."

"O! how can I live under the same roof with him, under such circumstances?" exclaimed Miss Temple; "how can I meet his eye—how can I speak to him, with the consciousness of a secret engagement, with the recollection that, all the time he is lavishing his affection upon me, my heart is yearning for another, and that, while he is laying plans of future companionship, I am meditating, perhaps, an eternal separation!"

"Sweet Henrietta, listen to me one moment. Suppose I had quitted you last night for Bath, merely for this purpose, as indeed we had once thought of; and that your father had arrived at Ducie before I had returned to make my communication; would you style your silence, under such circumstances, a secret engagement? No, no, dear love; this is an abuse of terms. It would be a delicate consideration for a parent's feelings."

"O! Ferdinand, would we were united, and had no cares!"

"You would not consider our projected union a secret engagement, if, after passing to-morrow with your father, you expected me on the next day to communicate to him our position. Is it any more a secret engagement because six or seven days are to elapse, before this communication takes place, instead of one? My Henrietta is indeed fighting with shadows!"

"O! Ferdinand, I cannot reason like you; but I feel unhappy when I think of this."

"Dearest Henrietta! feel only that you are loved. Think, darling, the day will come when we shall smile at all these cares. All will flow smoothly yet; and we shall all yet live at Armine—Mr. Temple and all."

"Papa likes you so much, too, Ferdinand, I should be miserable if you offended him."

"Which I certainly should do if I were not to communicate with Sir Ratcliffe first."

"Do you, indeed, think so?"

"Indeed I am certain."

"But cannot you write to Sir Ratcliffe, Ferdinand? Must you, indeed, go? Must we, indeed, be separated? I cannot believe it; it is inconceivable; it is impossible; I cannot endure it."

"It is, indeed, terrible," said Ferdinand, most sincerely. "This consideration alone reconciles me to the necessity: I know my father well; his only answer to a communication of this kind would be an immediate summons to his side. Now, is it not better that this meeting should take place when we must necessarily be much less together than before, than at a later period, when we may, perhaps, be constant companions with the sanction of our parents?"

"O! Ferdinand, you reason—I only feel."

Let us pause here one instant, to reflect upon the character and situation of Ferdinand Armine. Henrietta Temple told him that he reasoned, and did not feel. Such an observation from one's mistress is rather a reproach than a compliment. It was made, in the present instance, to a man whose principal characteristic was, perhaps, his too dangerous susceptibility; a man of profound and violent passions, yet of a most sweet and tender temper; capable of deep reflection, yet ever acting from the impulse of sentiment, and ready at all times to sacrifice every consideration to his heart. The prospect of separation from Henrietta, for however short a period, was absolute agony to him; he found difficulty in conceiving existence without the influence of her perpetual presence: their parting even for the night was felt by him as an onerous deprivation. The only process, indeed, that could at present prepare and console him for the impending sorrow, would have been the frank indulgence of the feelings which it called forth. Yet behold him, behold this unhappy victim of circumstances, forced to deceive, even for her happiness, the being whom he idolized; compelled, at this hour of anguish, to bridle his heart, lest he should lose for a fatal instant his command over his head; and—while he was himself conscious that not in the wide world, perhaps, existed a man who was sacrificing more for his mistress—obliged to endure, even from her lips, a remark which seemed to impute to him a deficiency of feeling. And yet it was too much; he covered his eyes with his hand, and said, in a low and broken voice, "Alas! my Henrietta, if you knew all, you would not say this!"

"My Ferdinand, my darling Ferdinand," she exclaimed, touched by that tender and melancholy one, "why—what is this? you weep! Let me kiss away these tears! What have I said—what done? Dearest, dearest Ferdinand, do not do this." And she threw herself on her knees before him, and looked up into his face with scrutinizing affection.

He bent down his head, and pressed his lips to her forehead. "O, Henrietta!" he exclaimed, "we have been so happy!"

"And shall be so, my love, my own Ferdinand. Doubt not my word, all will go right, sweet soul. I am so sorry, I am so miserable, that I made you unhappy to-night. I shall think of it when you are gone. I shall remember how naughty I was. It was so wicked—so very, very wicked; and he was so good!"

"Gone! what a dreadful word! And shall we not be together to-morrow, Henrietta? O! what a morrow! Think of me, dearest! Do not let me for a moment escape from your memory!"

"Tell me exactly your road; let me know exactly where you will be at every hour; write to me on the road; if it be only a line, only a little word, only his dear name; only Ferdinand. Let me have a letter with only 'Ferdinand' in it, that I may kiss the dear name with a thousand kisses!"

"And how shall I write to you, my beloved? Shall I direct to you here?"

Henrietta looked perplexed. "Papa opens the bag every morning, and every morning you must write, or I shall die. Ferdinand, what is to be done?"

"I will direct to you at the post-office. You must send for your letters."

"I tremble. Believe me, it will be noticed. It will look so—so—so—so clandestine."

"I will direct them to your maid. She must be our confidant."

"Ferdinand!"

"'Tis only for a week."

"O, Ferdinand! love teaches us strange things."

"My darling, believe me, it is wise and well. Think how desolate we should be without constant correspondence. As for myself, I shall write to you every hour, and unless I hear from you as often, I shall believe only in evil!"

"Let it be as you wish. God knows my heart is pure. I pretend no longer to regulate my destiny. I am yours, Ferdinand. Be you responsible for all that affects my honour or my heart."

"A precious trust, my Henrietta, and dearer to me than all the glory of my ancestors."

The clock sounded eleven. Miss Temple rose. "It is so late, and we in darkness here! What will they think? Ferdinand, sweetest, rouse the fire. I ring the bell. Lights will come, and then—" Her voice faltered.

"And then—" echoed Ferdinand. He took up his guitar, but he could not command his voice.

"'Tis your guitar," said Henrietta; "I am happy that it is left behind."

The servant entered with lights, drew the curtains, renewed the fire, arranged the room, and withdrew.

"Little knows he our misery," said Henrietta. "It seemed strange, when I felt my own mind, that there could be any thing so calm and mechanical in the world."

Ferdinand was silent. He felt that the hour of departure had indeed arrived, yet he had not courage to move. Henrietta, too, did not speak. She laid down on the sofa, as it were, exhausted, and placed her handkerchief over her face. Ferdinand leaned over the fire. He was nearly tempted to give up his project, confess all to his father by letter, and await his decision. Then he conjured up the dreadful scenes at Bath, and then he remembered that, at all events, to-morrow he must not appear at Ducie. "Henrietta!" he at length said.

"A minute, Ferdinand, yet a minute," she exclaimed, in an excited tone; "do not speak—I am preparing myself."

He remained in his leaning posture; and, in a few moments, Miss Temple rose and said, "Now, Ferdinand, I am ready." He looked round. Her countenance was quite pale, but fixed and calm.

"Let us embrace," she said, "but let us say nothing."

He pressed her to his arms. She trembled. He imprinted a thousand kisses on her cold lips; she received them with no return. Then she said in a low voice, "Let me leave the room first;" and, giving him one kiss upon the forehead, Henrietta Temple disappeared.

When Ferdinand, with a sinking heart and a staggering step, quitted Ducie, he found the night so dark that it was with extreme difficulty that he traced, or rather groped, his way through the grove. The absolute necessity of watching every step he took, in some degree diverted his mind from his painful meditations. The atmosphere of the wood was so close, that he congratulated himself when he had gained its skirts; but just as he was about to emerge upon the common, and was looking forward to the light of some cottage, as his guide in this gloomy wilderness, a flash of lightning that seemed to cut the sky in twain, and to descend like a flight of fiery steps from the highest heavens to the lowest earth, revealed to him for a moment the whole broad bosom of the common, and showed to him that nature to-night was as disordered and perturbed as his own heart. A clap of thunder, that might have been the herald of doomsday, woke the cattle from their slumbers, which began to moan and low to the rising wind, and cluster under the trees, that sent forth, indeed, with their waiting branches, sounds scarcely less dolorous and wild. Avoiding the woods, and striking into the most open part of the country, Ferdinand watched the progress of the tempest.

For the wind, indeed, had now risen to such a height, that the leaves and branches of the trees were carried about in vast whirls and eddies, while the waters of the lake, where, in serener hours, Ferdinand was accustomed to bathe, were lifted out of their bed, and inundated the neighbouring settlements. Lights were now seen moving in all the cottages, and then the forked lightning, pouring down at the same time from opposite quarters of the sky, exposed with an awful distinctness, and a fearful splendour, the wide-spreading scene of danger and devastation.

Now descended the rain in such overwhelming torrents, that it was as if a waterspout had burst, and Ferdinand gasped for breath beneath its oppressive power, while the blaze of the variegated lightning, the crash of the thunder, and the roar of the wind, all simultaneously in movement, indicated the fulness of the storm. Succeeded then that strange lull that occurs in the heart of a tempest, when the unruly and disordered elements pause as it were for breath, and seem to concentrate their energies for an increased and final explosion. It came at last; and the very earth seemed to rock in the passage of the hurricane.

Exposed to all the awful chances of the storm, one solitary being alone beheld them without terror. The mind of Ferdinand Armine grew calm, as nature became more disturbed. He moralized amid the whirlwind. He contrasted the present tumult and distraction with the sweet and beautiful serenity which the same scene had presented, when, a short time back, he first beheld it. His love, too, had commenced in stillness and in sunshine; was it, also, to end in storm and destruction?

BOOK IV.

CHAPTER I.

WHICH CONTAINS A LOVE-LETTER.

LET us pause. We have endeavoured to trace, in the preceding portion of this history, the development of that passion that is at once the principle and end of our existence; that passion, compared to whose delights all the other gratifications of our nature—wealth, and power, and fame—sink into insignificance; and which, nevertheless, by the ineffable beneficence of our Creator, are open to his creatures of all conditions, qualities, and climes. Whatever be the lot of man, however unfortunate, however oppressed, if he only love and be loved, he must strike a balance in favour of existence, for love can illumine the dark roof of poverty, and can lighten the fetter of the slave.

But, if the most miserable position of humanity be tolerable with its support, so also the most splendid situations of our life are wearisome without its inspiration. The golden palace requires a mistress as magnificent; and the fairest garden, besides the song of birds, and the breath of flowers, calls for the sigh of sympathy. It is at the foot of woman that we lay the laurels that, without her smile, would never have been gained: it is her image that strings the lyre of the poet, that animates our voice in the blaze of eloquent faction, and guides our brain in the august toils of stately councils.

But this passion, so charming in its nature, so equal in its dispensation, so universal in its influence, never assumes a power so vast, or exerts an authority so captivating, as when it is experienced for the first time. Then it is truly irresistible and enchanting, fascinating, and despotic; and, whatever may be the harsher feelings that life may develop, there is no one, however callous or constrained he may have become, whose brow will not grow pensive at the memory of FIRST LOVE.

The magic of first love is our ignorance that it can ever end. It is the dark conviction that feelings the most ardent may yet grow cold, and that emotions the most constant and confirmed, are, nevertheless, liable to change, that taints the feebler spell of our later passions, though they may spring from a heart that has lost little of its original freshness, and be offered to one infinitely more worthy of the devotion than our first idolatry. To gaze upon a face, and to believe that forever we must behold it with the same adoration; that those eyes, in whose light we live, will forever meet ours with mutual glances of rapture and devotedness; to be conscious that all conversation with others sounds rapid and spiritless, compared with the endless expression of our affection; to feel our heart rise at the favoured voice; and to believe that life must hereafter consist of a ramble through the world, pressing but one fond hand, and leaning but upon one faithful breast;—O! must this sweet credulity indeed be dissipated! Is there no hope for them so full of hope?—no pity for them so abounding with love?

And can it be possible that the hour can ever arrive when the former votaries of a mutual passion so exquisite and engrossing can meet each other with indifference, almost with unconsciousness, and recall with an effort their vanished scenes of felicity—that quick yet profound sympathy, that ready yet boundless confidence, all that charming abandonment of self, and that vigilant and prescient fondness that anticipates all our wants and all our wishes! It makes the heart ache but to picture such vicissitudes to the imagination. They are mages full of distress, and misery, and gloom. The knowledge that such changes can occur flits over the mind like the thought of death, obscuring all our gay fancies with its batlike wing, and tainting the healthy atmosphere of our happiness with its venomous exhalations. It is not so much ruined cities, that were once the capital glories of the world, or mouldering temples, breathing with oracles no more believed, or arches of triumph, that have forgotten the heroic name they were piled up to celebrate, that fill my mind with half so mournful an impression of the instability of human fortunes as these sad spectacles of exhausted afflictions, and, as it were, traditional fragments of expired passion.

The morning, that broke sweet, and soft, and clear, brought Ferdinand, with its first glimmer, a letter from Henrietta.

HENRIETTA TO FERDINAND.

MINE own, own love! I have not lain down the whole night, I have been so anxious about my Ferdinand. What a terrible, what an awful night! To think that he was in the heart of that fearful storm! What did, what could you do? How I long to be with you! And I could only watch the tempest from my window, and strain my eyes at every flash of lightning, in the vain hope that it might reveal him! Is he well—is he unhurt? Until my messenger return I can imagine only evil. How often I was on the point of sending out the household, and yet I thought it must be useless, and might displease him! I knew not what to do. I beat about my chamber like a silly bird in a cage. Tell me the truth, my Ferdinand—conceal nothing. Do not think of moving to-day. If you feel the least unwell, send immediately for advice. Write to me one line, only one line to tell me you are well. I shall be in despair until I hear from you. Do not keep the messenger an instant. He is on my pony. He promises to return in a very, very short time. I pray for you, as I prayed for you the whole long night, that seemed as if it would never end. God bless you, my dear and darling Ferdinand! Write only one word to your own

HENRIETTA.

FERDINAND TO HENRIETTA.

SWEETEST, DEAREST HENRIETTA!—I am quite well, and love you, if that could be, more than ever.

Darling, to send to see after her Ferdinand! A wet jacket, and I experienced no greater evil, does not frighten me. The storm was magnificent; I would not have missed it for the world. But I regret it now, because my Henrietta did not sleep. Sweetest love, let me come on to you! your page is inexorable. He will not let me write another line. God bless you, my Henrietta, my beloved, my matchless Henrietta! Words cannot tell you how I love you, how I dote upon you, my darling.

THY FERDINAND.

HENRIETTA TO FERDINAND.

No! you must not come here. It would be unwise, it would be silly. We could only be together a moment, and though a moment with you is heaven, my Ferdinand, I cannot endure again the agony of parting. O, Ferdinand! what has that separation not cost me! Pangs that I could not conceive any human misery could occasion. My Ferdinand may we some day be happy! It seems to me now that happiness can never come again. And yet I ought to be grateful that he was uninjured last night. I dared not confess to you before what evils I anticipated. Do you know she was so foolish that she thought every flash of lightning must descend on the head of her Ferdinand? She dares not now own how foolish she was. God be praised that he is well. But is he sure that he is quite well? If you have the slightest cold, dearest, do not move. Postpone that journey on which all our hopes are fixed. Colds bring fever. But you laugh at me: you are a man and a soldier; you laugh at a woman's caution. O! my Ferdinand, I am so selfish that I should not care if you were ill, if I might only be your nurse. What happiness, what exquisite happiness would that be!

Darling, do not be angry with your Henrietta, but I am nervous about concealing our engagement from papa. What I have promised I will perform, fear not that; I will never deceive you, no, not even for your fancied benefit; but sweet, sweet love, I feel the burden of this secrecy more than I can express, more than I wish to express. I do not like to say any thing that can annoy you, especially at this moment; when I feel, from my own heart, how you must require all the support and solace of unbroken fondness. I have such confidence in your judgment, my Ferdinand, that I feel convinced that you have acted wisely; but come back, my sweetest, come back as soon as you can. I know it must be more than a week; I know that that prospect was only held out by your affection for your Henrietta. Days must elapse before you can reach Bath; and I know, Ferdinand, I know your office is more difficult than you will confess. But come back, my sweetest, as soon as you can, and write to me at the postoffice, as you settled.

If you are well, as you say, leave the farm directly. The consciousness that you are so near, my darling, makes me restless. Remember, in a few hours papa will be here. I wish to meet him with as much calmness as I can command.

Ferdinand, I must bid you adieu! My tears are too evident. See, they fall upon the page. It is stained. Kiss it, Ferdinand, just here. I will press my lips just here; do you also press yours. Think of me always. Never let your Henrietta be absent from your thoughts. If you knew how desolate this house is! Your guitar is on the sofa; a ghost of departed joy!

Farewell, Ferdinand! farewell, my Ferdinand! Ah! there is pride, there is bliss, in that remembrance! If you knew, sweetest, how proud I am of you, how keenly I feel my own unworthiness; but my heart is yours. I cannot write, darling. I cannot restrain my tears. I know not what to do. I almost wish papa would return, though I dread to see him. I feel the desolation of this house, I am so accustomed to see you here!

Heaven be with you, dearest, and guard over you, and cherish you, and bless you. Think always of me. Would that this pen could express the depth and devotion of my feelings!

Thine own fond and faithful

HENRIETTA.

IN THE CORRESPONDENCE, PURSUES IT.

LETTER I.

HENRIETTA TO FERDINAND.

DEAREST, dearest love. A thousand, thousand thanks, a thousand blessings, for your letter from Armine, dear, dear Armine, where some day we shall be so happy! It was such a darling letter, so long, so kind, and so clear. How could my sweet life for a moment fancy that his Henrietta would not be able to decipher his dear, dear handwriting? Always cross, dearest; your handwriting is so beautiful that I shall never find the slightest difficulty in making it out, if your letters were crossed a thousand times. Besides, dear love, to tell the truth, I should rather like to experience a little difficulty in reading your letters, for I read them so often, over and over again, till I get them by heart, and it is such a delight every now and then to find out some new expression that escaped me in the first fever of perusal, and then it is sure to be some darling word fonder than all the rest!

O, my Ferdinand! how shall I express to you my love! It seems to me now that I never loved you until this separation—that I have never been grateful enough to you for your goodness. It makes me weep to remember all the soft things you have said, all the kind things you have done for me, and to think that I have not conveyed to you at the time a title of my sense of all your gentle kindness. You are so gentle, Ferdinand! I think that, sweet, is the greatest charm of your character. My gentle, gentle love! so unlike all other persons that I have met with! Your voice is so sweet, your manner so tender, I am sure you have the kindest heart that ever existed; and then it is a daring spirit too, and that I love! Ec of good cheer, my Ferdinand; all will go well. I am full of hope, and would be of joy if you were here—and yet I am joyful, too, when I think of all your love. I can sit for hours and recall the past—it is so sweet. When I received your dear letter from Armine yesterday and knew indeed that you had gone, I went and walked in our woods, and sat down on the very bank we loved so, and read your letter over and over again; and then I thought of all you had said and done. It is so strange; I think I could repeat every word you have uttered since we first knew each other.

The morning that began so miserable, wore away before I dreamed it could be noon.

Papa arrived about an hour before dinner. So kind and good! And why should he not be? I was ashamed of myself afterwards for seeming surprised that he was the same as ever. He asked me if your family had returned to Armine. I said that you expected them daily. Then he asked if I had seen you. I said very often, but that you had now gone to Bath, as their return had been prevented by the illness of a relative. Did I right in this? I looked as unconcerned as I could when I spoke of you, but my heart throbbled—O! how it throbbled! I hope, however, I did not change colour; I think not; for I had schooled myself for this conversation. I knew it must ensue. Believe me, Ferdinand, papa really likes you, and is prepared to love you. He spoke of you in a tone of genuine kindness. I gave him your message about the shooting at Armine; that you regretted his unexpected departure had prevented you from speaking before, but that it was at his entire command, only that, after our preserves, all you could hope was, that the extent of the land might make up for the thinness of the game. He was greatly pleased.

Ferdinand, my darling Ferdinand, adieu! All good angels guard over my Ferdinand. I will write every day to the postoffice, Bath. Think of me very much. Your own faithful HENRIETTA.

LETTER II.

HENRIETTA TO FERDINAND.

O, FERDINAND, what heaven it is to think of you, and to read your letters! This morning brought me two—the one from London, and the few lines you wrote me as the mail stopped on the road. Do you know, you will think me very ungrateful, for those dear few lines, I believe I must confess I prefer them even to your beautiful long letter. It was so kind, so tender, so sweetly considerate, so like my Ferdinand, to snatch the few minutes that should have been given to rest and food, to write to his Henrietta. Darling! I love you for it a thousand times more than ever! I hope you are really well; I hope you tell me truth. This is a great fatigue, even for you. It is worse than our mules that we once talked of. Does he recollect? O! what joyous spirits my Ferdinand was in that happy day! I love him when he laughs, and yet I think he won my heart with those pensive eyes of his!

Papa is most kind, and suspects nothing. Yesterday I mentioned you first. I took up your guitar, and said to whom it belonged. I thought it more natural not to be silent about you. Besides, dearest, papa really likes you, and I am sure will love you very much when he knows all, and it is such a pleasure to me to hear you praised and spoken of with kindness by those I love. I have, of course, little to say about myself. I visit my birds, tend my flowers, and pay particular attention to all those I remember that you admired or touched. Sometimes I whisper to them, and tell them that you will soon return, for, indeed, they seem to miss you and to droop their heads like their poor mistress. O! my Ferdinand, shall we ever again meet! Shall I, indeed, ever again listen to that sweet voice, and will it tell me again that it loves me with the very selfsame accents that ring even now in my fascinated ear!

O Ferdinand! this love is a fever, a fever of health. I cannot sleep; I can scarcely countenance my father at his meals. I am wild and restless; but I am happy, happy in the consciousness of your fond devotion. To-morrow I purpose visiting our farmhouse. I think papa will shoot to-morrow. My heart will throb, I fancy, when I see our porch, and when I remember all that has happened there. God bless my own love; the darling, the idol of his fond and happy

HENRIETTA.

LETTER III.

HENRIETTA TO FERDINAND.

DEAREST, dearest love! No letter since the few lines on the road, but I suppose it was impossible. To-morrow will bring me one, I suppose from Bath. I know not why I tremble when I write that word. All is well here, papa most kind, the same as ever. He went a little on your land to-day, a very little, but it pleased me. He has killed an Armine hare. O! what a morning have I spent; so happy, so sorrowful, so full of tears and smiles! I hardly know whether I laughed or wept most. That dear, dear farmhouse! And then they all talked of you. How they do love my Ferdinand! But so must every one. The poor woman has lost her heart to you, I suspect, and I am half inclined to be a little jealous. She did so praise you! So kind, so gentle, giving so little trouble, and, as I fear, so much too generous! Exactly like my Ferdinand; but, really, this was unnecessary. Pardon me, love, but I am learning prudence.

Do you know I went into your room! I contrived to ascend alone; the good woman followed me, but I was there alone a moment, and—and—and—what do you think I did? I could not help it, dear Ferdinand. Don't think it very wrong; don't scold me. I kissed your pillow. I could not help it, dearest; when I thought that his darling head has rested there so often and so lately, I could not refrain from pressing my lips to that favoured resting-place, and I am afraid I shed a tear besides.

When mine own love receives this he will be at Bath. How I pray that you may find all your family well and happy! I hope they will love me. I already love them, and dear, dear Armine. I shall never have courage to go there again until your return. It is night, and I am writing this in my own room. Perhaps the hour may have its influence, but I feel depressed. O! that I were at your side! This house is so desolate without you. Every thing reminds me of the past. Darling, darling Ferdinand, how can I express to you what I feel—the affection, the love, the rapture, the passionate joy, with which your image inspires me? I will not be miserable. I will be grateful to Heaven that I am loved by one so rare and gifted. Your portrait is before me, I call it yours; it is so like! 'Tis a great consolation. My heart is with you, dearest. Think of me as I think of you. Awake or asleep my thoughts are alike yours, and now I am going to pray for you.

Thine own HENRIETTA.

LETTER IX.

My best beloved—The week is long past, but you say nothing of returning. O! my Ferdinand, your Henrietta is not happy. I read your letters over and over again. They ought to make me happy. I feel in the consciousness of your affection that I ought to be the happiest person in the world, and yet, I know not why, I am very depressed. You say that all is going well; but why do you not enter into detail? There are difficulties, I am prepared for them. Believe me, my Ferdinand, that your Henrietta can endure as well as enjoy. Your father, he frowns upon our affection? Tell me, tell me all, only do not leave me in suspense. I am entitled to your confidence, Ferdinand. It makes me hate myself to think that I do not share your cares as well as your delights. I am jealous of your sorrows, Ferdinand, if I may not share them.

Darling Ferdinand, do not let your brow be clouded when you read this. O! I could kill myself if I thought I could increase your difficulties. I love you—God knows how I love you. I will be patient; and yet, my Ferdinand, I feel wretched when I think that all is concealed from papa, and my lips are sealed until you give me permission to open them.

Pray write to me, sweet, sweet love, and tell me really how affairs are. Be not afraid to tell your Henrietta any thing. There is no misery as long as we love; as long as your heart is mine, there is nothing which I cannot face, nothing which I am persuaded, we cannot overcome. God bless you, Ferdinand, my soul's very idol. Words cannot express how I dote upon your image.

HENRIETTA.

LETTER X.

MINE OWN, OWN. I wrote to you yesterday a letter of complaints. I am so sorry, for your dear letter has come to-day, and it is so kind, so fond, so affectionate, that it makes me miserable that I should occasion you even a shade of annoyance. Dearest, how I love you! How I long to prove my love! There is nothing that I would not do, nothing that I would not endure, to convince you of my devotion! Sweet, sweet Ferdinand, I will do all that you wish. I will be calm, I will be patient. I will try to be content. You say you are sure all will go right; but you tell me nothing. What said your dear father? your mother? Be not afraid to speak.

You bid me tell you all that I am doing. O! my Ferdinand, life is a blank without you. I have seen no one, I have spoken to no one, save papa. He is very kind, and yet somehow or other I dread to be with him. This house seems so desolate, so very desolate. It seems a deserted place since your departure, a spot that some good genius has quitted, and all the glory has gone. I never care for my birds or flowers now. They have lost their music and their sweetness since my Ferdinand left them. And the woods, I cannot walk in them, and the garden reminds me only of the happy past. I have never been to the farmhouse again. I could not go now, dearest Ferdinand; it would only make me weep. I think only of the morning, for it brings me your letters. I feed upon them, I live upon them. They are my only joy and solace, and yet—but no complaints to-day, no complaints, dearest Ferdinand; let me only express my devoted love. Farewell, my joy, my pride, my soul's idol. O! that my weak pen could express a title of my fond devotion. Ferdinand, I love you with all my heart, and all my soul, and all my spirit's strength. I have no thought but for you, I exist only on your idea. Write, write—tell me that you love me, tell me that you are unchanged. It is so long since I heard that voice, so long since I beheld that fond, soft eye! Pity me, my Ferdinand. This is captivity. A thousand, thousand loves. Your devoted HENRIETTA.

LETTER XI.

FERDINAND, dearest Ferdinand, the post to-day has brought me no letter. I cannot credit my senses. I think the postmaster must have thought me mad. No letter! I could not believe his denial. I was annoyed, too, at the expression of his countenance. This mode of correspondence, Ferdinand, I wish not to murmur, but when I consented to this clandestine method of communication, it was for a few days, a few, few days, and then—But I cannot write. I am quite overwhelmed. O! will to-morrow ever come! HENRIETTA.

LETTER XII.

DEAREST FERDINAND, I wish to be calm. Your letter occasions me very serious uneasiness. I quarrel not with its tone of affection. It is fond, very fond, and there were moments when I could have melted over such expressions; but, Ferdinand, it is not candid. Why are we separated! For a purpose. Is that purpose effected? Were I to judge only from your letters, I should even suppose that you had not spoken to your father; but that is of course, impossible. Your father disapproves of our union. I feel it, I know it; I was even prepared for it. Come, then, and speak to my father. It is due to me not to leave him any more in the dark; it will be better, believe me, for yourself, that he should share our confidence. Papa is not a rich man, but he loves his daughter. Let us make him our friend. Ah! why did I ever conceal any thing from one so kind and good? In this moment of desolation, I feel, I keenly feel, my folly, my wickedness. I have no one to speak to, no one to console me. This constant struggle to conceal my feelings will kill me. It was painful when all was joy, but now—O, Ferdinand! I can endure this life no longer. My brain is weak, my spirit perplexed and broken. I will not say if you love; but Ferdinand, if you pity me, write, and write definitely to your unhappy HENRIETTA.

LETTER XVIII.

You tell me that, in compliance with my wishes, you will write definitely. You tell me that circumstances have occurred, since your arrival at Bath, of a very perplexing and annoying nature, and that they retard that settlement with your father that you had projected and partly arranged, that it is impossible to enter into detail in letters, and assuring me of your love, you add that you have been anxious to preserve me from sharing your anxiety. O, Ferdinand! what anxiety can you withhold like that you have occasioned me! Dearest, dearest Ferdinand, I will, I must still believe that you are faultless; but, believe me, a want of candour in our situation, and, I believe, in every situation, is a want of common sense. Never conceal any thing from your Henrietta.

I now take it for granted that your father has forbid our union; indeed, this is the only conclusion that I can draw from your letter. Ferdinand, I can bear this, even this. Sustained by your affection, I will trust to time, to events, to the kindness of my friends, and to that overruling Providence, which will not desert affections so pure as ours, to bring about, sooner or later, some happier result. Confident in your love, I can live in solitude, and devote myself to your memory. I—

O, Ferdinand! kneel to your father, kneel to your kind mother; tell them all, tell them how I love you, how I will love them; tell them your Henrietta will have no thought but for their happiness; tell them she will be as dutiful to them as she is devoted to you. Ask not for our union, ask them only to permit you to cherish our acquaintance. Let them return to Armine; let them cultivate our friendship; let them know papa; let them know me—let them know me as I am, with all my faults, I trust not worldly, not selfish, not quite insignificant, not quite unprepared to act the part that awaits a member of their family, either in its splendour or its proud humility; and, if not worthy of their son, (as who can be?) yet conscious, deeply conscious of the value and blessing of his affection, and prepared to prove it by the devotion of my being. Do this, my Ferdinand, and happiness will yet come.

But, sweet, sweet Ferdinand, my own, my gentle love, on whatever course you may decide, remember your Henrietta. I do not reproach you, my darling; never will I reproach you; but remember the situation in which you have placed me. All my happy life I have never had a secret from my father; and now I am involved in a private engagement and a clandestine correspondence. Be just to him; be just to your Henrietta! Return, my darling, I beseech you on my knees; return instantly to Ducie; reveal every thing. He will be kind and gracious; he will be our best friend; in his hand and bosom we shall find solace and support. God bless you, Ferdinand! All will yet go well, mine own, own love. I smile amid my tears when I think that we shall so soon meet. O! what misery can there be in this world if we may but share it together!

Thy fond, thy faithful, thy devoted

HENRIETTA.

CHAPTER III.

CONTAINING THE ARRIVAL AT DUCIE OF A VERY DISTINGUISHED GUEST.

It was about three weeks after Ferdinand Armine had quitted Ducie that Mr. Temple entered the breakfast-room one morning, with an open note in his hand, and told Henrietta to prepare for visitors, as her old friend, Lady Bellair, had written, to apprise him of her intention to rest the night at Ducie, on her way to the north.

"She brings with her also the most charming woman in the world," added Mr. Temple with a smile.

"I have little doubt Lady Bellair deems her companion so at present," said Miss Temple, "whoever she may be; but, at any rate, I shall be glad to see her ladyship, who is certainly one of the most amusing women in the world."

This announcement of the speedy arrival of Lady Bellair made some bustle in the household of Ducie Bower; for her ladyship was in every respect a memorable character, and the butler, who had remembered her visits to the Temples before their residence at Ducie, very much interested the curiosity of his fellow-servants by his intimations of her ladyship's eccentricities.

"You will have to take care of the parrot, Mary," said the butler; "and you, Susan, must look after the page. We shall all be well cross-examined as to the state of the establishment; and so I advise you to be prepared. Her ladyship is a rum one, and that's the truth."

In due course of time, a very handsome travelling chariot, emblazoned with a viscount's coronet, and carrying on the seat behind a portly man-servant and a lady's-maid, arrived at Ducie. They immediately descended; and assisted the assembled household of the Bower to disembark the contents of the chariot; but Mr. Temple and his daughter were too well acquainted with Lady Bellair's character to appear at this critical moment. First came forth a very stately dame, of ample proportions and exceedingly magnificent attire, being dressed, indeed, in the very extreme of gorgeous fashion, and who, after being landed on the marble steps, was for some moments absorbed in the fluttering arrangement of her plumage; smoothing her maroon pelisse, shaking the golden riband of her emerald bonnet, and adjusting the glittering pelerine of point device that shaded the fall of her broad, but well formed, shoulders. In one hand the stately dame lightly swung a bag that was worthy of holding the great seal itself, so rich and so elaborate were its materials and embroidery; and in the other she at length took a glass, which was suspended from her neck by a chain-cable of gold, and glanced with a flashing eye, as dark as her ebony curls and as brilliant as her well-rouged cheek, at the surrounding scene.

The green parrot, in its sparkling cage, followed next, and then came forth the prettiest, liveliest, smallest, best dressed, and, stranger than all, oldest little lady in the world. Lady Bellair was of child-like stature, and quite erect, though ninety years of age; the tasteful simplicity of her costume, her little plain white silk bonnet, her gray silk dress, her apron, her gray mittens, and her Cinderella shoes, all admirably contrasted with the vast and flaunting splendour of her companion, not less than her ladyship's small yet exquisitely proportioned form, her highly-finished extremities, and her keen sarcastic gray eye. The expression of her ladyship's countenance now, however, was somewhat serious. An arrival was an important moment that required all her practical circumspection; there was so much to arrange, so much to remember, and so much to observe.

The portly serving-man had advanced, and taking his little mistress in his arms, as he would a child, had planted her on the steps. And then her ladyship's clear, shrill, and now rather fretful voice was heard.

"Here! where's the butler? I don't want you, stupid, (addressing her own servant,) but the butler of the house, Mister's butler; what is his name—Mr. Two-Shoes' butler? I cannot remember names.

"O! you are there, are you? I don't want you. How is your master? How is your charming lady? Where is the parrot? I don't want it. Where's the lady? Why don't you answer? Why do you stare so! Miss Temple! no! not Miss Temple! The lady, my lady, my charming friend, Mrs.

Floyd! To be sure so—why did not you say so before? But she has got two names. Why don't you say both names? My dear," continued Lady Bellair, addressing her travelling companion, "I don't know your name. Tell all these good people your name—your two names! I like people with two names. Tell them, my dear, tell them—tell them your name, Mrs. Thingabob, or whatever it is, Mrs. Thingabob Two-Shoes."

Mrs. Montgomery Floyd, though rather annoyed by this appeal, still contrived to comply with the request in the most dignified manner; and all the servants bowed to Mrs. Montgomery Floyd.

To the great satisfaction of this stately dame, Lady Bellair, after scanning every thing and every body with the utmost scrutiny, indicated some intention of entering, when suddenly she turned round—

"Man, there's something wanting. I had three things to take charge of. The parrot and my charming friend—that is only two. There is a third. What is it? You don't know! Here, you man, who are you? Mr. Temple's servant. I knew your master when he was not as high as that cage. What do you think of that?" continued her ladyship, with a triumphant smile. "What do you laugh at, sir? Did you ever see a woman ninety years old before? That I would wager you have not. What do I want? I want something. Why do you tease me by not remembering what I want. Now, I knew a gentleman who made his fortune by once remembering what a very great man wanted. But then the great man was a minister of state. I dare say if I were a minister of state, instead of an old woman ninety years of age, you would contrive somehow or other to find out what I wanted. Never mind, never mind. Come, my charming friend, let me take your arm. Now I will introduce you to the prettiest, the dearest, the most innocent and charming lady in the world. She is my greatest favourite. She is always my favourite. You are my favourite, too; but you are only my favourite for the moment. I always have two favourites: one for the moment, and one that I never change, and that is my sweet Henrietta Temple. You see I can remember her name, though I couldn't yours. But you are a good creature, a dear good soul, though you live in a bad set, my dear, a very bad set, indeed; vulgar people, my dear; they may be rich, but they have no ton. This is a fine place. Stop, stop," Lady Bellair exclaimed, stamping her little foot, and shaking her little arm, "Don't drive away, I remember what it was. Gregory! run, Gregory! It is the page! There was no room for him behind, and I told him to lie under the seat. Poor dear boy! He must be smothered. I hope he is not dead. O! there he is. Has Miss Temple got a page? Does her page wear a feather? My page has not got a feather, but he shall have one, because he was not smothered. Here! woman, who are you? The housemaid. I thought so. I always know a housemaid. You shall take care of my page. Take him at once, and give him some milk and water; and, page, be very good, and never leave this good young woman, unless I send for you. And, woman, good young woman, perhaps you may find an old feather of Miss Temple's page. Give it to this good little boy, because he was not smothered."

CHAPTER IV.

CONTAINING SOME ACCOUNT OF THE VISCONTESS
DOWAGER BELLAIR.

THE Viscountess Dowager Bellair was the last remaining link between the two centuries. Herself born of a noble family, and distinguished both for her beauty and her wit, she had reigned for a quarter of a century the favourite subject of Sir Joshua; had flirted with Lord Carlisle, and chatted with Dr. Johnson. But the most remarkable quality of her ladyship's destiny was her preservation. Time, that had rolled on nearly a century since her birth, had spared alike her physical and mental powers. She was almost as active in body, and quite as lively in mind, as when seventy years before she skipped in Marylebone Gardens, or puzzled the gentlemen of the Tuesday Night Club at Mrs. Cornely's masquerades. Those wonderful seventy years, indeed, had passed to Lady Bellair like one of those very masked balls in which she formerly sparkled; she had lived in a perpetual crowd of strange and brilliant characters. All that had been famous for beauty, rank, fashion, wit, genius, had been gathered round her throne; and at this very hour a fresh and admiring generation, distinguished for these qualities, cheerfully acknowledged her supremacy, and paid to her their homage. The heroes and heroines of her youth, her middle life, even of her old age, had vanished; brilliant orators, profound statesmen, inspired bards, ripe scholars, illustrious warriors, beauties whose dazzling charms had turned the world mad; choice spirits, whose flying words or fanciful manners made every saloon smile or wonder—all had disappeared. She had witnessed revolutions in every country in the world; she remembered Brighton a fishing-town, and Manchester a village; she had shared the pomp of nabobs and the profusion of loan-mongers; she had stimulated the early ambition of Charles Fox, and had sympathized with the last aspirations of George Canning; she had been the confidant of the loves alike of Byron and Alfieri; had worn mourning for General Wolfe, and given a festival to the Duke of Wellington; had laughed with George Selwyn, and smiled at Lord Alvauley; had known the first macaroni and the last dandy; remembered the Gummings, and introduced the Sheridans! But she herself was unchanged; still restless for novelty, still eager for amusement; still anxiously watching the entrance on the stage of some new stream of characters, and indefatigable in attracting the notice of every one whose talents might contribute to her entertainment, or whose attention might gratify her vanity. And, really, when one recollected Lady Bellair's long career, and witnessed at the same time her diminutive form and her unrivalled vitality, one might almost be tempted to believe, that if not absolutely immortal, it was at least her strange destiny not so much vulgarly to die, as to grow like the heroine of the fairy tale, each year smaller and smaller, until her ladyship might at length subside into airy nothingness, and so rather vanish than expire.

"Five by degrees and beautifully less."

It was the fashion to say her ladyship had no heart; in most instances an unmeaning phrase; in her case certainly an unjust one. Ninety years of experience had assuredly not been thrown away on a mind of remarkable acuteness, but Lady Bellair's feelings were still quick and warm, and could be even profound. Her fancy was so lively, that her attention was soon engaged; her taste so refined, that her affection was not so easily obtained. Hence she acquired a character, for caprice, because she repented at leisure those first impressions which with her were irresistible; for, in truth, Lady Bellair, though she had nearly completed her century, and had passed her whole life in the most artificial circles, was the very creature of impulse. Her first homage she always declared was paid to talent, her second to beauty, her third to blood. The favoured individual who might combine these three splendid qualifications, was, with Lady Bellair, a nymph, or a demi-god. As for mere wealth she really despised it, though she liked her favourites to be rich.

Her knowledge of human nature, which was considerable, her acquaintance with human weaknesses, which was unrivalled, were not thrown away upon Lady Bellair. Her ladyship's perception of character was fine and quick, and nothing delighted her so much as making a person a tool. Capable, where her heart was touched, of the finest sympathy and the most generous actions—where her feelings were not engaged, she experienced no compunction in turning her companions to account, or, indeed, sometimes in honouring them with her intimacy for that purpose. But if you had the skill to detect her plots, and the courage to make her aware of your consciousness of them, you never displeased her, and often gained her friendship. For Lady Bellair had a fine taste for humour, and when she chose to be candid—an indulgence which was not rare with her—she could dissect her own character and conduct with equal spirit and impartiality. In her own instance it cannot be denied that she comprised the three great qualifications she so much prized: for she was very witty; had blood in her veins, to use her own expression; and was the prettiest woman in the world—for her years. For the rest, though no person was more highly bred, she could be very impertinent; but if you treated her with servility, she absolutely loathed you.

Lady Bellair, after the London season, always spent two or three months at Bath, and then proceeded to her great-grandson's, the present viscount's, seat in the North, where she remained until London was again attractive. Part of her domestic diplomacy was employed each year, during her Bath visit, in discovering some old friend, or making some new acquaintance, who would bear her in safety, and save her harmless from all expenses and dangers of the road, to Northumberland; and she displayed often in these arrangements talents which Talleyrand might have envied. During the present season, Mrs. Montgomery Floyd, the widow of a rich East Indian, whose intention it was to proceed to her estate in Scotland at the end of the autumn, had been presented to Lady Bellair by a friend well acquainted with her ladyship's desired arrangements. What an invaluable acquaintance at such a moment for Lady Bellair! Mrs. Montgomery Floyd, very rich and very anxious to be fashionable, was intoxicated with the flattering condescension and anticipated companionship of Lady Bellair. At first, Lady B. had quietly suggested that they should travel together to Northumberland. Mrs. Montgomery Floyd was enchanted with the proposal. Then Lady Bellair regretted that her servant was very ill, and that she must send her to town immediately in her own carriage; and then Mrs. Montgomery Floyd insisted, in spite of the offers of Lady Bellair, that her ladyship should take a seat in her carriage, and would not for an instant hear of Lady Bellair defraying, under such circumstances, any portion of the expense. Lady Bellair held out to the dazzled vision of Mrs. Montgomery Floyd a brilliant perspective of the noble lords and wealthy squires whose splendid seats, under the auspices of Lady Bellair, they were to make their resting-places during their progress; and in time Lady Bellair, who had a particular fancy for her own carriage, proposed that her servants should travel in that of Mrs. Montgomery Floyd. Mrs. Montgomery Floyd smiled a too willing assent. It ended by Mrs. Montgomery Floyd's servants travelling to Lord Bellair's, where their mistress was to meet them, in that lady's own carriage, and Lady Bellair travelling in her own chariot with her own servants, and Mrs. Montgomery Floyd defraying the expenditure of both expeditions.

CHAPTER V.

IN WHICH LADY BELLAIR GIVES SOME ACCOUNT OF SOME OF HER FRIENDS.

LADY BELLAIR really loved Henrietta Temple. She was her prime and her permanent favourite, and she was always lamenting that Henrietta would not come and stay with her in London, and marry a duke. Lady Bellair was a great match-maker. When, therefore, she was welcomed by the fair mistress of Ducie Bower, Lady Bellair was as genuine as she was profuse in her kind phrases. "My sweet, sweet young friend," she said, as Henrietta bowed her head and offered her lips to the little old lady, "it is something to have such a friend as you. What old woman has such a sweet friend as I have! Now let me look at you. It does my heart good to see you. I feel younger. You are handsomer than ever, I declare you are. Why will you not come and stay with me, and let me find you a husband? There is the Duke of De-randale—he is in love with you already; for I do nothing but talk of you. No, you should not marry him, he is not good enough. He is not refined. I love a duke, but I love a duke that is refined more. You shall marry Lord Fitzwarrene. He is my favourite; he is worthy of you. You laugh; I love to see you laugh. You are so fresh and innocent! There is your worthy father talking to my friend Mrs. Twoshoes; a very good creature, my love, a very worthy soul, but no ton; I hate French words, but what other can I use; and she will wear gold chains, which I detest. You never wear gold chains, I am sure. The Duke of — would not have me, so I came to you," continued her ladyship, returning the salutation of Mr. Temple, "Don't ask me if I am tired, I am never tired. There is nothing I hate so much as being asked if I am well. I am always well. There, I have brought you a charming friend; give her your arm; and you shall give me yours," said the old lady, smiling to Henrietta; "we make a good contrast; I like a good contrast, but not an ugly one. I cannot bear any thing that is ugly; unless it is a very ugly man indeed who is a genius and very fashionable. I liked Wilkes, and I liked Curran; but they were famous, the best company in the world. When I was as young as you, Lady Lavington and I always hunted in couples, because she was tall, and I was called the Queen of the Fairies. Pretty women, my sweet child, should never be alone. Not that I was very pretty, but I was always with pretty women, and at last the men began to think that I was pretty too."

"A superbly pretty place," simpered the magnificent Mrs. Montgomery Floyd to Mr. Temple, "and of all the sweetly pretty persons I ever met, I assure you I think Miss Temple the most charming. Such a favourite too with Lady Bellair! You know she calls Miss Temple her real favourite," added the lady, with a playful smile.

The ladies were ushered to their apartments by Henrietta, for the hour of dinner was at hand, and Mrs. Montgomery Floyd indicated some anxiety not to be hurried in her toilet. Indeed, when she reappeared, it might have been matter of marvel how she could have effected such a complete transformation in so short a period. Except a train, she was splendid enough for a birth-day at St. James's, and wore so many brilliants that she glittered like a chandelier. However, as Lady Bellair loved a contrast, this was perhaps not unfortunate; for certainly her ladyship, in her simple costume, which had only been altered by the substitution of a cap that should have been immortalized by Mieris or Gerard Douw, afforded one not a little startling to her sumptuous fellow-traveller.

"Your dinner is very good," said Lady Bellair to Mr. Temple. "I eat very little and very plainly, but I hate a bad dinner; it dissatisfies everybody else, and they are all dull. The best dinners now are a new man's; I forget his name; the man who is so very rich. You never heard of him, and she (pointing with her fork to Mrs. Montgomery) knows nobody. What is his name? Gregory, what is the name of the gentleman I dine with so often? the gentleman I send to when I have no other engagement, and he always gives me a dinner, but who never dines with me. He is only rich, and I hate people who are only rich; but I must ask him next year. I ask him to my evening parties, mind; I don't care about them; but I will not have stupid people, who are only rich at my dinners. Gregory, what is his name?"

"Mr. Million de Stockville, my lady."

"Yes, that is the man, good Gregory. You have no deer, have you?" inquired her ladyship of Mr. Temple. "I thought not. I wish you had deer. You should send a haunch in my name to Mr. Million de Stockville, and that would be as good as a dinner to him. If your neighbour, the duke, had received me, I should have sent it from thence. I will tell you what I will do; I will write a note from this place to the duke, and get him to do it for me. He will do any thing for me. He loves me, the duke, and I love him: but his wife hates me."

"And you have had a gay season in town this year, Lady Bellair?" inquired Miss Temple.

"My dear, I always have a gay season."

"What happiness!" softly exclaimed Mrs. Montgomery Floyd. "I think nothing is more delightful than gaiety."

"And how is my friend Mr. Bonmot, this year?" said Mr. Temple.

"My dear, Bonmot is growing very old. He tells the same stories over again, and therefore I never see him. I cannot bear wits that have run to seed; I cannot ask Bonmot to my dinners, and I told him the reason why; but I said I was at home every morning from two till six, and he might come then—for he does not go out to evening parties—and he is huffy—and so we have quarrelled."

"Poor Mr. Bonmot," said Miss Temple.

"My dear, there is the most wonderful man in the world—I forget his name—but everybody is mad to have him. He is quite the fashion. I have him to my parties instead of Bonmot, and it is much better. Everybody has Bonmot; but my man is new, and I love something new. Lady Frederick Berrington brought him to me. Do you know Lady Frederick Berrington? O! I forgot, poor dear, you are buried alive in the country; I must introduce you to Lady Frederick. She is charming—she will taste you—she will be your friend; and you cannot have a better friend, my dear, for she is very pretty, very witty, and has got blood in her veins. I won't introduce you to Lady Frederick," continued Lady Bellair to Mrs. Montgomery Floyd; "she is not in your way. I shall introduce you to Lady Splash and Dashaway—she is to be your friend."

Mrs. Montgomery Floyd seemed consoled by the splendid future of being the friend of Lady Splash and Dashaway, and easily to endure with such a compensation the somewhat annoying remarks of her noble patroness.

"But as for Bonmot," continued Lady Bellair, "I will have nothing to do with him. General Faneville, he is a dear good man and gives me dinners. I love dinners: I never dine at home, except when I have company. General Faneville not only gives me dinners, but lets me always choose my own party. And he said to me the other day—'Now, Lady Bellair, fix your day and name your party.' I said directly—'General, anybody but Bonmot.' You know Bonmot is his particular friend."

"But surely that is very cruel," said Henrietta Temple, smiling.

"I am cruel," said Lady Bellair, "when I hate a person I am very cruel—and I hate Bonmot. Mr. Fox wrote me a copy of verses once, and called me 'cruel fair'; but I was not cruel to him, for I dearly loved Charles Fox: and I love you, and I love your father. The first party your father ever was at, was at my house. There, what do you think of that! And I love my grandchildren; I call them all my grandchildren. I think great-grandchildren sounds silly: I am so happy that they have married so well. My dear Selina is a countess; you shall be a countess, too," added the old lady, laughing. "I must see you a countess before I die. Mrs. Grenville is not a countess, and is rather poor; but they will be rich some day; and Grenville is a good name—it sounds well. That is a great thing. I hate a name that does not sound well."

CHAPTER VI.

CONTAINING A CONVERSATION NOT QUITE SO AMUSING AS THE LAST.

IN the evening, Henrietta amused her guests with music. Mrs. Montgomery Floyd was enthusiastically fond of music and very proud of her intimate friendship with Pasta.

"O! you know her, do you?" said Lady Bellair. "Very well: you shall bring her to my house; she shall sing at all my parties: I love music at my evenings, but I never pay for it, never. If she will not come in the evening, I will try to ask her to dinner, at least. I do not like singers and tumblers at dinner—but she is very fashionable, and young men like her, and what I want at my dinners are young men, young men of very great fashion. I rather want young men at my dinners. I have some—Lord Languid always comes to me, and he is very fine, you know, very fine indeed. He goes to very few places, but he always comes to me."

Mrs. Montgomery Floyd quitted the piano, and seated herself by Mr. Temple. Mr. Temple was gallant, and Mrs. Montgomery Floyd anxious to obtain the notice of a gentleman whom Lady Bellair had assured her was of the first ton. Her ladyship herself beckoned to Henrietta Temple to join her on the sofa, and, taking her hand very affectionately, explained to her all the tactics by which she intended to bring about a match between her and Lord Fitzwarrene, very much regretting, at the same time, that her dear grandson, Lord Bellair, was married; for he, after all, was the only person worthy of her. "He would taste you, my dear; he would understand you. Dear Bellair! he is so very handsome, and so very witty. Why did he go and marry! And yet I love his wife. Do you know her? O! she is charming: so very pretty, so very witty, and such good blood in her veins. I made the match. Why were you not in England! If you had only come to England a year sooner, you should have married Bellair. How provoking!"

"But really, dear Lady Bellair, your grandson is very happy. What more can you wish?"

"Well, my dear, it shall be Lord Fitzwarrene, then. I shall give a series of parties this year, and ask Lord Fitzwarrene to every one. Not that it is very easy to get him, my child. There is nobody so difficult as Lord Fitzwarrene. That is quite right. Men should always be difficult, I cannot bear men who come and dine with you when you want them."

"What a charming place is Ducie!" sighed Mrs. Montgomery Floyd to Mr. Temple. "The country is so delightful."

"But you would not like to live in the country only," said Mr. Temple.

"Ah! you do not know me!" sighed the sentimental Mrs. Montgomery Floyd. "If you only knew how I loved flowers!—I wish you could but see my conservatory in Park lane."

"And how did you find Bath this year, Lady Bellair?" inquired Miss Temple.

"O! my dear, I met a charming man there. I forget his name, but the most distinguished person I ever met; so very handsome, so very witty, and with blood in his veins, only I forget his name, and it is a very good name, too. My dear," addressing herself to Mrs. Montgomery Floyd, "tell me the name of my favourite."

Mrs. Montgomery Floyd looked a little puzzled "My great favourite!" exclaimed the irritated Lady Bellair, rapping her fan against the sofa. "O! why do you not remember names! I love people who remember names. My favourite, my Bath favourite. What is his name? He is to dine with me in town

What is the name of my Bath favourite who is certainly to dine with me in town?"

"Do you mean Captain Armine?" inquired Mrs. Montgomery Floyd. Miss Temple turned quite pale. "That is the man," said Lady Bellair. O! such a charming man. You shall marry him, my dear, you shall not marry Lord Fitzwarrene."

"But you forget he is going to be married," said Mrs. Montgomery Floyd.

Miss Temple tried to rise, but she could not. She held down her head. She felt the fever in her cheek. "Is our engagement then so notorious!" she thought to herself.

"Ah! yes, I forgot he was going to be married," said Lady Bellair. "Well, then, it must be Lord Fitzwarrene. Besides, Captain Armine is not rich, but he has got a very fine place, though, and I will go and stop there some day. And, besides, he is over head and ears in debt, so they say. However he is going to marry a very rich woman, and so all will be right. I like old families in decay to get round again."

Henrietta dreaded that her father should observe her confusion; she had recourse to every art to prevent it. "Dear Ferdinand," she thought to herself, "thy very rich wife will bring thee, I fear, but a poor dowry. Ah! would he were here!"

"Who is Captain Armine going to marry?" inquired Mr. Temple.

"O! a very proper person," said Lady Bellair. "I forgot her name. Miss Twoshoes, or something. What is her name, my dear?"

"You mean Miss Grandison, madam?" responded Mrs. Montgomery Floyd.

"To be sure, Miss Grandison, the great heiress. The only one left of the Grandisons. I knew her grandfather. He was my son's schoolfellow."

"Captain Armine is a near neighbour of ours," said Mr. Temple.

"O! you know him," said Lady Bellair, "Is he not charming?"

"Are you certain he is going to be married to Miss Grandison?" inquired Mr. Temple.

"O! there is no doubt in the world," said Mrs. Montgomery Floyd. "Every thing is quite settled. My most particular friend, Lady Julia Hartville, is to be one of the bride's-maids. I have seen all the presents. Both the families are at Bath at this very moment. I saw the happy pair together every day. They are related, you know. It is an excellent match, for the Armines have great estates, mortgaged to the very last pound. I have heard that Sir Ratcliffe Armine has not a thousand a-year he can call his own. We are all so pleased," added Mrs. Montgomery Floyd, as if she were quite one of the family. "Is not it delightful?"

"They are to be married next month," said Lady Bellair. "I did not quite make the match, but I did something. I love the Grandisons, because Lord Grandison was my son's friend fifty years ago."

"I never knew a person so pleased as Lady Armine is," continued Mrs. Montgomery Floyd. "The truth is, Captain Armine has been very wild, very wild indeed; a little of a roué; but then such a fine young man, so very handsome, so truly distinguished, as Lady Bellair says, what could you expect! But he has sown his wild oats now. They have been engaged these six months—ever since he came from a road. He has been at Bath all the time, except for a fortnight or so, when he went to his place to make the necessary preparations. We all so missed him. Captain Armine was quite the life of Bath. I am almost ashamed to repeat what was said of him," added Mrs. Montgomery Floyd, blushing through her rouge; "but they said every woman was in love with him."

"Fortunate man!" said Mr. Temple, bowing, but with a grave expression.

"And he says, he is only going to marry, because he is wearied of conquests," continued Mrs. Montgomery Floyd; "how impertinent, is it not? But Captain Armine says such things! He is quite a privileged person at Bath!"

Miss Temple rose and left the room. When the hour of general retirement had arrived, she had not returned. Her maid brought a message that her mistress was not very well, and offered her excuses for not again descending.

CHAPTER VII.

IN WHICH MR. TEMPLE PAYS A VISIT TO HIS DAUGHTER'S CHAMBER.

HENRIETTA, when she quitted the room, never stopped until she had gained her own chamber. She had no light, but a straggling moonbeam revealed sufficient. She threw herself upon her bed, choked with emotion. She was incapable of thought; a chaos of wild images flitted over her brain. Thus had she remained, perchance an hour, with scarcely self-consciousness, when her servant entered with a light to arrange her chamber, and nearly shrieked when, on turning round, she beheld her mistress.

This intrusion impressed upon Miss Temple the absolute necessity of some exertion, if only to preserve herself at this moment from renewed interruptions. She remembered where she was, she called back with an effort some recollection of her guests, and she sent that message to her father, which we have already noticed. Then she was again alone. How she wished at that moment that she might ever be alone; that the form and shape of human being should no more cross her vision; that she might remain in this dark chamber until she died! There was no more joy for her; her sun was set, the lustre of her life was gone; the lute had lost its tone, the flower its perfume, the bird its airy wing. Ah! what a fleet, as well as fatal tragedy! How swift upon her improvidence had come her heart-breaking pang! There was an end of faith, for he was faithless; there was an end of love, for love had betrayed her; there was an end of beauty, for beauty had been her bane. All that hitherto made life delightful, all the fine emotions, all the bright hopes, and the rare accomplishments of our nature, were dark delusions now, cruel mockeries, and false and cheating phantoms! What humiliation! what despair! And he had seemed so true; so pure, so fond, so gifted! What—could it be—could it be that a few short weeks back this man had knelt to her, had adored her! And she had hung upon his accents, and lived in the light of his enraptured eyes, and pledged to him her heart; dedicated to him her life, devoted to him all her innocent and passionate affections, worshipped him as an idol! Why, what was life that it could bring upon its swift wing such dark, such agonizing vicissitudes as these? It was not life—it was frenzy!

Some one knocked gently at her door. She did not answer—she feigned sleep. Yet the door opened—she felt, though her eyes were shut and her back turned, that there was a light in the room. A tender step approached her bed. It could be but one person—that person whom she had herself deceived. She knew it was her father.

Mr. Temple seated himself by her bedside; he bent his head and pressed his lips upon her forehead. In her desolation some one still loved her. She could not resist the impulse—she held forth her hand without opening her eyes—her father held it clasped in his.

"Henrietta," he at length said, in a tone of peculiar sweetness.

"O! do not speak, my father. Do not speak. You alone have cause to reproach me. Spare me; spare your child."

"I came to console, not to reproach," said Mr. Temple. "But, if it please you, I will not speak; let me, however, remain."

"Father, we must speak. It relieves me even to confess my indiscretion, my fatal folly. Father, I feel—yet why, I know not—I feel that you know all!"

"I know much, my Henrietta, but I do not know all."

"And, if you knew all, you would not hate me?"

"Hate you, my Henrietta! These are strange words to use to a father—to a father, I would add, like me. No one can love you, Henrietta, as your father loves you; yet, speak to me not merely as a father; speak to me as your earliest, your best, your fondest, your most faithful friend."

She pressed his hand, but answer—that she could not.

"Henrietta, dearest, dearest Henrietta, answer me one question."

"I tremble, sir."

"Then we will speak to-morrow."

"O! no, to-night, to-night. To-morrow may never come. There is no night for me; I cannot sleep. I should go mad if it were not for you. I will speak; I will answer any questions. My conscience is quite clear except to you; no one, no power on earth or heaven, can reproach me except my father."

"He never will. But, dearest, tell me; summon up your courage to meet my question; are you engaged to this person?"

"I was."

"Positively engaged?"

"Long ere this I had supposed we should have claimed your sanction. He left me only to speak to his father."

"This may be the idle tattle of chattering women?"

"No, no," said Henrietta, in a voice of a deep melancholy; "my fears had foreseen this dark reality. This week has been a very hell to me; and yet, I hoped, and hoped, and hoped. O! what a fool have I been!"

"I know this person was your constant companion in my absence: that you have corresponded with him. Has he written very recently?"

"Within two days."

"And his letters?"

"Have been of late most vague. O! my father: indeed, indeed I have not conducted myself so ill as you perhaps imagine. I shrunk from this secret engagement; I opposed by every argument in my power, this clandestine correspondence; but it was only for a week, a single week; and reasons, plausible and specious reasons, were plentiful. Alas! alas! all is explained now. All that was strange, mysterious, perplexed in his views and conduct, and which, when it crossed my mind, I dismissed with contempt—all is now too clear."

"Henrietta, he is unworthy of you."

"Hush! hush! dear father. An hour ago I loved him. Spare him, if you only wish to spare me."

"Cling to my heart, my child, my pure and faultless child! A father's love has comfort. Is it not so?"

"I feel it is; I feel calmer since you came and we have spoken. Father, I never can be happy again; my spirit is quite broken. And yet I feel I have a heart now, which I thought I had not before you came. Dear, dear father," she said, rising and putting her hands round Mr. Temple's neck and leaning on his bosom, and speaking in a sweet yet very mournful voice, "henceforth your happiness shall be mine. I will not disgrace you; you shall not see me grieve; I will atone, I will endeavour to atone, for my great sins, for sins they were, towards you."

"My child, the time will come when we shall remember this bitterness only as a lesson. But I know the human heart too well to endeavour to stem your sorrow now; I only came to soothe it. My blessing is upon you, my sweet child. Let us talk no more. Henrietta, do me one favour; let me send your maid to you. Try, my love, to sleep; try to compose yourself."

"These people,—to-morrow,—what shall I do?"

"Leave all to me. Keep your chamber until they have gone. You need appear no more."

"O! that no human being might again see me!"

"Hush! sweetest! that is not a wise wish. Be calm; we shall yet be happy. To-morrow we will talk; and so good night, my child, good night, my own Henrietta."

Mr. Temple left the room. He bid the maid go to her mistress in as calm a tone as if, indeed, her complaint had been only a headache; and then he entered his own apartment. Over the mantelpiece was a portrait of his daughter, gay and smiling as the spring; the room was adorned with her drawings. He drew the chair near the fire, and gazed for some time abstracted upon the flame, and then hid his weeping countenance in his hands. He sobbed convulsively.

CHAPTER VIII.

IN WHICH GLASTONBURY IS VERY MUCH ASTONISHED.

It was a gusty autumnal night; Glastonbury sat alone in his tower; every now and then the wind, amid the chorus of groaning branches, and hissing rain, dashed against his window, then its power seemed gradually lulled, and perfect stillness succeeded, until a low moan was heard again in the distance, which gradually swelled into storm. The countenance of the good old man was not so serene as usual. Occasionally his thoughts seemed to wander from the folio opened before him; and he fell into fits of reverie which impressed upon his visage an expression rather of anxiety than study.

The old man looked up to the portrait of the unhappy Lady Armine, and heaved a deep sigh.

Were his thoughts of her, or of her child?

He closed his book, he replaced it upon its shelf, and taking from a cabinet an ancient crucifix of carved ivory, he bent down before the image of his Redeemer.

Even while he was buried in his devotions, praying perchance for the soul of that sinning yet sainted lady, whose memory was never absent from his thoughts, or the prosperity of that family to whom he had dedicated his faithful life, the noise of ascending footsteps was heard in the sudden stillness, and immediately a loud knocking at the door of his outer chamber.

Surprised at this unaccustomed interruption, Glastonbury rose, and inquired the object of his yet unseen visitor; but, on hearing a well-known voice, the door was instantly unbarred, and Ferdinand Armine, pale as a ghost, and deluged to the skin, appeared before him. Glastonbury ushered his guest into his cell, replenished the fire, re-trimmed the lamp, and placed Ferdinand in his own easy seat.

"My Ferdinand, you have surprised me; but you are wet. I fear, thoroughly?"

"It matters not," said Captain Armine, in a hollow voice.

"From Bath?" inquired Glastonbury.

But his companion did not reply. At length he said, in a voice of utter wretchedness, "Glastonbury, you see before you the most miserable of human beings."

The good father started.

"Yes!" continued Ferdinand; "this is the end of all your care, all your affection, all your hopes, all your sacrifices. It is over, our house is fated, my life draws to an end."

"Speak, my Ferdinand," said Glastonbury, for his pupil seemed to have relapsed into moody silence; "speak to your friend and father. Disburden your mind of the weight that presses on it. Life is never without hope, and while this remains," pointing to the crucifix, "never without consolation."

"I cannot speak; I know not what to say. My brain sinks under the effort. It is a wild, a complicated tale; it relates to feelings with which you cannot sympathize, thoughts that you cannot share. O, Glastonbury! there is no hope; there is no solace."

"Calm yourself, my Ferdinand; not merely as your friend, but as a priest of our holy church, I call upon you to speak to me. Even to me, the humblest of its ministers, is given a power that can sustain the falling and make whole the broken spirit. Speak, and speak fearlessly; nor shrink from exposing the very inmost recesses of your breast, for I can sympathize with your passions, be they even as wild as I believe them."

Ferdinand turned his eyes from the fire, on which he was gazing, and shot a scrutinizing glance at his kind confessor, but the countenance of Glastonbury was placid though serious.

"You remember," Ferdinand at length murmured, "that we met—we met unexpectedly—some six weeks back."

"I have not forgotten it," replied Glastonbury.

"There was a lady," Ferdinand continued, in a hesitating tone.

"Whom I mistook for Miss Grandison," observed Glastonbury, "but who, it turned out, bore another name."

"You know it?"

"I know all; for her father has been here."

"Where are they?" exclaimed Ferdinand eagerly, starting from his seat, and seizing the hand of Glastonbury. "Only tell me where they are—only tell me where Henrietta is—and you will save me, Glastonbury. You will restore me to life, to hope, to heaven."

"I cannot," said Glastonbury, shaking his head. "It is more than ten days ago that I saw this lady's father, for a few brief and painful moments; for what purpose your conscience may inform you. From the unexpected interview between ourselves in the gallery, my consequent misconception, and the conversation which it occasioned, I was not so unprepared for this interview with him as I otherwise might have been. Believe me, Ferdinand, I was as tender to your conduct as was consistent with my duty to my God and to my neighbour."

"You betrayed me, then," said Ferdinand.

"Ferdinand!" said Glastonbury, reproachfully, "I trust that I am free from deceit of any kind. In the present instance I had not even to communicate any thing. Your own conduct had excited suspicion: some visitors from Bath, to this gentleman and his family, had revealed every thing; and, in deference to the claims of an innocent lady, I could not refuse to confirm what was no secret to the world in general—what was already known to them in particular; what was not even doubted—and, alas! not dubitable."

"O! my father, pardon me, pardon me; pardon the only disrespectful expression that ever escaped the lips of your Ferdinand towards you; most humbly do I ask your forgiveness. But if you know all—God! God! my heart is breaking. You have seen her, Glastonbury, you have seen her. Was there ever on earth a being like her? So beautiful, so highly gifted—with a heart as fresh, as fragrant, as the dawn of Eden; and that heart mine—and all lost—all gone and lost. O! why am I alive?" He threw himself back in his chair, and covered his face, and wept.

"I would that deed or labour of mine could restore you both to peace," said Glastonbury, with streaming eyes.

"So innocent, so truly virtuous!" continued Ferdinand. "It seemed to me I never knew what virtue was till I knew her. So frank, so generous! I think I see her now, with that dear smile of hers, that never more may welcome me!"

"My child, I know not what to say—I know not what advice to give—I know not what even to wish. Your situation is so complicated, so mysterious, that it passes my comprehension. There are others whose claims, whose feelings, should be considered. You are not, of course, married?"

Ferdinand shook his head.

"Does Miss Grandison know all?"

"Nothing."

"Your family?"

Ferdinand shook his head again.

"What do you yourself wish? What object are you aiming at? What game have you yourself been playing? I speak not in harshness; but I really do not understand what you have been about. If you have your grandfather's passions, you have his brain too. I did not ever suppose that you were 'infirm of purpose.'"

"I have only one wish, only one object. Since I first saw Henrietta, my heart and resolution have never for an instant faltered; and if I do not now succeed in them, I am determined not to live."

"The God of all goodness have mercy on this distracted house!" exclaimed Glastonbury, as he lifted his pious hands to heaven.

"You went to Bath to communicate this great change to your father," he continued. "Why did you not? Painful as the explanation must be to Miss Grandison, the injustice of your conduct towards her is aggravated by delay."

"There were reasons," said Ferdinand, "reasons which I never intended any one to know—but now I have no secrets. Dear Glastonbury, even amid all this overwhelming misery, my cheek burns when I confess to you that I have, and have had for years, private cares of my own, of no slight nature."

"Debts?" inquired Glastonbury.

"Debts," replied Ferdinand, "and considerable ones."

"Poor child!" exclaimed Glastonbury. "And this drove you to the marriage?"

"To that every worldly consideration impelled me: my heart was free then: in fact I did not know I had a heart, and I thought the marriage would make all happy. But now—as far as I am myself concerned—O! I would sooner be the commonest peasant in this country, with Henrietta Temple for the partner of my life, than live at Armine with all the splendour of my ancestors."

"Honour be to them; they were great men," exclaimed Glastonbury.

"I am their victim," replied Ferdinand. "I owe my ancestors nothing—nay! worse than nothing, I owe them—"

"Hush! hush!" said Glastonbury. "If only for my sake, Ferdinand, be silent."

"For yours, then, not for theirs."

"But why did you remain at Bath?" inquired Glastonbury.

"I had not been there more than a day or two, when my principal creditor came down from town and menaced me. He had a power of attorney from a usurer at Malta, and talked of applying to the Horse Guards. The report that I was going to marry an heiress had kept these fellows quiet; but the delay, and my absence from Bath, had excited his suspicion. Instead, therefore, of coming to an immediate explanation with Katherine, brought about, as I had intended, by my coldness and neglect, I was obliged to be constantly seen with her in public, to prevent myself from being arrested. Yet I wrote to Ducie daily. I had confidence in my energy and skill. I thought that Henrietta might be for a moment annoyed or suspicious; I thought, however, she would be supported by the fervour of my love—I anticipated no other evil. Who could have supposed that these infernal visitors would have come at such a moment to this retired spot!"

"And now, is all known now?" inquired Glastonbury.

"Nothing," replied Ferdinand; "the difficulty of my position was so great, that I was about to cut the knot, by quitting Bath and leaving a letter addressed to Katherine confessing all. But the sudden silence of Henrietta drove me mad. Day after day elapsed; two, three, four, five, six days, and I heard nothing. The moon was bright—the mail was just going off. I yielded to an irresistible impulse. I bid adieu to no one. I jumped in. I was in London only ten minutes. I dashed to Ducie. It was deserted; an old woman told me the family had gone, had utterly departed. She knew not where, but she thought for foreign parts. I sank down, I tottered to a seat in that hall where I had been so happy. Then it flashed across my mind, that I might discover their course and pursue them. I hurried to the nearest posting town. I found out their route. I lost it forever at the next stage. The clue was gone; it was market-day, and, in a great city, where horses are changed every minute, there is so much confusion, that my inquiries were utterly baffled. And here I am, Mr. Glastonbury," added Ferdinand, with a kind of mad smile. "I have travelled four days, I have not slept a wink, I have tasted no food; but I have drunk, I have drunk well. Here I am, and I have half a mind to set fire to that cursed pile, called Armine Castle, for my funeral pyre."

"Ferdinand, you are not well," said Mr. Glastonbury, grasping his hand. "You need rest. You must retire; indeed you must. I must be obeyed. My bed is yours."

"No! Let me go to my own room," murmured Ferdinand, in a faint voice. "That room where my mother said the day would come—O! what did my mother say? Would there were only mother's love, and then I should not be here or thus."

"I pray you, my child, rest here."

"No! Let us to the Place. For an hour; I shall not sleep more than an hour. I am off again directly the storm is over. If it had not been for the cursed rain, I should have caught them. And yet perhaps they are in countries where there is no rain. Ah! who would believe what happens in this world? Not I for one. Now! give me your arm. Good Glastonbury! you are always the same. You seem to me the only thing in the world that is unchanged."

Glastonbury, with an air of great tenderness and anxiety, led his former pupil down the stairs. The weather was more calm. There were some dark blue rifts in the black sky, which revealed a star or two. Ferdinand said nothing in their progress to the Place except once, when he looked up to the sky, and said, as it were to himself, "She loved the stars."

Glastonbury had some difficulty in rousing the man and his wife, who were the inmates of the Place; but it was not very late, and, fortunately, they had not retired for the night. Lights were brought into Lady Armine's drawing-room. Glastonbury led Ferdinand to a sofa, on which he rather permitted others to place him than seated himself. He took no notice of any thing that was going on, but remained with his eyes open, gazing feebly with a rather vacant air.

Then the good Glastonbury looked to the arrangement of his sleeping-room, drawing the curtains, seeing that the bed was well aired and warmed, and himself adding blocks to the wood fire which soon kindled. Nor did he forget to prepare, with the aid of the good woman, some hot potion that might soothe and comfort his stricken and exhausted charge, who in this moment of distress and desolation had come as it were and thrown himself on the bosom of his earliest friend. When all was arranged, Glastonbury descended to Ferdinand, whom he found in exactly the same position as that in which he left him. He offered no resistance to the invitation of Glastonbury to retire to his chamber. He neither moved nor spoke, and yet seemed aware of all they were doing. Glastonbury and the stout serving-man bore him to his chamber, relieved him from his wet garments, and placed him in his earliest bed. When Glastonbury bade him good night, Ferdinand faintly pressed his hand, but did not speak; and it was remarkable, that while he passively submitted to their undressing him, and seemed incapable of affording them the slightest aid, yet he thrust forth his hand to guard a lock of dark hair that was placed next to his heart.

CHAPTER IX.

IN WHICH GLASTONBURY FINDS THAT A SERENE TEMPER DOES NOT ALWAYS BRING A SERENE LIFE.

THOSE quiet slumbers, that the regular life and innocent heart of the good Glastonbury generally insured, were sadly broken this night, as he lay awake meditating over the distracted fortunes of the house of Armine. They seemed now indeed to be most turbulent and clouded; and that brilliant and happy future, in which of late he had so fondly indulged, offered nothing but gloom and disquietude. Nor was it indeed the menaced disruption of those ties whose consummation was to restore the greatness and splendour of the family, and all the pain, and disappointment, and mortification, and misery that must be its consequence, that alone made him sorrowful. Glastonbury had a reverence for that passion which sheds such a lustre over existence, and is the pure and prolific source of much of our better conduct; the time had been when he, too, had loved, and with a religious sanctity worthy of his character and office; he had been for a long life the silent and hopeless votary of a passion almost ideal, yet happy though "he never told his love;" and, indeed, although the unconscious mistress of his affections had been long removed from that world where his fidelity was almost her only comfort, that passion had not waned, and the feelings that had been inspired by her presence were now cherished by her memory. His tender and romantic nature, which his venerable gray hairs had neither dulled nor hardened, made him deeply sympathize with his unhappy pupil; the radiant image of Henrietta Temple, too, vividly impressed on his memory as it was, rose up before him; he recollected his joy that the chosen partner of his Ferdinand's bosom should be worthy of her destiny; he thought of this fair creature, perchance in solitude and sickness, a prey to the most mortifying and miserable emotions, with all her fine and generous feelings thrown back upon herself; deeming herself deceived, deserted, outraged, where she had looked for nothing but fidelity, and fondness, and support; losing all confidence in the world and the world's ways; but recently so lively with expectation and airy with enjoyment, and now aimless, hopeless, wretched—perhaps broken-hearted.

The tears trickled down the pale cheek of Glastonbury, as he revolved in his mind these mournful thoughts; and almost unconsciously he wrung his hands as he felt his utter want of power to remedy these sad and piteous circumstances. Yet he was not absolutely hopeless. There was ever open to the pious Glastonbury one perennial source of trust and consolation. This was a fountain that was ever fresh and sweet, and he took refuge from the world's harsh courses and exhausting cares in its salutary flow and its refreshing shade; when, kneeling before his crucifix, he commended the unhappy Ferdinand and his family to the superintending care of a merciful Omnipotence.

The morning brought fresh anxieties, Glastonbury was at the Place at an early hour, and found Ferdinand in a high state of fever. He had not slept an instant, was very excited, talked of departing immediately, and rambled in his discourse. Glastonbury blamed himself for having left him for a moment, and resolved to do so no more. He endeavoured to soothe him; assured him that if he would be calm, all would go well; and they would consult together what was best to be done: and that he would make inquiries after the Temple family. In the mean time he despatched the servant for the most eminent physician of the county; but, as hours must necessarily elapse before his arrival, the difficulty of keeping Ferdinand still was very great. Talk he would, and of nothing but Henrietta. It was really agonizing to listen to his frantic appeals to Glastonbury, to exert himself to discover her abode; yet Glastonbury never left his side; and with promises, expressions of confidence, and the sway of an affected calmness—for in truth dear Glastonbury was scarcely less agitated than his patient—Ferdinand was prevented from rising, and the physician at length arrived.

After examining Ferdinand, with whom he remained a very short space, this gentleman quietly invited Glastonbury to descend below, and they left the patient in the charge of the servant.

"This is a bad case," said the physician.

"Almighty God preserve him!" exclaimed the agitated Glastonbury. "Tell me the worst!"

"Where are Sir Ratcliffe and Lady Armine?"

"At Bath."

"They must be sent for instantly."

"Is there any hope?"

"There is hope; that is all. I shall now bleed him copiously, and then blister; but I can do little. We must trust to nature. I am afraid of the brain. I cannot account for his state by his getting wet, or his rapid travelling. Has he any thing on his mind?"

"Much," said Glastonbury.

The physician shook his head.

"It is a precious life!" said Glastonbury, seizing his arm. "My dear doctor, you must not leave us."

They returned to the bed-chamber.

"Captain Armine," said the physician, taking his hand and seating himself on the bed, "you have a bad cold and some fever—I think we should lose a little blood."

"Can I leave Armine to-day, if I am blooded?" inquired Ferdinand, eagerly. "For go I must."

"I would not move to-day," said the physician.

I must, indeed I must. Mr. Glastonbury will tell you I must."

"If you set off early to-morrow, you will get over as much ground in four-and-twenty hours as if you went this evening," said the physician, fixing the bandage on the arm as he spoke, and nodding to Mr. Glastonbury to prepare the basin.

"To-morrow morning?" said Ferdinand.

"Yes, to-morrow," said the physician, opening his lancet.

"Are you sure that I shall be able to set off to-morrow?" said Ferdinand.

"Quite," said the physician, opening the vein.

The dark blood flowed sullenly; the physician exchanged an anxious glance with Glastonbury; at length the arm was bandaged up, a composing draught, with which the physician had been prepared, given to his patient, and the doctor and Glastonbury withdrew. The former now left Armine for three hours, and Glastonbury prepared himself for his painful office of communicating to the parents the imminent danger of their only child.

Never had a more difficult task devolved upon an individual than that which now fell to the lot of the good Glastonbury in conducting the affairs of a family labouring under such remarkable misconceptions as to the position and views of its various members. It immediately occurred to him, that it was highly probable that Miss Grandison, at such a crisis, would choose to accompany the parents of her intended husband. What incident, under the present circumstances, could be more awkward and more painful? Yet how to prevent its occurrence? How crude to communicate the real state of such affairs at any time by letter! How impossible at the moment he was preparing the parents for the alarming, perhaps fatal, illness of their child, to enter on such subjects at all, much more when the very revelation, at a moment which required all their energy and promptitude, would only be occasioning at Bath scenes scarcely less distracting and disastrous than those occurring at Armine. It was clearly impossible to enter into any details at present; and yet Glastonbury, while he penned the sorrowful lines, and softened the sad communication with his sympathy, added a somewhat sly postscript, wherein he impressed upon Lady Armine the advisability, for various reasons, that she should only be accompanied by her husband

CHAPTER X.

IN WHICH FERDINAND ARMINE IS MUCH CONCERNED.

THE contingency which Glastonbury feared, surely happened. Miss Grandison insisted upon immediately rushing to her Ferdinand; and as the maiden aunt was still an invalid, and was quite incapable of enduring the fatigues of a rapid and anxious journey, she was left behind. Within a few hours of the receipt of Glastonbury's letter, Sir Ratcliffe and Lady Armine, and their niece, were on their way. They found letters from Glastonbury in London, which made them travel to Armine, even through the night.

In spite of all his remedies, the brain fever, which the physician foresaw, had occurred; and when his family arrived, the life of Ferdinand was not only in danger, but desperate. It was impossible even that the parents could see their child, and no one was allowed to enter his chamber but his nurse, the physician, and occasionally Glastonbury; for this name, with others less familiar to the household, sounded so often on the frenzied lips of the sufferer, that it was recommended that Glastonbury should often be at his bedside. Yet he must leave it, to receive the wretched Sir Ratcliffe and his wife, and their disconsolate companion. Never was so much unhappiness congregated together under one roof; and yet, perhaps, Glastonbury, though the only one who retained the least command over himself, was, with his sad secret, the most wo-begone of the tribe.

As for Lady Armine, she sat without the door of her son's chamber the whole day and night, clasping a crucifix in her hands; nor would she ever undress, or lie down, except upon a sofa which was placed for her, but was absorbed in silent prayer. Sir Ratcliffe remained below, prostrate. The unhappy Katherine in vain offered the consolation she herself so needed; and would have wandered about that Armine of which she had heard so much, and where she was to have been so happy, a forlorn and solitary being, had it not been for the attentions of the considerate Glastonbury, who embraced every opportunity of being her companion. His patience, his heavenly resignation, his pious hope, his vigilant care, his spiritual consolation, occasionally even the gleams of agreeable converse with which he attempted to divert her brooding mind, consoled and maintained her. How often did she look at his benignant countenance, and not wonder that the Armines were so attached to this engaging and devoted friend.

For three days did this unhappy family expect in terrible anticipation that each moment would witness the last event in the life of their son. His distracted voice caught too often the vigilant and agonized ear of his mother; yet she gave no evidence of the pang, except by clasping her crucifix with increased energy. She had promised the physician that she would command herself, that no sound should escape her lips, and she rigidly fulfilled the contract on which she was permitted to remain.

On the eve of the fourth day Ferdinand, who had never yet closed his eyes, but who had become, during the last twelve hours, somewhat more composed, fell into a slumber. The physician lightly dropped the hand which he had scarcely ever quitted, and, stealing out of the room, beckoned, his finger pressed to his lip, to Lady Armine to follow him. Assured by the symbol that the worst had not yet happened, she followed the physician to the end of the gallery, and he then told her that immediate danger was past. Lady Armine swooned in his arms.

"And now, my dear madam," said the physician to her, when she had revived, "you must breathe some fresh air. Oblige me by descending."

Lady Armine no longer refused; she repaired with a slow step to Sir Ratcliffe: she leaned upon her husband's breast as she murmured to him her hopes. They went forth together. Katherine and Glastonbury were in the garden. The appearance of Lady Armine gave them hopes. There was a faint smile on her face which needed not words to explain it. Katherine sprang forward, and threw her arms around her aunt's neck.

"He may be saved, he may be saved," whispered the mother; for in this hushed house of impending death they had lost almost the power, as well as the habit of speaking in any other tone.

"He sleeps," said the physician, "all present danger is past."

"It is too great joy," murmured Katherine; and Glastonbury advanced and caught in his arms her insensible form.

CHAPTER XI.

IN WHICH FERDINAND BEGINS TO GET A LITTLE TROUBLESOME.

FROM the moment of this happy slumber, Ferdinand continued to improve. Each day the bulletin was more favourable, until his progress, though slow, was declared certain, and even relapse was no longer apprehended. But his physician would not allow him to see any one of his family. It was at night, and during his slumbers, that Lady Armine stole into his room to gaze upon her beloved child; and if he moved even in the slightest degree, faithful to her promise and the injunction of the physician, she instantly glided behind his curtain, or a large Indian screen which she had placed there purposely. Often, indeed, did she remain in this fond lurking-place, silent and trembling, when her child was even awake, listening to every breath, and envying the nurse, that might gaze on him undisturbed; nor would she allow any sustenance that he was ordered, to be prepared by any but her own fair, fond hands; and she brought it herself even to his door. For Ferdinand himself, though his replies to the physician satisfactorily attested the healthy calmness of his mind, he indeed otherwise never spoke, but lay on his bed without repining, and seemingly plunged in mild and pensive abstraction. At length one morning he inquired for Glastonbury, who, with the sanction of the physician, immediately attended him.

When he met the eye of that faithful friend, he tried to extend his hand. It was so wan, that Glastonbury trembled while he touched it.

"I have given you much trouble," he said in a faint voice.

"I think only of the happiness of your recovery," said Glastonbury.

"Yes, I am recovered," murmured Ferdinand; "it was not my wish."

"O! be grateful to God for this great mercy, my Ferdinand."

"You have heard nothing?" inquired Ferdinand.

Glastonbury shook his head.

"Fear not to speak; I can struggle no more. I am resigned. I am very much changed."

"You will be happy, dear Ferdinand," said Glastonbury, to whom this mood gave hopes.

"Never" he said in a more energetic tone. "Never."

"There are so many that love you," said Glastonbury, leading his thoughts to his family.

"Love!" exclaimed Ferdinand, with a sigh, and in a tone almost reproachful.

"You dear mother," said Glastonbury.

"Yes! my dear mother," replied Ferdinand, musingly. Then in a quicker tone. "Does she know of my illness? Did you write to them?"

"She knows of it."

"She will be coming, then. I dread her coming. I can bear to see no one. You, dear Glastonbury, you—it is a consolation to see you, because you have seen"—and here his voice faltered—"you have seen—her."

"My Ferdinand, think only of your health; and happiness, believe me, will yet be yours."

"If you could only find out where she is," continued Ferdinand, "and go to her. Yes! my dear Glastonbury, good, dear Glastonbury, go to her," he added in an imploring tone; "she would believe you; every one believes you. I cannot go, I am powerless; and if I went, alas! she would not believe me."

"It is my wish to do every thing you desire," said Glastonbury, "I should be content to be ever labouring for your happiness. But I can do nothing unless you are calm."

"I am calm; I will be calm; I will act entirely as you wish. Only I beseech you see her."

"On that head let us say no more," replied Glastonbury, who feared that excitement might lead to relapse; yet anxious to soothe him, he added, "Trust in my humble services ever, and in the bounty of a merciful Providence."

"I have had dreadful dreams," said Ferdinand. "I thought I was in a farmhouse; every thing was so clear, so vivid. Night after night she seemed to be sitting on this bed. I touched her, her hand was in mine, it was so burning hot! Once, O! once, once I thought she had forgiven me!"

"Hush! hush! hush!"

"No more: we will speak of her no more. When comes my mother?"

"You may see her to-morrow, or the day after."

"Ah! Glastonbury, she is here."

"She is."

"Is she alone?"

"Your father is with her."

"My mother and my father. It is well." Then after a minute's pause he added with some earnestness, "Do not deceive me, Glastonbury; see what deceit has brought me to. Are you sure that they are quite alone?"

"There are none here but your dearest friends, none whose presence should give you the slightest care."

"There is one," said Ferdinand.

"Dear Ferdinand, let me now leave you, or sit by your side in silence. To-morrow you will see your mother."

"To-morrow. Ah! to-morrow. Once to me to-morrow was brighter even than to-day." He turned his back and spoke no more: Glastonbury glided out of the room.

CHAPTER XII.

CONTAINING THE INTIMATION OF A SOMEWHAT MYSTERIOUS ADVENTURE.

It was absolutely necessary that Lady Armine's interview with her son should be confined merely to observations about his health. Any allusion to the past might not only produce a relapse of his fever, but occasion explanations, at all times most painful, but at the present full of difficulty and danger. It was therefore with feelings of no uncommon anxiety, that Glastonbury prepared the mother for this first visit to her son, and impressed upon her the absolute necessity of not making any allusion at present to Miss Grandison, and especially to her presence in the house. He even made for this purpose a sort of half-confidant of the physician, who, in truth, had heard enough during the fever to excite his suspicions; but this is a class of men essentially discreet, and it is well, for few are the family secrets ultimately concealed from them.

The interview occurred without any disagreeable results. The next day, Ferdinand saw his father for a few minutes. In a few days, Lady Armine was established as nurse to her son; Sir Ratcliffe, easy in his mind, amused himself with his sports; and Glastonbury devoted himself to Miss Grandison. The intimacy, indeed, between the tutor of Ferdinand and his intended bride became daily more complete, and Glastonbury was almost her inseparable companion. She found him a very interesting one. He was the most agreeable guide amid all the haunts of Armine and its neighbourhood, and drove her delightfully in Lady Armine's pony phaeton. He could share, too, all her pursuits, and open to her many new ones. Though time had stolen something of its force from the voice of Adrian Glastonbury, it still was wondrous sweet; his musical accomplishments were complete; and he could guide the pencil or prepare the herbal, and indite fair stanzas in his fine Italian handwriting in a lady's album. All his collections, too, were at Miss Grandison's service. She handled with rising curiosity his medals, copied his choice drawings, and even began to study heraldry. His interesting conversation, his mild and benignant manners, his captivating simplicity, and the elegant purity of his mind, secured her confidence and won her heart. She loved him as a father, and he soon exercised over her an influence almost irresistible.

Every morning as soon as he awoke, every evening before he composed himself again for his night's repose, Ferdinand sent for Glastonbury, and always saw him alone. At first he requested his mother to leave the room, but Lady Armine, who attributed these regular visits to a spiritual cause, scarcely needed the expression of this desire. His first questions to Glastonbury were ever the same. "Had he heard any thing? Were there any letters? He thought there might be a letter—was he sure? Had he sent to Bath—to London—for his letters?" When he was answered in the negative, he usually dwelt no more upon the subject. One morning he said to Glastonbury, "I know Katherine is in the house."

"Miss Grandison is here," replied Glastonbury.

"Why don't they mention her? Is all known?"

"Nothing is known," said Glastonbury.

"Why don't they mention her, then? Are you sure all is not known?"

"At my suggestion, her name has not been mentioned. I was unaware how you might receive the intelligence; but the true cause of my suggestion is still a secret."

"I must see her," said Ferdinand, "I must speak to her."

"You can see her when you please," replied Glastonbury; "but I would not speak upon the great subject at present."

"But she is existing all this time under a delusion. Every day makes my conduct to her more infamous."

"Miss Grandison is a wise and most admirable young lady," said Glastonbury. "I love her from the bottom of my heart; I would recommend no conduct that could injure her, assuredly none that can disgrace you."

"Dear Glastonbury, what shall I do?"

"Be silent; the time will come when you may speak. At present, however anxious she may be to see you, there are plausible reasons for your not meeting. Be patient, my Ferdinand."

"Good Glastonbury, good, dear Glastonbury, I am too quick and fretful. Pardon me, dear friend. You know not what I feel. Thank God you do not, but my heart is broken."

When Glastonbury returned to the library, he found Sir Ratcliffe playing with his dogs, and Miss Grandison copying a drawing.

"How is Ferdinand?" inquired the father.

"He mends daily," replied Glastonbury. "If only May-day were at hand instead of Christmas, he would soon be himself again; but I dread the winter."

"And yet the sun shines?" said Miss Grandison.

Glastonbury went to the window and looked at the sky. "I think, my dear lady, we might almost venture upon our promised excursion to the Abbey to-day. Such a day as this may not quickly be repeated. We might take our sketch book."

"It would be delightful," said Miss Grandison; "but before I go, I must pick some flowers for Ferdinand." So saying, she sprang from her seat, and ran out into the garden.

"Kate is a sweet creature," said Sir Ratcliffe to Glastonbury. "Ah! my dear Glastonbury, you know not what happiness I experience in the thought that she will soon be my daughter."

Glastonbury could not refrain from sighing. He took up the pencil and touched her drawing.

"Do you know, dear Glastonbury," resumed Sir Ratcliffe, "I had little hope in our late visitation. I cannot say I had prepared myself for the worst, but I anticipated it. We have had so much unhappiness in our family, that I could not persuade myself that the cup was not going to be dashed from our lips."

"God is merciful," said Glastonbury.

"You are his minister, dear Glastonbury, and a worthy one. I know not what we should have done without you in this awful trial; but, indeed, what could I have done throughout life without you?"

"Let us hope that every thing is for the best," said Glastonbury.

"And his mother, his poor mother—what would have become of her! She never could have survived his loss. As for myself, I would have quitted England forever, and gone into a monastery."

"Let us only remember that he lives," said Glastonbury.

"And that we shall soon all be happy," said Sir Ratcliffe, in a more animated tone. "The future is, indeed, full of solace. But we must take care of him; he is too rapid in his movements. He has my father's blood in him, that is clear. I never could well make out why he left Bath so suddenly, and rushed down in so strange a manner to this place."

"Youth is impetuous," said Glastonbury.

"It was lucky you were here, Glastonbury."

"I thank God that I was," said Glastonbury, earnestly; then checking himself, he added—"that I have been of any use."

"You are always of use. What should we do without you? I should long ago have sunk. Ah! Glastonbury, God in his mercy sent you to us."

"See here," said Katherine, entering, her fair cheek glowing with animation; "only dahlias, but they will look pretty, and enliven his room. O! that I might write him a little word, and tell him I am here! Do not you think I might, Mr. Glastonbury?"

"He will know that you are here to-day," said Glastonbury. "To-morrow—"

"You always postpone it," said Miss Grandison, in a tone half playful, half reproachful; "and yet it is selfish to murmur. It is for his good that I bear this bereavement, and that thought should console me. Heigho!"

Sir Ratcliffe stepped forward and kissed his niece. Glastonbury was busied on the drawing; he turned away his face, for a tear was trickling down his cheek.

Sir Ratcliffe took up his gun. "God bless you, dear Kate," he said: "a pleasant drive and a choice sketch. We shall meet at dinner."

"At dinner, dear uncle; and better sport than yesterday."

"Ha! ha!" said Sir Ratcliffe. "But Armine is not like Grandison. If I were in the old preserves, you should have no cause to sneer at my sportsmanship."

Miss Grandison's good wishes were prophetic: Sir Ratcliffe found excellent sport, and returned home very late, and in capital spirits. It was the dinner hour, and yet Katherine and Glastonbury had not returned. He was rather surprised. The shades of evening were fast descending, and the distant lawns of Armine were already invisible; the low moan of the rising wind might be just distinguished; and the coming night promised to be raw and cloudy, perhaps tempestuous. Sir Ratcliffe stood before the crackling fire in the dining-room, otherwise in darkness—but the flame threw a bright yet glancing light upon the Snyders, so that the figures seemed really to move in the shifting shades, the eye of the infuriate boar almost to emit sparks of rage, and there wanted but the shouts of the huntsmen and the panting of the dogs to complete the tumult of the chase.

Just as Sir Ratcliffe was anticipating some mischance to his absent friends, and was about to steal upon tiptoe to Lady Armine, who was with Ferdinand, to consult her, the practised ear of a man who lived much in the air caught the distant sound of wheels, and he went out to welcome them.

"Why, you are late," said Sir Ratcliffe, as the phaeton approached the house. "All right, I hope."

He stepped forward to assist Miss Grandison. The darkness of the evening prevented him from observing her swollen eyes and agitated countenance. She sprang out of the carriage in silence, and immediately ran up into her room. As for Glastonbury, he only observed it was very cold, and entered the house with Sir Ratcliffe.

"This fire is hearty," said Glastonbury, warming himself before it; "you have had good sport, I hope! We are not to wait dinner for Miss Grandison, Sir Ratcliffe. She will not come down this evening; she is not very well."

"Not very well! Ah! the cold, I fear. You have been very imprudent in staying so late. I must run and tell Lady Armine."

"Oblige me, I pray, by not doing so," said Glastonbury; "Miss Grandison most particularly requested that she should not be disturbed."

It was with difficulty that Glastonbury could contrive that Miss Grandison's wishes should be complied with; but at length he succeeded in getting Sir Ratcliffe to sit down to dinner, and affecting a cheerfulness which was, indeed, far from his spirit. The hour of ten at length arrived, and Glastonbury, before retiring to his tower, paid his evening visit to Ferdinand.

CHAPTER XIII.

IN WHICH THE FAMILY PERPLEXITIES RATHER INCREASE THAN DIMINISH.

If ever there were a man who deserved a serene and happy life, it was Adrian Glastonbury. He had pursued a long career without injuring or offending a human being; his character and conduct were alike spotless; he was void of guile; he had never told a falsehood, never been entangled in the slightest deceit; he was very easy in his circumstances; he had no relations to prey upon his purse or his feelings; and though alone in the world, was blessed with such a sweet and benignant temper, gifted with so many resources, and adorned with so many accomplishments, that he appeared to be always employed, amused, and content. And yet, by a strange contrariety of events, it appeared this excellent person had become placed in a situation which is generally the consequence of impetuous passions not very scrupulous in obtaining their ends. That breast, which heretofore would have shrunk from being analyzed only from the refined modesty of its nature, had now become the repository of terrible secrets; the day could scarcely pass over without finding him in a position which rendered equivocation on his part almost a necessity; while all the anxieties inseparable from pecuniary embarrassments were forced upon his attention, and his feelings were racked from sympathy with individuals who were bound to him by no other tie, but to whose welfare he felt himself engaged to sacrifice all his pursuits, and devote all his time and labour. And yet he did not murmur, although he had scarcely hope to animate him. In whatever light he viewed coming events, they appeared ominous only of evil. All that he aimed at now was to soothe and support, and it was his unshaken confidence in Providence that alone forbade him to despair.

When he repaired to the Place in the morning, he found every thing in confusion. Miss Grandison was very unwell; and Lady Armine, frightened by the recent danger from which they had escaped, very alarmed. She could no longer conceal from Ferdinand that his Katherine was here, and perhaps Lady Armine was somewhat surprised at the calmness with which her son received the intelligence. But Miss Grandison was not only very unwell, but very obstinate. She would not leave her room, but insisted that no medical advice should be called in. Lady Armine protested, supplicated, adjured; Miss Grandison appealed to Mr. Glastonbury; and Glastonbury, who was something of a physician, was called in, and was obliged to assure Lady Armine that Miss Grandison was only suffering from a cold, and only required repose. A very warm friendship subsisted between Lady Armine and her niece. She had always been Katherine's favourite aunt, and during the past year there had been urgent reasons why Lady Armine should have cherished this predisposition in her favour. Lady Armine was a very fascinating person, and all her powers had been employed to obtain an influence over the heiress. They had been quite successful. Miss Grandison looked forward almost with as much pleasure to being Lady Armine's daughter as her son's bride. The intended mother-in-law was in turn as warm-hearted as her niece was engaging; and eventually Lady Armine loved Katherine, not merely because she was to marry her son, and make his fortune.

In a few days, however, Miss Grandison announced she was quite recovered, and Lady Armine again devoted her unbroken attention to her son, who was now about to rise for the first time from his bed. But, although Miss Grandison was no longer an invalid, it is quite certain that if the attention of the other members of the family had not been so entirely engrossed, that a very great change in her behaviour could not have escaped their notice. Her flowers and drawings seemed to have lost their relish; her gaiety to have deserted her. She passed a great portion of the morning in her own room, and although it was announced to her that Ferdinand was aware of her being an inmate of the Place, and that in a day or two they might meet, she scarcely evinced, at this prospect of resuming his society, as much gratification as might have been expected; and though she daily took care that his chamber should still be provided with flowers, it might have been remarked that the note she had been so anxious to send him, was never written. But how much, under the commonest course of circumstances, happens in all domestic circles, that is never observed, or never remarked, till the observation is too late!

At length the day arrived when Lady Armine invited her niece to visit her son. Miss Grandison expressed her readiness to accompany her aunt, but took an opportunity of requesting Glastonbury to join them; and all three proceeded to the chamber of the invalid.

The white curtain of the room was drawn, but though the light was softened, the apartment was by no means obscure. Ferdinand was sitting in an easy chair, supported by pillows. A black handkerchief was just twined round his forehead, for his head had been shaved, except a few curls on the side and front, which looked stark and lustreless. He was so thin and pale, and his eyes and cheeks were so wan and hollow, that it was scarcely credible that in so short a space of time a man could have become such a wreck. When he saw Katherine he involuntarily dropped his eyes, but extended his hand to her with some effort of earnestness. She was almost as pale as he, but she took his hand.

It was so light and cold, it felt so much like death, that the tears stole down her cheek.

"You hardly know me, Katherine," said Ferdinand, very feebly. "This is good of you to visit a sick man."

Miss Grandison could not reply, and Lady Armine made an observation to break the awkward pause.

"And how do you like Armine?" said Ferdinand. "I wish that I could be your guide. But Glastonbury is so kind!"

A hundred times Miss Grandison tried to reply, to speak, to make the commonest observation, but it was in vain. She grew paler every moment; her lips moved, but they sent forth no sound.

"Kate is not well," said Lady Armine. "She has been very unwell. This visit," she added in a whisper to Ferdinand, "is a little too much for her."

Ferdinand sighed.

"Mother," he at length said, "you must ask Katherine to come and sit here with you; if indeed she will not feel the imprisonment."

Miss Grandison turned in her chair, and hid her face with her handkerchief.

"My sweet child," said Lady Armine, rising and kissing her, "this is too much for you. You really must restrain yourself. Ferdinand will soon be himself again, he will indeed."

Miss Grandison sobbed aloud. Glastonbury was much distressed, but Ferdinand avoided catching his eye; and yet, at last, Ferdinand said with an effort and in a very kind voice, "Dear Kate, come and sit by me."

Miss Grandison went into hysterics, Ferdinand sprang from his chair and seized her hand; Lady Armine tried to restrain her son; Glastonbury held the agitated Katherine.

"For God's sake, Ferdinand, be calm," exclaimed Lady Armine. "This is most unfortunate. Dear, dear Katherine—but she has such a heart! All the women have in our family, but none of the men, 'tis so odd. Mr. Glastonbury, water if you please, that glass of water—sal volatile; where is the sal volatile? My own, own Katherine, pray, pray restrain yourself! Ferdinand is here; remember Ferdinand is here, and he will soon be well; soon quite well. Believe me, he is already quite another thing. There, drink that, darling, drink that. You are better now?"

"I am so foolish," said Miss Grandison, in a mournful voice. "I can never pardon myself for this. Let me go."

Glastonbury bore her out of the room; Lady Armine turned to her son. He was lying back in his chair, his hands covering his eyes. The mother stole gently to him, and wiped tenderly his brow, on which hung the light drops of perspiration, occasioned by his recent exertion.

"We have done too much, my own Ferdinand. Yet who could have expected that dear girl would have been so affected? Glastonbury was indeed right in preventing you so long from meeting. And yet it is a blessing to see that she has so fond a heart. You are fortunate, my Ferdinand; you will indeed be happy with her."

Ferdinand groaned.

"I shall never be happy," he murmured.

"Never happy, my Ferdinand! O! you must not be so low-spirited. Think how much better you are; think, my Ferdinand, what a change there is for the better. You will soon be well, dearest, and then, my love, you know you cannot help being happy."

"Mother," said Ferdinand, "you are deceived, you are all deceived—I, I—"

"No! Ferdinand, indeed we are not. I am confident, and I praise God for it, that you are getting better every day. But you have done too much, that is the truth. I will leave you now, love, and send the nurse, for my presence excites you. Try to sleep, darling." And Lady Armine rang the bell and quitted the room.

CHAPTER XIV

IN WHICH SOME LIGHT IS THROWN UPON SOME CIRCUMSTANCES WHICH WERE BEFORE RATHER MYSTERIOUS.

LADY ARMINE now proposed that the family should meet in Ferdinand's room after dinner; but Glastonbury, whose opinion on most subjects generally prevailed, scarcely approved of this suggestion. It was, therefore, but once acted upon during the week that followed the scene described in our last chapter, and on that evening Miss Grandison had so very severe a headach, that it was quite impossible for her to join the circle. At length, however, Ferdinand made his appearance below, and established himself in the library: it now, therefore, became absolutely necessary that Miss Grandison should steel her nerves to the altered state of her betrothed, which had at first apparently so much affected her sensibility, and, by the united influence of habit and Mr. Glastonbury, it is astonishing what progress she made. She even at last could so command her feelings, that she apparently greatly contributed to his amusement. She joined in the family concerts, once even read to him. Every morning, too, she brought him a flower, and often offered him her arm. And yet Ferdinand could not resist observing a very great difference in her behaviour towards him since he had last quitted her at Bath. Far from conducting herself as he had nervously apprehended, as if her claim to be his companion were irresistible, her carriage, on the contrary, indicated the most retiring disposition; she annoyed him with no expressions of fondness, and listened to the kind words which he occasionally urged himself to bestow upon her, with a sentiment of grave regard and placid silence, which almost filled him with astonishment.

One morning, the weather being clear and fine, Ferdinand insisted that his mother, who had as yet scarcely quitted his side, should drive out with Sir Ratcliffe; and, as he would take no refusal, Lady Armine agreed to comply. The carriage was ordered, was at the door; and as Lady Armine bade him adieu, Ferdinand rose from his seat and took the arm of Miss Grandison, who seemed on the point of retiring; for Glastonbury remained, and therefore Ferdinand was not without a companion.

"I will see you go off," said Ferdinand.

"Adieu!" said Lady Armine. "Take care of him, dear Kate," and the phaeton was soon out of sight.

"It is more like May than January," said Ferdinand to his cousin. "I fancy I should like to walk a little."

"Shall I send for Mr. Glastonbury?" said Katherine.

"Not if my arm be not too heavy for you," said Ferdinand. So they walked slowly on, perhaps some fifty yards, until they arrived at a garden-seat, very near the rose tree whose flowers Henrietta Temple had so much admired. It had no flowers now, but seemed as desolate as their unhappy loves.

"A moment's rest," said Ferdinand, and sighed.

"Dear Kate, I wish to speak to you."

Miss Grandison turned very pale.

"I have something on my mind, Katherine, of which I would endeavour to relieve myself."

Miss Grandison did not reply, but she trembled.

"It concerns you, Katherine."

Still she was silent, and expressed no astonishment at this strange address.

"If I were any thing now but an object of pity, a miserable and broken-hearted man," continued Ferdinand, "I might shrink from this communication; I might delegate to another this office, humiliating as it might then be to me, painful as it must, under any circumstances, be to you. But," and here his voice faltered, "but I am far beyond the power of any mortification now. The world, and the world's ways touch me no more. There is a duty to fulfil—I will fulfil it. I have offended against you, my sweet and gentle cousin—grievously, bitterly, infamously offended."

"No, no, no!" murmured Miss Grandison.

"Katherine, I am unworthy of you; I have deceived you. It is neither for your honour nor your happiness that these ties, which our friends anticipate, should occur between us. But, Katherine, you are avenged."

"O! I want no vengeance!" muttered Miss Grandison, her face pale as marble, her eyes convulsively closed. "Cease, cease, Ferdinand; this conversation is madness; you will be ill again."

"No, Katherine, I am calm. Fear not for me. There is much to tell; it must be told, if only that you should not believe that I was a systematic villain, or that my feelings were engaged to another when I breathed to you those vows—"

"O! any thing but that; speak of any thing but that!"

Ferdinand took her hand.

"Katherine, listen to me. I honour you, my gentle cousin, I admire, I esteem you; I could die content if I could but see you happy. With your charms and virtues, I thought that we might be happy. My intentions were as sincere as my belief in our future felicity. O! no, dear Katherine, I could not trifle with so pure and gentle a bosom."

"Have I accused you, Ferdinand?"

"But you will—when you know all."

"I do know all," said Miss Grandison, in a hollow voice.

Her hand fell from the weak and trembling grasp of her cousin.

"You do know all!" he at length exclaimed. "And can you, knowing all, live under the same roof with me! Can you see me! Can you listen to me? Is not my voice torture to you? Do you not hate and despise me?"

"It is not my nature to hate any thing; least of all could I hate you."

"And could you, knowing all, still minister to all my wants and watch my sad necessities? This gentle arm of yours, could you, knowing all, let me lean upon it this morning? O! Katherine, a happy lot be yours, for you deserve one!"

"Ferdinand, I have acted as duty, religion, and, t may be, some other considerations, prompted me. My feelings have not been so much considered that they need now be analyzed."

"Reproach me, Katherine—I deserve your reproaches."

"Mine may not be the only reproaches that you have deserved, Ferdinand; but permit me to remark, from me you have received none. I pity you, I sincerely pity you."

"Glastonbury has told you?" said Ferdinand.

"That communication is among the other good offices we owe him," replied Miss Grandison.

"He told you?" said Ferdinand, inquiringly.

"All that was necessary I should know for your honour, or, as some might think, for my own happiness; no more, I would listen to no more. I had no idle curiosity to gratify. It is enough that your heart is another's; I seek not, I wish not to know that person's name."

"I cannot mention it," said Ferdinand; "but there is no secret from you. Glastonbury may, should tell all."

"Amid the wretched, she is not the least miserable," said Miss Grandison.

"O! Katherine," said Ferdinand, after a moment's pause, "tell me that you do not hate me; tell me that you pardon me; tell me that you think me more mad than wicked!"

"Ferdinand," said Miss Grandison, "I think we are both unfortunate."

"I am without hope," said Ferdinand: "but you, Katherine, your life must still be bright and fair."

"I can never be happy, Ferdinand, if you are not. I am alone in the world. Your family are my only relations; I cling to them. Your mother is my mother; I love her with the passion of a child. I looked upon our union only as the seal of that domestic feeling that had long bound us all. My happiness now entirely depends upon your family, theirs I feel is staked upon you. It is the conviction of the total desolation that must occur, if our estrangement be suddenly made known to them—and you, who are so impetuous, decide upon any rash course, in consequence—that has induced me to sustain the painful part I now uphold. This is the reason that I would not reproach you, Ferdinand, that I would not quarrel with you, that I would not desert them in this hour of their affliction."

"Katherine, beloved Katherine!" exclaimed the distracted Ferdinand, "why did we ever part?"

"No, Ferdinand, let us not deceive ourselves. For me, that separation, however fruitful, at the present moment, in mortification and unhappiness, must not be considered altogether an event of unmingled misfortune. In my opinion, Ferdinand, it is better to be despised for a moment, than to be neglected for a life."

"Despised! Katherine, for God's sake spare me; for God's sake do not use such language! Despised! Katherine, at this moment I declare most solemnly all that I feel is, how thoroughly, how infamously unworthy I am of you! Dearest Katherine, we cannot recall the past, we cannot amend it, but let me assure you that at this very hour there is no being on earth I more esteem, more reverence, than yourself."

"It is well, Ferdinand. I would not willingly relieve that your feelings towards me were otherwise than kind and generous. But let us understand each other. I shall remain at present under this roof. Do not misapprehend my views. I seek not to recall your afflictions. The past has proved to me that we are completely unfitted for each other. I have not those dazzling qualities that could enchain a fiery brain like yours. I know myself; I know you; and there is nothing that would fill me with more terror now than our anticipated union. And, now, after this frank conversation, let our future intercourse be cordial and unembarrassed; let us remember we are kinsfolk. The feelings between us should by nature be kind and amiable: no incident has occurred to disturb them; for I have not injured or offended you; and as for your conduct towards me, from the bottom of my heart I pardon and forget it."

"Katherine," said Ferdinand, with streaming eyes, "kindest, most generous of women! My heart is too moved, my spirit too broken, to express what I feel. We are kinsfolk; let us be more. You say my mother is your mother. Let me be assert the privilege of that admission. Let me be a brother to you; you shall find me, if I live, a faithful one."

CHAPTER XV.

WHICH LEAVES AFFAIRS IN GENERAL IN A SCARCELY MORE SATISFACTORY POSITION THAN THE FORMER ONE.

FERDINAND felt much calmer in his mind after this conversation with his cousin. Her affectionate attention to him now, instead of filling him, as it did before, with remorse, was really a source of consolation, if that be not too strong a phrase to describe the state of one so thoroughly wretched as Captain Armine; for his terrible illness and impending death had not in the slightest degree allayed or affected his profound passion for Henrietta Temple. Her image unceasingly engaged his thoughts; he still clung to the wild idea that she might yet be his. But his health improved so slowly, that there was faint hope of his speedily taking any steps to induce such a result. All his inquiries after her—and Glastonbury, at his suggestion, had not been idle—were quite fruitless. He made no doubt that she had quitted England. What might not happen, far away from him, and believing herself betrayed and deserted? Often, when he brooded over these terrible contingencies, he regretted his recovery.

Yet his family—thanks to the considerate conduct of his admirable cousin—were still content and happy. His slow convalescence now was their only source of anxiety. They regretted the unfavourable season of the year: they looked forward with hope to the genial influence of the coming spring. That was to cure all their cares; and yet they might well suspect, when they watched his ever pensive and often suffering, countenance, that there were deeper causes than physical debility and bodily pain to account for that moody and wo-begone expression. Alas! how changed from that Ferdinand Armine, so full of hope, and courage, and youth, and beauty, that had burst upon their enraptured vision, on his return from Malta. Where was that gaiety now that made all eyes sparkle, that vivacious spirit that kindled energy in every bosom? How miserable to see him crawling about with a wretched stick, with his thin, pale face, and tottering limbs, and scarcely any other pursuit than to creep about the plaisance, where, when the day was fair, his servant would place a campstool opposite the cedar tree where he had first beheld Henrietta Temple; and there he would sit, until the unkind winter breeze would make him shiver, gazing on vacancy; yet peopled to his mind's eye with beautiful and fearful apparitions.

And it is love, it is the most delightful of human passions, that can bring about such misery! Why will its true course never run smooth! Is there a spell upon our heart that its finest emotions should lead only to despair? When Ferdinand Armine, in his reveries, dwelt upon the past; when he recalled the hour that he had first seen her, her first glance, the first sound of her voice, his visit to Ducie, all the passionate scenes to which it led—those sweet wanderings through its enchanted bowers—those bright mornings, so full of expectation that was never balked—those soft eyes, so redolent of tenderness that could never cease—when from the bright, and glowing, and gentle scenes his memory conjured up, and all the transports and the thrill that surrounded them like an atmosphere of love—he turned to his shattered and broken-hearted self, the rigid heaven above, and what seemed to him, perhaps unwise and ungrateful, spirit, the mechanical sympathy and commonplace affliction of his companions—it was as if he had wakened from some too vivid and too glorious dream, or as if he had fallen from some brighter and more favoured planet upon our cold, dull earth.

And yet it would seem that the roof of Armine Place protected a family that might yield to few in the beauty and engaging qualities of its inmates, their happy accomplishments, and their kind and cordial hearts. And all were devoted to him. It was on him alone the noble spirit of his father dwelt still with pride and joy; it was to soothe and gratify him that his charming mother exerted all her graceful care and all her engaging gifts. It was for him, and his sake, the generous heart of his cousin had submitted to mortification without a murmur, or indulged her unhappiness only in solitude; and it was for him that Glastonbury exercised a devotion that might alone induce a man to think with complacency both of his species and himself. But the heart, the heart, the jealous and despotic heart! it rejects all substitutes, it spurns all compromise, and it will have its purpose or it will break.

What may be the destiny of Ferdinand Armine, whether a brighter light is to fall on his gloomy fortunes, or whether his sad end may add to our moral instances another example of the fatal consequences of unbridled passions and ill-regulated conduct, will be recorded in the future books of this eventful history.

BOOK V.

CHAPTER I.

CONTAINING THE APPEARANCE ON OUR STAGE OF A NEW AND IMPORTANT CHARACTER.

THE MARQUESS OF MONTFORT was the grandson of that nobleman who had been Glastonbury's earliest patron. The old duke had been dead some years; his son had succeeded to his title, and Digby, that youth whom the reader may recollect was about the same age as Ferdinand Armine, and was his companion during that happy week in London which preceded his first military visit to the Mediterranean, now bore the second title of the family.

The young marquess was an excellent specimen of a class superior in talents, intelligence, and accomplishments, in public spirit and in private virtues, to any in the world—the English nobility. His complete education had been carefully conducted; and although his religious creed, (for it will be remembered that he was a Catholic,) had deprived him of the advantage of matriculating at an English university, the zeal of an able and learned tutor, and the resources of a German alma mater, had afforded every opportunity to the development of his considerable talents. Nature had lavished upon him other gifts besides his distinguished intelligence and his amiable temper: his personal beauty was remarkable, and his natural grace was not less evident than his many acquired accomplishments.

On quitting the university of Bonn, Lord Montfort had passed several years on the continent of Europe, and had visited and resided at most of its courts and capitals—an admired and cherished guest: for, debarred at the period of our story from occupying the seat of his ancestors in the senate his native country offered no very urgent claims upon his presence. He had ultimately fixed upon Rome as his principal residence, for he was devoted to the arts, and in his palace were collected some of the rarest specimens of ancient and modern invention.

At Pisa, Lord Montfort had made the acquaintance of Mr. Temple, who was residing in that city for the benefit of his daughter's health; who, it was feared by her physician, was in a decline. I say, the acquaintance of Mr. Temple; for Lord Montfort was aware of the existence of his daughter only by the occasional mention of her name; for Miss Temple was never seen. The agreeable manners, varied information, and accomplished mind of Mr. Temple, had attracted and won the attention of the young nobleman, who shrank in general from the travelling English, and all their arrogant ignorance. Mr. Temple was in turn equally pleased with a companion alike refined, amiable, and enlightened; and their acquaintance would have ripened into intimacy, had not the illness of Henrietta, and her repugnance to see a third person, and the unwillingness of her father that she should be alone, offered in some degree a bar to its cultivation.

Yet Henrietta was glad that her father had found a friend and was amused, and impressed upon him not to think of her, but to accept Lord Montfort's invitations to his villa. But Mr. Temple invariably declined them.

"I am always uneasy when I am from you, dearest," said Mr. Temple: "I wish you would go about a little. Believe me, it is not for myself that I make the suggestion, but I am sure you would derive benefit from the exertion. I wish you would go with me and see Lord Montfort's villa. There would be no one there but himself. He would not in the least annoy you, he is so quiet; and he and I could stroll about, and look at the busts, and talk to each other. You would nardly know he was present. He is such a very quiet person."

Henrietta shook her head, and Mr. Temple would not urge the request.

Fate, however, had decided that Lord Montfort and Henrietta Temple should become acquainted. She had more than once expressed a wish to see the Campo Santo; it was almost the only wish that she had expressed since she left England. Her father, pleased to find that any thing could interest her, was in the habit of almost daily reminding her of this desire, and suggesting that she should gratify it. But there was ever an excuse for procrastination. When the hour of exertion came, she would say, with a faint smile, "Not to-day, dearest papa;" and then arranging her shawl, as if even in this soft climate she shivered, composed herself upon that sofa which now she scarcely ever quitted.

And this was Henrietta Temple! that gay and glorious being, so full of graceful power and beautiful energy, that seemed born for a throne, and to command a nation of adoring subjects! What are those political revolutions, whose strange and mighty vicissitudes we are ever dilating on, compared with the moral mutations that are passing daily under our own eye; uprooting the hearts of families, shattering to pieces domestic circles, scattering to the winds the plans and prospects of a generation, and blasting, as with mildew, the ripening harvest of long cherished affection.

"It is here that I would be buried," said Henrietta Temple.

They were standing, the father and daughter, in the Campo Santo. She had been gay that morning: her father had seized a happy moment, and she had gone forth—to visit the dead.

That vast and cloistered cemetery was silent and undisturbed: not a human being was there save themselves and the keeper. The sun shone brightly on the austere and ancient frescoes, and Henrietta stood opposite that beautiful sarcophagus, that seemed prepared and fitting to receive her destined ashes.

"It is here that I would be buried," said she.

Her father almost unconsciously turned his head to gaze upon the countenance of his daughter, to see if there were indeed reason that she should talk of death. That countenance was changed since the moment I first feebly attempted to picture it. That flashing eye had lost something of its brilliancy, that superb form something of its roundness and that staglike state; the crimson glory of that mantling cheek had faded like the fading eye; and yet—it might be thought, it might be suffering, perhaps the anticipation of approaching death, and as it were the imaginary contact with a sereener existence; but certainly there was a more spiritual expression diffused over the whole appearance of Henrietta Temple, and which by many might be preferred even to that more lively and glowing beauty which, in her happier hours, made her the very queen of flowers and sunshine.

"It is strange, dear papa," she continued, "that my first visit should be to a cemetery."

At this moment their attention was attracted by the sound of the distant gates of the cemetery opening, and several persons soon entered. This party consisted of some of the authorities of the city, and some porters bearing on a slab of verd antique a magnificent cinerary vase, that was about to be placed in the Campo. In reply to his inquiries Mr. Temple learned that the vase had been recently excavated in Catania, and that it had been purchased, and presented to the Campo by the Marquess of Montfort. Henrietta would have hurried her father away, but, with all her haste, they had not reached the gates before Lord Montfort appeared.

Mr. Temple found it impossible, although Henrietta pressed his arm in token of disapprobation, not to present Lord Montfort to his daughter. He then admired his lordship's urn, and then his lordship requested that he might have the pleasure of showing it to them himself. They turned; Lord Montfort explained to them its rarity, and pointed out to them its beauty. His voice was soft and low, his manner simple but rather reserved. While he paid that deference to Henrietta which her sex demanded, he addressed himself chiefly to her father. She was not half so much annoyed as she had imagined: she agreed with her father that he was a very quiet man; she was even a little interested by his conversation, which was elegant yet full of intelligence; and she was delighted that he did not seem to require her to play any part in the discourse, but appeared quite content in being her father's friend. Lord Montfort pleased her very much, if only for this circumstance, that he seemed to be attached to her father, and to appreciate him. And this was always a great recommendation to Henrietta Temple.

The cinerary urn led to a little controversy between Mr. Temple and his friend; and Lord Montfort wished that Mr. Temple would some day call on him at his house in the Lung' Arno, and he would show him some specimens which he thought might influence his opinion. "I hardly dare to ask you to come now," said his lordship, looking at Miss Temple; "and yet Miss Temple might like to rest."

It was evident to Henrietta that her father would be very pleased to go, and yet that he was about to refuse for her sake. She could not bear that he should be deprived of so much and such refined amusement, and be doomed to an uninteresting morning at home, merely to gratify her humour. She tried to speak, but could not at first command her voice; at length she expressed her wish that Mr. Temple should avail himself of the invitation. Lord Montfort bowed lowly, Mr. Temple seemed very gratified, and they all turned together and quitted the cemetery.

As they walked along to the house, conversation did not flag. Lord Montfort expressed his admiration of Pisa. "Silence and art are two great charms," said his lordship.

At length they arrived at his palace. A venerable Italian received them. They passed through an immense hall, in which were statues, ascended a magnificent double staircase, and entered a range of saloons. One of them was furnished with more attention to comfort than an Italian cares for; and herein was the cabinet of urns and vases his lordship had mentioned.

"This is little more than a barrack," said Lord Montfort; "but I can find a sofa for Miss Temple." So saying, he arranged with great care the cushions of the couch, and when she seated herself, placed a footstool near her. "I wish you would allow me some day to welcome you at Rome," said the young marquess. "It is there that I indeed reside."

Lord Montfort and Mr. Temple examined the contents of the cabinet. There was one vase which Mr. Temple greatly admired for the elegance of its form. His host immediately brought it and placed it on a small pedestal near Miss Temple. Yet he scarcely addressed himself to her, and Henrietta experienced none of that troublesome attention, from which, in the present state of her health and mind, she shrank. While Mr. Temple was interested with his pursuit, Lord Montfort went to a small cabinet opposite, and brought forth a curious casket of antique gems. "Perhaps," he said, placing it by Miss Temple, "the contents of this casket might amuse you;" and then he walked away to her father.

In the course of an hour a servant brought in some fruit and wine.

"The grapes are from my villa," said Lord Montfort. "I ventured to order them, because I have heard their salutary effects have been marvellous. Besides, at this season, even in Italy, they are rare. At least you cannot accuse me of prescribing a very disagreeable remedy," he added with a slight smile, as he handed a plate to Miss Temple. She moved to receive them. Her cushions slipped from behind her, Lord Montfort immediately arranged them with the greatest skill and care. He was so kind that she really wished to thank him; but before she could utter a word, he was again conversing with her father.

At length Mr. Temple indicated his intention to retire; and spoke to his daughter.

"This has been a great exertion for you, Henrietta," he said; "this has indeed been a busy day."

"I am not wearied, papa; and I am sure we have been very much pleased." It was the firmest tone in which she had spoken for a long time. There was something in her manner which recalled to Mr. Temple her vanished animation. The affectionate father looked for a moment quite happy. The sweet music of these simple words dwelt on his ear.

He went forward and assisted Henrietta to rise; she closed the casket with care, and delivered it herself to her considerate host. Mr. Temple bid him adieu; Henrietta bowed and nearly extended her hand. Lord Montfort attended them to the gate—a carriage was waiting there.

"Ah! we have kept your lordship at home," said Mr. Temple.

"I took the liberty of ordering the carriage for Miss Temple," said his lordship. "I feel a little responsible for her kind exertion to-day."

CHAPTER II.

IN WHICH LORD MONTFORT CONTRIVES THAT MISS TEMPLE SHOULD BE LEFT ALONE.

"AND how do you like my friend, Henrietta?" said Mr. Temple, as they drove home.

"I like your friend very much, papa. He is quite as quiet as you said; he is almost the only person I have seen since I quitted England, who has not jarred my nerves. I felt quite sorry that I had so long prevented you both from cultivating each other's acquaintance. He does not interfere with me in the least."

"I wish I had asked him to look in upon us in the evening," said Mr. Temple, rather inquiringly.

"Not to-day," said Henrietta. "Another day dearest papa."

The next day Lord Montfort sent a note to Mr. Temple, to inquire after his daughter, and to press upon her the importance of eating his grapes. His servant left a basket. The rest of the note was about cinerary urns. Mr. Temple, while he thanked him, assured him of the pleasure it would give both his daughter and himself to see him in the evening. This was the first invitation to his house that Mr. Temple had ventured to give, though they had now known each other for some time.

In the evening Lord Montfort appeared. Henrietta was lying on her sofa, and her father would not let her rise. Lord Montfort had brought Mr. Temple some English journals, which he had received from Leghorn. The gentlemen talked a little on foreign politics; and discussed the character of several of the most celebrated foreign ministers. Lord Montfort gave an account of his visit to Prince Esterhazy. Henrietta was amused. German politics and society led to German literature. Lord Montfort on this subject seemed completely informed. Henrietta could not refrain from joining in a conversation for which she was fully qualified. She happened to deplore her want of books. Lord Montfort had a library; but it was at Rome: no matter; it seemed that he thought nothing of sending to Rome. He made a note very quietly of some books that Henrietta expressed a wish to see, and begged that Mr. Temple would send the memorandum to his servant.

"But surely to-morrow will do," said Mr. Temple. "Rome is too far to send to this evening."

"That is an additional reason for instant departure," said his lordship, very calmly.

Mr. Temple summoned a servant.

"Send this note to my house," said his lordship. "My courier will bring us the books in four days," he added, turning to Miss Temple. "I am sorry you should have to wait, but at Pisa I really have nothing."

From this day, Lord Montfort passed every evening at Mr. Temple's house. His arrival never disturbed Miss Temple; she remained on her sofa. If she spoke to him, he was always ready to converse with her, yet he never obtruded his society. He seemed perfectly contented with the company of her father. Yet with all this calmness and reserve, there was no air of affected indifference, no intolerable nonchalance; he was always attentive, always considerate, often kind. However apparently engaged with her father, it seemed that his vigilance anticipated all her wants. If she moved, he was at her side; if she required any thing, it would appear that he read her thoughts, for it was always offered. She found her sofa arranged as if by magic. And if a shawl were for a moment missing, Lord Montfort always knew where it had been placed. In the mean time, every morning brought something for the amusement of Mr. Temple and his daughter; books, prints, drawings, newspapers, journals, of all countries, and caricatures from Paris and London, were mingled with engravings of Henrietta's favourite Campo Santo.

One evening Mr. Temple and his guest were speaking of a very celebrated professor of the university. Lord Montfort described his extraordinary acquirements and discoveries, and his rare simplicity. He was one of those eccentric geniuses that are sometimes found in decayed cities with ancient institutions of learning. Henrietta was interested in his description; almost without thought she expressed a wish to see him.

"He shall come to-morrow," said Lord Montfort, "if you please. Believe me," he added, in a tone of great kindness, "that if you could prevail upon yourself to cultivate Italian society a little, it would repay you."

The professor was brought. Miss Temple was very much entertained. In a few days he came again, and introduced a friend scarcely less distinguished. The society was so easy, that even Henrietta found it no burden. She remained upon her sofa; the gentlemen drank their coffee and conversed. One morning, Lord Montfort had prevailed on her to visit the studio of a celebrated sculptor. The artist was full of enthusiasm for his pursuit, and showed them, with pride, his great work, a Diana that might have made one envy Endymion. The sculptor declared it was the perfect resemblance of Miss Temple, and appealed to her father. Mr. Temple could not deny the very striking likeness. Miss Temple smiled; she looked almost herself again; even the reserved Lord Montfort was in raptures.

"O! it is very like," said his lordship. "Yes! now it is exactly like. Miss Temple does not often smile; but now one would believe she really was the model."

They were bidding the sculptor farewell.

"Do you like him?" whispered Lord Montfort to Miss Temple.

"Extremely; he is full of ideas."

"Shall I ask him to come to you this evening?"

"Yes! do."

And so it turned out that in time Henrietta found herself the centre of a little circle of eminent and accomplished men. Her health improved as she brooded less over her sorrows.

It delighted her to witness the pleasure of her father. She was not always on her sofa now. Lord Montfort had sent her an English chair, which suited her delightfully.

They even began to take drives with him in the country an hour or so before sunset. The country round Pisa is rich as well as picturesque. And their companion always contrived that there should be an object in their brief excursions. He spoke, too, the dialect of the country, and they paid, under his auspices, a visit to a Tuscan farmer. All this was agreeable; even Henrietta was persuaded that it was better than staying at home. The variety of pleasing objects diverted her mind in spite of herself. She had some duties to perform in this world yet remaining. There was her father; her father who had been so devoted to her—who had never uttered a single reproach to her for all her faults and follies, and who, in her hour of tribulation, had clung to her with such fidelity. Was it not some source of satisfaction to see him again comparatively happy? How selfish for her to mar this graceful and innocent enjoyment! She exerted herself to contribute to the amusement of her father and his kind friend, as well as to share it. The colour returned a little to her cheek; sometimes she burst for a moment into something like her old gaiety, and, though these ebullitions were often followed by a gloom and moodiness, against which she found it in vain to contend, still, on the whole, the change for the better was decided, and Mr. Temple yet hoped that in time his sight might again be blessed, and his life illustrated by his own brilliant Henrietta.

CHAPTER III.

IN WHICH MR. TEMPLE AND HIS DAUGHTER, WITH THEIR NEW FRIEND, MAKE AN UNEXPECTED EXCURSION.

ONE delicious morning, remarkable even in the south, Lord Montfort called upon them in his carriage, and proposed a little excursion. Mr. Temple looked at his daughter, and was charmed that Henrietta consented. She rose from her seat, indeed, with unwonted animation, and the three friends had soon quitted the city and entered its agreeable environs.

"It was wise to pass the winter in Italy," said Lord Montfort, "but to see Tuscany in perfection, I should choose the autumn. I know nothing more picturesque, than the carts laden with grapes, and drawn by milk-white steers."

They drove gaily along at the foot of green hills, crowned ever and anon by a convent or a beautiful stone pine. The landscape attracted the admiration of Miss Temple. A Palladian villa rose from the bosom of a gentle elevation, crowned with these picturesque trees. A broad terrace of marble extended in front of the villa, on which were ranged orange trees. On either side spread an olive grove. The sky was without a cloud, and deeply blue, the bright beams of the sun illuminated the building. The road had wound so curiously into this last branch of the Apennine, that the party found themselves in a circus of hills, clothed with Spanish chestnuts and olive trees, from which there was apparently no outlet. A soft breeze, which it was evident had passed over the wild flowers of the mountains, refreshed and charmed their senses.

"Could you believe we were only two hours' drive from a city?" said Lord Montfort.

"Indeed," said Henrietta, "if there be peace in this world, one would think that the dweller in that beautiful villa enjoyed it."

"He has little to disturb him," said Lord Montfort; "thanks to his destiny and his temper."

"I believe we make our miseries," said Henrietta, with a sigh. "After all, nature always offers us consolation. But who lives here?"

"I sometimes steal to this spot," replied his lordship.

"O! this then is your villa! Ah! you have surprised us."

"I aimed only to amuse you."

"You are very kind, Lord Montfort," said Mr. Temple, "and we owe you much."

They stopped—they ascended the terrace—they entered the villa. A few rooms only were furnished, but their appearance indicated the taste and pursuits of its occupier. Busts and books were scattered about; a table was covered with the implements of art; and the principal apartment opened into an English garden.

"This is one of my native tastes," said Lord Montfort, "that will, I think, never desert me."

The memory of Henrietta was recalled to the flowers of Ducie and of Armine. Amid all the sweets and sunshine she looked sad. She walked away from her companions; she seated herself on the terrace—her eyes were suffused with tears. Lord Montfort took the arm of Mr. Temple, and led him away to a bust of Germanicus.

"Let me show it to Henrietta," said Mr. Temple; "I must fetch her."

Lord Montfort laid his hand gently on his companion. The emotion of Henrietta had not escaped his quick eye.

"Miss Temple has made a great exertion," he said. "Do not think me pedantic, but I am something of a physician. I have long perceived that although Miss Temple should be amused, she must sometimes be left alone."

Mr. Temple looked at his companion; but the countenance of Lord Montfort was inscrutable. His lordship offered him a medal, and then opened a portfolio of Marc Antonius.

"These are very rare," said Lord Montfort; "I bring them into the country with me, for really at Rome there is no time to study them. By-the-by, I have a plan," continued his lordship, in a somewhat hesitating tone; "I wish I could induce you and Miss Temple to visit me at Rome."

Mr. Temple shrugged his shoulders and sighed.

"I feel confident that a residence at Rome would benefit Miss Temple," said his lordship, in a voice a little less calm than usual. "There is much to see, and I would take care that she should see it in a manner which would not exhaust her. It is the most delightful climate, too, at this period. The sun shines here to-day, but the air of these hills at this season is sometimes treacherous. A calm life, with a variety of objects, is what she requires. Pisa is calm, but for her it is too dull. Believe me, there is something in the blended refinement and interest of Rome, that she would find exceedingly beneficial. She would see no one but ourselves; society shall be at her command if she desires it."

"My dear lord," said Mr. Temple, "I thank you from the bottom of my heart for all your considerate sympathy; but I cannot flatter myself that Henrietta could avail herself of your really friendly offer. My daughter is a great invalid. She——"

But here Miss Temple joined them.

"We have a relic of a delicate temple here," said Lord Montfort, directing her gaze to another window. "You see it now to advantage—the columns glitter in the sun. There, perhaps, was worshipped some wood-nymph or some river god."

The first classic ruin that she had yet beheld attracted the attention of Miss Temple. It was not far, and she acceded to the proposition of Lord Montfort to visit it. That little ramble was delightful. The novelty and the beauty of the object greatly interested her. It was charming also to view it under the auspices of a guide so full of information and feeling.

"Ah!" said Lord Montfort. "If I might only be your cicerone at Rome!"

"What say you, Henrietta?" said Mr. Temple, with a smile. "Shall we go to Rome?"

The proposition did not alarm Miss Temple as much as her father anticipated. Lord Montfort pressed the suggestion with delicacy; he hinted at some expedients by which the journey might be rendered not very laborious. But as she did not reply, his lordship did not press the subject; sufficiently pleased, perhaps, that she had not met with an immediate and decided negative.

When they returned to the villa they found a collation prepared for them worthy of so elegant an abode. In his capacity of a host, Lord Montfort departed a little from that placid and even constrained demeanour which generally characterized him. His manner was gay and flowing; and he poured out a goblet of Monte Pulciano and presented it to Miss Temple.

"You must pour a libation," said he, "to the nymph of the fane."

CHAPTER IV.

SHOWING THAT IT IS THE FIRST STEP THAT IS EVER THE MOST DIFFICULT.

ABOUT a week after this visit to the villa, Mr. Temple and his daughter were absolutely induced to accompany Lord Montfort to Rome. It is impossible to do justice to the tender solicitude with which his lordship made all the arrangements for the journey. Wherever they halted, they found preparations for their reception; and so admirably had every thing been concerted, that Miss Temple at length found herself in the Eternal City, with almost as little fatigue as she had reached the Tuscan villa.

The palace of Lord Montfort was in the most distinguished quarter of the city, and situated in the midst of vast gardens full of walls of laurel, arches of ilex, and fountains of lions. They arrived at twilight, and the shadowy hour lent even additional space to the huge halls and galleries. Yet in the suite of rooms prepared for the reception of Mr. Temple and his daughter, every source of comfort seemed to have been collected. The marble floors were covered with Indian mats and carpets, the windows were well secured from the air which might have proved fatal to an invalid, while every species of chair, and couch, and sofa courted the languid or capricious form of Miss Temple—and she was ever favoured with an English stove, and guarded by an Indian screen. The apartments were supplied with every book which it could have been supposed might amuse her: there were guitars of the city and of Florence, and even an English piano; a library of the choicest music; and all the materials of art. The air of elegance and cheerful comfort that pervaded these apartments, so unusual in this land, the bright blaze of the fire, even the pleasant wax-lights, all combined to deprive the moment of that feeling of gloom and exhaustion which attends an arrival at a strange place at a late hour—and Henrietta looked around her, and almost fancied she was once more at Ducie. Lord Montfort introduced his fellow-travellers to their apartments, presented to them the servant who was to assume the management of their little household, and then reminding them of their mutual promises, that they were to be entirely their own masters, and not trouble themselves about him any more than if they were at Pisa, he shook them both by the hand, and bade them good-night.

It must be confessed that the acquaintance of Lord Montfort had afforded great consolation to Henrietta Temple. It was impossible to be insensible to the sympathy and solicitude of one so highly gifted and so very amiable. Nor should it be denied that this homage, from one of his distinguished rank, was entirely without its charm. To find ourselves, when deceived and deserted, unexpectedly an object of regard and consideration, will bring balm to most bosoms; but to attract, in such a situation, the friendship of an individual whose deferential notice, under any circumstances, must be flattering; and to be admired by one whom all admire—these are accidents of fortune which few could venture to despise. And Henrietta had now few opportunities to brood over the past; a stream of beautiful and sublime objects passed unceasingly before her vision. Her lively and refined taste, and her highly-cultivated mind, could not refrain from responding to these glorious spectacles. She saw before her all that she had long read of, all that she had long mused over. Her mind became each day more serene and harmonious, as she gazed on these ideal creations, and dwelt on their beautiful repose. Her companion, too, exerted every art to prevent these amusements from degenerating into fatiguing expeditions. The Vatican was open to Lord Montfort, when it was open to none others. Short visits, but numerous ones, was his system! Sometimes they entered merely to see a statue or a picture they were reading or conversing about the preceding eve; and then they repaired to some modern studio, where their entrance always made the sculptors' eyes sparkle. At dinner there was always some distinguished guest, whom Henrietta wished to see; and as she thoroughly understood the language, and spoke it indeed with fluency and grace, she was tempted to enter into conversations, where all seemed delighted that she played her part. Sometimes, indeed, Henrietta would fly to her chamber to sigh, but suddenly the palace resounded with tones of the finest harmony, or the human voice, with its most felicitous skill, stole upon her from the distant galleries. Although Lord Montfort was not himself a musician, and his voice could not pour forth those fatal sounds that had ravished her soul from the lips of Ferdinand Armine, he was well acquainted with the magic of music; and while he hated a formal concert, the most eminent performers were often at hand in his palace to contribute at the fitting moment to the delight of his guests. Who could withstand the soft influence of a life so elegant and serene, or refuse to yield up their spirit to its gentle excitement and its mild distraction? The colour returned to Henrietta's cheek and the lustre to her languid eye; her form regained its airy spring of health; the sunshine of her smile burst forth once more.

It would have been impossible for an indifferent person not to perceive that Lord Montfort witnessed these changes with feelings of no slight emotion. Perhaps he prided himself upon his skill as a physician, but he certainly watched the apparent convalescence of his friend's daughter with zealous interest. And yet Henrietta herself was not aware that Lord Montfort's demeanour to her differed in any degree from what it was at Pisa. She had never been alone with him in her life; she certainly spoke more to him than she used, but then she spoke more to everybody; and Lord Montfort certainly seemed to think of nothing but her pleasure, and convenience, and comfort; but he did and said every thing so quietly, that all this kindness and solicitude appeared to be the habitual impulse of his generous nature. He certainly was more intimate, much more intimate, than during the first week of their acquaintance, but scarcely more kind; for she remembered he had arranged her sofa the very first day they met, though he did not even remain to receive her thanks.

One day a discussion rose about Italian society between Mr. Temple and his host. His lordship was a great admirer of the domestic character and private life of the Italians. He maintained that there was no existing people who more completely fulfilled the social duties than this much scandalized nation, respecting whom so many silly prejudices are entertained by the English, whose travelling fellow-countrymen, by-the-by, seldom enter into any society but that tainted circle that must exist in all capitals.

"You have no idea," he said, turning to Henrietta, "what amiable and accomplished people are the better order of Italians. I wish you would let me light up this dark house some night and give you an Italian party."

"I should like it very much," said Mr. Temple.

Whenever Henrietta did not enter her negative, Lord Montfort always implied her assent, and it was resolved that the Italian party should be given.

All the best families in Rome were present, and not a single English person. There were some, perhaps, whom Lord Montfort might have wished to have invited, but Miss Temple had chanced to express a wish that no English might be there, and he instantly acted upon her suggestion.

The palace was magnificently illuminated. Henrietta had scarcely seen before its splendid treasures of art. Lord Montfort, in answer to her curiosity, had always playfully depreciated them, and said that they must be left for rainy days. The most splendid pictures and long rows of graceful or solemn statues, were suddenly revealed to her; rooms and galleries were opened that had never been observed before; on all sides cabinets of vases, groups of imperial busts, rare bronzes, and vivid masses of tessellated pavement. Over all these choice and beautiful objects, a clear yet soft light was diffused, and Henrietta never recollected a spectacle more complete and effective.

These rooms and galleries were soon filled with guests, and Henrietta could not be insensible to the graceful and engaging dignity with which Lord Montfort received the Roman world of fashion. That constraint which at first she had attributed to reserve, but which of late she had ascribed to modesty, now entirely quitted him. Frank, yet always dignified, smiling, apt, and ever felicitous, it seemed that he had a pleasing word for every ear, and a particular smile for every face. She stood at some distance leaning on her father's arm, and watching him. Suddenly he turned and looked around. "I was they whom he wished to catch. He came up to Henrietta and said, "I wish to introduce you to the Princess —. She is an old lady, but of the first distinction here. I would not ask this favour of you, unless I thought you would be pleased."

Henrietta could not refuse his request. Lord Montfort presented her and her father to the princess, the most agreeable and important person in Rome; and having now provided for their immediate amusement, he had time to attend to his guests in general. An admirable concert now in some degree hushed the general conversation. The voices of the most beautiful women in Rome echoed in those apartments. When the music ceased, the guests wandered about the galleries, and at length the principal saloons were filled with dancers. Lord Montfort approached Miss Temple. "There is one room in the palace you have never yet visited," he said, "my tribune; 'tis open to-night for the first time."

Henrietta accepted his offered arm. "And how do you like the princess?" he said as they walked along. "It is agreeable to live in a country where your guests amuse themselves."

At the end of the principal gallery, Henrietta perceived an open door, which admitted them into a small octagon chamber, of Ionic architecture. The walls were not hung with pictures, and one work of art alone solicited their attention. Elevated on a pedestal of porphyry, surrounded by a rail of bronze arrows of the lightest workmanship, was that statue of Diana, which they had so much admired at Pisa. The cheek, by an ancient process, the secret of which has been recently regained at Rome, was tinted with a delicate glow.

"Do you approve of it," said Lord Montfort to the admiring Henrietta. "Ah! dearest Miss Temple," he continued, "it is my happiness that the rose has also returned to a fairer cheek than this."

CHAPTER V.

WHICH CONTAINS SOME FARTHER PAINFUL EXPLANATIONS.

THE reader will not, perhaps, be very much surprised that the Marquess of Montfort soon became the declared admirer of Miss Temple. His lordship made the important declaration after a very different fashion to the unhappy Ferdinand Armine; he made it to the lady's father. Long persuaded that Miss Temple's illness had its origin in the mind, and believing that in that case the indisposition of a young lady had probably arisen, from one cause or another, in the disappointment of her affections, Lord Montfort resolved to spare her feelings, unprepared, the pain of a personal appeal. The beauty, the talent, the engaging disposition, and the languid melancholy of Miss Temple, had excited his admiration and his pity, and had finally won a heart capable of deep affections, but gifted with great self-control. He did not conceal from Mr. Temple the conviction that impelled him to the course which he had thought proper to pursue, and this delicate conduct relieved Mr. Temple greatly from the unavoidable embarrassment of his position. Mr. Temple contented himself with communicating to Lord Montfort, that his daughter had indeed entered into an engagement with one who was not worthy of her affections, and that the moment her father had been convinced of the character of the individual, he had quitted England with his daughter. He expressed his unqualified approbation of the overture of Lord Montfort, to whom he was indeed sincerely attached, and which gratified all those worldly feelings from which Mr. Temple was naturally not exempt. In such an alliance Mr. Temple recognised the only mode by which his daughter's complete recovery could be secured. Lord Montfort in himself offered every thing which it would seem that the reasonable fancy of woman could desire. He was young, handsome, amiable, accomplished, sincere, and exceedingly clever; while, at the same time, as Mr. Temple was well aware, his great position would insure that reasonable gratification of vanity from which none are free, which is a fertile source of happiness, and which would, at all times subdue any bitter recollections which might occasionally arise to cloud the retrospect of his daughter.

It was Mr. Temple who, exerting all the arts of his abandoned profession, now indulging in intimations and now in panegyric, conveying to his daughter, with admirable skill, how much the intimate acquaintance with Lord Montfort contributed to his happiness, gradually fanning the feeling of gratitude to so kind a friend, which had already been excited in his daughter's heart, into one of zealous regard, and finally seizing his opportunity with practised felicity—it was Mr. Temple who at length ventured to communicate to his daughter the overture which had been confided to him.

Henrietta shook her head.

"I have too great regard for Lord Montfort, to accede to his wishes," said Miss Temple. "He deserves something better than a bruised spirit, if not a broken heart."

"But, my dearest Henrietta, you really take a wrong, an impracticable view of affairs. Lord Montfort must be the best judge of what will contribute to his own happiness."

"Lord Montfort is acting under a delusion," replied Miss Temple. "If he knew all that had occurred, he would shrink from blending his life with mine."

"Lord Montfort knows every thing," said the father; "that is, every thing he should know."

"Indeed!" said Miss Temple. "I wonder he does not look upon me with contempt, at the least with pity."

"He loves you, Henrietta," said her father.

"Ah! love, love, love! name not love to me. No, Lord Montfort cannot love me. It is not love that he feels."

"You have gained his heart, and he offers you his hand. Are not these proofs of love?"

"Generous! good young man!" exclaimed Henrietta; "I respect, I admire him. I might have loved him. But it is too late."

"My beloved daughter, O! do not say so! For my sake do not say so," exclaimed Mr. Temple. "I have no wish—I have had no wish, my child, but for your happiness. Lean upon your father, listen to him, be guided by his advice. Lord Montfort possesses every quality which can contribute to the happiness of woman. A man so rarely gifted I never met. There is not a woman in the world, however exalted her rank, however admirable her beauty, however gifted her being, who might not feel happy and honoured in the homage of such a man. Believe me, my dearest daughter, that this is a union which must lead to happiness. Indeed, were it to occur, I could die content. I should have no more cares, no more hopes. All would then have happened that the most sanguine parent, even with such a child as you, could wish or imagine. We should be so happy! For his sake, for my sake, for all our sakes, dearest Henrietta, grant his wish. Believe me, believe me, he is indeed worthy of you."

"I am not worthy of him," said Henrietta, in a melancholy voice.

"Ah! Henrietta, who is like you!" exclaimed the fond and excited father.

At this moment the servant announced that Lord Montfort would, with their permission, wait upon them. Henrietta seemed plunged in thought.

Suddenly she said, "I cannot rest until this is settled. Papa, leave me with him a few moments alone." Mr. Temple retired.

A faint blush rose to the cheek of her visitor when he perceived that Miss Temple was alone. He seated himself at her side, but he was unusually constrained.

"My dear Lord Montfort," said Miss Temple, very calmly, "I have to speak upon a painful subject, but I have undergone so much suffering, that I shall not shrink from this. Papa has informed me this morning that you have been pleased to pay me the highest compliment that a man can pay a woman. I wish to thank you for it. I wish to acknowledge it in terms the strongest and the warmest I can use. I am sensible of the honour, the high honour that you have intended me. It is indeed an honour of which any woman might be proud. You have offered me a heart of which I know the worth. No one can appreciate the value of your character better than myself. I do justice, full justice, to your virtues, your accomplishments, your commanding talents, and your generous soul. Except my father, there is no one who holds so high a place in my affections as yourself. You have been my kind and true friend; and a kind and true friendship, faithful and sincere, I return you. More than friends we never can be, for I have no heart to give."

"Ah! dearest Miss Temple," said Lord Montfort, in an agitated tone, "I ask nothing but that friendship; but let me enjoy it in your constant society; let the world recognise my right to be your consoler."

"You deserve a better and a brighter fate, my lord. I should not be your friend if I could enter into such an engagement."

"The only aim of my life is to make you happy," said Lord Montfort.

"I am sure that I ought to be happy with such a friend," said Henrietta Temple, "and I am happy. How different is the world to me to what it was before I knew you! Ah! why will you disturb this life of consolation? Why will you call me back to recollections that I would fain banish? Why?"—

"Dearest Miss Temple," said Lord Montfort, "do not reproach me! You make me wretched. Remember, dear lady, that I have not sought this conversation; that if I were presumptuous in my plans and hopes, I at least took precautions that I should be the only sufferer by their non-fulfilment."

"Best and most generous of men! I would not for the world be unkind to you. Pardon my distracted words. But you know all! Has papa told you all? It is my wish."

"It is not mine," replied Lord Montfort; "I wish not to penetrate your sorrows, but only to soothe them."

"O! if we had but met earlier," said Henrietta Temple; "if we had but known each other a year ago! when I was—not worthy of you—but more worthy of you. But now, with health shattered, the lightness of my spirit vanished, the freshness of my feelings gone—no! my kind friend, my dear and gentle friend, my affection for you is too sincere to accede to your request; and a year hence, Lord Montfort will thank me for my denial."

"I scarcely dare to speak," said Lord Montfort, in a low tone, as if suppressing his emotion. "If I were to express my feelings, I might agitate you.

I will not then venture to reply to what you have urged: to tell you I think you the most beautiful and engaging being that ever breathed; or how I dote upon your pensive spirit, and can sit for hours together gazing on the language of those dark eyes. O! Miss Temple, to me you never could have been more beautiful, more fascinating. Alas! I may not even breathe my love; I am unfortunate. And yet, sweet lady, pardon this agitation I have occasioned you; try to love me yet; endure at least my presence; and let me continue to cherish that intimacy that has thrown over my existence a charm so inexpressible." So saying, he ventured to take her hand, and pressed it with devotion to his lips.

CHAPTER VI.

WHICH CONTAINS AN EVENT NOT LESS IMPORTANT THAN THE ONE WHICH CONCLUDED OUR FOURTH CHAPTER OF THE FOURTH BOOK.

LORD MONTFORT was scarcely disheartened by this interview with Miss Temple. His lordship was a devout believer in the influence of time. It was unnatural to suppose that one so young and so gifted as Henrietta could ultimately maintain that her career was terminated because her affections had been disappointed by an intimacy which was confessedly of so recent an origin as the fatal one in question. Lord Montfort differed from most men in this respect, that the consciousness of this intimacy did not cost him even a pang. He preferred, indeed, to gain the heart of a woman like Miss Temple, who, without having in the least degree forfeited the innate purity of her nature and the native freshness of her feelings, had yet learned in some degree to penetrate the mystery of the passions, to one so untutored in the world's ways, that she might have bestowed upon him a heart less experienced indeed, but not more innocent. He was convinced that the affection of Henrietta, if once obtained, might be relied on, and that the painful past would only make her more finely appreciate his high-minded devotion, and amid all the dazzling characters and seducing spectacles of the world, cling to him with a firmer gratitude and a more faithful fondness. And yet Lord Montfort was a man of deep emotions, and of a very fastidious taste. He was a man of as romantic a temperament as Ferdinand Armine; but with Lord Montfort, life was the romance of reason, with Ferdinand, the romance of imagination. The first was keenly alive to all the imperfections of our nature, but he also gave that nature credit for all its excellencies. He observed finely, he calculated nicely, and his result was generally happiness. Ferdinand, on the contrary, neither observed nor calculated. His imagination created fantasies, and his impetuous passions struggled to realize them.

Although Lord Montfort carefully abstained from pursuing the subject which nevertheless engrossed his thoughts, he had a vigilant and skilful ally in Mr. Temple. That gentleman lost no opportunity of pleading his lordship's cause, while he appeared only to advocate his own; and this was the most skilful mode of controlling the judgment of his daughter.

Henrietta Temple, the most affectionate and dutiful of children, left to reflect, sometimes asked her self whether she were justified, that from what she endeavoured to believe was a mere morbid feeling, from accomplishing the happiness of that parent who loved her so well? There had been no concealment of her situation, or of her sentiments. There had been no deception as to the past. Lord Montfort knew all. She had told him she could only bestow a broken spirit. Lord Montfort aspired only to console it. She was young. It was not probable that the death which she had once sighed for would be accorded to her. Was she always to lead this life? Was her father to pass the still long career which probably awaited him, in ministering to the wearisome caprices of a querulous invalid? This was a sad return for all his goodness—a gloomy catastrophe of all his bright hopes. And if she could ever consent to blend her life with another's, what individual could offer pretensions which might ensure her tranquillity, or even happiness, equal to those proffered by Lord Montfort? Ah! who was equal to him?—so amiable, so generous, so interesting!

It was in such a mood of mind that Henrietta would sometimes turn with a glance of tenderness and gratitude to that being who seemed to breathe only for her solace and gratification. If it be agonizing to be deserted, there is at least consolation in being cherished. And who cherished her? One whom all admired—one, to gain whose admiration, or even attention, every woman sighed. What was she before she knew Montfort? If she had not known Montfort, what would she have been even at this present? She recalled the hours of anguish, the long days of bitter mortification, the dull, the wearisome, the cheerless, hopeless, uneventful hours that were her lot when lying on her solitary sofa at Pisa, brooding over the romance of Armine and all its passion—the catastrophe of Ducie, and all its baseness. And now there was not a moment without kindness, without sympathy, without considerate attention and innocent amusement. If she were querulous, no one murmured; if she were capricious, every one yielded to her fancies; but if she smiled every one was happy. Dear, noble Montfort, thine was the magic that had worked this change! And for whom were all these choice exertions made? For one whom another had trifled with, deserted, betrayed! And Montfort knew it. He dedicated his life to the consolation of a despised woman. Leaning on the arm of Lord Montfort, Henrietta Temple might meet the eye of Ferdinand Armine and his rich bride, at least without feeling herself an object of pity!

Time had flown on. The Italian spring, with all its splendour, illumed the glittering palaces and purple shores of Naples. Lord Montfort and his friends were returning from Capua in his galley. Miss Temple was seated between her father and their host. The Ausonian clime, the beautiful scene, the sweet society, had all combined to produce a day of exquisite enjoyment. Henrietta Temple could not refrain from expressing her delight. Her eye sparkled like the star of eve that glittered over the glowing mountains; her cheek was as radiant as the sunset.

"Ah! what a happy day has this been!" she exclaimed.

The gentle pressure of her hand reminded her of the delight her exclamation had afforded one of her companions. Strange to say, that pressure was returned. With a trembling heart Lord Mont-fort leaned back in the galley; and yet, ere the morning sun had flung its flaming beams over the city Henrietta Temple was his betrothed.

BOOK VI.

CHAPTER I.

WHICH CONTAINS A REMARKABLE CHANGE OF FORTUNE.

ALTHOUGH Lord Montfort was now the received and recognised admirer of Miss Temple, their intended union was not immediate. Henrietta was herself averse to such an arrangement, but it was not necessary for her to urge this somewhat ungracious desire, as Lord Montfort was anxious that she should be introduced to his family before their marriage, and that the ceremony should be performed in his native country. Their return to England, therefore, was now meditated. That event was hastened by an extraordinary occurrence.

Good fortune in this world, they say, is seldom single. Mr. Temple at this moment was perfectly content with his destiny. Easy in his own circumstances, with his daughter's future prosperity about to be provided for by a union with the heir to one of the richest peerages in the kingdom, he had nothing to desire. His daughter was happy, he entertained the greatest esteem and affection for his future son-in-law, and the world went well with him in every respect.

It was in this fulness of his happiness that destiny, with its usual wild caprice, resolved "to gild refined gold, and paint the lily;" and it was determined that Mr. Temple should wake one morning among the wealthiest commoners of England.

There happened to be an old baronet, a great humourist, without any very near relations, who had been a godson of Mr. Temple's grandfather. He had never invited or encouraged any intimacy or connexion with the Temple family, but had always throughout life kept himself aloof from any acquaintance with them. Mr. Temple, indeed, had only seen him once, but certainly under rather disadvantageous circumstances. It was when Mr. Temple was minister at the German court, to which we have alluded, that Sir Temple Devereux was a visiter at the capital at which Mr. Temple was resident. The Minister had shown him some civilities, which was his duty: and Henrietta had appeared to please him. But he had not remained long at this place; had refused at the time to be more than their ordinary guest; and had never, by any letter, message, or other mode of communication, conveyed to them the slightest idea that the hospitable minister and his charming daughter had dwelt a moment on his memory. And yet Sir Temple Devereux had now departed from the world, where it had apparently been the principal object of his career to avoid ever making a friend, and had left the whole of his immense fortune to the Right Honourable Pelham Temple, by this bequest proprietor of one of the finest estates in the county of York, and a very considerable personal property, the accumulated savings of a large rental and a long life.

This was a great event. Mr. Temple had the most profound respect for property. It was impossible for the late baronet to have left his estate to an individual who could more thoroughly appreciate its possession. Even personal property was not without its charms—but a large landed estate, and a large landed estate in the county of York, and that large landed estate in the county of York flanked by a good round sum of three per cent. consols duly recorded in the Rotunda of Threadneedle street—it was a combination of wealth, power, consideration, and convenience, which exactly lit the ideal of Mr. Temple, and to the fascination of which I should rather think the taste of few men would be insensible. Mr. Temple being a man of family, had none of the awkward embarrassments of a parvenu to contend with. “It was the luckiest thing in the world,” he would say, “that poor Sir Temple was my grandfather’s godson, not only because in all probability it obtained us his fortune, but because he bore the name of Temple; we shall settle down in Yorkshire scarcely as strangers, we shall not be looked upon as a new family, and in a little time the whole affair will be considered rather one of inheritance than bequest. But, after all, what is it to me? It is only for your sake, Dicky, that I rejoice. I think it will please your family. I will settle every thing immediately on Henrietta. They shall have the gratification of knowing that their son is about to marry the richest heiress in England.”

The richest heiress in England! Henrietta Temple the richest heiress in England! Ah! how many feelings will that thought arise! Strange to say, the announcement of this extraordinary event brought less joy than might have been supposed to the heiress herself.

It was in her chamber and alone, that Henrietta Temple mused over this freak of destiny. It was in vain to conceal it, her thoughts recurred to Ferdinand. They might have been so happy! Why was he not true! And perhaps he had sacrificed himself to his family, perhaps even personal distress had driven him to the fatal deed. Her kind, feminine fancy conjured up every possible extenuation of his dire offence. She grew very sad. She could not believe that he was false at Ducie; O, no! she never could believe it! He must have been sincere: and if sincere, O! what a heart was lost there! What would she have not given to have been the means of saving him from all his sorrows! She recalled his occasional melancholy, his desponding words, and how the gloom left his brow and his eyes brightened when she fondly prophesied that she would restore the house. She might restore it now; and now he was another’s, and she—what was she? A slave like him. No longer her own mistress, at the only moment she had the power to save him. Say what they like, there is a pang in balked affection, for which no wealth, power, or place, watchful indulgence or sedulous kindness, can compensate. Ah! the heart, the heart!

CHAPTER II.

IN WHICH THE READER IS AGAIN INTRODUCED TO CAPTAIN ARMINE, DURING HIS VISIT TO LONDON.

WE must not forget our friends at Armine Place. Their career was not as eventful as that of the Temple family. Miss Grandison had resolved upon taking a house in London for the season, and had obtained a promise from her uncle and aunt to be her guest. Lady Armine’s sister was to join them from Bath. As for Ferdinand, the spring had gradually restored him to health, but not to his former frame of mind. He remained moody and indolent, incapable of exertion, and a prey to the darkest humours; circumstances however occurred, which rendered some energy on his part absolutely necessary. His creditors grew importunate, and the arrangement of his affairs, or departure from his native land, was an alternative now become inevitable. The month of April, which witnessed the arrival of the Temples and Lord Montfort in England, welcomed also to London Miss Grandison and her guests. A few weeks after, Ferdinand, who had evaded the journey with his family, and who would not on any account become a guest of his cousin, settled himself down at a quiet hotel in the vicinity of Grosvenor Square; but not quite alone, for almost at the last hour Glastonbury had requested permission to accompany him, and Ferdinand, who duly valued the society of the only person with whom he could converse about his broken fortunes and his blighted hopes without reserve, acceded to his wish with the greatest satisfaction.

A sudden residence in a vast metropolis, after a life of rural seclusion, has, without doubt, a very peculiar effect upon the mind. The immense population, the multiplicity of objects, the important interests hourly impressed upon the intelligence, the continually occurring events, the noise, the bustle, the general and widely-spread excitement, all combine to make us keenly sensible of our individual insignificance; and those absorbing passions, that in our solitude, fed by our imagination, have assumed such gigantic and substantial shapes, rapidly subside, by an almost imperceptible process, into less colossal proportions, and seem invested, as it were, with a more shadowy aspect. As Ferdinand Armine jostled his way through the crowded streets of London, urged on by his own harassing and inexorable affairs, and conscious of the impending peril of his career, while power and wealth dazzled his eyes in all directions, he began to look back upon the passionate past with feelings of less keen sensation than heretofore, and almost to regret that a fatal destiny, or his impetuous soul, had entailed upon him so much anxiety, and prompted him to reject the glittering cup of fortune that had been proffered to him so opportunely. He sighed for enjoyment and repose: the memory of his recent sufferings made him shrink from that reckless indulgence of the passions, of which the consequences had been so severe.

It was in this mood, exhausted by a visit to his lawyer, that he stepped into a military club, of which he was a member, and took up a newspaper. Caring little for politics, his eye wandered over, uninterested, its pugnacious leading articles and tedious parliamentary reports; and he was about to throw it down, when a paragraph caught his notice, which instantly engrossed all his attention. It was in “the Morning Post” that he thus read:—

“The Marquis of Montfort, the eldest son of the Duke of —, whose return to England we recently noticed, has resided for several years in Italy. His lordship is considered one of the most accomplished noblemen of the day, and was celebrated at Rome for his patronage of the arts. Lord Montfort will shortly be united to the beautiful Miss Temple, the only daughter of the Right Honourable Pelham Temple. Miss Temple is esteemed one of the richest heiresses in England, as she will doubtless inherit the whole of the immense fortune to which her father so unexpectedly acceded: Mr. Temple is a widower, and has no son. Mr. Temple was formerly our minister at several of the German courts, where he was distinguished by his abilities, and his hospitality to his travelling countrymen. It is said that the rent-roll of the Yorkshire estates of the late Sir Temple Devercux is not less than £15,000 per annum. The personal property also is very considerable. We understand that Mr. Temple has purchased the mansion of the Duke of *, in Grosvenor Square. Lord Montfort accompanied Mr. Temple and his amiable daughter to this country."

What a wild and fiery chaos was the mind of Ferdinand Armine, when he read this paragraph. The wonders it revealed succeeded each other with such rapidity, that for some time he was deprived of the power of reflection. Henrietta Temple in England!—Henrietta Temple one of the greatest heiresses in the country!—Henrietta Temple about to be immediately married to another! His Henrietta Temple, the Henrietta Temple who had joined her lips to his, whom he adored, and by whom he had been worshipped!—The Henrietta Temple whose beautiful lock was at this very moment on his heart!—The Henrietta Temple, for whom he had forfeited fortune, family, power, almost life!

O, woman, woman! Put not thy trust in woman! And yet, could he reproach her? Did she not believe herself trilled with by him, outraged, deceived, deluded, deserted? And did she, could she love another? Was there another, to whom she had poured forth her heart as to him, and all that beautiful flow of fascinating and unrivalled emotion? Was there another, to whom she had pledged her pure and passionate soul? Ah! no; he would not, he could not believe it. Light and false Henrietta could never be. She had been seen, she had been admired, she had been loved—who that saw her would not admire and love? and he was the victim of her pique, perhaps of her despair.

But, she was not yet married. They were, according to these lines, to be soon united. It appeared they had travelled together; that thought gave him a pang. Could he not see her? Could he not explain all? Could he not prove his heart had ever been true and fond? Could he not tell her all that had happened, all that he had suffered, all the madness of his misery; and could she resist that voice whose accents had once been her joy, that glance which had once filled her heart with rapture? And, when she found that Ferdinand, her own Ferdinand, had never deceived her, was worthy of her choice affection, and suffering even at this moment for her sweet sake, what were all the cold-blooded ties in which she had since involved herself? She was his, by an older and more ardent bond—should he not claim his right? Could she deny it!

Claim what? The hand of an heiress! Should it be said that an Armine came crouching for lucre, where he ought to have commanded for love? Never! Whatever she might think, his conduct had been faultless to her. It was not for Henrietta to complain. She was not the victim, if one, indeed, there might chance be. He had loved her; she had returned his passion; for her sake he had made the greatest of sacrifices, forfeited a splendid inheritance, and a fond and faithful heart. When he had thought of her before, pining perhaps in some foreign solitude, he had never ceased reproaching himself for his conduct, and had accused himself of deception and cruelty; but now, in this moment of her flush prosperity, "esteemed one of the richest heiresses in England," (he ground his teeth as he recalled that phrase,) and the affianced bride of a great noble, (his old companion, Lord Montfort, too; what a strange thing is life!) proud, smiling, and prosperous, while he was alone, with a broken heart, and worse than desperate fortunes, and all for her sake, his soul became bitter; he reproached her with want of feeling; he pictured her as void of genuine sensibility, he dilated on her indifference since they had parted; her silence, so strange, now no longer inexplicable; the total want of interest she had exhibited as to his career; he sneered at the lightness of her temperament; he cursed her caprice; he denounced her infernal treachery; in the distorted phantom of his agonized imagination, she became to him even an object of hatred.

Poor Ferdinand Armine! it was the first time he had experienced the maddening pangs of jealousy.

Yet how he had loved this woman! How he had doted on her. And now they might have been so happy! There is nothing that depresses a man so much as the conviction of had fortune. There seemed, in this sudden return, great fortune, and impending marriage of Henrietta Temple, such a combination as far as Ferdinand Armine was concerned, of vexatious circumstances; it would appear that he had been so near perfect happiness and missed it, that he felt quite weary of existence, and seriously meditated depriving himself of it.

It so happened that he had promised this day to dine at his cousin's; for Glastonbury, who was usually his companion, had accepted an invitation this day to dine with the noble widow of his old patron. Ferdinand, however, found himself quite incapable of entering into any society, and he hurried to his hotel to send a note of excuse to Brook street. As he arrived, Glastonbury was just about to step into a hackney-coach, so that Ferdinand had no opportunity of communicating his sorrows to his friend, even had he been inclined.

CHAPTER III.

IN WHICH GLASTONBURY MEETS THE VERY LAST PERSON IN THE WORLD HE EXPECTED, AND THE STRANGE CONSEQUENCES.

WHEN Glastonbury arrived at the mansion of the good old dutchess, he found nobody in the drawing-room but a young man of very distinguished appearance, whose person was unknown to him, but who, nevertheless, greeted him with remarkable cordiality. The good Glastonbury returned, with some confusion, his warm salutation.

"It is many years since we last met, Mr. Glastonbury," said the young man. "I am not surprised you have forgotten me. I am Lord Montfort; Digby, perhaps you recollect?"

"My dear child! my dear lord! You have indeed changed! You are a man, and I am a very old one."

"Nay! my dear sir, I do assure you I observe little change. Believe me, I have often recalled your image in my long absence, and I find now that my memory has not deceived me."

Glastonbury and his companion fell into some conversation about his lordship's travels, and residence at Rome, in the midst of which their hostess entered.

"I have asked you, my dear sir, to meet our family circle," said her grace, "for I do not think I can well ask you to meet any who love you better. It is long since you have seen Digby."

"Mr. Glastonbury did not recognise me, grandmamma," said Lord Montfort.

"These sweet children have all grown out of your sight, Mr. Glastonbury," said the dutchess, "but they are very good. And as for Digby, I really think he comes to see his poor grandmother every day."

The duke and dutchess, and two very young daughters, were now announced.

"I was so sorry that I was not at home when you called, Glastonbury," said his grace, "but I thought I should soon hear of you at grandmamma's."

"And, dear Mr. Glastonbury, why did you not come up and see me?" said the younger dutchess.

"And, dear Mr. Glastonbury, do you remember me?" said one beautiful daughter.

"And me, Mr. Glastonbury, me; I am Isabella."

Blushing, smiling, bowing, constrained from the novelty of his situation, and yet every now and then quite at ease when his ear recalled a familiar voice, dear Mr. Glastonbury was very gratified and very happy. The duke took him aside, and they were soon engaged in conversation.

"How is Henrietta to-day, Digby?" inquired Isabella. "I left her an hour ago; we have been riding, and expected to meet you all. She will be here immediately."

There was a knock, and soon the drawing-room door opened, and Miss Temple was announced.

"I must make papa's apologies," said Henrietta, advancing and embracing the old dutchess. "I hope he may get here in the evening: but he bade me remind your grace that your kind invitation was only provisionally accepted."

"He is quite right," said the old lady; "and indeed I hardly expected him, for he told me there was a public dinner which he was obliged to attend. I am sure that our dinner is a very private one, indeed," continued the old lady with a smile. "It is really a family party, though there is one member of the family here whom you do not know, my dear Miss Temple, and whom I am sure, you will love as much as all of us do. Digby, where is —?"

At this moment dinner was announced, Lord Montfort offered his arm to Henrietta. "There, lead the way," said the old lady; "the girls must bear themselves, for I have no young men to-day for them. I suppose man and wife must be parted, so I must take my son's arm; Mr. Glastonbury, you will hand down the dutchess." But, before Glastonbury's name was mentioned, Henrietta was halfway down stairs.

The duke and his son presided at the dinner. Henrietta sat on one side of Lord Montfort, his mother on the other. Glastonbury sat on the right hand of the duke, and opposite their hostess; the two young ladies in the middle. All the guests had been seated without Glastonbury and Henrietta recognising each other; and, as he sat on the same side of the table as Miss Temple, it was not until Lord Montfort asked Mr. Glastonbury to take wine with him that Henrietta heard a name that might well, indeed, turn her pale.

Glastonbury! It never entered into her head at the moment that it was the Mr. Glastonbury! whom she had known. Glastonbury!—what a name! What dreadful associations did it not induce! She looked forward—she caught the well-remembered visage—she sunk back in her chair. But Henrietta Temple had a strong mind; this was surely an occasion to prove it. Mr. Glastonbury's attention was not attracted to her: he knew, indeed, there was a lady at the table called Henrietta, but he was engrossed with his neighbours, and his eye never caught the daughter of Mr. Temple. It was not until the ladies rose to retire that Mr. Glastonbury beheld that form which he had not forgotten, and looked upon a lady whose name was associated in his memory with the most disastrous and mournful moments of his life. Miss Temple followed the dutchess out of the room, and Glastonbury, perplexed and agitated, resumed his seat.

But Henrietta was the prey of emotions far more acute and distracting. It seemed to her that she had really been unacquainted with the state of her heart until this sudden apparition of Glastonbury. How his image recalled the past! She had school-ed herself to consider it all a dream; now it lived before her. Here was one of the principal performers in that fatal tragedy of Armine. Glastonbury in the house—under the same roof as she! Where was Ferdinand? There was one at hand who could tell her. Was he married? She had enjoyed no opportunity of ascertaining since her return: she had not dared to ask. Of course he was married; but was he happy? And Glastonbury, who, if he did not know all, knew so much—how strange it must be to Glastonbury to meet her! Dear Glastonbury! She had not forgotten the days when she so fondly listened to Ferdinand's charming narratives of all his amiable and simple life! Dear, dear Glastonbury, whom she was so to love! And she met him now, and did not speak to him, or looked upon him as a stranger; and he, he would, perhaps, look upon her with pity, certainly with pain. O! life—what a heart-breaking thing is life! And our affections, our sweet and pure affections, fountains of such joy and solace, that nourish all things, and make the most barren and rigid soil teem with life and beauty—O! why do we disturb the flow of their sweet waters and pollute their immaculate and salutary source! Ferdinand, Ferdinand Armine, why were you false?

The door opened. Mr. Glastonbury entered, followed by the duke and his son. Henrietta was sitting in an easy chair—one of Lord Montfort's sisters, seated on an ottoman at her side, held her hand. Henrietta's eye met Glastonbury's; she bowed to him.

"How your hand trembles, Henrietta!" said the young lady.

Glastonbury approached her with a hesitating step. He blushed faintly—he looked exceedingly perplexed—at length he reached her, and stood before her, and said nothing.

"You have forgotten me, Mr. Glastonbury," said Henrietta; for it was absolutely necessary that some one should break the awkward silence, and she pointed to a chair at her side.

"That would indeed be impossible," said Glastonbury.

"O! you knew Mr. Glastonbury before," said the young lady. "Grandmamma, only think, Henrietta knew Mr. Glastonbury before."

"We were neighbours in Nottinghamshire," said Henrietta in a quick tone.

"Isabella," said her sister, who was seated at the piano, "the harp awaits you." Isabella rose, Lord Montfort was approaching Henrietta, when the old dutchess called to him.

Henrietta and Glastonbury were alone.

"This is a strange meeting, Mr. Glastonbury," said Henrietta.

What could poor Glastonbury say! Something he murmured, but not very much to the purpose. "Have you been in Nottinghamshire lately?" said Henrietta.

"I left it about ten days back with" (and here Glastonbury stopped) "with a friend," he concluded.

"I trust all your friends are well," said Henrietta, in a tremulous voice.

"No—yes—that is," said Glastonbury, "something better than they were."

"I am sorry that my father is not here," said Miss Temple; "he has a lively remembrance of all your kindness."

"Kindness, I fear," said Glastonbury, in a melancholy tone, "that was most unfortunate."

"We do not deem it so, sir," was the reply.

"My dear young lady," said Glastonbury, but his voice faltered as he added, "we have had great unhappiness."

"I regret it," said Henrietta; "you had a marriage, I believe, expected in your family?"

"It has not occurred," said Glastonbury.

"Indeed!"

"Alas! madam," said her companion, "if I might venture indeed to speak of one whom I will not name, and yet—"

"Pray speak, sir," said Miss Temple, in a kind, yet hushed voice.

"The child of our affections, madam, is not what he was. God, in his infinite mercy, has visited him with great afflictions."

"You speak of Captain Armine, sir!"

"I speak, indeed, of my broken-hearted Ferdinand; I would I could say yours. O! Miss Temple, he is a wreck."

"Yes! yes!" said Henrietta, in a low tone.

"What he has endured," continued Glastonbury, "passes all description of mine. His life has indeed been spared, but under circumstances that almost make me regret he lives."

"He has not married?" muttered Henrietta.

"He came to Ducie to claim his bride, and she was gone," said Glastonbury; "his mind sunk under the terrible bereavement. For weeks he was a maniac; and, though Providence spared him again to us, and his mind, thanks to God, is again whole, he is the victim of a profound melancholy, that seems to defy alike medical skill and worldly vicissitude."

"Digby, Digby!" exclaimed Isabella, who was at the harp, "Henrietta is fainting."

Lord Montfort rushed forward just in time to seize her cold hand.

"The room is too hot," said one sister.

"The coffee is too strong," said the other.

"Air," said the young dutchess.

Lord Montfort carried Henrietta into a distant room. There was a balcony opening into a garden. He seated her on a bench, and never quitted her side, but contrived to prevent any one approaching her. The women clustered together.

"Sweet creature!" said the old dutchess, "she often makes me tremble; she has but just recovered, Mr. Glastonbury, from a long and terrible illness."

"Indeed!" said Glastonbury.

"Poor dear Digby," continued her grace, "this will quite upset him again. He was in such spirits about her health the other day."

"Lord Montfort?" inquired Glastonbury.

"Our Digby. You know that he is to be married to Henrietta next month."

"Holy Virgin!" muttered Glastonbury; and, taking up Lord Montfort's hat by mistake, he seized advantage of the confusion, and effected his escape.

CHAPTER IV.

IN WHICH MR. GLASTONBURY INFORMS CAPTAIN ARMINE OF HIS MEETING WITH MISS TEMPLE.

It was still an early hour when Mr. Glastonbury arrived at his hotel. He understood, however, that Captain Armine had already returned and retired. Glastonbury knocked gently at his door, and was invited to enter. The good man was pale and agitated. Ferdinand was already in bed. Glastonbury took a chair and seated himself by his side.

"My dear friend, what is the matter?" said Ferdinand.

"I have seen her—I have seen her," said Glastonbury.

"Henrietta! seen Henrietta!" inquired Ferdinand.

Glastonbury nodded assent, but with a most rueful expression of countenance.

"What has happened! what did she say?" asked Ferdinand in a quick voice.

"You are two innocent lambs," said Glastonbury, wringing his hands.

"Speak—speak, my Glastonbury."

"I wish that my death could make you both happy," said Glastonbury: "but I fear that would do you no good."

"Is there any hope!" said Ferdinand.

"None," said Glastonbury. "Prepare yourself, my dear child, for the worst."

"Is she married?" inquired Ferdinand.

"No; but she is going to be."

"I know it," said Ferdinand.

Glastonbury stared.

"You know it! what, to Digby?"

"Digby, or whatever his name may be; damn him."

"Hush! hush!" said Glastonbury.

"May all the curses——"

"God forbid," said Glastonbury, interrupting him.

"Unfeeling, fickle, false, treacherous——"

"She is an angel," said Glastonbury, "a very angel. She has fainted, and nearly in my arms."

"Fainted! nearly in your arms! O! tell me all, tell me all, Glastonbury," exclaimed Ferdinand, starting up in his bed with an eager voice and sparkling eyes. "Does she love me?"

"I fear so," said Glastonbury.

"Fear!"

"O! how I pity her poor innocent heart," said Glastonbury.

"When I told her of all your sufferings—"

"Did you tell her! What then?"

"And she herself has barely recovered from a long and terrible illness."

"My own Henrietta! Now I could die happy," said Ferdinand.

"I thought it would break your heart," said Glastonbury.

"It is the only happy moment I have known for months," said Ferdinand.

"I was so overwhelmed that I lost my presence of mind," said Glastonbury. "I really never meant to tell you any thing. I do not know how I came into your room."

"Dear, dear Glastonbury, I am myself again!"

"Only think," said Glastonbury, "I never was so unhappy in my life."

"I have endured for the last four hours the tortures of the damned," said Ferdinand, "to think that she was going to be married, to be married to another; that she was happy, proud, prosperous, totally regardless of me, perhaps utterly forgetful of the past, and that I was dying like a dog in this cursed caravanserai—O! Glastonbury, nothing that I have ever endured has been equal to the hell of this day! And now you have come and made me comparatively happy. I shall get up directly."

Glastonbury looked quite astonished; he could not comprehend how this fatal intelligence could have produced effects so directly contrary to those he had anticipated. However, in answer to Ferdinand's reiterated inquiries, he contrived to give a detailed account of every thing that had occurred, and Ferdinand's running commentary continued to be one of constant self-congratulation.

"There is however one misfortune," said Ferdinand, "with which you are unacquainted, my dear friend."

"Indeed!" said Glastonbury, "I thought I knew enough."

"Alas! she has become a great heiress!"

"Is that it?" said Glastonbury.

"'Tis the devil," said Ferdinand. "Were it not for that, by the soul of my grandfather, I would tear her from the arms of this stripling!"

"Stripling!" said Glastonbury. "I never saw a truer nobleman in my life."

"The deuce," said Ferdinand.

"Nay! second scarcely to yourself. I could not believe my eyes," continued Glastonbury. "He was but a child when I saw him last, but so were you, Ferdinand. Believe me, he is no ordinary rival."

"Good-looking?"

"Altogether of a most princely presence. I have rarely met a personage so highly accomplished, or who more quickly impressed you with his moral and intellectual excellence."

"And they are positively engaged?"

"To be married next month," replied Glastonbury.

"O! Glastonbury, why do I live!" exclaimed Ferdinand, "why did I recover!"

"My dear child, but just now you were comparatively happy."

"Happy! you cannot mean to insult me Happy! O! is there in this world a thing so deplorable as I am!"

"I thought I did wrong to say any thing," said Glastonbury, speaking as it were to himself, "I have got a wrong hat too!"

Ferdinand made no observation. He turned himself in his bed, with his face averted from Glastonbury.

"Good night," said Glastonbury, after remaining some time in silence.

"Good night," said Ferdinand, in a faint and mournful tone.

CHAPTER V.

WHICH, ON THE WHOLE, IS PERHAPS AS REMARKABLE A CHAPTER AS ANY IN THE WORK.

WRETCHED as he was, the harsh business of life could not be neglected; Captain Armine was obliged to be in Lincoln's Inn by ten o'clock the next morning. It was on his return from his lawyer, as he was about to cross Berkeley Square, that a carriage suddenly stopped in the middle of the road, and a female hand apparently beckoned to him from the window. He was at first very doubtful, whether he were indeed the person to whom the signal was addressed, but as on looking around, there was not a single human being in sight, he at length slowly approached the equipage, from which a white handkerchief now waved with considerable agitation. Somewhat perplexed by this incident, the mystery was, however, immediately explained by the voice of Lady Bellair.

"You wicked man," said her little ladyship, in a great rage. "O! how I hate you! I could cut you into minced meat; that I could. Here I have been giving parties every night, all for you too. And you have been in town; never called on me. Tell me your name. How is your wife? O! you are not married. You should marry; I hate a ci-devant jeune homme. However, you can wait a little. Here, James, Thomas, Peter, what is your name, open the door and let him in. There, get in, get in; I have a great deal to say to you." And Ferdinand found that it was absolutely necessary to comply.

"Now, where shall we go?" said her ladyship; "I have got till two o'clock. I make it a rule to be at home every day from two till six, to receive my friends. You must come and call upon me. You may come every day if you like. Do not leave your card. I hate people who leave cards. I never see them; I order all to be burned. I cannot bear people who leave bits of paper at my house. Do you want to go anywhere!—You do not!—Why do not you? How is your worthy father, Sir Peter?—Is his name Sir Peter or Sir Paul!—Well, never mind; you know who I mean. And your charming mother, my favourite friend?—She is charming; she is quite one of my favourites.—And were not you to marry?—Tell me, why have you not!—Miss—Miss—you know whom I mean, whose grandfather was my son's friend. In town are they?—Where do they live?—Brook Street!—I will go and call upon them. There, pull the string, and tell him where they live."

And so, in a few minutes, Lady Bellair's carriage stopped opposite the house of Miss Grandison.

"Are they early risers?" said her ladyship; "I get up every morning at six. I dare say they will not receive me, but do you show yourself, and then they cannot refuse."

In consequence of this diplomatic movement, Lady Bellair effected an entrance. Leaning on the arm of Ferdinand, her ladyship was ushered into the morning-room, where she found Lady Armine and Katherine.

"My dear lady, how do you do? And my sweet miss!—O! your eyes are so bright, that it makes me young to look upon them! I quite love you, that I do.—Your grandfather and my poor son were bosom friends.—And, my dear lady, where have you been all this time? Here have I been giving parties every night, and all for you; for all my Bath friends; telling everybody about you; talking of nothing else; everybody longing to see you; and you have never been near me. My dinner parties are over; I shall not give any more dinners until June. But I have three evenings yet; to-night you must come to me, to-night, and Thursday, and Saturday; you must come on all three nights.—O! why did you not call upon me? I should have asked you to dinner.—I would have asked you to meet Lord Colonnade and Lady Ionia! They would have just suited you; they would have tasted you!—But I tell you what I will do; I will come and dine with you some day.—Now, when will you have me?—Let me see, when am I free?" So saying, her ladyship opened a little red book, which was her inseparable companion in London. "All this week I am ticketed; Monday, the Derricourts—dull, but then he is a duke. Tuesday I dine with Bonmot; we have made it up; he gives me a dinner. Wednesday—Wednesday—where is Wednesday? General Faneville, my own party. Thursday, the Maxburys—bad dinner, but good company. Friday, Waring Cutts—a famous house for eating; but that is not in my way; however, I must go, for he sends me pines. And Saturday I dine off a rabbit, by myself, at one o'clock, to go and see my dear, darling Lady St. Julian at Richmond. So it cannot be this or next week. I will send you a note; I will tell you to-night. And now I must go, for it is five minutes to two—I am always at home from two to six—I receive my friends—you may come every day—and you must come to see my new squirrel; my darling, funny, little grand-son gave it to me—and, my dear miss, where is that wicked Lady Grandison? Do you ever see her, or are you enemies?—She has got the estate, has not she?—She never calls upon me—tell her she is one of my greatest favourites—O! why does not she come?—I should have asked her to dinner; and now all my dinners are over till June. Tell me where she lives, and I will call upon her to-morrow."

So saying, and bidding them all farewell very cordially, her ladyship took Ferdinand's arm and retired.

Captain Armine returned to his mother and cousin, and sat an hour with them, until their carriage was announced. Just as he was going away, he observed Lady Bellair's little red book, which she had left behind.

"Poor Lady Bellair! what will she do?" said Miss Grandison; "we must take it to her immediately."

"I will leave it," said Ferdinand, "I shall pass her house."

Bellair House was the prettiest mansion in May Fair. It was a long building, in the Italian style, situated in the midst of gardens, which, though not very extensive, were laid out with so much art and taste, that it was very difficult to believe that you were in a great city. The house was furnished and adorned with all that taste for which Lady Bellair was distinguished. All the receiving-rooms were on the ground floor, and were all connected. Ferdinand, who remembered Lady Bellair's injunctions not to leave cards, attracted by the spot, and not knowing what to do with himself, determined to pay her ladyship a visit, and was ushered into an octagon library, lined with well-laden dwarf-cases of brilliant volumes, crowned with no lack of marble busts, bronzes, and Etruscan vases. On each side opened a magnificent saloon, furnished in that classic style which the late accomplished and ingenious Mr. Hope first rendered popular in this country. The wings, projecting far into the gardens, comprised respectively a dining-room and a conservatory of considerable dimensions. Isolated in the midst of the gardens was a long building, called the summer-room, lined with Indian matting, and screened on one side from the air merely by Venetian blinds. The walls of this chamber were almost entirely covered with caricatures and prints of the country seats of Lady Bellair's friends, all of which she took care to visit. Here also were her parrots, and some birds of a sweeter voice, a monkey, and the famous squirrel.

Lady Bellair was seated in a chair, the back of which was much higher than her head; at her side was a little table with writing materials, and on which also was placed a magnificent bell, by Benvenuto Cellini, with which her ladyship summoned her page, who, in the mean time, loitered in the hall.

"You have brought me my book!" she exclaimed, as Ferdinand entered with the mystical volume. "Give it me—give it me. Here I cannot tell Mrs. Fancourt what day I can dine with her. I am engaged all this week and all next, and I am to dine with your dear family when I like. But Mrs. Fancourt must choose her day, because they will keep. You do not know this gentleman?" she said, turning to Mrs. Fancourt. "Well, I shall not introduce you; he will not suit you; he is a fine gentleman, and only dines with dukes."

Mrs. Fancourt consequently looked very anxious for an introduction.

"General Faneville," Lady Bellair continued to a gentleman on her left, "what day do I dine with you? Wednesday. Is our party full? You must make room for him; he is my greatest favourite. All the ladies are in love with him."

General Faneville expressed his deep sense of the high honour; Ferdinand protested he was engaged on Wednesday; Mrs. Fancourt looked very disappointed that she had thus lost another opportunity of learning the name of so distinguished a personage.

There was another knock. Mrs. Fancourt departed. Lady Maxbury, and her daughter, Lady Selina, were announced.

"Have you got him?" asked Lady Bellair, very eagerly, as her new visitors entered.

"He has promised most positively," answered Lady Maxbury.

"Dear, good creature!" exclaimed Lady Bellair, "you are the dearest creature that I know! And you are charming," she continued, addressing herself to Lady Selina; "if I were a man, I would marry you directly. There, now, he (turning to Ferdinand) cannot marry you, because he is married already; but he should, if he were not. And how will he come?" inquired Lady Bellair.

"He will find his way," said Lady Maxbury.

"And I am not to pay any thing?" inquired Lady Bellair.

"Not any thing," said Lady Maxbury.

"I cannot bear paying," said Lady Bellair. "But will he dance, and will he bring his bows and arrows? Lord Dorfield protests 'tis nothing without the bows and arrows."

"What, the New Zealand chief, Lady Bellair?" inquired the general.

"Have you seen him?" inquired Lady Bellair, eagerly.

"Not yet," replied the gentleman.

"Well, then, you will see him to-night," said Lady Bellair, with an air of triumph. "He is coming to me to-night."

Ferdinand rose, and was about to depart.

"You must not go without seeing my squirrel," said her ladyship, "that my dear funny grandson gave me—he is such a funny boy! You must see it, you must see it," added her ladyship in a peremptory tone. "There, go out of that door; and you will find your way to my summer-room, and there you will find my squirrel."

The restless Ferdinand was content to quit the library, even with the stipulation of first visiting the squirrel. He walked through a saloon, entered the conservatory, emerged into the garden, and at length found himself in the long summer-room. At the end of the room a lady was seated looking over a book of prints; as she heard a footstep she raised her eyes, and the thunderstruck Ferdinand beheld—Henrietta Temple!

He was literally speechless; he felt rooted to the ground; all power of thought and motion alike deserted him. There he stood confounded and aghast. Nor indeed was his companion less disturbed. She remained with her eyes fixed on Ferdinand, with an expression of fear, astonishment, and distress impressed upon her features. At length Ferdinand in some degree rallied, and he followed the first impulse of his mind—when mind indeed returned to him—he moved to retire.

He had retraced half his steps, when a voice, if human voice indeed it were that sent forth tones so full of choking anguish, pronounced his name.

"Captain Armine!" said the voice.

How he trembled, yet mechanically obedient to his first impulse, he still proceeded to the door.

"Ferdinand!" said the voice.

He stopped, he turned, she waved her hand wildly, and then leaning her arm on the table, buried her face in it. Ferdinand walked to the table at which she was sitting; she heard his footsteps near her, yet she neither looked up nor spoke. At length he said in a still yet clear voice, "I am here."

"I have seen Mr. Glastonbury," she muttered.

"I know it," he replied.

"Your illness has distressed me," she said, after a slight pause, her face still concealed, and speaking in a very hushed tone. Ferdinand made no reply: and there was another pause, which Miss Temple broke.

"I would that we were at least friends," she said. The tears came into Ferdinand's eyes when she said this, for her tone, though low, was now sweet. It touched his heart.

"Our mutual feelings now are of little consequence," he replied.

She sighed, but made no reply. At length Ferdinand said, "Farewell, Miss Temple."

She started, she looked up, her mournful countenance harrowed his heart. He knew not what to do; what to say. He could not bear her glance, he in his turn averted his eyes.

"Our misery, is—has been great," she said, in a firmer tone, "but was it of my making?"

"The miserable can bear reproaches: do not spare me—my situation, however, proves my sincerity. I have erred, certainly," said Ferdinand; "I could not believe that you could have doubted me. It was a mistake," he added, in a tone of great bitterness.

Miss Temple again covered her face, as she said, "I cannot recall the past: I wish not to dwell upon it. I desire only to express to you the interest I take in your welfare, my hope that you may yet be happy. Yes! you can be happy, Ferdinand—Ferdinand, for my sake you will be happy."

"O! Henrietta, if Henrietta I indeed may call you, this is worse than that death I curse myself for having escaped."

"No, Ferdinand, say not that. Exert yourself only exert yourself, bear up against irresistible fate. Your cousin—every one says she is so amiable—surely—"

"Farewell, madam, I thank you for your counsel."

"No, Ferdinand, you shall not go, you shall not go, in anger. Pardon me, pity me, I spoke for your sake, I spoke for the best."

"I, at least, will never be false," said Ferdinand, with energy. "It shall not be said of me, that I broke vows consecrated by the finest emotions of our nature. No, no, I have had my dream; it was but a dream; but while I live, I will live upon its sweet memory."

"Ah! Ferdinand, why were you not frank, why did you conceal your situation from me?"

"No explanations of mine can change our respective situations," said Ferdinand; "I content myself therefore by saying, that it was not Miss Temple who had occasion to criticise my conduct."

"You are very bitter."

"The lady whom I injured, pardoned me. She is the most generous, the most amiable of her sex; if only in gratitude for all her surpassing goodness, I would never affect to offer her a heart which never can be hers. Katherine is indeed more than woman. Amid my many and almost unparalleged sorrows, one of my keenest pangs is the recollection that I should have clouded the life, even for a moment, of that admirable person. Alas! alas! that in all my misery, the only woman who sympathizes with my wretchedness, is the woman whom I have injured. And so delicate as well as so generous! She would not even inquire the name of the individual who had occasioned our mutual desolation."

"Would that she knew all!" murmured Henrietta, "would that I knew her!"

"Your acquaintance could not influence affairs. My very affection for my cousin, the complete appreciation which I now possess of her character, before so little estimated and so feebly comprehended by me, is the very circumstance, that, with my feelings, would prevent our union. She may—I am confident she will yet, be happy. I can never make her so. Our engagement in old days was rather the result of family arrangements than of any sympathy. I love her far better now than I did then, and yet she is the very last person in the world that I would marry. I trust, I believe that my conduct, if it have clouded for a moment her life, will not ultimately, will not long obscure it; and she has every charm and virtue, and accident of fortune, to attract the admiration and attention of the most favoured. Her feelings towards me at any time could have been but mild and calm. It is a mere abuse of terms to style such sentiments love. But," added he, sarcastically, "this is too delicate a subject for me to dilate on to Miss Temple."

"For God's sake do not be so bitter," she exclaimed; and then she added, in a voice half of anguish, half of tenderness, "let me never be taunted by those lips! O! Ferdinand, why cannot we be friends?"

"Because we are more than friends. To me such a word from your lips is mere mockery. Let us never meet. That alone remains for us. Little did I suppose that we ever should have met again. I go nowhere—I enter no single house; my visit here this morning was one of these whimsical vagaries which cannot be counted on. This old lady, indeed, seems, somehow or other, connected with our destiny. I believe I am greatly indebted to her?"

The page entered the room. "Miss Temple," said the lad, "my lady bid me say the dutchess and Lord Montfort were here."

Ferdinand started—and darting, almost unconsciously, a glance of fierce reproach at the miserable Henrietta, he rushed out of the room; and made his escape from Bellair House without re-entering the library.

CHAPTER VI.

CONTAINING AN EVENING ASSEMBLY AT BELLAIR HOUSE.

SEATED on an ottoman in the octagon library, occasionally throwing a glance at her illuminated and crowded saloons, or beckoning, with a fan almost as long as herself, to a distant guest, Lady Bellair received the world on the evening of the day that had witnessed the strange rencontre between Henrietta Temple and Ferdinand Armine. Her page, who stood at the library door in a new fancy dress, received the announcement of the company from the other servants, and himself communicated the information to his mistress.

"Mr. Million de Stockville, my lady," said the page.

"Hem!" said her ladyship, rather gruffly, as, with no very amiable expression of countenance, she bowed, with her haughtiest dignity, to a rather common-looking personage in a very gorgeously embroidered waistcoat.

"Lady Ionias Colonnade, my lady."

Lady Bellair bestowed a smiling nod on this fair and classic dame, and even indicated, by a movement of her fan, that she might take a seat on her ottoman.

"Sir Ratcliff and Lady Armine, my lady, and Miss Grandison."

"Dear, good people!" exclaimed Lady Bellair, "how late you are! and where is your wicked son! There, go into the next room, go, go, and see the wonderful man. Lady Ionias, you must know Lady Armine; she is like you; she is one of my favourites. Now, then, there all of you go together. I will not have anybody stay here, except my niece. This is my niece," Lady Bellair added, pointing to a very young lady seated by her side; "I give this party for her."

"General Faneville, my lady."

"You are very late," said Lady Bellair.

"I dined at Lord Rochfort's," said the general, bowing.

"Rochfort's! O! where are they?—where are the Rochfort's! they ought to be here. I must—I will see them. Do you think Lady Rochfort wants a nursery governess! Because I have a charming person who would just suit her. Go and find her out, general, and inquire; and if she do not want one, find out some one who does. Ask Lady Maxbury. There, go—go."

"Mr. and Miss Temple, my lady."

"O! my darling!" said Lady Bellair, "my real darling! sit by me. I sent Lady Ionias away, because I determined to keep this place for you. I give this party entirely in your honour, so you ought to sit here. You are a good man," she continued, addressing Mr. Temple; "but I can't love you as well as your daughter."

"I should be too fortunate," said Mr. Temple, smiling.

"I knew you when you eat pap," said Lady Bellair, laughing.

"Mrs. Montgomery Floyd, my lady."

Lady Bellair assumed her coldest and haughtiest glance. Mrs. Montgomery appeared more gorgeous than ever. The splendour of her sweeping train almost required a page to support it; she held a bouquet which might have served for the centre-piece of a dinner-table. A slender youth, rather distinguished in appearance, simply dressed, with a rose-bud just twisted into his black coat, but whose person distilled odours whose essence might have exhausted a conservatory, lounged at her side.

"May I have the honour to present to your ladyship Lord Catchinwhocan," breathed forth Mrs. Montgomery, exulting in her companion, perhaps in her conquest.

Lady Bellair gave a short and ungracious nod. Mrs. Montgomery recognised Mr. and Miss Temple. "There, go, go," said Lady Bellair, interrupting her, "nobody must stop here; go and see the wonderful man in the next room."

"Lady Bellair is so strange," whimpered Mrs. Montgomery in an apologetical whisper to Miss Temple, and she moved away, covering her retreat by the graceful person of Lord Catchinwhocan.

"Some Irish guardsman, I suppose," said Lady Bellair. "I never heard of him; I hate guardsmen."

"Rather a distinguished looking man, I think," said Mr. Temple.

"Do you think so?" said Lady Bellair, who was always influenced by the last word. "I will ask him for Thursday and Saturday. I think I must have known his grandfather. I must tell him not to go about with that horrid woman. She is so very fine, and she uses musk; she puts me in mind of the Queen of Sheba," said the little lady, laughing, "all precious stones and frankincense. I quite hate her."

"I thought she was quite one of your favourites, Lady Bellair!" said Henrietta Temple, rather maliciously.

"A Bath favourite, my dear, a Bath favourite. I wear my old bonnets at Bath, and use my new friends; but in town I have old friends and new dresses."

"Lady Frederick Berrington, my lady."

"O! my dear Lady Frederick, now I will give you a treat. I will introduce you to my sweet, sweet friend, whom I am always talking to you of. You deserve to know her; you will taste her, there, sit down, sit by her, and talk to her, and make love to her."

"Lady Womandeville, my lady."

"Ah! she will do for the lord—she loves a lord. My dear lady, you come so late, and yet I am always so glad to see you. I have such a charming friend for you, the handsomest, most fashionable, witty person, quite captivating, and his grandfather was one of my dearest friends. What is his name? what is his name? Lord Catchinwhoan. Mind, I introduce you to him, and ask him to your house very often."

Lady Womandeville smiled, expressed her delight, and moved on.

Lord Montfort, who had arrived before the Temples, approached the ottoman.

"Is the dutchess here?" inquired Henrietta, as she shook hands with him.

"And Isabella," he replied. Henrietta arose, and, taking his arm, bid adieu to Lady Bellair.

"God bless you," said her ladyship, with great emphasis. "I will not have you speak to that odious Mrs. Floyd, mind."

When Lord Montfort and Henrietta succeeded in discovering the dutchess, she was in the conservatory, which was gayly illumined with coloured lamps among the shrubs. Her grace was conversing with great cordiality with a lady of very prepossessing appearance, and in whom the traces of a beauty once distinguished were indeed still considerable, and her companion, an extremely pretty person, in the very bloom of girlhood. Lord Montfort and Henrietta were immediately introduced to these ladies, as Lady Armine and Miss Grandison. After the scene of the morning, it was not very easy to deprive Miss Temple of her equanimity; after that shock, indeed, no incident connected with the Armine family could be very surprising; she was even desirous of becoming acquainted with Miss Grandison, and she congratulated herself upon the opportunity which had so speedily offered itself to gratify her wishes. The dutchess was perfectly delighted with Lady Armine, whose manners, indeed, were very fascinating; between the families there was some distant connection of blood, and Lady Armine, too, had always retained a lively sense of the old duke's services to her son. Henrietta had even to listen to iniquities made after Ferdinand, and she learned that he was recovering from an almost fatal illness, that he could not yet endure the fatigues of society, and that he was even living at a hotel for the sake of quiet. Henrietta watched the countenance of Katherine, as Lady Armine gave this information. It was serious, but not disturbed. Her grace did not separate from her new friends the whole of the evening, and they parted with a mutually expressed wish that they might speedily and often meet. The dutchess pronounced Lady Armine the most charming person she ever met, while, on the other hand, Miss Grandison was warm in her admiration of Henrietta Temple and Lord Montfort, whom she thought quite worthy even of so rare a prize.

CHAPTER VII.

CONTAINING A VERY IMPORTANT COMMUNICATION.

BETWEEN the unexpected meeting with Captain Armine in the morning, and the evening assembly at Bellair House, a communication had been made by Miss Temple to Lord Montfort, which ought not to be quite unnoticed. She had returned home with his mother and himself, and her silence and depression had not escaped him. Soon after their arrival they were left alone, and then Henrietta said, "Digby, I wish to speak to you!"

"My own!" said Lord Montfort, as he seated himself by her on the sofa; and took her hand.

Miss Temple was calm, but he would have been a light observer, who had not detected her suppressed agitation.

"Dearest Digby," she continued, "you are so generous and so kind, that I ought to feel no reluctance in speaking to you upon this subject; and yet it pains me very much." She hesitated—

"I can only express my sympathy with any sorrow of yours, Henrietta," said Lord Montfort. "Speak to me as you always do, with that frankness which so much delights me."

"Let your thoughts recur to the most painful incident of my life, then," said Henrietta.

"If you require it," said Lord Montfort, in a serious tone.

"It is not my fault, dearest Digby, that a single circumstance connected with that unhappy event should be unknown to you. I wished originally that you should know all. I have a thousand times since regretted that your consideration for my feelings should ever have occasioned an imperfect confidence between us; and something has occurred to-day, which makes me lament it most bitterly."

"No, no, dearest Henrietta; you feel too keenly," said Lord Montfort.

"Indeed, Digby, it is so," said Henrietta, very mournfully.

"Speak, then, dearest Henrietta."

"It is necessary that you should know the name of that person who once exercised an influence over my feelings, which I never affected to disguise to you."

"Is it indeed necessary?" inquired Lord Montfort.

"It is for my happiness," replied Henrietta.

"Then, indeed, I am anxious to learn it."

"He is in this country," said Henrietta; "he is in this town; he may be in the same room with you to-morrow; he has been in the same room with me even this day."

"Indeed!" said Lord Montfort.

"He bears a name not unknown to you," said Henrietta, "a name, too, that I must teach myself to mention, and yet——"

Lord Montfort rose and took a pencil and a sheet of paper from the table. "Write it," he said in a most kind tone.

Henrietta took the pencil, and wrote—"AR-MINE."

"The son of Sir Ratcliffe?" said Lord Montfort.

"The same," replied Henrietta.

"You heard then of him last night?" inquired her companion.

"Even so; of that, too, I was about to speak."

"I am aware of the connexion of Mr. Glastonbury with the Armine family," said Lord Montfort, very quietly.

There was a dead pause. At length Montfort said, "Is there any thing you wish me to do?"

"Much," said Henrietta. "Dearest Digby," she continued, after a moment's hesitation, "do not misinterpret me; my heart, if such a heart be indeed worth possessing, is yours. I can never forget who solaced me in all my misery; I can never forget all your delicate tenderness, my Digby. Would that I could make a return to you more worthy of all your goodness; but, if the grateful devotion of my life can repay you, you shall be satisfied."

He took her hand and pressed it to his lips. "It is of you, and of your happiness, that I can alone think," he murmured.

"Now let me tell you all," said Henrietta, with desperate firmness. "I have done this person great injustice."

"Hah!" said Lord Montfort.

"It cuts me to the heart," said Henrietta.

"You have then misconceived his conduct?" inquired Lord Montfort.

"Utterly."

"It is indeed a terrible situation for you," said Lord Montfort; "for all of us," he added, in a lower tone.

"No, Digby; not for all of us; not even for myself; for, if you are happy, I will be. But for him—yes! I will not conceal it from you—I feel for him."

"Your destiny is in your own hands, Henrietta."

"No, no, Digby; do not say so," exclaimed Miss Temple, very earnestly; "do not speak in that tone of sacrifice. There is no need of sacrifice; there shall be none. I will not—I do not falter. Be you firm. Do not desert me in this moment of trial. It is for support I speak; it is for consolation. We are bound together by ties the purest, the holiest. Who shall sever them? No! Digby, we will be happy; but I am interested in the destiny of this unhappy person. You—you can assist me in rendering it more serene; in making him, perhaps, not less happy than ourselves."

"I would spare no labour," said Lord Montfort.

"O! that you would not!" exclaimed Miss Temple. "You are so good, so noble! You would sympathize even with him. What other man in your situation would?"

"What can be done?"

"Listen: he was engaged to his cousin, even on that fatal day when we first met; a lady with every charm and advantage that one would think could make a man happy; young, noble, and beautiful; of a most amiable and generous disposition, as her subsequent conduct has proved; and of immense wealth."

"Miss Grandison?" said Lord Montfort.

"Yes: his parents looked forward to their union with delight, not altogether unmixed with anxiety. The Armines, with all their princely possessions, are greatly embarrassed, from the conduct of the last head of their house. Ferdinand himself has, I grieve to say, inherited too much of his grandfather's imprudent spirit; his affairs, I fear, are terribly involved. When I knew him, papa was, as you are aware, a very poor man. This marriage would have cured all: my Digby, I wish it to take place."

"How can we effect it?" asked Lord Montfort.

"Become his friend, dear Digby. I always think you can do any thing. Yes! my only trust is in you. O, my Digby! make us all happy."

Lord Montfort rose, and walked up and down the room, apparently in profound meditation. At length he said, "Rest assured, Henrietta, that to secure your happiness nothing shall be ever wanting on my part. I will see Mr. Glastonbury on this subject. At present, dearest, let us think of lighter things."

CHAPTER VIII.

WHICH IS RATHER STRANGE.

It was on the morning after the assembly at Bellair House that Ferdinand was roused from his welcome slumbers, for he had passed an almost sleepless night, by his servant bringing him a note, and telling him that it had been left by a lady in a carriage. He opened it, and read as follows:—

"Silly, silly Captain Armine! why did you not come to my Vauxhall last night? I wanted to present you to the fairest damsel in the world, who is a great fortune too, but that you don't care about. When are you going to be married! Miss Grandison looked charming, but disconsolate without her knight. Your mother is an angel, and the Dutchess of—— is quite in love with her. Your father, too, is a very worthy man. I love your family very much. Come and call upon poor old dotting bedridden H. B., who is at home every day from two to six to receive her friends. Has charming Lady Armine got a page? I have one that would just suit her. He teases my poor squirrels, that I am obliged to turn him away; but he is a real treasure. That fine lady, Mrs. Montgomery Floyd, would give her cars for him; but I love your mother much more, and so she shall have him. He shall come to her to-night. All the world takes tea with H. B. on Thursday and Saturday."

"One o'clock!" said Ferdinand. "I may as well get up, and call in Brook Street, and save my mother from this threatened infliction. Heigho! Day after day, and each more miserable than the other. How will this end?"

When Ferdinand arrived in Brook Street, he went up stairs without being announced, and found in the drawing-room, besides his mother and Katherine, the dutchess, Lord Montfort, and Henrietta Temple.

The young ladies were in their riding-habits, Henrietta appeared before him, the same Henrietta whom he had met, for the first time, in the plaisance at Armine. Retreat was impossible. Her grace received Ferdinand very cordially, and reminded him of old days. Henrietta bowed, but she was sitting at some distance with Miss Grandison, looking at some work. Her occupation covered her confusion. Lord Montfort came forward with extended hand.

"I have the pleasure of meeting a very old friend," said his lordship.

Ferdinand just touched his lordship's finger, and bowed rather stiffly; then turning to his mother he gave her Lady Bellair's note. "It concerns you more than myself," he observed.

"You were not at Lady Bellair's last night, Captain Armine," said her grace.

"I never go anywhere," was the answer.

"He has been a great invalid," said Lady Armine.

"Where is Glastonbury, Ferdinand?" said Lady Armine. "He never comes near us."

"He goes every day to the British Museum."

"I wish he would take me," said Katherine.

"I have never been. Have you?" she inquired, turning to Henrietta.

"I am ashamed to say never," replied Henrietta. "It seems to me that London is the only city of which I know nothing."

"Ferdinand," said Katherine, "I wish you would go with us to the Museum some day. Miss Temple would like to go. You know Miss Temple," she added, as if she of course supposed he had not that pleasure.

Ferdinand bowed; Lord Montfort came forward, and turned the conversation to Egyptian antiquities. When a quarter of an hour had passed, Ferdinand thought that he might now withdraw.

"Do you dine at home, Katherine, to-day?" he inquired.

Miss Grandison looked at Miss Temple;—the young ladies whispered.

"Ferdinand," said Katherine, "what are you going to do!"

"Nothing—particular."

"We are going to ride, and Miss Temple wishes you would come with us."

"I should be very happy; but I have some business to attend to."

"O! dear Ferdinand, that is what you always say. You really appear to me to be the most busy person in the world."

"Pray come, Captain Armine," said Lord Montfort.

"Thank you; it is really not in my power." His hat was in his hand; he was begging her grace to bear his compliments to the duke, when Henrietta rose from her seat, and, coming up to him, said—"Do, Captain Armine, come with us; I ask it as a favour."

That voice!—O! it came o'er his ear "like the sweet south"—it unmanned him quite. He scarcely knew where he was. He trembled from head to foot. His colour deserted him, and the unlucky hat fell to the ground; and yet she stood before him awaiting his reply—calm, quite calm—serious—apparently a little anxious. The dutchess was in earnest conversation with his mother. Lord Montfort had walked up to Miss Grandison, and apparently was engaged in arranging a pattern for her. Ferdinand and Henrietta were quite unobserved. He looked up—he caught her eye—and then he whispered—"This is hardly fair."

She stretched forth her hand, took his hat, and laid it on the table; then, turning to Katherine, she said, in a tone which seemed to admit of no doubt, "Captain Armine will ride with us;" and she seated herself by Lady Armine.
